To brighten his solitude the supposed Kelly was presented with two bottles of stout and a huge hunk of bread-and-cheese, which he accepted with a forced smile of thanks.

That day, to his evident satisfaction, Billy, the old excursion horse of the "Kenmare Arms," had his dinner of oats supplemented with a liberal allowance of bread-and-cheese.

After a weary hour, which a cigar failed to enliven, a ragged urchin appeared, whom Fitzgerald engaged with the promise of half-a-crown, to guard the vehicle and its contents; the gentleman then directed his steps towards the path taken by his party of tourists.

They were sitting under the famous tree, which, gnarled and aged beyond all reckoning, has still sprung up since the roof of the Abbey fell, a mute but emphatic witness of the great antiquity of the walls surrounding it, ragged, ivy-grown, and picturesque.

The travellers were partaking of sandwiches, cold fowl, and sherry, and Fitzgerald devoutly wished he could join them, instead of hanging about in the background like a shabby pickpocket.

Gladys rose first, and began gathering a nosegay of the pretty pink daisies growing in the soft turf.

"What lovely red berries those are! I wonder if I could reach them," she said, looking longingly at the rich scarlet clusters standing out bravely against the grey wall above her head.

She swung herself lightly up on a ledge of rock, but still the berries hung tantalisingly above her grasp, and she was obliged to abandon the attempt, and rejoined her friends under the tree.

Fitzgerald followed her presently with a huge handful of the coveted berries, which he had easily reached, taking off his gloves as he scrambled up the wall.

"I gathered these for the young lady, if she will accept them," he said, with a bow which was far from being the awkward gesture he intended to make.

"Thank you," said Gladys, with her goddess-like smile, "how kind of you to get them."

As Fitzgerald transferred the fruit into Gladys's hand, three pairs of eyes lighted simultaneously upon the cameo of the monkey's face worn on the pseudo-driver's finger, and Mr. Fielding, his sister, and Gladys, exchanged glances of surprise.

"That is a nice ring you wear, Kelly, where did you get it?" asked Mr. Fielding, watching the man's face narrowly.

Fitzgerald blushed with vexation at having forgotten his glove, and stammered:

"Oh, I got it as a present from my late master!"

"An odd present for a gentleman to make his servant; a five-pound note would have done you more good. Let me examine the ring a little closer. It is beautifully cut."

As soon as possible Fitzgerald withdrew from the scrutiny that was becoming awkward, but he little suspected the great cause for astonishment his companions had.

"That man is certainly a rogue," said Mr. Fielding, as soon as Fitzgerald had disappeared. "The ring he wears belongs without any doubt to Phil's friend, and this man has stolen it either last night or this morning. There is no possible question of its being the same ring."

"But, Uncle George, if he had stolen it, he surely would have hidden it, instead of wearing it so conspicuously," said Glady pleadingly.

"He couldn't get it off his finger—it was quite fast, so he wore gloves to hide it. The rascal! You both saw how he blushed when I spoke of the gloves, and asked how he came by the ring. I am sure the fellow is guilty, and we must put him under arrest. It is rather an awkward business; he has noticed our suspicions, and I am afraid he will sneak away before we arrive again at Kenmare. I have it! We will return by way of Killarney, and there, under pretence of getting a glass of wine, we can give him in charge of the police."

"It is our duty to Phil's friend to have him arrested, I suppose?"

"Unquestionably!"

"Poor fellow, perhaps he is innocent," said Gladys, a troubled look shading her lovely eyes.

Fortunately there were plenty of sign-posts, or Fitzgerald would have been hopelessly at sea when told to return by way of Killarney.

His passengers, including Gladys, were surprisingly silent and self-contained during the homeward route, a state of mind which he could only attribute to fatigue.

Arrived at the hotel in Killarney, the ladies and gentlemen descended and disappeared within doors, and directly after, to Fitzgerald's amazement, two policemen advanced, and taking him by both arms, announced that he was their prisoner.

"Confound that ring, I thought it would bring me into trouble!" he mentally ejaculated. "But how ready these strangers are to jump at a conclusion. How could they know but that Kelly the car-driver might not honestly have such a trinket?"

Digitized by Google

It would not do to explain the ridiculous affair until the departure of Gladys and her friends, so Hugh Fitzgerald allowed himself to be ignominiously led away to prison for the theft of his own property.

As he was turning the corner, flanked by the two policemen, he heard light footsteps behind him; Gladys Fenwick darted forward, pressed something in the prisoner's hand, and flew away again, as swiftly as she had come.

Fitzgerald opened his hand and saw a bright gold sovereign lying in the palm.

"The dear little girl, she was sorry for me, and gave me this money as a consolation. Bless her kind heart!" he said, as something very like a tear dimmed his eye.

* * * * *

Six weeks later, Hugh Fitzgerald, walking with a friend on the quay at Queenstown, saw Gladys Fenwick and her aunt approaching.

To his delight his friend advanced to meet them, shaking hands cordially.

Fitzgerald was presented in due time, and the desire of his heart was gratified, his right to address Gladys was established.

She in her turn was nothing loth to having the tall, handsome Englishman for a cavalier, and they had many a pleasant stroll together on the beach.

Gladys had often noticed what seemed only an ordinary English sovereign attached to Mr. Fitzgerald's watch-chain, and one day she jokingly asked him if, in all his wanderings, he had found no rarer keepsake.

"I prize it more than anything else I own," he answered quietly.

Reversing the coin he showed Gladys engraved on the other side:

"Killarney, July 7th, 1903."

"We were there at that date! How odd we did not meet!" she exclaimed. "But why do you wear the sovereign, all the same?"

"I will tell you some time, perhaps. Not now."

* * * * *

A few days later there was great excitement among the bathers at Whitepoint. A young lady, Miss Fenwick, had ventured beyond her depth, and no one was expert enough to swim out to save her.

A gentleman walking along the beach, hearing of what had happened, sprang into the waves with a white, anxious face, and, as Gladys Fenwick knew that her strength was going and she must sink, Hugh Fitzgerald's strong arms clasped her and drew her back to life.

* * * * *

"Gladys," Hugh Fitzgerald said, one moonlit evening on the sands, "I have a confession to make, and I want to tell you the secret of the gold coin I wear. I prize it because you gave it to me."

"I gave it to you? You are surely mistaken!"

Fitzgerald led her to a seat on the sea-wall, and told how his love for her had commenced when he saw her on the balcony at Kenmare, and how, for the sake of seeing her again, he had disguised himself as a peasant.

The fate that had overtaken him he need not describe, as she saw him arrested.

"I have so wondered where I had seen your face before! It was not surprising that I could not identify you," said Gladys, in astonishment. "But how did you escape from the prison?"

"Oh, that was easy enough! As soon as I was sure you had gone, I wrote a few words in pencil on my card to the landlord at the Killarney hotel, and I was released immediately. I trusted to the people at Kenmare not betraying me, and I was not mistaken in them."

"You certainly are fond of an adventure," said Gladys.

"Can you forgive such an impostor, Gladys? Do forgive me and love me, for I want you to be my wife, darling."

"I ought to have proper pride, and order you away for ever, but you saved my life, and—I love you," said Gladys shyly.

Lucy Blake.

£500 IN CASH PRIZES!

CASH DOWN. CASH DOWN. CASH DOWN.

First Prize £250. Second Prize £100. Third Prize £50.

AND ONE HUNDRED PRIZES OF £1 EACH.

The Editor of Pearson's Weekly is offering the above magnificent prizes for the solution of certain sets of letters which are published in that paper each week. This competition will form a most agreeable and profitable pastime for the long winter evenings, and can be entered by both old and young.

Everyone has an equal opportunity of winning the prizes. The first prize of £250 will be given to the competitor from whom the Editor receives the best list under the published conditions, and the other prizes will be awarded in order of merit.

Enter now for this great competition. You will find full particulars of it in the issue of Pearson's Weekly now on sale. Copies containing the sets already published can be obtained from any newsagent or direct from these offices.

£500 IN CASH PRIZES!

Digitized by Google

A Crucial Test.

"AND you think he loves you?" "I am afraid he does. I sang to him for an hour and a half last night, and when I stopped he asked me to go on."

Would Earn His Money.

TOMMY: "Do you love my sister?" Suitor: "Why do you ask?" Tommy: "Well, she said she'd give a shilling to know, and I want that shilling."

A Narrow Escape.

"I read an account of how a girl fell over forty feet without killing herself." "Good gracious! How did she do it?" "Tried to get out of a tramcar with exactly twenty men in it."

Encouragement!

MR. RICH: "I doubt if my daughter ever gave you any encouragement!" Mr. Suitor: "Most substantial encouragement, my dear sir! She said you were the most generous of men!"

It was His Barber!

"OH, do tell me who that fine, handsome, foreign-looking gentleman is? He looked as if he remembered you, George!" "Oh, yes. I frequently saw him some time back, but now I shave myself!"

Cause and Effect.

MRS. BLIFFERS: "Your old friend has such a sad face. Why is it?" Mr. Bliffers: "Years ago he proposed to a very beautiful girl, and——" Mrs. Bliffers: "And she refused him?" Mr. Bliffers: "No. She married him."

Plain Language.

SHE: "He didn't succeed in convincing her of his argument after all." He: "No; he merely made her indignant." "But his explanation was clear." "Yes, but that's where he made his mistake. He told her it was as 'plain as the nose on her face.'"

Too Expensive a Luxury.

"I KNOW we are poor, dear papa," said Evelyn, nestling her head against his shoulder, "but Charles is brave and hopeful, and he says that love will make a way." "I know it will," said the old banker grimly. "It has made away with two tons of best coal and two pounds' worth of gas already this winter."

Irretrievable.

"WHY is it," he asked, "that beautiful women are always the most stupid?" "Sir," she replied, "am I to understand that you desire to cast reflections upon my mental capacity?" "Oh, no," he hurriedly returned; "I have always said that you were one of the cleverest girls I ever——" But he did not finish. Before he could do so he realised that he had said the wrong thing, and could never make it right.

Depends on Circumstances.

EDYTHE: "Don't you think that character in a young man is everything?" Ethel: "Oh, yes; if he has nothing else."

Compassionate Girl.

HE: "Then I may live upon hope until next Sunday evening?" She: "Oh, poor fellow, is it as bad as that? Here, I'll lend you enough to buy a meal."

His View.

SHE: "From a purely psychological standpoint, do you think a man can give true and enduring love to two women?" The Professor: "Only until one or the other finds it out, Miss Tompkins."

A Cautious Girl.

CLARA: "I'm not going to tell him where I want to go on a honeymoon until after we are married." Maud: "Why not?" "Because I don't want him to break off the engagement."

Revenge!

FRANK: "I've got even with James at last." Edward: "How did you do it?" Frank: "I gave his girl a pair of pretty vases, and he will be ruined in keeping them filled with flowers."

Why He was Going.

CAPTAIN SLINGER: "Yes, Miss Maud. I am going to try my hand at shooting big game! I sail next week!" The Little Sister: "I suppose you find it very hard to hit the little birds, Captain Slinger?"

Then Trouble Began.

MR. JONES: "My dear, do you know that you have one of the best voices in the world?" Mrs. Jones: "Indeed! Do you really think so?" Mr. Jones: "I certainly do; otherwise it would have been worn out long ago."

He Went Quickly.

JOHNNY DUDE: "Julia, my little cherub, when does your sister Emma return?" Julia: "I don't know." "Didn't she say anything before she went away?" "She said if you came to see her, that she'd be gone till Doomsday."

Surprising in these Days.

"THEY had one of the strangest marriages recorded for a long time." "In what respect?" "In every respect. Why, the parents on both sides were present, there was nothing sudden or secret about it, and their own clergyman performed the ceremony."

The Origin of it All.

NAOMI: "George, I believe that love brings us anguish as well as bliss." "So do I." "Did you ever experience that restlessness, that anxiety, that positive pain, that——" "Certainly, love." "And what do you think caused it all?" "Indigestion!"

Hidden Treasure.

MISS MAINCHANCE: "I suppose you've heard of my engagement to Mr. Jenks?" Miss Ascott: "Yes; and I confess I was surprised. You told me once that you wouldn't marry him for a million." Miss Mainchance: "I know, dear, but I discovered later that he had two millions."

Two Reasons for the Change.

"DARLING," said the young man, as he tenderly raised the lovely head from the place where it had rested an hour or more, got up, sat down again on the other side of the beautiful maiden, and once more drew the golden curls to his bosom, "you have no objection to a slight change of position, have you?" "No, Alfred," she murmured softly, "your heart is on this side." "Yes, my angel," responded the young man, his voice trembling with deep feeling, "and my waistcoat will now get worn alike on both sides."

Digitized by Google

A FRIEND IN NEED.

Telling How the Unexpected Happened.

"I DON'T care, I'm happy," said Frank.

"I'm sure I don't care, I'm happy—perfectly happy. Don't see how I could be more so," said Nellie, in a hopeful tone of voice.

Neither was looking at the other. Each tried to be absorbed in a book; but certainly neither was absorbed, for on the average, during the entire afternoon, they had made remarks similar to the foregoing at least every ten minutes.

"Did you say, Nellie," continued Frank, just a trifle doubtfully, "that there was enough in the house for supper and breakfast?"

"I'm quite sure, dear," said Nellie, "that there is enough for supper, and perhaps for breakfast. But we shall not want much for breakfast. You know that you have very often said that you did not care for much breakfast, and really I can get along on nothing at all."

"I don't see what we have to worry about then, do you?"

"Indeed I do not. I think we have every reason to be perfectly happy," she answered.

"Sure of supper to-day and breakfast to-morrow. I should say we have every reason to be thankful," continued Frank.

"Yes, indeed," added Nellie. "Just think of the number of people in the world who are sure neither of supper to-day nor breakfast to-morrow. Take the case of a cannibal——"

"Just what I was thinking," broke in Frank. "He is dependent on the chance call of a missionary—surely a precarious existence."

"Oh, Frank, you are joking!" said Nellie.

"Proof that I am perfectly happy," responded Frank.

"While I am perfectly happy," said Nellie, "I do wish that the firm had not failed, and that you had not lost your position and your good salary."

"Yes, and while I am perfectly happy," said Frank, "I do wish that our parents had not objected to our marriage."

"The idea that we, who are children, both of us, of rich parents, should be left to the disagreeable expedient of pawning the few wedding presents that we received!"

"Say rather the disagreeable expedient of pawning the last wedding present that we received. Now—now—now, little wife, you are going to cry!"

"Indeed, I am not," said Nellie, struggling bravely to suppress the tears. "I think we are very lucky to have any wedding presents to pawn. In fact, I think we are very lucky indeed."

"And so do I," added Frank, "very, very lucky——" Just there he was interrupted.

There is no better time than an interruption to explain the conditions of affairs in a romance, so I will take advantage of the present one, which may be the only interruption in my story. Frank and Nellie Hayward had married against their parents' wishes. Their parents, though rich, refused to help them in any way, or even to receive them in their homes. Frank was brave and manly, and Nellie was sensible and womanly. They determined to do for themselves, and at the very outset made a solemn compact with each other that, come what might, they would consider their love for each other compensation for all the ills of life.

For a time things went very well. Frank obtained a position that enabled them to live very comfortably in a furnished flat. But, as in the life of everyone else, the time came when luck turned against them. The firm that employed Frank failed, and he was unable to get another position. The little money that they had saved up from his salary was soon exhausted. They were forced to the disagreeable expedient of pawning such things of value as they possessed, and finally they had come to the end of even that resource.

Never during all their trouble had either acknowledged to the other that they were anything but happy. The crisis, however, had just about been reached. They were in a quandary. It was a question whether they would be forgiven by their parents under any circumstances, and they were not at all willing to acknowledge that they had made a mistake. They were obstinately proud.

But there was an interruption. It was a knock at the door. Nellie rose from her seat, and Frank was about to do so, when it occurred to him that the chances were that it was a creditor, and he thought it hardly worth while to go to the door. He was rather surprised, though, when, at the invitation of his wife, the door was opened by a queer old man, who looked at each of them over the rims of his eyeglasses for a full minute before he spoke.

"Mr. and Mrs. Hayward, I believe?" he said at length.

"Yes, sir," replied Nellie. "Will you take a chair?"

"Ought to have been named Wayward, I suppose," he said, chuckling to himself, as he took the proffered chair. "I suppose my visit is rather unexpected?"

"Decidedly," said Frank, curtly.

"Well, it is the unexpected that always happens," said the old gentleman. "I was rather surprised to hear you through the door, accidentally, of course, assuring yourselves that you were very lucky and very happy, and all that sort of thing."

"May I inquire what business it is of yours, sir?" asked Frank.

"None, except that it assured me that I had found the right place," answered the old gentleman.

"And what place were you looking for?" asked Frank.

"The house of a happy married couple," said the old gentleman.

"You have found it," said Frank and Nellie together.

"Ah," said the old gentleman. "It is quite a curiosity. I suppose you will pardon an old gentleman like myself, if he asks a few questions. I am a student of human nature, you know, and, who knows? perhaps this visit may redound to your advantage."

"Fire away," said Frank, who was beginning to be interested.

"In the first place, what was the occasion of your saying just now that you were lucky?"

"Because we had some wedding presents to pawn," answered the ingenuous Frank.

"No," corrected his wife gently, "because we had had some wedding presents to pawn."

"Dear me!" said the old gentleman, "they are all pawned then?"

Digitized by Google

"Yes," answered Nellie, "but that does not make us unhappy."

"I suppose that you occupy a good position?" said the old gentleman to Frank.

"I have lost my position, sir," the latter answered.

"You have plenty of money in the bank?"

"None."

"Undoubtedly you have a well-stocked larder, though?"

"It is about exhausted."

"Of course, in case of real distress you have your parents to rely on?"

"On the contrary, we would not wish to ask them to help us under any circumstances."

"Well, young man," said the old gentleman, excitedly, "will you tell me what in the world you are going to do?"

"I would much rather have you tell me what I am going to do," answered Frank.

"Nothing," answered the old gentleman, solemnly.

"That's what I have been doing quite a while."

"The fact is," continued the old gentleman, "you are precisely what you were saying you were when I knocked on your door—you are lucky. I am a man of whimsicalities. I have been looking all my life for a happy married couple. Someone, never mind who, told me that you were the couple I was looking for. I did not believe it for a long time, but when I discovered that you were in hard luck, and still were not complaining, I began to believe it. My mission on earth is to assist happy couples who are in hard luck. That is the first time I have ever had a chance to fulfil my mission. It is all the more to your advantage, though—there is more money in the fund than there would be if the world were stocked with happy couples. I propose to settle on you a little income of five hundred a year."

The old gentleman paused to see what effect this startling announcement would have on the happy couple. The effect was not marked. They looked at him very much as they would look at a curiosity.

"I suppose you think I am an insane man?" he said angrily.

"No," answered Nellie, "but I think you are my father, with a wig and eyeglasses, and a very poor attempt at a disguised voice."

Saying which, she ran to him and threw her arms about his neck.

"Well, I am," said the old gentleman, laughingly, as he removed his disguise, "and I frankly confess that for a long time I have had a disguised heart. I didn't want to help you until I thought you needed it, so I waited. But I will tell you this—if you had acknowledged that you were not happy I would have given you double the allowance I have."

"I don't care," said Nellie. "I'm perfectly happy."

"And so am I," said Frank. Stanley Hammond.

Old Bellows: "Oh, for a thousand tongues!" Mrs. Bellows (facetiously): "What would you do with so many?" Old Bellows: "Raise a row with you and see if I couldn't get the best of it."

"Darling," he said, "your eyes are as bright as diamonds, your teeth as white as pearls, your lips as red as rubies, and——" "Yes, Horace," she replied sweetly, "and you're as green as an emerald." Then Horace went out into the jet black night.

Prospective Father (to young man): "Have you spoken to my daughter yet?" Young Man: "Oh, yes, sir." Father: "And she loves you?" Young Man (with enthusiasm): "You should have seen her hug me when I came to-night. Talk about love!"

She "I haven't anything new to sing to you to-night, George." He: "Well, give me something old then." She broke into a refrain that was "a song of the day" seventeen years before. He (at the close): "That's very, very old, Clara." She: "Yes, George; I sang that to you the night we became engaged."

INVALUABLE

To Every Wife and Housekeeper!

PART II. NOW READY.

PEARSON'S HOME MANAGEMENT

Edited by "ISOBEL" of "HOME NOTES."

TO BE ISSUED IN

TWELVE FORTNIGHTLY PARTS.

Price 7d. net each.

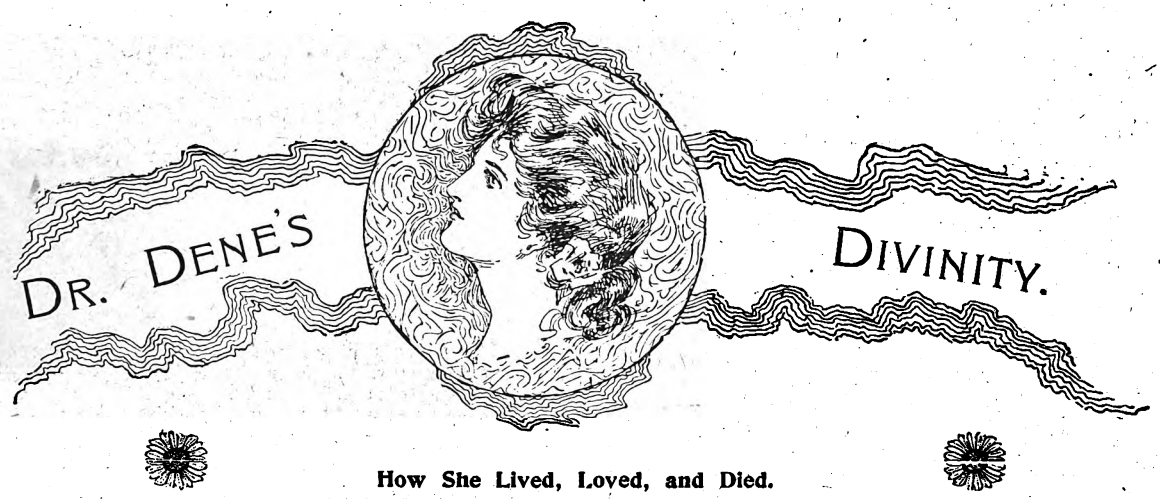
This work is the most thoroughly up-to-date and exhaustive work on HOUSEHOLD MANAGEMENT ever published, and contains 12 Beautiful Coloured Illustrations, 64 Full-Page Illustrations, together with a large number of Cuts in the Text.

The subjects are treated with such thoroughness by well-known authorities as to render the Work invaluable to every Household.

PART II. NOW READY.

To be had at all Railway Bookstalls, Newsagents, or of the publishers, C. ARTHUR PEARSON Ltd., 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



How She Lived, Loved, and Died.

DOCTOR DENE was a young man who by much over-study and superfluous cramming had managed to scrape through his many exams., gain his degree, and yet be one of the simplest men that ever ate bread and butter.

He had a good practice in a fashionable London suburb, and although too shy a man—apart from his professional character—ever to make many friends, especially among the fair sex, still he was universally admired for his skill and integrity, and laughed at as well, because of his extreme gullibility.

Instead of growing better in this respect as he grew older, the doctor suddenly became rapidly worse.

More dreamy, more absent-minded, more eccentric every day.

Truth to tell, Theodore Dene had fallen in love.

To a serious, single-minded, shy man, such as he, this was a fearful calamity.

He was in love without rhyme or reason either, which made it still more serious.

His divinity, too, was the veriest shrimp of a thing. Wasp-waisted, high-heeled, always fashionably dressed. The very sort of girl that a medical man, who hadn't quite forgotten all his anatomy, would tell you was a disgrace to civilisation.

She passed his house frequently, generally once a day; and looking up at his surgery window one morning—her big eyes had caught him peeping behind the blind—had made a conquest of him then and there.

All the years of his life—he was barely thirty now—he had ground away at his books and had never looked at a woman. He had had no little love affairs to knock off his bashfulness. No strolls by moonlight. No billets-doux. No bright telegraphic eyes ever to talk love's language with him. No sleepless nights.

Indeed, I am half ashamed to write about such a shockingly wasted life.

Kitty Coram—for that was the divinity's name—was very quick to perceive—as indeed, what ordinary woman is not?—the impression she made on the reticent, studious man. From a friend of hers—Gerald Thorncroft—she managed to glean a great deal at odd times about the doctor; of his goodness, his simpleness, his cleverness.

This Thorncroft had, indeed, studied for some time at the same college with Theodore Dene.

A man of the world, a dashing fellow was Gerald; handsome, passing rich, well connected, and a thoroughpaced scoundrel withal.

He paid assiduous court to Kitty, and at first she smiled on him, although, wondrous to relate, she kept herself as straight and pure as if she had a chaperon ever at her elbow. Self-reliant, witty, ambitious, Kitty did not let her morals run askew.

When she heard so much about the doctor, thought of the security of his position, the happy home he could offer a wife, a great disgust came over her for Gerald Thorncroft, with his swagger and dash and style.

"He swears he loves me. Yet he's never asked me to marry. If he did, he's drowning in debt, and would make a brute of a husband. Oh! if I could only marry Dr. Dene."

The thought grew in her mind until she could picture nothing else.

Poor little divinity! She was only a chorus-singer at a West End theatre. Her mother had been the same before her. Can you wonder that she wished for better things? Can you wonder that, born and bred behind the scenes, she grew sick and loth to lead such a life, and wondered how it would be when her beauty waned!

Her head was a clever as well as a pretty one, and this is how she set to work:

One day, passing the doctor's house, she caught him watching for her at his surgery window, which closely overlooked the road. Just as nervous and shy was he as any silly schoolgirl when she sees her lover in church.

Kitty, who was a first-rate actress, let her umbrella slip out of her hand, staggered a step or two, clutched wildly at the lamp-post, and finally fell very gracefully on the unimpressive pavement.

Dr. Dene was at her side in a moment. Lifting the little figure very tenderly in his arms he bore her to his surgery.

"She has fainted! Poor child!" he said compassionately to his housekeeper, who had been a witness to the scene. Mrs. Grant tossed her head, and deluged the pretty pale face with cold water.

This quickly brought Kitty to, and she went on with her acting.

She was better, much better. So ashamed and sorry to have given such trouble. Thank them both very much. She was quite ready to go now. She had not far to walk, only to Caraman Street.

The doctor told a white lie for once in his life, and stuck to it like a man.

"I am passing Caraman Street on a professional visit," he said. "May I offer to take you in my carriage?"

She refused very prettily and with sweet hesitation.

Half surprised at his own temerity, the doctor pressed the matter and over-ruled her objections.

Mrs. Grant tossed her head again as the little dainty thing went lightly down the steps on Dr. Dene's arm and then into Dr. Dene's carriage.

On the way, Kitty was talkative. Told the doctor all about herself. There was no mention of a theatre in her narrative though, nor of anything else connected with her real life. Just a cleverly-told, high-flown little fiction of fallen fortunes—a helpless orphan—no one to befriend her, and so on. The doctor was charmed with her woes, he would have asked her to marry him on the spot, if only he had dared.

Digitized by Google

She made good use of the twenty minutes' drive, you may be sure, and when they reached Caraman Street, she gave his hand ever so slight a pressure, and said modestly:

"I will ask you to set me down at the corner. My landlady is very strict, and might be harsh to me if she saw me get out of your carriage. Unfortunately for me I am in her debt, and the world is so censorious."

"How delicate! How thoughtful!" mused Theodore afterwards.

She no more lived in Caraman Street, reader, than you or I do. But before nightfall she had secured two top rooms in one of the highly respectable houses there; had cut her connection with the theatre under the plea that she was going at once to America to join some rich relatives. Had even borrowed ten pounds from Gerald Thorncroft to aid her on her voyage out.

"You can pay me how and when you like, Kitty—in coin, or kisses, dear!"

"It won't be in kisses," said she, very scornfully; and scarcely let him touch her hand when she said "Good-bye."

Then Kitty was taken ill in her grand new lodgings, and Theodore Dene attended her.

You can guess the consequence. The very first day she went out of doors, the doctor drove her to church and they were very quietly married.

Now you know by this time that Kitty was ambitious. Well, suppose we skip over ten years and find her, socially speaking, at the top of the tree. Her husband is a full-blown physician now—with a host of letters after his name and a title in front of it.

Kitty had looked upon life in London in the early part of their marriage as decidedly dangerous, and had induced her husband to take a practice in Scotland; where, through Mrs. Dene's clever scheming, he had come under royal notice and quickly risen in royal favour. After ten years she considered herself sufficiently safe to come back to London. Lady Theodore Dene, the beautiful wife of the well-known physician, was not likely to be connected in any way with vanished Kitty Coram. It is wrong to tell a lady's age, and Lady Dene carried hers in her pocket. She looked about twenty-five, though really she was thirty.

We find her the belle of the season. People make a great fuss over her. By right of her wit and beauty she is a queen in Society's kingdom. Yet the throne she values highest is her place in her husband's heart. He loves her so loyally, so trustfully, so tenderly still. She is above rank and riches to him, she is his guiding star, his divinity.

He is never jealous of the admiration showered upon her. He is only too proud of her loveliness and fame. Kitty is giddy at the height she has reached. She never thinks of detection now.

You can guess what a blow it is to her when, coming out of a jeweller's in Bond Street, where she has been choosing a new setting for her diamonds, a gentleman raises his hat, stopping her in her way to her carriage, and addressing her in well-remembered tones.

"How do you do, Lady Dene? You're in danger of forgetting old friends, I fear. You've cut me once or twice in the park."

"Is it really you, Mr. Thorncroft? You have altered indeed. I should not have known you. It is a lovely day. Good morning."

With great sang-froid Lady Kitty, stepping into her carriage, says, "Home!" and drives away. It was a great shock to her nerves, but she was very plucky. Poor little fly! That was only the beginning of your trials; you are fairly caught in the subtle spider's web.

Day after day, wherever you go, you see him. He dares to write you disgustingly familiar notes, and finally frightens you into granting him interviews. Here, with boorish license, he makes love to you, rendering your golden life a tarnished misery.

"This must end," she says to him despairingly, in one of their tête-à-têtes.

"So it shall, Kitty, when you consent to be mine! You fooled me years ago. I haven't forgotten or forgiven. You're a riper plum now, and I swear I will pluck you yet."

"I am rich," she said pleadingly. "I will give you anything you ask for if you will only cease tormenting me."

He laughed at her.

"I am twice as handsome as your dried up stick of a husband, who only married you because he was a fool. I don't want money. I want you. If you won't come of your own free will, I'll tell such tales of your past to the world that it will spit at you, and your saint of a doctor will turn you out of doors."

"I will defy you. I will tell him everything myself. I don't care what the world thinks, I only care for him."

"Couldn't trust you, Beauty," said Thorncroft, sneeringly. "You've lied so successfully all these years, that you couldn't tell the truth now if you tried. I should tell him I had a right to you as your lover. Get witnesses to swear we lived together before you threw me up for him."

"Heaven help me!" she sighed despairingly.

"All's fair in love and war, little woman. Cheer up. Take a run with me over to the Continent to-morrow. Be at Victoria in the afternoon. Don't stop to consider. Come."

"Give me time. Let me think."

"No! That's just what I don't want to do. If you're not there, I'll come to your grand house in the evening, and he'll turn you over to me himself, when he's heard my tale. Aye, and be glad to get rid of you."

Poor Kitty. What a sleepless night she passed. Kissing her wedding-ring with passionate pain, scalding it with her tears; looking with loving, sorrowing eyes at her husband, smiling in his sleep. Praying, planning, plotting, all to no purpose. Anyway, she saw how certain her downfall was—how she must lose everything, even her husband's love. Her weak little word would never hold out against Gerald's plausible lies.

"A lie, that is all a lie, can be met with and fought outright,
But a lie that is half a truth is a harder matter to fight."

"Oh, that I could die! Thorncroft would surely spare me then."

Through the dark night she lay and pondered how. Poison? No! Too easily detected.

Drowning—hanging—she went through a list of deaths, but all were too palpable.

When morning dawned she was white and ill.

Dene stayed with her all the day, rested her aching head on his breast. She clung to him tremblingly in her despair.

They were to dine with an earl that night; she would insist upon going. "The excitement will do me good," she said.

It was past six o'clock; they had a long drive before them. He waited, watch in hand, at the head of his magnificent staircase, to conduct her down to the carriage. Her dressing-room door opened and out she came.

Dressed like a bride almost; in purest ivory silk with draperies of rich old lace. Diamonds in her hair—round her fair throat—clasping her beautiful arms and gleaming from her breast. Her face was star-like in its loveliness, only so strangely pale.

"You should never wear anything but white, sweetheart," he whispered, offering his arm.

She turned and kissed him gratefully.

"Go back, dear, and ask Jane for my wedding-ring; I left it on my dressing-table," she said.

As he passed away from her side, she threw herself forward with wild energy, down those many, many polished oaken stairs. Down! down! down! till she lay in a shapeless mass on the marble pavement below.

* * * * *

"She was plucky to the end," said Thorncroft to himself as he read the many accounts of the beautiful Lady Dene's fatal accident, and heard of the letters of condolence that were showered on the bereaved husband from the highest quarters.

"No accident that, I know. Anyway I won't peach on her now. Wouldn't the world stare though if I showed it the flaw in Dr. Dene's divinity?"

Edith Dunaway.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID SERIAL.

Dupes of Destiny

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

By Blanche Eardley, Writer of "The Bond Between."

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS IN THIS STORY ARE:

SIR CYPRIAN RUST, who has inherited the baronetcy and estates of Sir Basil Wingate, though he is not the legal heir.

MARCELLA RUST, his daughter, a very lovely girl, who is greatly in love with

PHILIP NULLIUS, the curate of Crawley Village, where the home of Sir Cyprian, Wingate Court, is situated.

LADY VIOLET FRAYNE-LENNOX, whom Marcella believes to be her aunt. She is a very beautiful woman, and loves her niece dearly, but Sir Cyprian has, for some reason, immense power over her, which he uses to further his own ends.

EDWARD DAY is an orphan whom Lady Violet has befriended. He, however, in making unreturned love to Marcella, insults her, and Lady Violet refuses to have anything more to do with him.

CALEB J. JOHNSON, a City magnate and millionaire, who marries Lady Violet, though he knows that her husband is still alive. This husband,

MAJOR RICHARD FRAYNE-LENNOX, is a good-for-nothing, who has been turned out of the Army. Lady Violet believes him dead.

THIRTY-FOURTH CHAPTER.

A Meeting at the Court.

MARCELLA for two days had been free from the haunting presence of her father. Both he and the repulsive doctor had left hurriedly soon after the telegram had arrived, that had sent Sir Cyprian tearing out of the rooom forgetful of the errand on which he had brought his friend, Dr. Winter.

And when she had seen the carriage driving through the gates, Marcella had sighed with relief. She wandered about free from that dread of an unexpected terror without which she was never free when Sir Cyprian was watching her with those cold, smiling, blue eyes of his.

It was just as well that this was so, for she was now without the society of her faithful maid, Jane being ill in bed with pneumonia caught, the doctor said, through a sudden immersion in cold water. How Jane had managed to fall into the brook was a mystery, and seemed likely to remain one for some little time. She had been brought back by a carter some two hours after she had left the Court with Marcella's letter in her hand, which had, so Marcella supposed, drifted down the little brook.

She went through the gates of the Court and walked slowly towards the village. It was a pretty walk, and one that led through leafy wildernesses and undulating paths. She sat down on the trunk of a fallen tree that stretched across the lane. She was on part of the estate that belonged to the Court, and so feared no interruption. She was thinking of her lover, and her thoughts were full of sadness as she remembered how long it was since she had heard anything of him.

"Surely Aunt Violet has not forgotten me?" she mused. "It is a long time since I had a letter." Then she flushed as the vision of her aunt's beautiful face rose before her. "No, I will never think hardly of dear Aunt Violet," she murmured. "I will hope for brighter days, and if father and that hateful Dr. Winter stay away long enough, I may be almost happy at the Court, if I could just hear from Philip that all is well with him."

Suddenly she drew in her breath with a startled cry. A voice had sounded quite near her; a whisper of "Marcella" had reached her ears as vividly as though she had heard Philip in the flesh. She sprang to her feet, and gazed with startled eyes in the direction from which the voice had come. There was a rustle of leaves and twigs, then a man stepped from behind a large tree, and the next moment, sobbing with joy and relief, Marcella was once again clasped in the arms of the man she loved with all her heart.

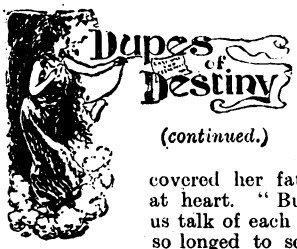
"Philip, oh, Philip!" she cried. "Am I really looking at you, or is this some beautiful dream, darling?"

He pressed his lips to hers. "It is I, dearest love," he answered tenderly. "And I am never going to lose sight of you again, come what may. Oh, my love, when I think what you have endured for my sake, I feel I can never forgive——" he stopped suddenly. He remembered that his enemy was the father of the girl he loved.

She glanced up quickly. "Yes, I know," she murmured. "I guess why you pause, dearest. But tell me, Philip, how did you get here so suddenly? Why did you not write me?"

He drew her closer to him. How beautiful she looked with that light in her eyes, and her pale face was flushed again with love.

Digitized by Google



(continued.)

"I came here after one or two interesting adventures, sweetheart," he answered. He could not tell her that he had discovered her father to be almost a murderer at heart. "But," he went on quickly, "let us talk of each other now, darling. I have so longed to see your dear face and to kiss your beautiful mouth. Let us leave mysteries alone."

For a time the lovers were silent; they had forgotten the danger of being seen together by any of Sir Cyprian's spies, or by the baronet himself. They remembered only their love and that the world was a beautiful place after all.

Suddenly Marcella raised her head from Philip's shoulder. "Dearest," she said, "I can't stay long at the Court now. There are strange things happening here—mysteries I cannot fathom. There is a man with a black beard who comes and goes, and——"

Philip started. It was odd that he should also have seen such a man. He opened his mouth to speak, but Marcella clutched him tightly.

"There is someone looking for us, Philip. I can hear the rustling of the leaves in the distance. Perhaps father has returned from London! Oh, you must not meet him," she cried wildly.

Philip's mind was made up. "I shall not, darling. Just do as I tell you and be brave. Hide behind that great oak near that thicket, and don't make a sound; whoever that is shall not recognise me as Philip Nullius!"

But Marcella protested, bewildered. "I don't understand."

He drew her to him, then pressed his lips to hers. "You will soon, my darling love; only obey me if you love me."

With a tender look she disappeared behind the tree, and drawing something from his pocket, Philip quickly and accurately transferred to his head and face the grey wig, beard, and moustache that the girl Lottie had given him.

Then he turned the rim of his hat down, and the collar of his coat up, and after one quick glance into a pocket mirror, and a whispered word to the wondering girl behind the tree, he stepped forward in the guise of the "Vicar" to meet the man who, impatiently beating the brambles and bushes with a stick, came out into the open.

THIRTY-FIFTH CHAPTER.

Philip Learns Something.

THE man who stumbled before Philip from behind the thick bushes of the wilderness was not the man whom Marcella had dreaded meeting, and whom Philip had acknowledged to himself that it would be awkward to speak with in the near presence of his sweetheart, for he had things to say to Sir Cyprian Rust that he could never say before his innocent daughter. So it was with a sense of relief that he saw another man in the place of the baronet.

The intruder was, however, no stranger to Philip Nullius, and it was with difficulty that he refrained from betraying his personality through his disguise, as he looked upon the face of the man Boulter, whom he had seen on several memorable occasions, the last being the day before on the platform at Paddington with the man with the black beard!

He was so concerned with his own amazement at encountering his enemy within the very precincts of his lady love's home, that he at first was oblivious to the impression his own appearance made upon Boulter. It was growing dusk, and they stood beneath the shadows cast by the trees overhead, but in the gloom Boulter's face took unto it an expression of frank amazement and perplexity. And when he spoke Philip knew the reason of his astonishment.

"Why, what on earth are you doing up here, 'Vicar'?" he said hoarsely. "I thought you decided that it was safest to keep at Water Grange? Anyway, the 'Spade' would be wild if he knew you had risked everything just to look round here. It's not safe, you know—if you don't mind my telling you."

While he had been speaking Philip had grasped the clue to his further conduct. This man Boulter had taken him for the man as whom the girl Lottie had disguised him. If he could keep it up he would be able to come to some conclusion regarding much that puzzled him.

The real "Vicar" had spoken with a curiously American accent, and in his schooldays Philip had been no mean mimic of other people's voices. He would see whether he still possessed that gift. It would, perhaps, help him to learn a little of what was going on behind the scenes of the mystery into which he had been dragged.

He opened his mouth, and then, seized with a sudden idea, took from his pocket the spade guinea he had picked up in London when the man with the beard had dropped it. He had noticed a bright gleam of something yellow shining in the other man's hand, and had wondered whether it was a coin similar to the one in his possession.

The effect upon Boulter was not entirely unexpected. He laughed and opened his hand, showing a spade guinea lying in the hollow of it.

"Oh, it's all right with me, 'Vicar'!" he said. "I thought you would have dropped showing the sign with me—we are such old pals."

Philip smiled grimly; then he had been right! The spade guinea was a sign between the "Vicar" he was personating and the man with the black beard, as well as the scoundrel Boulter—a sign of some secret confederation, and one in which villainy largely predominated. Acting swiftly upon his intention to learn as much as he could about this secret society, he said, in the drawling, nasal tones of the master of Water Grange:

"I came up here to have a look round for purposes of my own. But what brings you here, Boulter? I thought you had your instructions to meet the 'Spade' in London. Why didn't you?"

His chance shot was a lucky one. The man replied glibly:

"I did meet him at the station, and got his instructions about that wretched parson chap we've got to track down. The 'Spade' seems to fear him more than anyone else—even the scent of the police on the 'Mona Lisa' is nothing to him so long as the sky-pilot is at large; of course it's our duty to do all we can to help the 'Spade' but I'd like to be a little more in the know, wouldn't you? So far as I can make out this sky-pilot stands in the 'Spade's' way."

Philip smiled beneath the disguise of hair on his face. So far he was succeeding better than he had anticipated, but he would learn more before he finished with the loquacious Boulter.

"Oh, I dare say the 'Spade' has a good reason for wishing the parson out of the way," he muttered; "but did he give you any further orders that should bring you up here? It's risky, I should say, to be hanging round this part!" Another chance shot that also went home.

"I don't know," Boulter answered cautiously. "I've not been up here for a long time, and the last time I was dressed as a farm labourer, so I would not be known; anyway, the 'Spade' sent me himself to be on the look out for a day or so, in case that sky-pilot returned here, and"—he lowered his voice cautiously—"there's some talk about the 'tecs nosing round; it appears they've got hold of some clue that has sent them into this part of the country to investigate. Anyway, the 'Spade' said I was to be about here a day or two, because the 'swag' is concealed here; besides I wanted to have a look at that girl. I intended mentioning all this to you when I got back to the Grange," he finished. "Now tell me why you've trotted up here; who's in charge while you are away?"

Philip hesitated. "Oh, the others will see to things," he murmured. He was trying to find a way out of the maze of perplexity into which his companion's speech had flung him. "I really intended calling to hear if the curate had been seen at his lodgings," he went on quickly, feeling the other man's eyes fixed on him strangely. "I'm not afraid of being noticed; this coat and hat make an effective yet quiet disguise! By-the-way, it's a nuisance those papers were missing from his rooms when Rayne went to get them!" he added, with a sudden thought, remembering that there had been a strangely mysterious reason for those letters and papers of his to be found.

Digitized by Google

Boulter laughed softly. "Yes, the 'Spade' was wild about it; it seems he wanted them most of all. They were nearly as important as the parson himself! But there is to be a meeting at the Grange, so the 'Spade' told me, and he's going to be there. He said he would distribute details about that fresh deal we shall be working soon, and he intended seeing you one day about it!"

"Ah!" Philip murmured thoughtfully. "I shall be pleased to listen to the Chief's orders. By-the-way, have you any letters of the 'Spade's'? I should like to have one of them. He has not written much except in cipher lately," he said, remembering the words of the man in the black beard.

"I've only a few papers," Boulter answered slowly. "Most of them are not written by the Chief himself; he's too sharp to put his hand to anything that will incriminate himself, but he's got someone else to write for him. They're the names of the new 'cribs' to be 'cracked,' and a list of the principal valuables. You know the 'Spade' never bothers about cheap stuff. But he don't expect to get such a haul as he did with the 'Mona Lisa' at that millionaire's place."

"Ah!" said Philip quickly. "That was exceptional luck, of course. But I hope the 'Spade' will drop hunting that parson down—it will recoil on his own head if he does, I feel sure of it. The fellow's harmless and quiet, and if left alone will do no harm; but I am afraid that things will go wrong with the 'Spade' if he tackles him again!"

Boulter laughed harshly. "What! Turning saint, 'Vicar'! Don't go and say you're going to play King's Evidence after all the years we've pulled together! The 'Spade' would get his own back, you know. He'd stick at nothing—he'd soon knife you, or get someone else to do it. Do you remember that informer he got put away for trying that game on with us?"

A slight shiver shook Philip from head to foot. In the presence of so much cold-blooded villainy he felt inclined to take the man by his neck and shake the life out of him; but prudence, and something else—a regard for the safety of the girl he loved, whom he knew was listening in bewilderment to their conversation, held his tongue; besides, he wanted to get something definite out of the man, so that he would be enabled to place the facts in the hands of the police and run this gang to earth.

"I'm not likely to betray those whose cause I uphold," he said slowly. "But there is danger ahead for the 'Spade,' if he insists, for no reason whatever, in hunting the innocent. That curate, after all, did not even know the 'Spade'."

"There you are wrong!" was the quick retort. "The 'Spade' was well acquainted with the parson, and it's my own private opinion that it is because this parson by being alive threatens the 'Spade's' position. But no one can drag the 'Spade' from his place without injuring the innocent whom he uses as his tools! He's a darned clever man, and will never be traced. Although the 'Mona Lisa' was his plan, there's not a sign to show that he had a personal hand in it, except the coin that fool the 'Shovel' must have dropped out of his pocket!" He laughed softly. "No, the 'Spade' had a splendid decoy for that lay!"

A slight rustle behind the tree where Marcella was hiding made both men start—one with suspicion, the other with fear lest she should be discovered.

"What's that?" Boulter said sharply, and, taking a step forward. "If there's anyone listening, I'll soon know what to do!"

Philip grasped his arm roughly. "Don't be a fool, Boulter!" he said in a voice that trembled in spite of the drawl. "How can anyone be there!" He stopped suddenly.

Boulter had again looked at him strangely, and Philip's face flushed beneath his disguise.

"Very well, of course if you are certain," the other said grumblingly, "I'll not bother. By-the-way, 'Vicar,' I shall get some papers of rather rare value to us from the 'Spade' to-morrow night. Will you meet me here about nine, and I'll show them to you—that is, if you are staying longer in this place," he added quickly.

Philip agreed readily. He wanted to get hold of tangible proof of the 'Spade's' villiany, and that of his confederates, and could hope to do so only by strategy and an equal cunning. If he could but learn the reason of the mysterious 'Spade's' antipathy and loathing for himself, he would be glad. It was bad enough to know that Marcella's father was against him, and had some acquaintance with the powerful incognito, to have trusted his satellites with the charge of abducting him to Water Grange.

He compelled himself to part on friendly terms with Boulter, who went in the same manner as that in which he had arrived, and disappeared among the bushes and trees, an odd little smile puckering his sardonic mouth as though he had experienced some new pleasure in speaking with the 'Vicar,' whom he had imagined to be still at Water Grange.

Philip watched him out of sight, and waited until he felt quite certain of the man being far enough away from him for it to be impossible for him to overhear anything that happened on the spot he had just left. Then, hastily freeing himself from his ugly disguise, he ran to the tree behind which he knew Marcella had been so long in hiding.

THIRTY-SIXTH CHAPTER.

By Woman's Wit.

"PHILIP! Philip!" she cried, turning her white, tearful face to him, upon which were traces of the agony she had endured. "That man! That awful man! The things he said about the 'Mona Lisa' that was stolen from Mr. Johnson's. How could you let him speak so familiarly to you?" she went on, puzzled. "For whom did he take you?"

Philip hesitated, then, drawing her into his arms, said tenderly: "For a man who is just as wicked and cruel as himself, my darling. The disguise I put on made him think I was his friend, and I encouraged him to speak as he did, because, by so doing, I hope to discover a strange and deeply-laid plot that will be the means of handing over to justice several clever rogues. But you must not be frightened, sweetheart," he went on soothingly. "I am able to fight with my own weapons of truth and honesty. Come," he added, "you must let me see you safely within the walls of the Court before I leave you again."

Marcella seized his arm and said impressively: "Philip, don't meet that man to-morrow night without being armed. Oh, my dear!" she cried. "I know my woman's instinct told me that that man was only talking like that to get you into a trap! He meant to play you some trick—to put you out of his way by some cunning deed! Promise," she pleaded, "that you will take someone with you who will be able to defend you should he want to play you false!"

Philip gazed into her beautiful, eager face with a loving smile. How he thanked God for the heart of this pure, tender woman.

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

"Darling," he said earnestly, "you need have no fear for me this time. That man Boulter thought I was his confederate! Why should he mean treachery to his friend? Don't be afraid, my dearest; I shall learn a great deal that will be valuable, and I promise you that I will take care of myself for your dear sake," he added, kissing her trembling lips tenderly. His love for her then was greater than ever.

Marcella sighed. She saw argument was useless, and her heart was too full to dwell on the subject further. "I hope you may be right," she murmured, "and that my doubts are unfounded. But since I have had so much mystery to combat, and so many uncanny experiences at the Court, I am not surprised at anything that may happen. But promise at least that before you go you will meet me at half-past eight to-morrow."

At the Court gates the lovers parted regretfully, with renewed vows of tenderness and love. And Philip swung lightly down the drive, Marcella gazing after him into the gloom.

"Until to-morrow night at half-past eight," she murmured, then the great gate closed with a harsh clang that jarred upon her, and she went thoughtfully into the house. In the hall she met Deacon, Sir Cyprian's valet. He had been to the post-bag, and in his hand were several letters. "Are there any letters for me, Deacon?" she said eagerly.

The man looked at her sharply. "No, miss—only for Sir Cyprian," he answered civilly.

Marcella glanced wistfully at the letters in his hand—one envelope looked as though it might have been from her Aunt Violet; she thought it was just like those she always used. She put out her hand impulsively, "Let me see them?"

Deacon shook his head regretfully, yet firmly. "I'm very sorry, miss, but it's my orders direct from Sir Cyprian that he sees the letters before anyone else."

"But surely, while my father is away, the letters are not sent on to him before other people are allowed to see them?" she protested haughtily.

A malicious twinkle shot from the man's narrow little eyes as he replied urbanely, "Those are the master's orders, miss; I dare not disobey him."

Marcella shrugged her shoulders resignedly. She knew from bitter experience that her father's servants would lie and perjure their very souls for love of him. Sir Cyprian exercised an almost heathenish fascination over his domestics, and Marcella realised that for him they would walk through fire and water if need be, while for her their allegiance was only perfunctory at the best of times, except poor old Jane's, who was unable to be of any assistance for some time to come.

The following day she spent in her bedroom, and when dusk fell she set out to meet her lover. She was very pale, and her great brown eyes burnt as though some hidden fire smouldered behind them. Her gown was black, a great heavy cloak covered her, and in her arms she held a large bottle full of some dark liquid. As she neared the outer gates of the Court, a man stepped from behind a tree and went up to her. She drew back with a smothered cry.

The man laughed softly. "Forgive me, darling! I forgot you would not recognise me in this get-up; you have not forgotten my appointment for this evening, have you?"

Marcella breathed a low, glad little cry as her lover's arms closed round her. "Oh, Philip, dearest! At first I thought that—it was someone else!" Then she added—"No, I had not forgotten your appointment—we have a few moments before you go yet."

Philip kissed her passionately on her red, tender mouth. "My darling! I wish I had never to leave you again—but I hope to-night to put my disguise to some good purpose, and perhaps learn something that has long puzzled me."

Her arms tightened round him. "Dearest," she said with a half tremulous laugh, "you will think me very foolish, but—but—I remembered that it was a cold night, and you would have a long time to wait about, so I brought some wine out with me. I hoped, for my sake," she continued earnestly, "that you would drink some. Please, please, Philip," she pleaded, "don't refuse."

Philip hesitated. He had no desire to drink the wine, but seeing that Marcella was so prettily concerned for him, he resolved to do as she asked.

"Very well, dearest; I will drink a little of your wine," he laughed, "but I really don't need it. I am afraid you are spoiling me."

Marcella's eyes shone with relief. "Then, dear, I will give it to you in the old summer house," she returned. "It is only a minute's walk."

He followed her to the ivy covered arbour, and, taking a small tumbler from the pocket in her cloak, Marcella poured out a glassful of the wine. "There, that will warm you," she murmured.

He took the glass from her and drained it obediently. It certainly was comforting, but there was a strange taste about it that might have been a bitter one, it was so pungent and strong.

"Now for a few moment's talk before I go to the wilderness," he said tenderly, drawing her down beside him on the rustic seat. "I shall make the most of my opportunity to-night, and then, with those papers that that man mentioned, perhaps I may be able to bring a great wrong to justice."

Marcella murmured a few words of loving sympathy. She could not talk; something held her tongue, and she sat in an agony of suspense, gazing at her lover's dark, intense face with eager yet frightened eyes. Suddenly she saw Philip half rise from the seat, then fall back. "Marcella!" he cried sharply, "it is time I went, yet my limbs feel as heavy as lead. What am I to do?"

She pushed him down gently on to the seat. "Wait here, darling," she said tenderly. Then after a pause his head grew heavy on her shoulder, and she breathed a deep sigh of relief.

"Thank God!" she murmured. "I feel so cruel having played him such a trick, but it is for his own dear sake. I could not let him go to meet treachery. He will be safe here—until I return."

Pressing one long kiss upon the sleeping man's brow, she left the summer house, and soon was running with swift, noiseless steps in the direction of the wilderness.

The parish church clock struck a quarter to the hour when she arrived, breathless, at the place where Philip had met the strange man the day before. "There is still time," she murmured softly, then hastily flinging the black cloak upon the ground she placed the bottle of wine she had still carried on top of it, and upon the whole she threw a white handkerchief.

"I think that will do; it looks careless, and as though someone would return for it soon!" Then she listened keenly; above the low moaning of the wind among the trees, she heard a crashing noise, as though someone were trying vainly to force a way through the blackness of the night to where she stood waiting—waiting, for what?

Then with one swift glance at the cloak and the bottle on the ground, Marcella slipped behind a tree, just as two men came out into the open.

* * * * *

More than half an hour went by. The pale moon, rising higher in the heavens as night advanced, fell full upon two motionless figures lying side by side, and not far from one was a broken bottle.

A woman crept softly up to one of the figures, and, leaning over it, searched with white, trembling fingers one man's coat and pockets, doing the same with the other motionless sleeper. At last her search was satisfied, and she rose from her crouching attitude with a sigh of relief. In her hand was a packet of papers, and her big brown eyes flashed with triumph, as she flung the cloak round her shivering shoulders

(Continued on page 254.)

Digitized by Google

YOUR HEALTH

IS THE BEST THING IN THE WORLD.

Kill Infection instantly by means of

NUBOLIC SOAP

For Clothes, Bedding, Floors, Furniture, Paint, Oilcloth, Drains, &c.
In the Bathroom, Nursery, Cellar, and Kitchen. For Plates, Pots, Pans, &c.

SAVE HEALTH. SAVE LIFE. SAVE WRAPPERS.

Sold Everywhere by Grocers, Oilmen, Stores, &c.

ANOTHER GREAT PRIZE SCHEME

120,419 Prizes FOR SOAP WRAPPERS. Cash Prizes as high as £100 each. Thousands of WATCHES, CYCLES, SEWING MACHINES, TIMEPIECES, DRESS LENGTHS, and other Articles. Value £25,969

N.B.—Collect the Wrappers and send them to the address below. £25,969 worth of valuable Prizes, some in money, some in the shape of beautiful costly and useful articles to be distributed amongst users of NUBOLIC SOAP. Wrappers of WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER and SPARKLA may be used by competitors for the prizes. Full particulars with each tablet of the three soaps.

JOSEPH WATSON & SONS Limited, Whitehall Soap Works, LEEDS.

TO AVOID INDIGESTION.

That distressed feeling is simply a poorly-working stomach—it needs a little help—but no matter how bad it may be, a dose of will speedily give relief. Take Beecham's Pills for a few days, and the trouble will disappear.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

once again. "I was right," she murmured. "There was a plot—a cruel wicked plot to silence him, and thank God for my woman's instinct that told me I guessed correctly! Now to go and put these papers in his hands—and to beg him to forgive me for the trick that was prompted by my love. I am so glad I accomplished it."

Then, gathering up her skirts, she ran swiftly through the darkness and gloom, stumbling over the mounds of earth and broken branches that had fallen across the path, flying with dishevelled hair and triumphant eyes towards the summer house, while clasped to her bosom was the packet of papers for which she had staked so much to lose—or win.

THIRTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER.

Sealed Lips.

Two days later Philip Nullius sat in his old rooms near the parish church, reading the papers that his brave devoted little love had obtained for him. His first sensation on recovering from the deep sleep into which he had been drugged after drinking the wine Marcella had given him had been one of amazement and fear, lest he had, after all, missed learning so much that he had counted upon. But when he understood that it was a woman's unerring instinct which had saved him, and at the same time outwitted his enemies, he had owned with a throb of shame that had he listened to the girl who had loved him so devotedly, her young life would not have been risked, as it most assuredly had been, in the carrying out of so hazardous an undertaking.

He was now turning over the packet of miscellaneous papers with a sense of disappointment. They were memoranda consisting mostly of dates and ambiguous sentences, that only those understanding the allusions hidden between the lines could follow.

"These are not of much use to me," he said slowly. "They implicate no one; even if I were to hand them over to the police, they would know no more than I do now, unless this last paper contains more detail." He opened it curiously. It was a curt note of but a few stilted phrases, but as Philip Nullius looked more closely into it, a startled expression leapt into his dark eyes, and his face paled to a deathly whiteness.

"It can't be," he muttered hoarsely. "My God! to imagine for a moment that such a madness can exist! Yet it is in the same writing—the same queer little characteristics. There is no mistaking it—in doubting the hideous truth!"

He rose from his chair and paced the floor with quick, impatient steps. His mind was divided between two things—love and duty—and he knew that in the performance of his duty he would drag his love down into the dust with shame and horror.

This evidence which had fallen so strangely into his hands would startle the entire world of criminal investigation, and place in the possession of the authorities of Scotland Yard the person of the notorious leader of the most dangerous gang of burglars—the man whose sobriquet was a menace in itself to those who, though never having seen him or heard his voice, recognised his master brain that planned out the daringly audacious raids that had earned for him the questionable nickname of the "Spade." And the simple fact of placing the letter he had just read, and the one he had taken from his own drawer to compare with it, would make the blood of the chiefs in unravelling crime thrill with delight at the prospect of getting into their hands the mysterious King of Burglars.

"What am I to do?" he muttered, after a fruitless ten minutes' ramble to and fro his small sitting-room. "There seems to be no other course open but to keep silence—I dare not speak—I dare not with my own hand kill the heart that loves me—I must let Justice play her own game—I will not place the best trump in her grasp."

He brushed his hair back from his brow, which was lined with thought and perplexity. "No, I will not, even to aid the law of my country, stir one inch towards bringing this mysterious leader of criminals to the tribunal that awaits him. I can't be doing wrong," he mused; "surely it is the only course open to me—the one chance I have of warding off sorrow and shame from the innocent."

He crossed the room to the fire and held over the flames the two papers that would hurt more in proportion to the good they would accomplish. As the blaze caught and licked them up, he did not know that he would shortly regret that act of generosity more than any other in his life.

As he moved away he murmured again: "It is better so—far, far better that I should do that than send them to Scotland Yard with the information I possess." Then his face clouded, and he shut his teeth sharply together at the thought of the mercy an unscrupulous villain was receiving on account of the innocent dependent upon him.

"One day he shall know! One day I shall reveal my knowledge and then I shall give no quarter!" he said, as the last flicker died in the grate and ashes only remained.

Then, packing a few things into a bag, and writing a loving note to Marcella, telling her not to worry about him, as he was going to London to see the authorities at the Foundling Hospital where he had been brought up, in order to ascertain about the details of his birth, also that he had destroyed the papers as they were of no value after all, Philip caught the up-train to town, and neither he, nor the man whose enmity was pursuing him so relentlessly, knew that they had passed on the line, one returning to Crawley to resume life as the country gentleman, and the other to London, to try to trace, for his sweetheart's sake, the mystery that surrounded his life.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER.

"She is your Mother!"

Marcella, on the night of her lover's departure to London, felt a renewal of the interest in the woman whom she had seen concealed in the hidden wing of the subterranean corridor.

Her father was still away, and, catching sight of Deacon disappearing towards the door that led into the passage, she waited until his steps had died away; then, creeping up to it, she pushed the door gently.

It yielded immediately, and she quickly slipped past it, and closed it noiselessly on the other side. She very soon found herself near the panelled door of the room at the end of the underground passage. Not a sound could she hear; it was almost as though she were in a silent tomb of death—so chilly and awesome was the atmosphere. She raised one corner of the curtain that hung before the glass panels, and looked into the room. It was brightly illuminated with electric light, and to her surprise she saw Deacon speaking with a tone of command to the woman she had seen before, whose white, frightened face was even thinner and more wild-looking than ever.

"You've got to do as you're told," he said roughly; "and if you start any of your nonsense, you'll be put somewhere else where it won't matter how much noise you make. Come along, you take that medicine without any more to do."

"No, no!" wailed the low voice. "I don't like it; I took some before and it was nasty. I won't take any more," and she retreated further against the wall, holding out one white, thin hand as though afraid of being struck.

Deacon's dark face scowled savagely. "You wait—you precious bundle of bones. I've got my orders to see to, and one of 'em is that you take your medicine regular or there'll be a nice little surprise for you from someone else."

A terrified glance crept into the delicate face. "You mean—you mean—him?" she whispered.

(Another long instalment of this serial next week.)

Digitized by Google

Page Woodcock's Pills

Have you lost the appetite to enjoy your food and the ability to digest it? These famous Pills will bring them back and put you in the very "pink" of condition.

There is no other remedy so safe for the cure of Wind on the Stomach, Indigestion, Biliousness, Loss of Appetite, Flatulence, Heartburn, Headache, Languor, Depression, etc. Sold by all Medicine Vendors at 1/1½ and 2/9, or post free for price from PAGE WOODCOCK, Ltd., 14 and 16, Euston Buildings, London, N.W. (Late of Lincoln.)

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

SONGS COPIED.

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly 6d. page. MRS. CONYERS, Chagford, R.S.O. Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

Penna Elastic Rubber Heels don't slip or splash, are up-to-date, being the Pioneer, and the heel made on purely hygienic principles to relieve the Nervous System. No rotary movement to retard progress, strain or turn the ankle. Will outwear several leather heels and save the soles from friction and wear. They are economy and comfort. Beware of clumsy imitations. Ask your Shoemaker for PENNA Heels, and see PENNA on each Heel. Ladies', 1d.; Men's, 1/3 per pair. Write for Pamphlet.—HOWISON & CO., 4 SNOW HILL, LONDON, E.C.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1s. 1½d. tins everywhere.

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.

SUITABLE FOR PRESENTS.

A full list sent post free on application.

SAVE £ d S

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.

12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together.

14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14/9; approval willingly.

19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in saddler-made case; approval.

21/- Fine Old Violin, by Pietro Antorious: magnificent rich solo tone; in perfect condition, with fully mounted bow and case; approval.

10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, 8ct. with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 3 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.

7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.

6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.

21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.

8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped); beautifully finished; very choice design.

9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.

9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.

12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.

R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

To CURE Drunkards

MRS. GEO. FULLER, who saved her husband.

There is a cure for Drunkenness which has shed its radiance into thousands of hitherto desolate homes. It does its work so silently and surely that while the devoted wife, sister, or brother looks on, the drunkard is reclaimed, even against his will or without his knowledge or co-operation.

This famous remedy has guided many a young man to sobriety and into the high road of fortune, and has saved the father, the brother, and the son.

If you send name and address to the Ward Chemical Company, 51 Century House, Regent St., London, W., they will post enough of the remedy free to show how it is used in tea, coffee, or food.

Mrs. George Fuller says:—"I am only too thankful my husband never now wishes for intoxicating liquor. I gave him Antidipso in his tea and coffee, and it has quite cured him." With the

FREE TRIAL

Packet will be sent books and testimonials from hundreds who have been cured, and everything needed to save those near and dear to you. Don't neglect to write to-day.

TEN DAYS' FREE TRIAL

Allowed on every cycle bought of us. Your money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory. Highest grade fully warranted

BRITISH MADE CYCLES

LATEST MODELS £2 10s. to £6

new departure free wheel and hub brake. Best Makes Tyres and best equipment throughout.

200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES

all makes, good as new £1 to £2 10s.

Great FACTORY CLEARING SALE at half factory prices.

EARN A CYCLE taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. ACTIVE AGENTS wanted in each district. Large profits easily made. Write at once for FREE CATALOGUES and our special offer. Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonographs, &c., at half prices.

MEAD CYCLE CO., Dept. 44B, 97 Paradise St., Liverpool; 19 Charing Cross Rd., London.

Secrets of Youth.

How to have a beautiful face and figure. How to have beautiful eyes and hair. How to curl the hair naturally without curling pins or tongs. Little people can be made tall. Noses that are red or ugly shape can be cured, and looks greatly improved.

This Pretty Book will be sent FREE. Ask for "BEAUTY'S BOUDOIR." Stamp must be sent for postage. Peralia Perfumery Co. (Dept. 14) 73 Camden Street, North Shields, Eng.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Stores, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

ALL FAT PEOPLE

can safely Reduce Weight and cure Corpulency permanently by taking TRILENE TABLETS (Regd.) for a few weeks. They are small, agreeable, harmless, and never fail to IMPROVE both HEALTH and FIGURE without Change of Diet. An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to THE TRILENE CO., Sole Proprietor, 66 Finsbury Pavement, London.

SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

Princess Liechtenstein writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send your excellent tablets directly." Mr. Canham, 87 Alexandra Road, Norwich: "Tablets cured my wife of extreme stoutness; it has never returned." Mrs. H. Cox, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The Tablets reduced me 1½ stone." Mrs. S. Alexander, 102 Dixon Street New Swindon, says: "They reduced me 28lb., and I am cured." Countess Furstenberg, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well." Mrs. Crossley, of Ross Hill, Tower, Comston, says: "I weigh much less and can breathe so much easier; I am delighted."

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Lover's Complaint.

I AM sorry, "WALTER," that you can so seldom see your sweetheart by yourself in the evenings when you call, as the members of her family are so plentiful. You say: "Would you advise me to call in the mornings, when I am sometimes free?" I certainly should not. If you are free yourself in the mornings, I don't suppose she will be. Besides, girls don't like morning sweethearts. They never feel they look their best then, and are nearly always busy. I suppose now that Spring is not far off, you will be able to take her out more for walks, so the family grievance will not fall so heavily on you.

Lady Detectives.

"CAN a girl become a lady detective?" asks "FLOSSIE." "I have a great gift for finding out things about people, and my friends often say I should make a splendid detective. Now, is there any kind of opening for me, do you think?"

* * * * *

There are lady detectives, but I don't think it is a kind of profession I would advise any girl to take up of her own free will. There is no official position for a lady in the detective force, as the Scotland Yard authorities do not, I believe, engage women. If a woman is employed, it is an affair arranged privately between herself and a male detective who wants her services. Some private detective agencies employ ladies. Their work consists chiefly in watching people's movements, and in finding out their secrets by means of tricks. It is, no doubt, a fascinating occupation to read stories about, but I don't think I should like any girl friend of mine to follow it up, as spying and prying do not make a woman's character lovable.

A Melancholy Youth.

"F.," aged nineteen, writes me the following gloomy lines: "What is wrong with me? I am always brooding and melancholy. I dislike the society of other people, and only like to be by myself. I always look on the black side of everything, and think I have no prospects in life, and am of no use in the world. Can you suggest a remedy?"

* * * * *

There is no remedy, except those which "F." alone has the power to take. It is not unusual at the age of nineteen for a young man to look at things in the light you speak of. The best thing to do is to keep the mind as fully occupied as possible. Get more work than you can do, and even if you do not, as you say, like the society of other people, I should cultivate it. It will certainly help you to get out of your melancholy state. And, in not very many years, you will be a changed being. It is wonderful how sensible and practical many a dreamer has been known to turn out n after life.

Resuming an Old Acquaintance.

SIX years ago, "T. G. W." was very friendly with a girl he met while on his school holidays. Since then he has never seen her. He feels that he would like to meet her again, but does not like to write. He saw her once, but she did not recognise him, as he has probably altered a great deal.

* * * * * *

Why not write to her? You were on intimate terms then, so it would not be resented if you tried to resume an old acquaintance.

Sending Presents to an Engaged Man.

"A. W." writes: "Would you tell me if it is right for a young lady friend of mine to write letters and send presents to the young man I am engaged to?"

* * * * * *

It doesn't seem altogether right. Find out the facts. Is she sending him letters and presents just out of friendship, or in kindness to him, or are they being sent as tokens of love? Ask the young man straight out what is the meaning of the affair, and if he confesses that he is carrying on a double game, I should ask him to cease at once, or cancel the engagement. But before you take any such steps, find out the facts of the case. It may after all be a mere harmless bit of pleasantry on the girl's part.

Servants as Wives.

"WORKING MAN" wishes to marry, and asks my advice as to the best kind of girl for him to choose. "Do you think a servant would suit me best, as being more used to household work?"

* * * * *

I do not see why a servant should not make "WORKING MAN" as good a wife as a girl of any other class. But he should not run away with the idea that she will be a good wife because she has been a servant. After all, there is nothing much in common between the life of a girl who has to do the work of a family of good position, and one who has to make both ends meet in a much smaller dwelling. Servants are not generally the most economical of people, and are, I am afraid, often given to waste. However, such faults as that should soon be lost in married life. I merely mention them because "WORKING MAN" should be prepared to take such things into consideration when seeking for a wife.

The Loveless Man.

"WHAT is the matter with me?" writes "FRANCIS." "I cannot fall in love. I am twenty-four, and have met dozens of girls who have seemed to like me, but I have never yet felt any kind of tender feeling towards them. Is there anything wrong with me, and, if so, what is the best cure?"

* * * * *

While I am sorry "FRANCIS" is so cold in his affections, I do not know that there is anything wrong with him. Not everybody has it in him to be deeply in love. The nearest approach is a lasting friendship. "FRANCIS" should on no account think himself the victim of anything wrong. If he wishes to get married, then he had better cultivate the acquaintance of as many girls as possible. The one with whom he feels he has most in common, he should try to learn to love, if she returns his liking for her. It is of no use for a man of "FRANCIS'" disposition to go with the expectation of being suddenly love-stricken. He is not, evidently, built that way, and if he ever does love, it will be more the platonic but sincere affection than the passionate feeling.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

No. 1 of our NEW MAGAZINE

Now on Sale, 6d.

Now on Sale, 6d.

The Rapid Review is an essential to all who would be up-to-date in everything; to all who wish to save time and save money; to all who wish to have an intelligent grasp of modern progress and modern thought, and who wish to have it in a bright, clear, and concise form.

You Should Secure a Copy To-day—You'll Want It Every Month.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

FENDERS

AND BEDSTEADS

of Every Description
Direct from Works.

Also CURBS, FIRE IRONS, BRASSES, FIRE GUARDS, &c.

Send particulars of your requirements.
Sketches and Prices can be sent on at once.

SPARKHILL FENDER AND BEDSTEAD CO.,
B88 DURHAM ROAD, BIRMINGHAM.

"The pickle of pickles."

THE MILITARY PICKLE.

A choice condiment of Oriental Fruits and English Vegetables.

HAYWARD BROS. Ltd., 319 KENNINGTON ROAD, S.E.

ORDER
AND BRIGHTNESS PREVAIL WHERE

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH IS USED

BRITISH·ALL THROUGH.
Free from Acid, Poison & Grit.
PRODUCES QUICKLY
A LASTING BRILLIANCY.
Manuf'rs The Matchless Metal Polish Co. Ltd.
LIVERPOOL.

THE BEST DRESSED
MEN OF THE DAY
WEAR

'OCEANIC' BOOTS

AND PAY

10/6

FOR THEM.

Manufactory:
NORTHAMPTON.

DELICIOUS WHOLESOME
PURE.

Rothesay' Rice.

JOHN HILL & SONS

16 Gold Medals & Highest Awards

A DELIGHTFUL PLAIN CAKE, RICH AND FRAGRANT.
A ½-lb. Sample Sent Free on receipt of 3d. in stamps to cover postage.

SEND 3D.

THE "TUDNO" CAKE & BISCUIT FACTORY,
ASHTON-UNDER-LYNE.

A TURKISH BATH AT HOME
BY USING THE

"IMPERIAL"
FOLDING
VAPOUR BATH
CABINET

CLEARS THE SKIN.
Gives Health & Vigour. CURES RHEUMATISM
GOLD MEDAL, 1903.
Send for full particulars to—
KITCHING BROS. & Co. IMPERIAL WORKS, HULL.

PRICE 20/10 COMPLETE WITH STOVE

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 791. Week Ending February 27, 1904. Price One Penny.

"SIGN THAT PAPER IF YOU DARE!" SHE CRIED.

(A Dramatic Incident from the Story, "Turning the Tables." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

Kaputine
THE SAFE REMEDY

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Headache,

Neuralgia & all Nerve Pains

One dose of Kaputine, costing 1d., cures in ten minutes the most violent nerve pain,—every time.

Kaputine is not an aperient, and causes no inconvenience, but is for one purpose only—to cure Nerve Pains.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—and gives immediate relief.

Kaputine, unlike the dangerous white headache powders consisting of one crude drug, is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical Profession.

Kaputine is sold by all Medicine Dealers, Packets of 18 doses, 1/-. Samples 1d. each.

Write now for samples free and post paid to

C. Q. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

J. G. GRAVES'
TAILORING

For Men's and Boys' Suits, Overcoats, Mackintoshes, or Complete Outfitting, see our No. 5 Illustrated Catalogue. Particulars of Latest Styles, Patterns, Easy Terms of Payment, etc., fully described. Important Advantages to Cash Purchasers.

PROFITABLE AGENCIES offered to Persons with Spare Time.

J. G. GRAVES. 169 Division St., Sheffield.

GIVEN AWAY
with next week's
HOME NOTES
(No. 529)

A PAPER PATTERN of this
BLOUSE.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.
PRICE ONE PENNY.

"NO BETTER FOOD."
Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's
Pure Concentrated
Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

If you wish to EAT WELL
—TAKE—BEECHAM'S PILLS.

You will EAT WELL,

because by their specific action on the digestive organs Beecham's Pills remove the sensation of fulness and oppression commonly experienced, give the appetite "edge," and restore the stomach to healthy and natural function.

Sold everywhere in Boxes price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

24.2.1904 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 791.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending February 27th, 1904.

Turning the Tables.

A Story of Love and Gratitude.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

Walter Heaton surveyed the portrait on the wall with a queer smile.

"My father used to tell me that there is always a way of getting what you want if you have the will! 'Where there's a will there's a way!' I pride myself on having studied his advice, and I'll undertake to say that I can get most things that I set my heart on. Now, let us see! I've made up my mind to be rich, and also that I am going to marry Lena Brookes. I think that both desires are on the high road to realisation; in fact, I shall put the latter to the test to-morrow, and I'm sure of winning. Yet the task in both cases has offered considerable difficulty!"

He puffed away contentedly at his cigar. At the end of a few seconds he resumed his half-audible monologue.

"I first determined to be rich, and, as at that time I had no fancy for marriage, I did not set about making a fortune by the unintelligent method of trying to captivate some rich widow or silly girl. I am succeeding well in my own direction. What that direction is, I don't tell! A wise man keeps his own style of fortune-making secret. The least said about that, the safer! And the wife? Ah!"

It was a long-drawn exclamation, which told of anxiety to possess.

"That girl would not have married me in ordinary circumstances. It isn't flattering to me, I'll admit, but that's the fact!" So ran Heaton's thoughts. "She is not beautiful, only just pretty, but with a smile and an expression in the liquid eyes that takes the soul out of a man from the very moment he sets eyes on her. At least, that's the way she affected me. I was in love with her from the first moment, and I said that if my eminently respectable parent was correct, I could have her for my wife if I wanted her. I did want her, I do want her! By all that's good, I mean to have her!

"It didn't take me long to see that she would not take to me in the ordinary course of things, so stratagem had to be resorted to. And I hit upon a very pretty little plan, which worked like magic!

"She was skating. I knew that she would be at it in good time, and I prepared things accordingly!" A curious light came in his eyes at this instant. "I kept close behind her, and she got cross, so she scudded away and I followed, without appearing to notice her! Oh, I worked the oracle so that she could suspect nothing! And all at once something happened! Isn't it strange how accidents happen, now? She went over, just at a particular spot! That accident couldn't have happened at a worse spot, even if the thing had been planned!

"Before she realised it, she had gone through the ice. Of course, I was just in time to save her. I got her out before she had been fairly in. I had saved her life, so I managed to insinuate in a very innocent way; and, naturally, she was compelled to be grateful! She couldn't help herself!

"After that I took good care that I should reap the full benefit of this affair. I pressed my suit upon her gradually, and she couldn't tell me to get out. I contrived to keep that life-saving business just enough in the foreground to make her feel that she must receive my attentions, and all the while I appeared as if I wasn't thinking of that, but was taking it for granted that she liked me for myself alone! And I've got her so tight in the meshes now, that I don't see how she can get out! Will she be happy with me? Why not? It will be her fault if she isn't, and all I have to consider is that I shall be happy with her!"

An uneasy thought crossed his mind at that moment. Was there anyone else in the background? Certain indications suggested an affirmative reply, and he did not like that.

"Then it is someone of whom her father does not, or would not, approve, so I think there is not much chance for him. On the other hand, she might take it into her dainty head that she preferred to remain single if she could not have him. That's where my hold comes in. I'll force her, out of sheer gratitude, to marry me!"

Walter Heaton ought to have been contented with his prospects, considering that he was so sure of his ultimate success, but he was not pleased. Something had disturbed him, so he strode from the apartment and put on his hat and overcoat.

A minute later he was striding along the almost empty street in the darkness. The air was cold, and the wind keen; he felt a certain exhilaration as he walked rapidly along. The fresh air was dispelling the troubled thoughts and cooling the heated brain. Lena Brookes would marry him; she must. He could win her father's consent; the old man was wealthy, and would not tolerate a poor son-in-law. Walter Heaton could prove that he was well provided with this world's goods, and likely to have a still larger share in the future. And there might be some other power of persuasion; it might be possible to find out that old Brookes was involved in something or the other, and it was not beyond the range of possibility to get him involved if he were not so already!

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

He had arrived at this stage when he pulled himself up short, just in time to prevent himself from stumbling on two people as he turned the corner. They were going in the same direction as himself, which helped him to avert a collision; they must have crossed from the opposite corner just before he reached it with his long strides. He was turning aside in order to pass them, when the voice of Lena Brookes fell upon his ear with astounding suddenness. She was addressing her companion, a man.

"I wish I could take as rosy a view of matters as you do, Harold!" she said with a sigh. "Papa will not consent to our marriage, I know quite well! And how can I get rid of Mr. Heaton? He saved my life, and it would be the basest ingratitude to treat him so coldly!"

"I know that you are distressed, Lena, dear," returned the young man, his voice so full of infinite tenderness that Heaton set his teeth hard and stifled an oath. "But you will never entertain any offer of marriage from this Mr. Heaton, will you?"

Heaton waited with bated breath for the answer; it came in a low, clear tone:

"I do not love him! He would not make the offer unless I gave him some encouragement! But we must return, Harold, or——"

Heaton darted into the road, and was on the other side of the street before the young couple had turned to retrace their steps.

"So that's how the land lies, eh?" he muttered, his face white with anger. "That must be Harold Winslow! Well, he will stand no chance with the old man, and as for Lena, she shall be my wife, and if gratitude will not help me, then I'll arrange it otherwise! I'll begin to-morrow!"

He was very busy all the next day, but he appeared to be satisfied with the result of his doings when he shut himself up in his own special den in the evening.

"That will get the young man right enough!" he laughed. "It will take a fortnight, and then it will be ready. In the meantime, I press my suit and make the other arrangements. I was at first inclined to spare him if she agreed to marry me, but there may be a chance of doing both things, the advantage being that she will lose faith in her idol and fall in love with me as a reaction!"

Heaton presented himself on the following evening at the house of Robert Brookes, and was welcomed in the usual manner by the old man and his daughter. There was no question of the warmth of the father's greeting, but the girl's demeanour was ambiguous. Mr. Brookes looked with a favourable eye on these visits; Heaton was an eligible man, and it would serve to drive from Lena's head any nonsense about young Harold Winslow, if she still harboured any feeling of that kind towards him.

After five minutes of general conversation, Mr. Brookes rose and looked about him.

"I'll ask you to excuse me for a while, Mr. Heaton," he remarked blandly. "I must see Jackson about the property, you know, and Lena can entertain you. Where is that book of views, Lena? Show them to Mr. Heaton."

Lena shot a quick glance at her father, who, however, had half turned from her, and so missed it. Lena felt that there was some concerted action here, so she tried to fortify herself for the ordeal that awaited her.

"Better to have it over and ended!" she thought. "I fancied that he would not be so blind, but he is rushing to his own doom!"

"I am sure that it will be very interesting to hear your explanations of the photographs," Heaton was saying in his most dulcet tones, but Lena did not hear.

He had seen the book, which he understood to be new, as he had not noticed it previously, and he took it in his hands and seated himself in the chair beside hers. He opened the book, but shut it so suddenly that it startled her.

"I have not come here to look at counterfeit presentments, but at a reality, a living, palpitating reality!" he cried with a passionate gesture. It was a genuine expression of passion purposely exaggerated. "Miss Brookes, I have come here with the avowed intention of asking you to let me call you by a less formal name! Fortune has favoured me in giving me a chance to be with you alone. Lena!" He let the book drop, and seized her unwilling hands in his. "Lena! Was it not Fate that caused the accident from the awful results of which it was my good fortune to save you? Can we not see in that the hand of Fate that was to bind us more closely together than could have been possible under any other circumstances? To me, it means the loving and tender care of the one whose life was preserved that it might be linked with mine by the deepest of ties, those of love and gratitude—ties which must have a natural significance to one who is the embodiment of all that is good!"

If Lena Brookes had been less agitated by the torrent of words, which she tried at the outset to stem, she might have detected some insincerity in them. As it was she tried to take her hands from his grasp, essaying to utter the words that appeared unable to leave her trembling lips. Her countenance was pale, her breast was heaving with emotion and anxiety.

"Mr. Heaton!" she gasped at length. "I had not anticipated this! Oh, I am so sorry! It cannot be, for I——"

"You do not know what you are saying, Lena!" he expostulated gently. He was acting a part, now. "In your natural embarrassment, you are uttering words that have no foundation. I know, I feel, that you love me! It must be so, dearest, for our lives were linked together by that fateful slip on the ice! Linked together indissolubly by the closest of bonds. Your life is mine, and it is my duty, as it will be my delight, to insure that your life is crowded with happiness!"

It was an artful speech, and the poor girl turned white to the lips. She owed this man the greatest of all debts, and from the point of view of her code of honour, she must acknowledge his claim. Yet how could she give herself to this man? She did not love him; and, more than all, she had given her word to Harold Winslow that she loved him and would marry none other.

"Mr. Heaton," she said, striving vainly to steady her voice, "I cannot marry you! I know that I owe you a great debt, but I cannot suppose that you would wish to marry me against my will. You force me to tell you the truth; I have given my word to another!"

Lena's face now flushed crimson; it was a terrible ordeal for a girl to pass through. Her natural modesty caused her to shrink from making this confession to Heaton; she reproached herself unjustly for giving him pain, for showing what seemed to be ingratitude; yet she was compelled to speak the truth.

Digitized by Google

Walter Heaton did not flinch under the blow; he was playing his game with consummate cunning.

"I believe that you are too noble to wish to force me to do anything against my will!" cried the girl before he had time to say a word. "Oh, I am so sorry!"

This appeal showed Heaton that he must act cautiously.

"I am not unprepared for this," he returned calmly, "although it is a bitter disappointment for me to find that my suspicions are correct. But I am actuated even in this by my ardent desire to give you happiness and to save you from disgrace and sorrow. I know, I know! You are alluding to Harold Winslow. Yes, I see that I am correct!" he continued, as she started in surprise. "I am grieved to say it, but you are giving your affection to one who is unworthy! No, no, do not interrupt! I must speak, for your sake, and you will thank me for it in the time to come! Harold Winslow is a scoundrel; if he receives his deserts, he will one day find himself in prison!"

"It is false, false, false!" cried the girl vehemently, as she drew herself up to her full height, her small hands clenched, her eyes flashing. "You are libelling him; you must withdraw those words!"

"Alas! Would that I could, Miss Brookes, for your sake," he answered with assumed sadness. "It is only too true!"

"Prove it!" she cried passionately, but there was less fire in her eyes. There was something convincing in his positive manner; it made her heart sink.

"I will!" he cried, seizing the opportunity. "Give me a fortnight, and I will have ample proof."

"I will see Harold and ask him!" she said in a tone that was almost a wail. "It cannot be true; he is so good, so noble. There must be some mistake!"

"No, you must not mention it to him!" protested Heaton. If she did that it might upset his scheme! "That is not fair, you will be warning him, and he will contrive to elude the consequences of his wrong-doing. You must say nothing, and let us both abide by the result. I claim your promise!"

Lena Brookes was too agitated to do aught save acquiesce. Walter Heaton had carried his first point, and he now did his best to calm the trembling girl, and give her an appearance of ease before the return of her father.

Heaton continued the execution of his plan for ruining Harold Winslow with a calmness and indifference that were callous in the extreme. He weaved the net about the unsuspecting young man in a most skilful manner, and the blow that should strike two innocent persons and make them suffer for misdeeds in which neither had a hand, was prepared with a surety of aim that appeared to exclude the possibility of failure.

Lena Brookes waited in terrible anxiety, alternating between belief in her lover's integrity and doubts concerning his sterling honesty. She dared not meet him, lest she should break her promise, yet she cried herself to sleep night after night in her unsatisfied longing to meet him.

Sometimes she would feel that she must despise herself for her doubts; at others she would be unable to resist the sentiment of doubt that pervaded her.

Fate seemed to be playing into the hands of Heaton, for Harold Winslow was engaged in a large firm which the former had selected as one of his fields of operation. It had become necessary to find a scapegoat on whom to tack the frauds and so relieve his accomplice from suspicion, and Harold was selected.

"It is all going beautifully!" chuckled Heaton, a week after the scene with Lena Brookes. "In less than another week I shall have him in a tight place! Hallo, what is that?"

A knock at the door made him rise lazily from his seat and open it. A man stood outside, and Heaton bade him enter.

"What is it, Dodson?" he asked, with a searching glance.

"Laxton, who is doing that trick in Manchester, arrived home last night," said Dodson without the least perturbation, "and he had a little too much, with the result that he fell under a heavy waggon and got hurt. He died this morning!"

"H'm! He had practically finished the job, so there's no harm done!" remarked Heaton unconcernedly. "You can get another man to finish it, if that is necessary, can't you?"

"Exactly!" replied Dodson easily.

The two men conferred together for a time, and then Dodson left his principal. They had arranged matters to their own satisfaction, and neither was particularly sorry for the accident, as the man had learnt more of his chief than was desirable. "It's a good riddance!" was Heaton's thought. Yet neither guessed how that accident was to affect them!

The fortnight passed away, and Heaton sent a message to Lena in order to ask her to see him. Lena replied in non-committal terms, and Heaton betook himself to Mr. Brookes' residence with a light heart. Everything looked gay, as he himself expressed it; several of his coups were coming off. Lena was bound to submit, and all would be well with him. He would mend his ways, and live happily with her in luxury.

He found Lena looking worried to the last degree, and a quick feeling of regret and pity shot shrough his heart.

"I'll make it up to her when we are married!" he mentally vowed, as he saluted her gallantly.

"My father is out," said Lena in a cold, monotonous voice. "We had better go into his little room, where we can talk without interruption." She led the way, and he followed, blessing his good fortune at having Lena to himself. "Sit down," she said, motioning him to a chair as they entered the room and she closed the door. "You have failed?"

"No!" he cried, throwing himself into the chair, which was a swivel chair placed before a small table. He noted the question with satisfaction; it showed him that she dreaded to hear, expected to hear, that he had been successful. "I have ample proofs!"

She moved away from him without speaking, and sank into another chair a few feet from the table.

"Tell me all!" she commanded in a hollow voice.

"It will distress you, but it is to save you from degradation! I love you too well to permit it; so, even while I inflict pain, I am working for your good! I have proofs here," he continued, spreading some papers on the empty table, "which show what a rascal he is! Come and look at these."

She rose hurriedly, and, pressing her hand to her side, she leant over the table from the opposite side, and tried to follow with unseeing eyes what he was explaining.

It was so clearly set forth that even she could see that Harold Winslow was guilty of a great crime. She wanted to refuse to believe it, but the evidence was so clear! She was not a lawyer, able to pick this and that point to pieces. She uttered a groan and held on to the table for support as Heaton rolled up the papers and slipped them into an inner pocket.

"Is that sufficient, Lena? Will you marry me now?" he asked, springing to his feet and making his way round to her side of the table.

"No, no! I will not!" she cried, raising her voice till he feared that the servants might hear and come to their mistress' assistance. "Keep away from me! I will not marry you, I cannot!"

Digitized by Google

She lifted her hands to thrust him back, and there was such a look of abhorrence and determination on her usually placid and smiling features that he recoiled. He cast a swift glance at her, and he recognised that he must use force now if he wished to possess her. Possess her? He would have her if he died a week after the wedding! His blood was up, but, unlike Lena, he did not show it in his features.

"I have a paper here," he said with calm deliberation, "that will send your lover to prison as certainly as we are looking at it. That paper requires only my signature. Will you be my wife or shall I sign it?"

Moving swiftly to a side table, he brought pen and ink to the table at which he had been sitting; he held his incriminating document tightly in his left hand all the time. Seating himself, he laid the paper on the table, took a pen and prepared to sign.

"For the last time, Lena, will you be my wife or shall I sign this and send your lover to prison?"

"I cannot marry you, I will not marry you!" came in vehement tones from the girl's lips.

"Then I sign it!" he cried, fixing his keen eyes upon her.

He saw an agonised look creep into her eyes; her face was convulsed with conflicting sentiments; she stood over the table and stretched out her hand with a finger pointing to the paper and his pen.

"Sign that paper if you dare!" she said. "You are forcing me to it! I owe you my life, but you are taking it from me! I cannot undo the guilt of the man to whom I have given my love, but I can demonstrate my love by saving him! Walter Heaton, if you sign that paper and send my lover to prison, I will bring upon your head the just punishment of your own crime!"

For the first time, Heaton lost his self-possession; her words were so significant, and uttered with such conviction, that they alarmed him.

"What do you mean?" he gasped, springing to his feet and brushing the fatal document to the floor. "I don't understand."

"You are a villain, and you know it!" she cried. "See!" she added, pointing her finger at his now livid face and speaking as if to an invisible judge. "See how guilty he looks! Walter Heaton, I have discovered your crime! The widow of your poor accomplice, forced to do your rascally bidding because you had a hold on him through one false step he had made—his widow received his confession in his last moments. I befriended her, and she told me! I have found out much, for it was right that I should know the real characters of both the men who wished to marry me! If you had left me in peace, I would have said nothing, leaving the working of justice to other and higher hands; but you forced me to speak. My gratitude would have held me, but there must be some concession on your part!"

Walter Heaton did not trouble to examine into the logic of her action; all that concerned him was that she had learnt enough to visit his sins upon him if he persisted in carrying out his threat with regard to Harold Winslow. The tables were turned with a vengeance!

She still believed that Harold was guilty! He tried to collect himself, in order to find a way out. Before he had time to utter a word, however, a servant knocked at the door.

"There's two detectives, miss, as wants to come in! I've tried to bamboozle 'em, while I come to you, but they're coming and says as I'll catch it for hindering 'em or my name ain't John, and they 'ave got a warrant for the arrest of Mr. Heaton! Here they come!"

Lena shut the door in the man's face, then turned to confront the man who had saved her life, as she thought. He was trembling in every limb.

"They have found you out!" she cried spasmodically. "I have said nothing. There may yet be a chance of escape, and it is the last thing I can do for you! Quick, through that door, up the narrow staircase to the first floor, then take the servants' staircase to the left, and make your way to the roof! Quick, quick! You can escape that way, along the roofs! I will hold them at that door!"

He hesitated for a moment; for one brief second he forgot himself and thought of the risk she was running in helping him, and of the suffering he had caused her by his fiendish plot against Harold Winslow. Then the instinct of self-preservation gained the upper hand.

"Hold them!" he cried, white with fear. "I may escape!"

He dashed through the opposite door, not stopping even to give a sign that the document on the floor was false. Lena gathered up the paper and thrust it into her pocket; then she locked the door and threw the key through the open window into the shrubbery. The next moment the two officers entered, angry at having been detained.

"Where is he?" demanded one.

"Gone!" declared Lena, laconically, trying to be calm and gain time. Every minute was precious!

One man dashed towards the open window and quickly examined the sill.

"He didn't go that way!" he shouted. "Here, Jack, through this door!"

Lena, by an effort, prevented herself from placing her weak frame between them and the door; that would have betrayed her and him. The officers tried to open the door, but were baffled. It appeared as if Heaton would gain all the time necessary to make good his flight, but the feeling of exultation that was rising in Lena's breast was dashed by the inspiration of one of the detectives.

"I know these houses! That leads to the first floor! Follow me, and we'll have him!"

What happened during the next five minutes Lena never properly understood. She waited with nervously-clasped hands for the result. She waited till she heard a shriek from somewhere above, and then she fell into a swoon. They told her all afterwards.

The officers found Heaton on the roof; there was a short chase, Heaton missed his footing, and fell from the high roof, uttering that shriek as he fell. When picked up he was still living, and he made use of his last moments, as his accomplice had done, to endeavour to right a wrong.

Harold Winslow was amazed when he discovered how narrowly he had escaped prison without being in the least aware of his danger. Old Brookes was so upset, that he vowed that Lena should make her own selection of a husband, which duty she delegated to Harold with a charming blush.

The marriage did not take place for a year, and, when it was solemnised, Mr. Brookes sold his house and went to live in the South of England, near to the pretty estate which he had given to his daughter as a wedding present.

Leslie Grant.

A Word to the Wise.

Probably there is not a reader of Short Stories who is not fond of bright, clever fiction; and that being the case, we expect to earn the gratitude of a large number of people by putting them on to a very good thing.

That good thing is "The Food of the Gods"—the great new serial by H. G. Wells, which is appearing in Pearson's Magazine—and it may safely be described as the most powerful and exciting magazine serial ever published. If you have not already started reading it, you had better get the current number of Pearson's Magazine, in which a full summary of the earlier instalments appears, thus enabling new readers to commence the story now.

Digitized by Google

A WIFE WHO WAS ABOVE REPROACH.

The Tale of a Happy Married Couple and a Jealous Woman.

PICTURE to yourself one of the large, fashionable houses during one of the most superb receptions of the season; the whole suite of magnificent rooms thrown open, and a blaze of light, odorous with flowers, and gay with the exquisite toilets of women, and the glittering uniforms of the Army and Navy men, and the orders and decorations of the members of the foreign embassies; music was wafted in waves of sweetness from the Marine Band, and altogether nothing was wanting to make the scene one of the most beautiful and attractive to a beautiful and pleasure-loving woman.

Such an one, Kate St. George, stood a little apart from the throng, leaning against a marble pillar, attracting hundreds of pairs of eyes towards her, but not rewarding any one of them with even the most formal glance of recognition. Her gaze, an intent one, was fixed on the face of a man who stood in the same relative position as herself, only on the other side of the room; a man most fair to look upon indeed.

Guy Beauregard was always an object of interest to women, and it was not strange, for a face of such strength and such beauty it is not more than once in a lifetime given to a woman to behold. Just at this moment he was bending over the fair head of his wife, Beatrice; and when it is written that Guy Beauregard loved his wife with all the might of his nature, it is also written that she was perhaps the happiest woman in this world. They had been married five years, and Kate St. George had known them both since before their wedding.

The throng had thinned a little; there was more air, and the fragrance of the rich blossoms was more deliciously strong, and the music came more wooingly than when it had to struggle with such a rush and roar of human voices and merry laughter. There were not, perchance, more than a dozen people remaining in the East Room; Kate St. George turned her handsome, dark head wearily towards the crowd yonder, as though she would summon a cavalier to her side. Beatrice Beauregard glanced quickly about as she spoke:

"Guy, nearly everyone has left us. Come!"

"And what if they have?" murmured the lover-husband.

As they stepped out from the shadows of the columns they beheld the face of a man—young, fine-looking, yet with a haggard expression, whether from illness or dissipation it would be somewhat difficult to decide—and the women both uttered a man's name in almost a whisper, half of horror, half of terror.

"Jack!" they exclaimed; and Kate St. George shrunk back into the protection of the column once more. She was the older and more practised woman of the two, and watched Guy Beauregard. He started slightly as he studied his wife's terrible pallor, and went to fetch her a glass of water. When he returned, the gentleman had disappeared. But little occurred in his absence, and that little Kate St. George bore witness to. A few whispered words, and none of which she caught, save the last, as the stranger walked quickly away.

"Contrive to meet me, Beatrice, for Heaven's sake! in the Blue Room, before you go home—I will wait for you there!"

And Beatrice Beauregard bowed assent eagerly, as she pressed his hand—that was all.

"Here is some champagne, my darling!" cried the young fellow, as he put his arm round her trembling form. "What is the matter? Did that man—was he rude to you, or what made you start so? and I thought you made some exclamation—did you not?"

"Nonsense! Why, Guy, dear, what a ridiculous idea!" Beatrice laughed nervously. "It is the heat—the crowd, you know. I have not been feeling well all day."

"No, my heart," he said soberly, "I did not know it."

"Well, then, it was because I wanted to spare my boy pain and anxiety that I did not tell him."

"Bless your heart." He looked proudly and tenderly down at her from his height. "Then I must take you home at once; these infernal crowds are not fit places for you at any time!"

"No, no!" she answered pettishly. "Not yet. I want to see Mrs. McGregor before I go. I will go and look for her. You wait for me, or——" How obligingly and opportunely at this moment Kate St. George emerged from her place of concealment! "Yes, there is Kate, unescorted now, Guy!" she laughed gaily. "I give you carte blanche until I return!"

Kate glanced from husband to wife in remarkably well-feigned innocence.

"How is Mr. Beauregard this evening?" she asked playfully.

"Oh, thanks, Miss St. George, I am in a tolerable state of preservation. I need not ask how you are," he said, bending his blue eyes in gallant fashion full upon her face. Guy Beauregard was one of those men who could not help being civil to a woman, or saying the thing and looking the thing he was expected to.

Digitized by Google

There was a sort of chivalry in the man's nature that furnished him with a creed that women were created to be humoured, but he was loyal as ever knight of old to the lady of his heart.

"I am always well," she replied sweetly; "but——" For an instant Kate St. George hesitated; who shall say whether she lost herself in that moment of hesitation or not? "Shall I risk it? Jack will never betray me—even to her. Yes, I will risk all, for I have all to gain and little to lose," she thought to herself, and the instant of doubt was over. She turned her great black eyes up to Beauregard's face. "But I think Beatrice is not looking at all well, especially during the latter part of the evening, since——"

"Since what?" he inquired slowly.

"Why, since that start that she had—that handsome, dark man—an old friend of your wife's, I presume, Mr. Beauregard?"

"Were you——" Guy stopped short and was silent. He felt as though on the brink of some frightful precipice, and, unconsciously to himself, he quivered in every nerve of his strong frame. "Can I get you anything?" he asked cautiously, after a moment's pause.

"Oh, no; thanks."

Kate was radiant.

"Then, with your permission, I will go and find Mrs. Beauregard."

Kate was leaning, with hands clasped in front of her, against the identical column where she had spent a considerable portion of her evening; they had stopped there in their promenade, and she was looking down at the floor with a curious expression on her face.

"I wouldn't, if I were you."

"I do not understand you."

"Then I suppose I must initiate you, Mr. Beauregard, that is all. I heard Beatrice make an appointment to meet the handsome unknown in the Blue Room before she went home!"

"You l——" For a brief second of time—the very first in his whole life—Guy Beauregard forgot his courtesy to a woman, but he broke off shortly with a muttered: "I beg your pardon!"

Kate laughed.

"I suppose you think your wife is like Cæsar's, Mr. Beauregard, eh?—above reproach? Ah, well, I only say, go and see for yourself. I supposed, of course, Beatrice had told you, else I never should have mentioned it."

"See for myself!" he repeated scornfully. "Do you suppose I will play the spy? No. I do consider my wife 'above reproach,' Miss St. George!"

Kate lifted her eyes.

"You are spared the trouble; there goes 'Cæsar's wife'—and the handsome unknown!"

She turned away in an opposite direction, while Guy Beauregard, every drop of his hot blood surging through his veins like fire, watched Beatrice—his wife—hanging on the arm of the man whose sudden appearance, not half an hour since, caused her such apparent anguish.

* * *

"But, Kate?" murmured Beatrice, looking with wild eyes up at her companion's face.

He passed his hand uneasily across his brow.

"I—Kate will not betray me—she will not even recognise me—I——"

"How can she help it?"

"Ah, Beatrice, never mind, never mind—I—you are all, and the only human being in the world for me now. I am not worthy of you. I surely am not worthy to seek, or voice, or hold any woman's love."

"Hush!—quick, there is my husband—you are an old friend of mine from childhood. The name? I forget it?"

He whispered two words in her ear, and Guy Beauregard stood before them.

"Guy"—her voice trembled a little, and her sweet blue eyes were full of some unutterable pathos—"Guy—this is Berkeley Halpine; Berkeley, this is my husband—Guy Beauregard. Mr. Halpine and I are old friends, dear; we knew each other when we were children."

The two men looked at each other. Halpine did not even offer to extend his hand; but in a second Guy Beauregard put out his, and threw his other arm round his wife.

* * * * *

Two months had passed. Berkeley Halpine was a constant visitor at the Beauregards'. It was generally understood that he was in London endeavouring to obtain a foreign consulate, and that his chances, therefore, were not the most promising.

Meantime Society was busying itself with his devotion to Mrs. Beauregard, the woman whom men had vainly tried for the five years of her married life to lure or coerce into even the mild semblance of a flirtation.

"Gone this time!" exclaimed Colonel Templeton, the irresistible. "Pity she hadn't better taste, and taken me instead of that sallow-faced youngling, who looks as though he'd been through a course of India and curry!"

The Colonel was fifty-one.

Beauregard had as yet heard nothing of this. Absorbed in his affairs, he had tried, with a man's best might, to banish for ever from his mind the memory of that night, eight weeks ago, at the ball. There were times when it rose before him like a horrible vision of torture; but he crushed it as he drew in the sweetness of her lips, and listened to the soft words of her shy love telling. He was sitting in his library, hard at work, one morning, when the door suddenly opened, and Miss St. George entered, looking charming in her outdoor dress.

"Oh," she exclaimed, sinking into the most convenient chair, "I am glad that I have found someone! I have been up in the nursery, and Nelly is out with her maid. Servants are so stupid, and I want——"

"I am sorry you have been put to so much trouble, Miss St. George, I am sure; Beatrice is out."

"Oh, I know she is; I met her driving down the avenue with Berkeley Halpine. I want to leave a message with you, please. Tell her that Henriette—the dressmaker, you know—will be ready for her this afternoon, at four. Don't forget, there's a dear boy!"

"I will not."

He bowed profoundly.

"Ta-ta! then. Oh, I nearly forgot—and that Henriette says she cannot find anywhere that peculiar shade of pink that Mr. Halpine admires so much for Beatrice's new evening dress. Don't forget! Ta-ta!"

"One moment!" He laid his hand upon her arm, and the touch thrilled to the core of her heart. "Were those the dressmaker's words?"

"To be sure! Oh, dear me, Mr. Beauregard, the woman is not to be blamed; the whole town is exciting itself over dear Beatrice's flirtation with her old friend, and every woman thinks you so charming and good-natured not to object or act stupidly about it. Really I must go. Good-bye!"

"Good-bye!"

He stood like a thing of flesh suddenly transformed into stone. His wife—his true-hearted darling and pride—the jeer and jest of the most frivolous Society in the world—that of London! No, no—a thousand times no!

Digitized by Google

"Guy, dear!"—her fresh, clear voice—"what's the matter?"

"Nothing; your friend Miss St. George has just been here and left word that the dressmaker waits you at four o'clock, and that Mr. Halpine's favourite pink is not to be had anywhere."

"Oh, I'm sorry. Well, never mind. Dear"—she nestled down on a little hassock at his feet—"I have a favour to ask of you—I never asked one before, and you will grant it, won't you?" She took her husband's hands and looked up into his face.

"What is it, Beatrice? Anything on earth that I can in honour I will do for you!"

"Well, you know you have influence—power; you are a strong man, politically speaking, and I want a political favour—I want this foreign consulate for Berkeley Halpine, Guy. I implore it of you—I beg—I beseech—I intreat. He is worthy and capable—and, dear, you will get it for him? I know you will?"

"But he will leave England, then, Beatrice; go away from—from here."

"Why, of course; that is what he wants to do, Guy."

"Child"—he laid his hand upon her fair young head—"say you love me as you did when you married me!"

"No, no, Guy—but so much better, by five years."

"Ah, my little one, I will do my best for your friend; it may be some time before its accomplishment, but——"

Guy Beauregard worked faithfully in behalf of the man whom half the world believed he was only working to be rid of. In a few brief weeks the appointment as British Consul would be officially bestowed upon Berkeley Halpine. Guy and Beatrice and the little Nelly were at the seaside, stopping at the Avenue Hotel, where also Miss St. George was staying for a few days with her friends, the Blanchards, prior to their departure for abroad.

The day for the party to sail had in fact arrived, and when the Britannic steamed out of the harbour that afternoon she would bear as precious freight the young woman who, just at this time—9 a.m.—was reading over a letter that had lately been handed her.

"That is all right," she soliloquised. "I fancy the Consul in prospect will not realise his fondest hopes. And now to tell my dear Beatrice of her dear Guy's absorbing passion for me. If I am not very much mistaken, she will fly with Berkeley Halpine to that haven for elopements—the Continent."

Somewhat late in the morning Kate went down and knocked gently at Beatrice's door. In a moment it was softly opened, not by Mrs. Beauregard, but by her husband.

"Beatrice is asleep, Miss St. George. She was out until two this morning—the Meredith ball—and I have just persuaded her to go and lie down on the couch in her room."

"Never mind; don't disturb her, Mr. Beauregard; I'll come down later. We have so much to do and so little time to do it in, that I ventured thus early——" She hesitated an instant; the exquisite room and the soft half-lights through the heavy curtains, the perfumes of flowers, the draperies drawn closely together in the arch leading to the adjoining apartment where Beatrice is, the man whom she adores—worshipped as much as she might with her ignoble nature. Could she turn away? No. "I will come in and rest, Mr. Beauregard, and wait for Beatrice to wake, if you will allow me?"

She saw him stoop and kiss Kate St. George.

"I shall be most happy!"

He drew the most luxurious chair to the window, and placed the morning papers and the freshest magazines beside her, with a plate of fruit and biscuits, and then betook himself back again to his desk and his correspondence. She sat there perhaps fifteen minutes, listening to the tick of the clock, the dulled roar of the streets, and the occasional rustle of the letters that the other occupant of the room was engaged in reading and replying to; for fifteen minutes, and then she could stand it no longer.

She rose and crossed swiftly and noiselessly over to where he sat, and, standing behind his seat she laid her two hands on his broad shoulders and pressed herred lips down upon his bonny curls.

"Guy!—oh, Guy!" she cried brokenly, "have mercy upon a woman who loves—who worships you!"

"Great Heaven!" he cried, springing to his feet. "Kate!—Miss St. George!—you are mad!—you are mistaking me for someone else! I——" But she is weeping now, clinging and kneeling. "Oh, my poor child!—for Heaven's sake——" He raised her in his arms and laid her on the sofa. "Let me get you some water—some wine—you are ill!"

"Ill!" she repeated passionately. "I am ill unto death. I am going away—away—into a far place, out of the sight of your eyes—and I leave you here with her—with Beatrice, who never loved you as I have done—who even now is deceiving you, for she loves this mysterious Berkeley Halpine."

Digitized by Google

There was a faint rustle in the next room, but the man did not hear it.

"My darling deceiving me?" he cried, in agony and bitterness.

"Kiss me—kiss me once, Guy!" she begged; "there is no harm in your kissing me, since, in a few short hours, we shall be separated for ever!" He bent his head and kissed her brow, and the curtains parted and dropped together again. "Thank you! Heaven bless you, my love!"

She left him sitting like one stunned with a terrible blow; and then in a few moments he dashed out of the room, passing Berkeley Halpine in the corridor as he went. He merely turned to see that the man entered the room which he had just quitted, and then went on his way to quench and still his grief in brandy, whisky—anything.

Beatrice Beauregard stood in the middle of the pretty room, with wild, wide eyes and fallen hair, when the man they called her lover came in and found her.

"Beatrice, what——"

"Hush!"

"No, no! Oh, Beatrice, I must tell you. They are on my track!—they have been given a clue by—by someone. I must fly on a sailing vessel at once, this very day. My darling! My dear Beatrice!"

The young man flung himself on his knees before her, while the tears coursed down his thin cheeks.

"I will go with you!" she cried steadily. "Berkeley, my husband loves someone else. I have heard with these ears, seen with these eyes, and I am going to leave them free to love each other. Do not attempt to remonstrate with me."

She raised her small white hand imploringly.

"But, Beatrice, the man worships you. Who is the woman?"

"The girl whom I always thought loved you."

"Kate!" he exclaimed, in horror. "Oh, no, Beatrice—Guy does not care for her! She"—he faltered—"always has cared for him."

"I have made up my mind," Beatrice Beauregard answered slowly. "I am going to leave my husband—and—my child!" The fierce sobs forced their utterance, and the miserable woman fell on her knees beside her companion. "Berkeley, do not refuse me; you are my refuge—my harbour—my only hope of rest; take me with you!"

"I can refuse you nothing," he replied.

"Take me this hour—this moment—from the home that I would not stoop to call mine an instant longer! When Love has died, I cannot stay to smile and play false over his grave!"

When Guy Beauregard came back from seeing the party off on board the Britannic, his wife's maid informed him that "Mrs. Beauregard left the hotel two hours since in a carriage with Mr. Halpine."

* * * * *

At the Hotel Continental at Nice Kate St. George, the Blanchards, Guy Beauregard, and his little daughter and her nurse were staying, for in the ship that sailed next after the Britannic Guy had taken passage—a heartbroken man, unable to find a single clue, a faint thread, upon which to hang his hope of finding the wife he had lost, without even a solitary written word to say farewell, or to speak of sorrow—nothing but a terrible, sickening blank.

At Paris he fell in with the Blanchard party, and Kate, who petted and humoured the little Nelly to the top of her bent, was quite careful that the plans of her friends should tally with those of Mr. Beauregard. Kate was an heiress, having come into some fifty thousand pounds, through foreign relatives, some eight years back. So they were all together at Nice.

The stay did not promise to be long: in fact, Guy was unable to rest anywhere for a length of time. He wandered about the Continent like an uneasy spirit, with naught to comfort him but the baby he idolised. Two or three times of late the child had insisted upon it that she had seen her mamma, "that mamma had tissed her and tried about her a dreat deal."

"Dreaming, poor little one! Dreaming!" the father murmured over her golden head. "If it were only so! If I could only find my girl and take her home—if she would come to me! If I could only once lay these hands on him! Great Heaven! I——"

The next day—it was to be the last of their stay at Nice—Miss St. George this time insisting that she needed a change at once—when Guy Beauregard came home from a weary walk about the gay streets of the town, he stood in amazement at the open door of the little salon.

There stood Berkeley Halpine with his child in his arms, kissing her wee, innocent lips and coaxing her with fruits and sweets. "I will take you to mamma, Nelly; come with me, like a good little girl, to mamma," he said.

"Put down my child!" The voice was one not to be disobeyed, the voice of a man overwhelmed with grief, anger, shame, outraged pride. "Is it not enough that you have robbed me of my wife, that you should steal away our child from me, too? Villain!" he cried, rushing upon the young fellow like a lion in his passionate fury, "what have you done with my wife? Where is she? Tell me, or I will kill you where you stand—coward, miserable scoundrel, that you are!"

"Guy Beauregard," returned Berkeley Halpine, the colour rising in his pale, thin cheeks, "your wife"—he spoke contemptuously, believing the other to have given her love up for another's—"your wife is my——"

"Your what?"

Guy sprang upon him and threw him to the floor.

"Is my sister."

"Mamma, mamma!" lisped the little child; and in another instant Beatrice and her baby were gathered into Guy's strong arms.

"What an affecting tableau!" exclaimed Miss St. George, suddenly appearing upon the scene.

"Oh, Kate!" groaned Halpine, while all the blood forsook his face. "My hour has come at last. Guy Beauregard, Beatrice—you see that woman. I loved her eight years ago with all a boy's first wild passion. I was poor—so was she. At her instigation I forged my employer's name for fifty thousand pounds, and placed it for safe keeping in her hands. Remorse overtook me; I implored her to give me back the money.

"I begged; but she would not—she is living on it now. I fled to South America. I dared not return a year since. I met my sister in London. You, Guy Beauregard, procured me the Consulate to T——. But this woman was not satisfied that I should live and succeed honestly anywhere; she gave the clue to my identity to the police; she drove my sister mad by making her believe that her husband's love was no longer hers.

"Then Beatrice fled with me. Oh, Kate St. George, I must have loved you well to have held my peace so long! Had you only tampered with me—my peace—my lips should never have been unsealed; but hers—no, no! Guy, there is your wife—take her!"

"Beatrice, my darling, forgive me!" cried the strong man, in his joy and anguish.

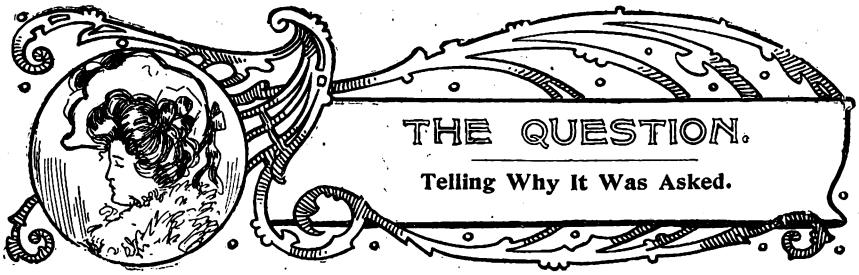
"Forgive you, dear heart? Ah, I did that long ago; and now there is nothing to forgive, unless for you to pardon me."

"To pardon you?" he said, gathering her and her child again to his heart. "I have a wife such as Cæsar of old had, dear—above reproach!"

And Kate St. George left Nice that very hour, it is presumed, for no trace of her, or of the money she liked so well, has ever been found.

May Vickers.

Digitized by Google



THE QUESTION.

Telling Why It Was Asked.

Travers and Miss Wainwright had been discussing all the latest happenings in their world. Now there came a lull; there seemed to be nothing more to say. Miss Wainwright stared absently into the fire. Presently Travers leant forward and looked at her searchingly.

"Miss Wainwright," he said, slowly, "there is something I want to know. I have been thinking——" He paused, then went on abruptly: "If I ask you a question will you promise to answer it truthfully, yes or no?"

Miss Wainwright looked at him quickly, the colour mounted to her cheeks. Of what was he thinking?

"It depends altogether upon the question," she said. "If I answer it at all, I shall answer it truthfully. What is it?"

"Oh, no, that won't do. Before I ask the question you must promise me that you will answer it, and truthfully, yes or no."

"Well, I won't promise any such thing."

"Then I can't ask the question."

"But possibly it is something that I couldn't answer."

"No, it is something that you can answer, if you will—by a simple yes or no."

"Is it something concerning—myself?"

"Yes."

"Does it concern anyone else besides myself?"

"Well, that would depend on the point of view," Travers said slowly. "In one way I might say that it concerns you alone, and then, again, I might say that it concerns—somebody else. However, I refuse to answer any more leading questions."

Miss Wainwright gazed throughtfully into the fire. Then she looked at Travers again.

"If I knew it wasn't——. But, then, how could you—?" She laughed excitedly, her eyes glowed, she leant forward in her chair with flushed cheeks and parted lips. Oh, what did he know?

"Couldn't you—just give me a little hint of what it is?" she said persuasively.

Travers shook his head.

"No, that would be the same as telling you outright."

"Well, then, I will do this—I will promise to answer you truthfully, unless it is a question on one certain subject, which—which I really couldn't—wouldn't have any right to answer, you know. Will that satisfy you?"

"That isn't fair at all. You might refuse to answer; then, in any case, you would know what I wanted to ask, and I would know nothing."

Miss Wainwright pushed back her hair petulantly.

"You are unkind. I don't see where the fairness of your proposition comes in. To make one promise to answer a question before one knows what it is! No, I won't promise!"

"Then let us drop the subject," said Travers.

For some time they sat in silence. Then she said suddenly:

"You will tell me the question you were going to ask, won't you?"

She leant forward coaxingly, irresistibly. Travers hesitated, then he gathered himself together.

"I had rather not say any more about it."

"I promise," she said, quickly, as if fearful of a second thought.

"Well, it is simply this. Weren't you getting just a little sleepy before we began this question business? Now answer me truthfully."

Miss Wainwright stared at him with wide open eyes.

"Mr. Travers, you don't mean to tell me that that is the question?"

"That is the question. I have tried it before on girls when things were getting a little dull, you know, and I have never known it to fail yet. It wakes them up; they always get excited, their cheeks glow and their eyes sparkle; they look awfully pretty, and it is the most amusing game I know. They invariably promise in the end."

Travers leant back and chuckled, until a deluge of sofa pillows almost smothered him. Nevertheless, as he walked home he said to himself:

"There is no getting round a woman. If I had asked her the question which she had in her mind she wouldn't have answered it. I saw in her face that she meant to break her promise."

Venita Seibert.

£25 IN CASH PRIZES!

CASH DOWN.	CASH DOWN.	CASH DOWN.
1st Prize.	2nd Prize.	3rd Prize.
£10.	£5.	£2.

And Eight Cash Prizes of £1 Each.

A NOVEL CONTEST FOR OLD AND YOUNG.

In a fortnight's time there will be announced in this paper a competition in which the above magnificent prizes will be offered. The competition will be of an absolutely unique description, and will appeal to all, whether they are old or young, poor or wealthy.

Everyone will have an equal opportunity of carrying off the prizes, and the competition will form a very pleasurable and diverting means of entertainment.

Remember that full details will be announced in the number of Short Stories dated March 12th.

Tell your friends to look out for further particulars.

£25 IN CASH PRIZES.

Digitized by Google

Splendid Series.

A Striking Series of Astonishing Revelations.

Told by the Decoy Herself.

OF WHOM YOU READ.

Vivienne D'Alton, the decoy. She, an innocent girl, unwittingly leads young gentlemen of good social standing to their ruin at the hands of her father.

Beverley D'Alton, who poses as a millionaire who has made his money by judicious speculation. He assumes to lavish great affection on his daughter, from whom he has been separated for many years.

Mrs. Sherwood. A florid person, who is introduced to Vivienne by her father as a great friend of her dead mother. She lives with the D'Altons, and requests Vivienne to call her "Aunt Flora," which the young girl reluctantly does.

Annchen. A lady's maid, whom Vivienne greatly detests. She seems to be on very familiar terms with Mrs Sherwood and Mr. D'Alton.

EPISODE EIGHT.

The Morocco-Bound Book.

The morocco-bound book proved weirdly fascinating, and, after looking round my rooms to make sure that neither of the maids was there, I shut the door. Then I sat down to investigate the inside of the volume, and what I read seemed to turn my very blood cold, for each chapter proved to be a concise treatise on the special effects of various poisons.

Some of these, by their apparently significant bearing upon recent events, attracted my instant attention, and I read of one poison which produced slow stupefaction, of others that would throw the victim into a fainting fit that would end fatally, and of others whose action could be prolonged many months without producing any symptoms except those of a wasting decline.

But one chapter was even more absorbingly interesting than the rest, for it dealt with a pernicious drug, easily administered in wine or spirits, which produced temporary paralysis of that portion of the brain which governs the faculty of memory.

"There is but one antidote to the condition induced by the administration of this toxicological marvel," continued the article, "and that is to be found in the vegetable kingdom. Take some Dutch tulips, express the raw juice, give the patient a teaspoonful of this juice, and its immediate effect will be to neutralise the poison so as to restore its normal action to that part of the brain which has been held in bondage."

The book fell from my nerveless fingers, and I closed my eyes as though to shut out the awful spectres of suspicion which faced me.

"Surely, surely," was my gasping thought, "I must be mad to imagine there can be any connection between this fiendish book and——"

"Ah, there it is! Vivienne, my dear! What a terrible fright you have given me! I was afraid that one of the maids had picked up that silly collection of impossibilities, and I am thankful to find it here, for there is no telling what stupid notions it might put into the heads of ignorant people."

Mrs. Sherwood, noiseless as a cat, had opened my door, and stolen in upon me quite unperceived. But, with almost miraculous self-control, I opened my eyes so slowly as to seem still half asleep. Then, yawning, and stretching myself, I said lazily: "Oh, it's you, is it? I thought you were going to sleep. Are you better?"

"Yes, dear, quite better. But you—you look pale."

"Very likely. I feel pale. I wanted to go out, but was kept indoors to amuse people I don't care about. When father asked me to see you to your room, I thought there was a fine chance to amuse myself in my own way, without going back to the drawing-room. So I borrowed a book, thinking it was a novel. But it proved to be too stupid for anything, so I fell asleep, and I think that a longer nap would have done me good."

"You should have asked me for a book. I could have lent you a splendid novel."

"Very well. Send Annchen with it now, and I will read it till it is time to dress for dinner."

Mrs. Sherwood smiled her approval, and walked off with her recovered volume, being followed by another audible yawn from me. She seemed to be quite satisfied that "The Life and Methods of Lucrezia Borgia" held no interest for me. But the chances were that she was dissembling just as much as I was, and the conviction was borne in upon me that I must trust her no more than I would trust a snake.

I also knew that never again would I have the chance of seeing the book of poisons. But I had had it long enough in my possession to make a valuable discovery, and I resolved to experiment upon Alan Melrose on the following morning. If the vegetable antidote failed to restore his lost memory, it would still add enormously to my peace of mind, for it would remove therefrom a most dreadful suspicion of deliberate foul play. If, on the other hand, it proved efficacious, it would be an incalculable blessing to the unfortunate Alan and his sisters, although my own mental anguish would no doubt be intensified.

Digitized by Google

So I planned to act upon the directions given in the book, and, in the meantime, strove to appear as usual. I was, however, not at all pleased at the facility with which I was constantly being interrupted when in fancied privacy.

My father laid great stress upon having all the hinges and locks in the house in such perfect condition that the doors would open and shut noiselessly. But such perfection as this had its drawbacks, and I resolved to emphasise my objection to it by locking my door the next time a friend called on me.

When I first came home from school, I was told that I was to preside over my father's palatial establishment, but my presidency had so many limitations that it soon practically became non-existent. Certainly, I was the nominal mistress of the house, with a large staff of servants to do my bidding.

But everything seemed to go on by clockwork, and it very often happened that though several people were invited to dine with us, it was not always considered necessary to inform me of the fact. So I was by no means surprised that Claude and Clarissa Greatham, after going home to change into evening attire, had come back to have dinner here, at my father's invitation. Notwithstanding my professed indifference on their account, I was very glad to see them, for I wanted to warn them against putting any money in the New Barbary Land Development Company, if I could do so without being observed by my own people.

Not even to myself did I explain my full reasons for being anxious on their behalf. And as for being explicit with them, how was that possible?

Beyond the fact that there had been abnormally erratic behaviour on the part of those whom I knew to have dabbled in the business, I had nothing which I could cite in support of my objections to this particular investment.

For how dared I even hint that, contrary to popular opinion, my father was not a Mascot, who brought good luck to all who sought his advice, but a Hoodoo, in whose wake there seemed to follow a long procession of calamitous events?

Nevertheless, I meant to bestow my warning in some form or other. But strange to relate, neither during dinner nor after did I find a minute's chance of a confidential word with either Claude or Clarissa, and it now dawned on me that every moment was being quietly and unostentatiously supervised.

What could be the reason of this? Was it possible that my vague suspicions had some foundation in fact, and that it was feared that I should make undesirable disclosures? Was my tongue being muzzled? And were my movements being curtailed, so as to restrict me to a circumscribed sphere of action?

Or perhaps—and here a more charitable line of argument crept in—perhaps my father, having concluded that Claude Greatham's openly displayed admiration for me was distasteful to its object, had decided to spare both of us the embarrassment which a proposal and consequent refusal would entail.

Anyhow, whatever the reason might be, the fact remained that I had no chance of giving my warning, and I had to console myself with the resolve to drive round to Clarissa Greatham's address next morning, after I had been to see Alan Melrose and his sisters.

My father, always anxious for me to enjoy life, had insisted that I must not allow Lady Windelmore's death to interfere with several social engagements I had made, and there were two receptions that night, from which I should have found it impossible to excuse myself, even if I had wished to do so. Mrs. Sherwood, it seemed, was not feeling well enough to go out, so I was to be escorted by my father himself, whose sudden cultivation of my society was becoming rather irksome to me, for it must be confessed that not all the kindness he had displayed towards me was able to kindle that devoted filial love which a daughter ought to feel for her parent.

The first of the receptions, held at the town house of the Dowager Lady Blankerley, was a dull, stiff affair, characterised by a total absence of the kind of people that my father liked me to cultivate, so we soon passed on to the Hon. Mrs. Donoughvan's, where everything was gay and sparkling.

"There are several men here whom I want you to capture," whispered my father, and I replied rather mutinously:

"You speak as if I were a bandit, or a policeman, and as if I were here solely to make conquests."

"That is exactly what you are here for. If it were all one what you did, or where you went, I should not have gone to either the trouble of bringing you here, or the expense of providing you with more costly attire than anybody else is wearing."

I looked round at the crowd of well-dressed members of Society, who, under cover of some of the best music to be had in London, were exchanging gossip with each other, and saw that for personal richness, my white crêpe-de-Chine gown, with its costly embroidery in real pearls, could not be equalled by that of anybody else in the room.

But it was something new to have the question of expense brought home to me, and, for the first time, I wondered if I were being paraded as a sort of speculation which was expected to return both capital and interest in due course.

The very idea roused my pride, and I answered, with some warmth:

"If my costumière's bills are too heavy for you, I will economise in future."

"Don't be so silly! I am not asking you to economise. All I want of you is to encourage desirable men to come to our house, so that I can have plenty of bright society about me without having to come out to seek it. But I suppose you are like all other daughters I have ever heard of—you grudge the least return for the many benefits heaped upon you, and you do not realise that you have duties as well as privileges."

This reproof hurt me to the quick, and, to show how undeserved it was, I exerted myself to the utmost to appear as brilliant, as attractive, and as free from care as I was when I was first introduced into Society at the beginning of the season. The result was that my father's expectations were more than realised, and amongst those who sought permission to pay their early respects to me were a Russian prince of fabulous wealth, the heir to an English earldom, and two wealthy Englishmen who had made fortunes by turning their businesses into limited liability companies.

The first was fat and fifty. The second was thin and thirty. The third was round and rosy. The fourth was long and lanky. So far as my own inclination went, I would not have encouraged one of them. But I saw that my father seemed to like them all, though I could not help thinking that, if they had been poor, he would have regarded them even more indifferently than I did myself.

* * * * *

Although I did not get to bed until nearly two o'clock, I was up in good time next morning, for I intended to go out soon after breakfast in my own rooms to visit Sophie Melrose. Even if I were asked to go out shopping, or for a drive, with Aunt Flora, I was not likely to be wanted by her for a couple of hours, for she never went out before half-past eleven, and I meant to slip out quietly, and take a hansom, instead of using the smart little coupé placed at my special disposal.

So I told Annchen to have my outdoor things in readiness for me to start at once, and I was by no means pleased to receive a visit from Aunt Flora.

"Good morning, dear," she smiled; "I don't suppose you expected to see me for hours yet. But dear Beverley sent me a note after he came home last night, saying that urgent business would take him to his City office very early, and that, as he wanted specially to see us both, we were to call there for him at a quarter past ten."

This was vexing news, though at any other time I would have hailed it with pleasure, for I had felt some curiosity to visit the City office in which so much unostentatious charity was dispensed. Now, however, I wanted to be elsewhere, and I promptly said so.

Digitized by Google

"I can't go with you this morning," I protested. "As you know, I have an appointment with Sophie Melrose, and I mean to keep it."

"I am very sorry, but you will have to disappoint Miss Melrose this time. Your father's orders are imperative, and you know that he is not the kind of man to be disobeyed."

"Then I shall send a message to say that I will see Sophie Melrose immediately after lunch."

"A very good idea! Write the note now, and Annchen shall go at once with it."

I complied with this suggestion, though I felt very disappointed, and was presently en route for the office, which proved to be situated down a court off Lombard Street. Greatly, however, to my increased vexation, we were told that Mr. D'Alton had been compelled to go out, and had left a message for us to await his return. So there was nothing for it but to muster what patience I could, and the little stock I had was entirely exhausted when, at twelve o'clock, my father put in his belated appearance.

He was full of apologies for having kept us waiting, and I felt that there was need of apology when it turned out that the important business which had brought us thither was nothing more than an appointment with a photographer to whom the influential millionaire had promised his patronage.

"I'm afraid it's too late to go to Mr. Vaughan now," he said; "we must manage better another time."

Of course I could not wisely say all that was in my mind. But I did not hide my disappointment at having missed going to the Melroses' because of an unwelcome appointment which had led to nothing after all.

We reached home rather late for lunch, and as soon as it was over, I ordered my coupé to be brought round at once.

"You took my note to Miss Melrose?" I asked Annchen, who replied respectfully: "Yes, miss; and I wondered how it was that everything was in such a bustle. The servants were running about as if something had happened, and Miss Melrose herself told me to say that she would write and thank you as soon as she could."

This message was absolutely unintelligible to me. For why did Sophie need to write when she expected to see me sooner than a letter could reach me by post? However, the only way to remove my mystification was to go before any more hindrances occurred, and my carriage stopped, within an hour, outside the house in which Alan Melrose lived with his sisters.

Greater still, however, was my surprise when, instead of being admitted, I was told that the Misses Melrose had left London, taking with them their brother, whom they were going to place under the care of a famous specialist.

More than this I could not gather. The servants knew neither the name nor the abiding place of the specialist, and I could have sat down and cried there and then to think that while I was meeting with a series of trivial but effective hindrances, the unfortunate Alan was being taken beyond the reach of the antidotal experiment whereby he might possibly have been restored to his former state of mind.

"Perhaps Sophie's letter will explain everything," I told myself, as I was once more being driven homewards. "She must have heard of the specialist since she called to beseech my aid, or she would have mentioned him when she was here. I only hope a cure will be effected."

We were nearly home when I remembered that I wanted to advise Clarissa Greatham against investing in anything that was recommended to her on account of big possibilities, and, pulling the check string, I ordered my coachman to drive to her house.

Then I gave myself up to try to solve the many things that puzzled me, and took no more notice of my surroundings until we actually drew up at home!

"How dared you drive me here without calling first at the address I gave you?" was the angry question I put to the coachman, who professed to be quite surprised at the mistake that had been made.

"Please, miss, I'm very sorry," he said; "but I thought you meant that I was to drive you to see Miss Greatham the next time you used the coupé."

The man was lying. I knew it by the shifty expression of his eyes, but I disdained to argue with him, though the sudden conviction that even the coachman told off for my special service was acting as a kind of spying restraint on my movements, gave me a severe shock.

But what could be the meaning of it all?

Many hindrances had prevented me from seeing the Melroses again. Were these hindrances premeditated? And had I been carefully kept out of the way until I could no longer communicate with them?

I certainly began to think so, and a vague terror possessed me when I remembered how oddly I had been prevented from talking to the Greathams. But I am not a nervous subject, and the instinct of self-defence soon asserted itself to such purpose that I was able to seem only mildly vexed when I met Aunt Flora, gaily dressed, and smiling benignantly, crossing the hall.

"I shall tell father to speak sharply to Bryce," I said in the tone of a petulant child. "I told him to drive to the Greathams', but he brought me straight home."

"Ah, well, dear, you mustn't blame Bryce," was the gentle reply; "you know how particular your father is about your being in to receive afternoon callers, and I daresay poor Bryce had his orders to get home before four o'clock."

"Upon my word, I am treated as if I were a little child."

"There are thousands of girls in London who would go wild with delight if they thought they were going to be half as well treated as you."

This reproof was so palpably true that I almost reproached myself for being ungrateful, and I made no demur when Aunt Flora suggested that I should have my toilet attended to at once, lest visitors should find me unprepared.

Thus it happened that we both went upstairs together, and when Aunt Flora saw my boudoir door closed behind me, I daresay she thought I had been easily hoodwinked. But I was not quite so docile as I seemed, for as soon as I knew that she was out of sight, I hurried softly downstairs again. I had heard the postman's knock, and meant to see if anything had arrived for me. Quick as I was, Annchen was before me, and I saw her take, from the pile lying on the table, two letters on which I could read my own name.

She was about to put them into her pocket when, swift as thought, I crept up behind her, and snatching the letters out of her hand, said sternly: "The next time you fetch my letters up for me, put them on a salver at once, and not into your pocket, which is not the proper place for them."

For an instant Annchen's eyes flashed venom. Then she said humbly: "I'm very sorry, miss. I shall know better next time."

Notwithstanding her feigned humility, I felt sure that the girl was furious because she had been deprived of the letters, but it was not until I came to read them myself that I knew their possession to be a matter of life and death.

(Another instalment of this exciting series next week.)

The First Number of

THE RAPID REVIEW,

Pearson's Splendid New Sixpenny Magazine,

is

NOW ON SALE

At all Booksellers. Get it at once!

Digitized by Google

Unsolved Love Problems.

A Prize of One Guinea is offered to the reader who sends in the most Satisfactory Solution to the Problem. Replies should not exceed one hundred words. See "Your Editor Chats."

No. IX.—THE ORDEAL OF DAVID HUME.

A WELL-PRESERVED, grey-haired woman was sitting in a comfortable arm-chair by a blazing fire one cold December day. The room and its occupant were well suited to each other; they were both clothed in excellent taste, handsomely, yet not aggressively fashionable; they both impressed the observer with an idea of riches without ostentation.

It was evident that she expected a visitor, for the silver kettle was left boiling and bubbling, and the tea was still unmade in the silver teapot, and the look of anxiety on her face cleared at the sound of footsteps on the stairs.

A man of medium height with a thoughtful, clever face, entered the room. He looked about forty, but, really, he was rapidly nearing his fiftieth year. His hair was thick and wavy, but strongly tinged with grey, which, however, only served to intensify the depth of his deep-set, dark eyes; his face was clean-shaven, and showed all the sweetness and strength of the lines of mouth and chin. Altogether, a man to be loved and trusted; not perhaps a successful man—the eyes were too soft and dreamy for that—but a man who would never fail one in one's need.

"Oh, David," cried Mrs. Craven, coming to meet him with both hands outstretched, "I am so glad you have come; I feared something might prevent you, and I really must have a talk with you to-day."

"You know I am always at liberty on a Friday, for my week's work is done by then, and there is only my pleasure to consider," he replied in a musical voice.

"Yes, I know; but whenever one particularly wants a thing all sorts of unexpected accidents crop up to prevent it. Also, I must beg you to forgive me for dragging you away from your real pleasure, your etching——"

"No, no, Eleanor—my real pleasure is to be of service to my friends. Tell me now, what is troubling you?"

And he seated himself, drawing up his chair in the manner of a man who feels at home.

But now that he was there, Mrs. Craven seemed in no haste to broach the subject of her anxiety. Instead, she chatted pleasantly on indifferent subjects till the tea was finished and removed.

"No, thank you; no lamps yet," and the soft-footed domestic withdrew.

"I think one can talk better by the firelight," she explained half apologetically, and David Hume replied:

"Your subject seems to cause you embarrassment?"

"Why, yes, frankly it does—you see, it is about Etta."

There was no movement from the figure opposite her, half hidden in the chair, only a sort of tense stillness.

"I am troubled about her," went on Mrs. Craven hurriedly; "she has refused Charlie Mowbray for the second time."

There was a short silence, and then David said:

"Why does that trouble you?"

"He is a charming young fellow, and very much in love with her; he would make her an excellent husband. It is most provoking that she should refuse what any girl would jump at——"

"One thousand pounds a year, and—youth," said the man meditatively, the last word almost a sigh.

"Well," she replied, "the one thousand pounds a year is not to be despised, though I should not dream of urging the marriage if it were only that, but we have known him so long and he is a thoroughly good fellow. John says so, and you know the value he puts upon character."

"What does John think about it?"

Mrs. Craven leant forward.

"He says if she can find her happiness with Charlie he would be very pleased, but he is not going to speak to her about it—that is a woman's affair."

"Surely you don't want me to do so?" cried David in an alarmed voice.

"Yes, I do," replied Mrs. Craven firmly. "Listen!"—and she enjoined silence by holding up her hand. "You know that six months ago John found out that his partner had been embezzling money. Well, the bank could not afford a scandal, the partnership was dissolved, and John has to pay back all the money that young Hilton had taken. The world must not guess, for should there be a sudden demand on the bank, it must close, therefore we still live like this," and she waved her hand comprehensively. "You alone know of this affair, and if you think, you will see how important it is that Etta should be comfortably married, for we can settle nothing on her, and should the secret leak out, the crash may come at any moment."

David was gazing thoughtfully at the fire, and made no reply.

"You know what a great influence you have always had with the child——"

"Surely Etta is a woman now," and there was an unwonted sound of impatience in his voice.

"She is only twenty," urged the woman of fifty-three. "In the eyes of the law she is not old enough to sign away money; why should she be any more fit to throw away the intangible treasure of an honest young fellow's love?"

David smiled at the argument.

"Well, what does Etta say herself? What excuse does she give for such silly behaviour?"

Mrs. Craven glanced at him nervously, and then spoke slowly, with her gaze on the leaping flames.

"She says she might have loved him had no ther ideal been something very different; something older, graver, deeper, something infinitely above her——"

Digitized by Google

David's heart seemed to stand still as he forced the question from his lips:

"And this ideal—has she found it in real life?"

"She thinks so," replied Mrs. Craven significantly.

The silence grew intense; in David's ears there was only the sound of the thumping of his heart, which seemed to him to grow louder and louder till he thought his companion must hear it. To speak just then without betraying his emotion was beyond even his self-control.

Suddenly Mrs. Craven rose and stood before him, and spoke in a passionate pleading:

"Now do you see why I want you to speak to her? Poor, foolish child, that is the only way to show her how hopeless is her dream without letting her know she has betrayed her secret. You have always been a sort of god to her from her childhood, and in your kindness you have almost made a friend of her despite her immature mind. How should she understand the real nature of her love, that it is a religion, and not love at all? How should she know that it will not bear the terrible intimacy of married life? That it would not survive the discovery that you are a man and not a god? How should she see the gulf that lies between you? The gulf of mental growth, of experience of life, of years—the gulf that will widen with every decade? How should she know that she would never be a mate for you, that your mind and heart are given to your art? Or realise the wearing struggle it would be for you to earn enough to keep two? Into her innocent child-like worship practical thoughts have never come; we must think for her, and save her from wrecking her life."

Her voice sank, as in a whisper, and stretching out her hands to him in appeal, she added:

"Ah, David, do not be vexed with the poor child. Pity a mother's anxiety for her only daughter's happiness, and speak to her about this marriage. It is the only way to make her really understand what are your feelings towards her. I do not want you to seriously urge her to marry Charlie; let her refuse him again, but I do intreat you to set her heart free that she may be able to love, with an everyday, human love, some man who is worthy and of a suitable age."

Her appeal made, the mother waited anxiously for his reply, but the man that sat so still saw pictures in the fire. Etta, the tiny, dark-eyed baby; Etta, the winsome, imaginative child; Etta, the gentle, sensitive maiden, whose mind he had helped to train, and who had so often startled him by flashes showing her intimacy with the Higher Knowledge; Etta, the woman, who was enshrined in his heart, in the holiest of holies to which none other had yet had access.

At last he rose from his chair, and spoke, but his tongue moved stiffly, and he found it difficult to form his words.

"Eleanor, you and John have been my friends for thirty years, and I would give my right hand if it could be of any service to you, but in this matter I cannot decide without time for thought. Give me till to-morrow."

"God bless you, David!" cried Mrs. Craven with a sob in her voice as he gave her his hand. "I knew you would not fail me."

And David walked out of the room like a man in a dream.

"What a dear, delicate-minded fellow he is!" murmured Mrs. Craven. "He evidently does not like the difficult task, perhaps he fears the responsibility; but he is as sensitive as a woman, and I know he will never let dear Etta guess that he knows her secret. I am glad that I had the courage to tell him."

Meanwhile David paced the cold, wet streets.

Why was this dazzling vision shown to him only to be snatched away? If Etta loved him, and God alone knew how he loved her, why should he not tell her of it? Why should they not be happy? Had he not a right to happiness like any other man? And did she not love him?

But then he knew the great question was, what would be for her happiness?

On the one side, Charlie Mowbray, young, strong, and noble-natured, with a good income, and a beautiful home to take her to, where they might grow old together and see their children grow up around them

On the other hand, himself, elderly, poor and unambitious, living on a bare two hundred pounds a year as a designer, which had hitherto satisfied his few needs, and devoting all his spare time to etchings which gave satisfaction to his soul, but brought in barely enough to cover their expense. He felt himself the father of her higher intelligence, but—he was thirty years her senior.

How ought he to act?

L. Hughes.

Unique and Interesting.

A COMPETITION which embraces a totally new idea is a rarity. In these days it is a very difficult task to discover something novel, some idea that has not already been worked to death. But the new competition, a preliminary announcement of which appears on page 265, will exploit fresh fields. In this will lay one of its greatest charms. In our issue dated March 12th the competition will commence, and in order that the scheme shall come as a greater surprise to you I shall not divulge full details of it until then. Bear in mind these important facts; firstly, that the competition will be simple, yet interesting in the extreme; secondly, that anybody, irrespective of age or station, may enter with equal opportunities; and thirdly, that the prizes offered are magnificent ones. Do not forget that the competition will commence the week after next. Let your friends and acquaintances know what is coming, so that they, too, may endeavour to win a fine award

The Ninth Love Problem.

ON the previous page appears the ninth Unsolved Love Problem. I am offering a prize of one guinea to the reader who sends me, not later than first post, Friday, March 4th, what I consider to be the best advice for David Hume under the circumstances. Replies should be written in not more than a hundred words, on one side of the paper only. State as clearly as possible why you consider your solution to be the best.

Mark your envelopes "Ninth Love Problem" in the top left hand corner, and address them to the "Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C."

Remember that the last possible date on which I can receive replies is Friday, the 4th of next month. None arriving after then will be considered.

The Eighth Love Problem.

"THE DIFFICULTY OF HUGH CHESTER," as the eighth problem was entitled, brought forth letters from very many readers. I shall announce the winner of the guinea in my next chat.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

FOR EDITH'S SAKE.

The Tale of a Wrong Forgiven.

Boom! Boom! Boom!

Above the roaring of the wind, above the swash of the driving rain, above the beating of the angry waves against the beach, rose the sound of the reports that implored aid for a sinking vessel.

In a hut just beyond the reach of the storm-tossed waves a man raised his head and listened. A man with a thin, delicately-featured face, coal-black hair and eyes, and long, slim, hands. A man whose whole appearance, even in the dimly-lighted hut, contradicted the coarse dress he wore, the utter penury of the room, that was the only one that the cabin contained.

Boom! Boom! Boom!

Again, rising above the battle of the elements, pathetic in its monotonous appeal, came the sound of a minute gun.

The man stood erect, took a lantern from the wall, lighted it, and opened the door of his hut.

The sudden rush of wind and rain drove him back for a moment; then, as he was, bareheaded, he strode into the darkness beyond. Only the feeble glimmer of his lantern, the occasional flashes of vivid lightning, guided his steps as he turned his face to the coast.

Below him, where the fishermen had a small colony of cabins, lanterns gleamed, and men were collecting in groups. But where he stood, upon higher ground, his was the solitary figure. Women looked up at the starlike glitter of his lantern, and said:

"The hermit is out to-night. Will he come down here to help, or look on as usual?"

For on that wild coast shipwrecks were not infrequent. It was but watching to save such lives as the sea spared them, for no boat could live for a moment in a storm there; but on the chance of reviving such as were washed ashore these men and women waited patiently.

Whether the man they called the hermit would have crossed the rocky cliff to where the fishermen were gathered can only be conjectured, for, as he stood quietly waiting alone, the waves carried to his very feet the lifeless form of a man, and instinctively he clutched it before it could be washed back again.

Half lifting, half dragging it, he succeeded in carrying it to his hut and putting it upon the rude bed there. Then, lighting a second candle, he brought spirits from a shelf and rubbed the temples, trying to force some drops between the clenched teeth. The face the candles revealed was a youthful one, not over twenty-one or two, dark-complexioned, with aristocratic features. The dress was fine in texture, and on one finger glittered a diamond ring of quaint design.

"Quite dead!" the hermit muttered, as he drew off the ring and examined it. "Quite dead!" he repeated, slipping it upon the smallest of his slender fingers.

Then he stripped the body to rub it with spirits, to wrap it in a coarse blanket, to try again to bring life back. This he intended; but as he took off the garments a belt of soft leather, sewed in compartments, was revealed, and this he hastily loosened and carried to the table where the candles burnt. With eager, trembling hands he ripped open one of the little bags of which the belt was composed, and there rolled out a diamond, large, pure, and dazzling. Another, another, and the man's face was eager and wild, counting the wealth before him, when a weak voice said, "My friend!" and starting, he saw the man he had rescued sitting upright upon the bed, looking steadily into his face.

A mad rage seized him that the treasure should be threatened, and, in an insane fury, he seized the wooden chair upon which he had been sitting, and aimed one blow at the rescued man. Only one before his senses returned, and a chill of horror shook him from head to foot. Without word or groan, utterly overwhelmed by the sudden attack, the stranger dropped back upon the bed.

The hermit, with shaking hands and chattering teeth, huddled on again the clothing he had removed, taking no notice of what further wealth might be there, only hastening—as if already he felt the hangman's hand at his threat—to remove the traces of his murderous act.

Trembling yet, he dragged the form out into the darkness to the spot where he had found it, gave it a push into the hungry waves again, and fled back to his cabin.

Still shaking, white as the man he had murdered, he gathered the glittering treasures into the belt, clasped it round his own body, and, wrapping himself in his cloak, drew a hat over his eyes and again went into the darkness outside.

Not to the sea this time, but over the inland road; fiercely battling the storm at every step, the man sped from the lonely hut his own hand had turned from a rude home into a spot accursed for ever—fled, with the brand of Cain upon his brow.

* * * * * *

"My Dear Edith.—You will be rejoiced, I have no doubt, to hear that I am still amongst the living, and not only that, but once more I have my hand upon such gifts of fortune as will enable us to resume something of our former state. Tell your Aunt Margaret that I shall ask her hospitality for a few days, until I can arrange our future household, when I look to you, my dear child, to make a home for one who has long been exiled from you. I shall be with you on Tuesday.—Your affectionate father,

"James Montgomery."

This letter being opened in a cosy sitting-room in a London mansion, where evidences of luxurious comfort spoke silently of the wealth of the owner, engrossed the reader so entirely that a second occupant of the room looked up in surprise.

"Who is your correspondent, Edie?" she said. "You look as if the fate of nations depended upon that letter."

Digitized by Google

Edith Montgomery raised her face, disclosing large, dark eyes, a coronet of golden-brown hair, and a countenance at once noble and gentle.

"My letter is from my father," she said.

Mrs. Ross, whose face was like Edith's, though matured by some fifty years of life's experience, dropped from her hands her dainty worsted work in unfeigned consternation.

"Your father?" she cried. "Where is he?"

"The letter is not dated, but postmarked Glasgow. He will be here on Tuesday."

And Edith read the letter aloud.

"It is characteristic of your father," said Mrs. Ross, "to remain all these years silent, and suddenly return with a fortune. And you may be sure it is no small sum that will content him, dear. I congratulate you, my child."

But there was no exultation in the girl's face. Consternation would better describe it, though it was scarcely that, either. More a bewildered terror.

"Aunt Margaret," she said, suddenly, "it is so long since he went away that I forget him. Why did he go? Why has he let us suppose him dead?"

"Ah, my dear, that last is a hard question to answer. I should attribute it all to a stubborn pride, if I were to judge. There is no great mystery about it, Edie. Your father made a mammoth fortune by successful speculation, and lived up to the full limits of an almost princely income. I remember your mother, my dear sister, Edith, closed your infant robes with diamond-studded clasps. And your childish dresses were trimmed with lace fit for a queen's robes, and your father's entertainments were the wonder even of our extravagant city. Your mother died when you were but four years old, and your father allowed you to come to my widowed, childless home. Five years later, as suddenly as riches had come to James, they fled from him, and by the same road—speculation. He came to me, intending to leave the city and to take you with him. But I pleaded so hard to keep you that he yielded to my wish."

"I remember that," Edith said. "It was ten years ago."

"Ten years ago, dear. After honourably meeting every obligation, leaving no debt unpaid, your father, with about a hundred pounds, left London. The letter you hold in your hand is the first token he has given of his existence in ten years."

"I have such a vague recollection of him!" Edith said. "Yet I think I should know him. I remember him as a tall, slight man, with dark eyes, dark hair, and a look of energy and spirit, as if ever eager to be moving. A man, in my memory, who would wrestle with fortune till one was conqueror."

"An eminently handsome man, my dear. You have his features, Edie, but not his expression. That is all your mother's. But this is Tuesday. I must see about preparing a room for your father."

Yet it was slowly, with a heavy sigh, not gladly, Mrs. Ross left the room to attend to the comfort of her expected guest. She could not forget for one moment that this sudden, unexpected return threatened separation between herself and Edith, the child she had taken into her warmest love for fifteen years.

And Edith, dressing mechanically, in becoming attire, to do honour to this almost unknown father, was haunted with dread. A new home, new love—all strange—was a prospect from which she shrank, remembering what a happy home, what warm, tender love she would be called upon to leave.

It was a dreary evening when aunt and niece met again in the sitting-room, where the fire crackled in an open grate, and the shaded lamps made a pleasant light. Both ladies were richly dressed, but upon both faces was a deep pallor and an expression of sadness.

"I delayed dinner," Mrs. Ross said, "in case your father comes by the seven o'clock train. Hark! Surely that was a carriage."

A peal at the door bell, a step across the hall, and the traveller was ushered into the room. Edith's heart contracted with sorrowful dismay as she went quickly forward to meet her father. All other emotion was swallowed up in a tender pity for the feeble old man who waited her welcome. Even Mrs. Ross forgot all else, looking at the wreck of the man who had been "handsome James Montgomery" for years.

Together, with all womanly tenderness, they welcomed him, drawing a chair to the fire, taking his hat and coat, and speaking words of warmest welcome.

It was the cold, they thought, that had driven all the colour from his face and made him tremble so violently. But the cold had never aged him so that he looked like a man of seventy, with snow-white hair and deeply-lined forehead.

After a few moments, the agitation of again meeting his child over, James Montgomery became calmer, and could thank his hostess for her kind welcome.

"I have been very ill recently," he said, "and I am weak."

"You must have rest," Mrs. Ross said gently; "and we are excellent nurses—are we not, Edith?"

"Let me look at you, Edith," her father said hastily. "I can scarcely realise that this is the little curly-headed girl I left. Yet it is a long time—a long time."

"You have travelled far, I presume?" Mrs. Ross said.

"Yes, yes," very hastily. "Never long in one place—never long in one place."

"But you will not leave home again," Edith said, her heart yearning over his feebleness, as a true woman ever does over any weak object of love.

"Never again, I trust," was the reply. "I have come home at last, Edith. Margaret," he added, turning his haggard eyes upon Mrs. Ross, "how can I thank you for the care you have taken of the child I deserted?"

"I hope to tell you soon," was the gentle reply.

It was still many days before James Montgomery heard in what way Mrs. Ross hoped for a proof of his gratitude. He asserted that it was but adding to his debt when she begged him to remain in her house, to let Edith be her child still.

And after a long discussion it was so arranged, a suite of rooms being set apart for the sole use of the new inmate.

But it soon became evident that he intended to lead a recluse life in these rooms, having a library fitted up there, where he spent all his time. Here he transacted his business, which consisted of a voluminous correspondence with estate agents, and such men as are ever ready to propose profitable investments to the possessors of wealth. Here he welcomed Edith, the only sunshine of his solitary life, and learnt to lavish upon her a love but little short of positive idolatry.

Finding she had not been introduced to Society, he pleaded for a magnificent entertainment, and spent money lavishly on the occasion. Her dress, he insisted, should be of rarest lace over glistening satin, and he drove himself to the jeweller's to purchase a parure of pearls.

Yet on the evening when the drawing-rooms were filled with guests he did not appear.

"I am not strong enough," he pleaded, looking fondly at his beautiful child, in her exquisite dress. "You must not expect me to join in such festivities.'

Digitized by Google

And Edith was forced to be content.

In the year that followed, all sorts of stories were current in Society regarding this sudden return of James Montgomery, the evidence of wealth betokened in his large purchases of real estate, his daughter's lavish expenditures. He had been in Australia, in California, in Africa; every gossip had a new version of his broken health and suddenly acquired wealth. A few old friends called upon him, but their visits were not returned, and gradually he was left to the seclusion he coveted.

He often refused admittance even to Edith; would refuse food for days, and be heard feebly pacing his room even during the night hours. Ever reserved, he seemed to live in an atmosphere of mystery, with an element of dread in it. He would tell nothing of those ten years of absence, and shrank so visibly from all allusion to them, that Edith at length ceased to refer in the most distant manner to his supposed travels.

Clear and stern came the voice of Guy: "This time it is no ghost!"

During this year of gaiety that was Edith's introduction to Society, a new happiness came into her life—the happiness that wakes in all young hearts when first they learn that there is one other of all the busy world who is learning the sweet lesson of love with their own faces for inspiration.

Not all at once is the lesson learnt. Not at first did Edith suspect the page was opening for her. Yet on the first evening that Guy Stevens bowed over her little gloved hand she knew that his face had an attraction all its own for her.

It was nearly a year after her father's return, when the winter gaieties were yet new, and gossip had heralded this newcomer. He was a young Australian, possessed of wealth almost fabulous, travelling for pleasure, and bringing letters that proved his right of entrance to the most exclusive circles of the fashionable world.

He was a very handsome man, with clear, olive complexion, and blackest of hair and eyes. From the moment of his introduction to Edith he paid her marked attention, and Edith found that no courtesies of all she had received had ever seemed so pleasant to her as those this stranger offered.

She dreamt of the dark eyes, the deep, rich voice, the graceful manner of Guy Stevens, and then, for many days, forgot his existence. For, the next morning, going to her father's library, Edith found him senseless upon the floor, a newspaper grasped in his hand, and for ten days his life hung upon a thread.

The doctors gave the attack a long name. Aunt Margaret and Edith nursed the invalid tenderly, and no one in the household read in the newspaper they loosened from his clutch this paragraph:

"One thousand pounds reward for any information leading to the present address of a man known as the 'Hermit,' for ten years a resident in a lonely hut upon a point on the Scottish coast called Sea Gull Rock. This man, tall, emaciated, with black hair and eyes, disappeared suddenly on the night of September 17th, 1901, during a violent storm. Any information leading to his present whereabouts will be rewarded as above, by applying to Messrs. Harris and Harris, Queen Victoria Street."

Very slowly James Montgomery struggled back to life after the attack mentioned, and only to life. All vigour was gone—even the feeble interest he had taken in his child's appearance and success in Society. His books were neglected, and he would sit for hours, with his hands folded, staring into vacancy. His appetite had to be coaxed with gentle persistence before he would touch any food.

The physicians called in consultation gravely spoke of a great shock to the nervous system, recommended care and quiet, and amongst themselves decided that the life which they tried to lengthen was very near its end, and that they were powerless.

* * * * *

Spring had come before Guy Stevens spoke his love to Edith, winning the answer he coveted. The noble yet purely womanly beauty of the young maiden had captivated the fancy of the Australian, but his heart was won by the higher charm of Edith's mind, her cultivated intellect, her modestly displayed accomplishments, and admiration deepened into love, while all the best of his own manly nature appealed to her for a return. Aunt Margaret listened, well pleased, to Edith's blushing confession, for with more matured judgment she had learnt to respect and like her niece's suitor. But she became very grave as she said:

Digitized by Google

"Your father must be persuaded now to see Mr. Stevens, Edith."

"He has refused so often. I am sure he would like Guy; yet he would not see him."

"But it is different now. You cannot betroth yourself to a man who is a stranger to your father, or without his consent. So I will speak myself to James."

Expecting some objections, or, perhaps, only the feeble refusal that had met all attempts to draw him from his seclusion, Mrs. Ross went to the library, where her brother-in-law sat, listlessly idle, apparently watching a fly upon his writing-table. Very gently Mrs. Ross introduced her errand, and in a moment the invalid started into unexpected animation.

"Marry Edith? Take her to a new country, away from here?"

"Not yet, James. There will be some months before we can let her go."

"No, let her marry him now—to-day, go away where she can never hear—never—— There, there, Margaret. I cannot talk. Let her marry him."

"But, James," said the bewildered woman, "you will see him first."

"Yes, if I must." He spoke wearily, as if the sudden burst of animation had utterly tired him. "Is he here?"

"He will come this morning. May I bring him here?"

"Yes, yes; have it over quickly. Anything for Edith."

"Anything for Edith! And yet you are willing to have her go away from you."

"I shall go a long journey soon, Margaret, and she will be far from here."

Perplexed beyond description, Margaret Ross went again to Edith, her only solution of this strange interview being that the sudden illness from which Mr. Montgomery was recovering had shaken his reason. She spared Edith a description of her father's words or manner, only saying he would see Mr. Stevens when he called.

"Then I will go to my father, and you can send Guy to the library when he comes," said Edith, rising as she spoke, and her aunt said no word to detain her.

Edith found her father much as her aunt had found him, seated in the apathetic silence that had become habitual to him. She drew a low chair to his feet, and while he gently caressed her hair, and her hands folded upon his knees, she told him of her lover in the sweet light of her own loving thoughts. Often she thought he did not hear her, his eyes seemingly fixed on vacancy, his thoughts far away, but if the melodious ripple of her voice ceased, he said gently:

"Tell me more of your lover, Edith. Let me be sure I am giving you your heart's desire. Tell me you love him."

And while Edith unfolded all her maiden dreams to her father's loving gentleness, Mrs. Ross, in the drawing-room, was listening to Guy Stevens.

In frank, manly words he had urged his suit, sure of her sympathy. But while he spoke he unfolded to her a secret she had never guessed.

"You may judge how engrossing my love is," he said to her, "when I tell you that for Edith's sake I shall abandon entirely the purpose on which I left Scotland. And yet I can scarcely believe myself that I can give up my purposed revenge."

"Revenge!" was the startled repetition.

"Revenge!" repeated Mr. Stevens. "I do not look like the ghost of a murdered man, Mrs. Ross, but I assure you I came here to seek a man who robbed, and to all intents, murdered me."

"But how?"

"I will tell you. When my father died, nearly two years ago, he left me, in addition to the family estate and the income from other investments, a valuable collection of diamonds, the accumulation of which had been the labour of a lifetime. Every one of these gems was of the purest water, and they were all of valuable size. Not inheriting my father's love of the stones themselves, and wishing to visit England, I determined to bring them to London and sell them. I sailed in the Castilian in August, 1901, and after a safe voyage of many days, we were overtaken by a storm and drifted out of our course. We struck upon the rocks on the coast of Scotland, and I must have been thrown ashore by the waves. About my waist was a belt of soft leather, in which my diamonds were securely stitched. I was senseless before I had been long in the water, and wakened to life in a rude room, lying upon a bed, with the sting of raw spirits on my lips. I sat up, to see a table with two candles, and between them a man, ripping open my belt of diamonds. I spoke, and in a moment the man sprang up, and, seizing his chair, brought it crashing down upon my head."

"Horrible!"

"He must have thrown me back into the sea, which washed me again ashore, to be revived by some fishermen, who nursed me through a delirious fever back to life and health."

"But the murderer?"

"As soon as I was reasonable I inquired about the people round me, and was soon satisfied that I had been robbed by a man they called the 'hermit,' who had lived a lonely life in a wretched hut, just outside the cluster of the fishermen's huts where I lay ill. He had disappeared on the night of the storm, and was supposed to be drowned. As soon as I was strong enough I visited his hut, and every doubt I might have felt before vanished when I recognised the room in which I had seen the robber counting his gains."

"But could you not trace him?" inquired Mrs. Ross.

"I have given the detectives here his description, have had the steamers watched, have advertised him; but he has vanished as if the waves, indeed, had swallowed him up. Probably he escaped to America. But if he ever crosses my path I will be revenged for that cowardly blow."

A few moments more of friendly converse followed; then Guy Stevens took courteous leave of Mrs. Ross to seek Mr. Montgomery in the library. He entered the sitting-room adjoining the library unannounced, and crossed upon the thick carpet unheard. Edith was still seated at her father's feet, when, looking into his face, she saw come upon it an appalling look of horror. The jaw fell, the pallor became grey, the eyes were distended, and the whole face grew rigid.

With a cry the girl sprang to her feet, to see Guy standing in the doorway.

"He is ill! My father is ill!" Edith cried. "Ring for the servants to send for a doctor."

"Loosen his necktie, and bring some water," was the reply; and even in her terror Edith wondered at the stern ring in her lover's voice. But she followed his directions, loosening the collar, bathing the face of the invalid, till, with a shivering moan, he closed the horribly dilated eyes, and sank back into the chair.

"Father, dear father!" she said then—"what is it?"

"A ghost, child," he whispered. "It comes often in my dreams; never before when I was awake."

"This time it is no ghost."

Clear and stern the voice of Guy rang out in the room as he stepped in front of the chair. But James Montgomery did not lose consciousness again, struggling to his feet, crying:

"Wait, only a moment! Go, Edith, go! I will call you if I need you. Go, child, go!"

The agony of appeal in his voice could not be resisted, and Edith left him, though she waited in the hall for any call he might make

Digitized by Google

"Spare her!" the old man cried, sinking upon his knees, and lifting his shaking hands—"spare her! Take all, take my life, but spare Edith!"

He fell, a mere helpless mass, upon the floor, as he finished his appeal, and the man who had vowed bitterest vengeance upon his would-be murderer bent over him now with womanly tenderness. It was so plainly evident that God's vengeance had overtaken James Montgomery, that the man he had wronged stood powerless before that Mightier Hand. He lifted the slight form in his strong arms and placed it upon a wide sofa, wondering even then if remorse alone had so aged and wrecked the man he had last seen vigorous and strong, with hair unstreaked in its raven hue, and eyes full of burning fire. Yet he knew that it was this man, and no other, who had stricken him down and thrown him into the sea to die, How easily he could take his revenge! Not only would one grasp of his strong hand end the frail life, but he could doom his enemy to lingering torture through Edith. A heavenly smile came upon the lips of Guy Stevens as he looked into the unconscious face—so pathetic in its still pallor.

"For Edith's sake!" he murmured, as he wet his hand and passed it over James Montgomery's brow.

It was a long swoon—so long that more than once Guy Stevens bent his ear to the heart of the still figure, to be sure he had not already been the unconscious executioner of the man he had sought for nearly two years. But at last, with a long, sighing inspiration, James Montgomery opened his eyes.

Above him hung the dark, handsome face that had haunted his dreams for many weary months. And in that face there was no anger, no revengeful animosity—only a pity unutterable.

"I was mad!" the old man whispered. "One hour later I would have given my life freely to know I was not a murderer. You could not desire a deeper vengeance than my life has been since that night."

"I see you have suffered," was the gentle answer.

"Ah, you can never know. I am glad it is over. You will have no trouble, for I will confess whenever you wish. Only"—and here the words came with feverish rapidity, and the trembling hands were lifted imploringly—"I have a child, a daughter. She has no share in my crime. If you could spare her the knowledge that her father is the wretch you know him, I will bless you, even if you exact my very life!"

"Do you know who I am?"

"The man who was washed ashore at Sea Gull Rock."

"Guy Stevens."

"Edith's lover! Oh, my child, my child!"

"Hush! I am Edith's lover, as you say. I ask no prouder title than that. And because I love Edith I would spare her all pain as eagerly as you would."

"May Heaven bless you! It is all yours. I will sign any paper you will write to give you back your own; but you will spare Edith!"

"I have said so."

But even as he spoke Guy Stevens knew that a grief he could not avert must come to his betrothed. Over the face so worn with remorse and suffering was creeping that change which comes but once in a human life. Already the staring eyes were becoming blank, as the Australian lifted his voice and called:

"Edith—Edith!"

Rightly he guessed she would not be far away, and as she answered his call he advanced to meet her.

"Keep calm, my beloved!" he said. "Your father is very ill."

"Dying?" she whispered huskily.

He let her pass him then, to read her answer in the face of her father. And as she knelt beside the sofa, pleading for one word, one look, Guy Stevens rang the bell, sent for a physician and Mrs. Ross, and took a calm control of the situation.

Mrs. Ross came hurriedly, but Edith never stirred from her place, hoping wildly for one farewell glance or word.

The laboured breath grew shorter, the grey shadows deepened on the wan face, but at last the large, dark eyes opened.

"Edith!" the dying voice whispered faintly.

"I am here, father."

"Where is he?"

"Guy?"

"Yes, let me see him."

"I am here," said Guy, bending over Edith.

"Edith, give—him—true—love—truth, faith! God bless you both. God bless him!"

So he died. Only one man ever knew the secret over which his grave closed, and he never spoke the cruel words that would have betrayed his knowledge, ever guarding the ghastly horror in his own heart for the sake of Edith, his wife.

Herbert Cullen.

PARTS I. & II. NOW READY.
PART III. ON MARCH 1st.
To be completed in 12 Fortnightly Parts.
Price 7d. each Nett.
PEARSON'S
HOME MANAGEMENT
Edited by "ISOBEL" of "HOME NOTES."
Containing Contributions by all the leading Authorities on Housekeeping and Domestic Economy.
OVER 1,000 PAGES.
12 BEAUTIFULLY PRODUCED COLOURED ILLUSTRATIONS.
64 FULL PAGE HALF TONE ILLUSTRATIONS.
MANY SMALL CUTS IN THE TEXT.
The Complete Work will form a handsome volume, which should find a place in every home. It is without doubt the most up-to-date and exhaustive book on the subject yet placed before the public. Every care has been taken to make the information thoroughly practical and suitable to all classes. More than two years have been spent on its production, and each point dealt with has been carefully thought out.
If you have not already seen a copy ask your newsagent to show you a specimen, or send 8 stamps for Part I. to the book publishers, 17 & 18 Henrietta St., W.C.

Digitized by Google

Compounding a Felony.

Telling how a Girl Played the Part of a Detective, and afterwards that of Barrister for the Defence.

Eric Charteris sat smoking a cigar in his modest lodgings in Gray's Inn. He was a pleasant-faced fellow of five-and-twenty, and his position, though in keeping with his lodgings, was ample for his wants. Steady, upright, genial, generous, it was small wonder that everyone who knew him liked Eric Charteris.

There was a tap at the door, and his landlady announced a visitor. A moment later Gerald Whitcombe, the husband of his sister Rose, stepped into the room and took a seat by the table.

Eric opened his eyes in genuine surprise. It was seldom that his brother-in-law favoured him with a visit. And, as he now regarded him, his surprise deepened.

The face of Gerald Whitcombe was pale and haggard, and his eyes had in them a frightened, hunted look that caused Eric some inward uneasiness.

"What's up?" he asked quickly. "Anything the matter with Rose or the child?"

Gerald Whitcombe fidgeted uneasily in his seat.

"No," he replied nervously. "But—but there will be before long."

Eric started.

"What do you mean?" he demanded. "Come—out with it!"

Gerald rose and hurriedly paced the floor of the room. Then he stopped suddenly, and, with his face averted, said:

"I'm in a terrible mess, Eric. You were right when you criticised my too expensive tastes, though I forbade you the house in consequence of such utterance of an unpleasant truth. And now these same expensive tastes have landed me in the clutch of the law. To-morrow will probably be my last day of liberty. The next day I shall be arrested."

He stopped. Eric never spoke—only waited for him to proceed. The silence seemed to add to Gerald Whitcombe's nervousness.

"I suppose I'd better tell the whole miserable story," went on the latter shamefacedly. "I had a friend—or I thought him such until recently—and, in a weak moment, I put my name to a deed of surety for him to the tune of fifty pounds.

"A month later he decamped, leaving me to face the music as best I could. I hadn't so much as five, let alone fifty pounds, but that tale isn't worth much in such a crisis. So I—I made a false entry in one of the books of the firm who employ me, and—and borrowed the money."

"Borrowed!" echoed Eric. There was just the faintest indication of a sneer in his tone.

Gerald Whitcombe flushed.

"Yes, borrowed," he repeated defiantly. "I'm not a wilful thief, Eric Charteris. Look here!"

He drew from his breast-pocket a small paper packet. Opening it, he displayed a ten-pound note and eight sovereigns.

"I was never a saving man," he protested. "But since I took that fifty pounds, I've pinched and scraped till I've got together these eighteen with which to pay back what I took. Ah, that surprises you, doesn't it? You didn't think it was in me."

"I did not," replied Eric honestly. "I was wrong. I beg your pardon."

Gerald Whitcombe looked up. But Eric was not sneering now.

"Is there any more to tell?" he asked quietly.

"Yes. Had things gone on in their usual way I could have raised the fifty pounds in time to put the entry straight before the half-yearly audit. But something or other has gone wrong—none of us know exactly what—and the books have this afternoon been given over to the accountants for a special audit. Even if I had the money to-night, I could do nothing to stop what is now inevitable."

"Then it is useless for me to advance the money?"

"I'm afraid so. Wilmot Brothers are business men, and the mere repayment of the money would, I fear, not content them."

There was silence for some moments. And then Eric asked:

"Does Rose know?"

"Yes."

It was late when Gerald Whitcombe took his departure. And ere he left, he had agreed to a plan which Eric Charteris had proposed.

* * * * *

Gabriel Wilmot, sole surviving partner in the firm of Wilmot Brothers, returned to his house the following afternoon in a state of great perturbation.

"Whatever is the matter?" asked his daughter Alma. "You look worried to death."

"So I am," ejaculated Mr. Wilmot savagely. "There's a defalcation in one of the books to the amount of fifty pounds, and the clerk who had charge of the book hasn't turned up to-day. I sent round to his house, but the beggar's sloped. It's as plain as a pikestaff!"

"Oh, daddie! What are you going to do? Is—is he a married man?"

"Yes, he's a married man, with one little girl—at least, that is what I learnt from the man I sent round. I can't make it out. His salary wasn't bad, as salaries go, and the fellow seemed a decent sort. I don't know what to do. I suppose I shall have to notify the police of the fact."

Gabriel Wilmot sighed. It was the first time in all his business career that such a step had been forced upon him.

"Daddie," said Alma, coming over to his chair and laying a little hand caressingly on his shoulder, "don't be in a hurry, dear. Find out why he did it."

"How can I?" responded the old man irritably.

"Then let me."

"You!"

Gabriel Wilmot gazed at his daughter in stupefied astonishment. But Alma never flinched.

"Yes, me," she repeated boldly. "You always said I was cut out for a detective. Why not put it to the test now? If there should be extenuating circumstances in the case, you will be glad you did not call in the aid of the police. If there be none—which I doubt—or if I fail—which I doubt still more—it will be time enough to communicate then with the proper authorities. In all probability the man has left London. I have been wanting a holiday for some time, but the country lacks interest this time of year. This little business will just fill up the blank and save me from ennui."

Gabriel Wilmot was only half convinced.

Digitized by Google

"But think of the example to the other clerks!" he protested.

"Bother the example!" said Alma decisively. "That's the excuse of a flint-heart. You needn't tell the others anything about the loss, and, if they don't know, where's the need of example?"

There was sound reason in this. But the old man was still dissatisfied.

"But you'll never find him!" he protested weakly. "You've had no ex——" But the look he got effectually stopped him.

"Don't you trouble your old head about that," replied his daughter scornfully. "I know what I'm about, and shall take care not to bungle the business. You leave it to me. Now tell me all you know about the man—what his name is, where he lived, and what he looks like."

There was no help for it. It was his daughter's way to treat him like this. And, to tell the truth, her "way" generally turned out to be the right one in the end. So he gave her all the information in his power and reluctantly promised to keep the matter a secret for three or four weeks.

"That's right!" she said, as she kissed his troubled face. "Now come and have some tea, and I'll sit with you all the evening. To-morrow will be soon enough to begin work."

* * * * *

It was a delightful day. The air was fresh—for it was not yet summer—and the blue sky was innocent of a cloud. A man was sitting on the beach, in the shelter of a great groyne that jutted out into the sea. A book was in his hand, and a little girl of five frolicked merrily round him. From time to time she attracted his attention by her clamouring insistence, but more often she was unsuccessful, for the volume in his hand absorbed and interested him. He was on the lee of the groyne, the tide flowing towards its opposite side, where the water was deep. Above his head rose the great stone barrier, skirted by the huge square timbers, slimy with sea-moss, which form so well-known a feature of most south-coast summer resorts. Presently the child looked up at the great groyne above her head.

"Put me wight up there," she pleaded. "I wants to sit on the edge and look down at you."

The man took her on his back, and, mounting the great timbers, set her on the top of the groyne.

"Don't move, Kitty," he commanded, as he again leapt down to the beach. "Sit quite still and tell me when you are tired."

"All wight," responded the child. "I'll wemember."

Once more the man took up his book, while the child, looking down at him from her pinnacle, began singing softly to herself.

"There's a nice lady coming this way," she observed presently, pausing in her song.

But the man never heard. The book had claimed him once more. How long they remained thus he never knew, but he was suddenly startled by hearing a cry from the child above him. Dropping his book, he looked up. Kitty was on her feet now, a look of terror in her eyes.

"Oh!" she screamed excitedly. "The nice lady's tumbled wight in the water!"

For a moment the man failed to comprehend. But a second scream—not a child's this time, but a woman's—made him spring suddenly to his feet. In an instant he was on the top of the great groyne. A girl was struggling helplessly in the blue water below. He was the only person in sight, and, as the sinking girl saw him, she cried piteously to him to save her.

"Stop there!" he shouted peremptorily to the child. "Don't move!"

Another instant and his coat was off. With a quick bound he was in the water. A dozen rapid strokes and the girl was in his arms.

"All right!" he said. "Keep cool; you're quite safe now."

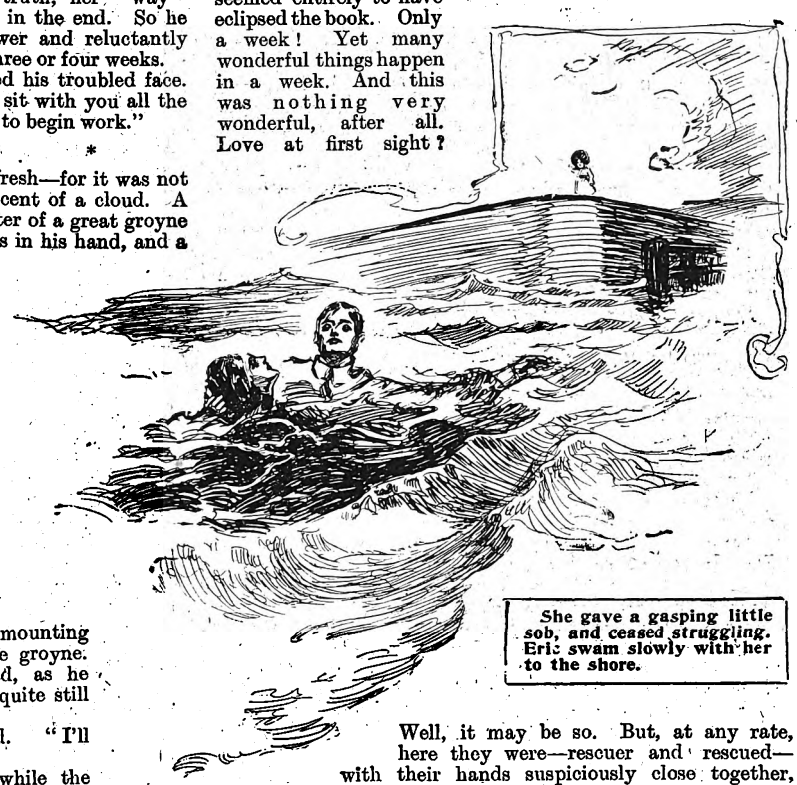
She gave a gasping little sob and ceased struggling, while the man slowly swam with her to shore.

"Oh!" she sobbed, as she sank down on the beach, "you have saved my life! How can I ever thank you! My foot slipped on the groyne. Oh, thank God you were here!"

"I shouldn't have been of much service, had it not been for the child," he said, shaking the water from his clothes. "It was she who saw you."

* * * * * *

It was a week later. That great black groyne seemed to possess some subtle fascination for two young people. The man with the book had a companion now, and the companion seemed entirely to have eclipsed the book. Only a week! Yet many wonderful things happen in a week. And this was nothing very wonderful, after all. Love at first sight?



She gave a gasping little sob, and ceased struggling. Eric swam slowly with her to the shore.

Well, it may be so. But, at any rate, here they were—rescuer and rescued—with their hands suspiciously close together, with the forsaken book artfully arranged so as to conceal the fact.

"It beats me," said the man, "how on earth you come to be down here alone. I'm afraid you're a spoilt daughter! If I were your father——"

"Father, indeed!"

"Well, yes—it's better as it is, isn't it?" he admitted, with a twinkle.

"Much!" assented the girl archly.

There was a curious and quite unaccountable movement about that book. And the girl said:

"Don't!"

There was silence for a moment or two, and then she added: "I don't know what dad will say!"

"Oh, never mind him," responded the man. "I'll manage him all right as soon as I get back to town."

"When will that be?" inquired the girl.

"I—I don't know. When will you?"

"I don't know, either."

Digitized by Google

Their eyes met.

"Seems as if we've got one secret," commented the man. I can't tell you mine—yet."

"Neither can I."

The man laughed.

"Well, it doesn't matter," he said. "We can trust each other, can't we?"

* * * * *

It was three days later. Alma Wilmot had searched the little seaside town with praiseworthy persistence. And at last she had discovered the present whereabouts of Mr. and Mrs. Whitcombe. At the outset, she had been somewhat surprised to find that the absconding clerk had been so careless of his liberty as to leave behind him the name of the town to which he had removed. But the town was one thing and the street and number were another. It had taken her almost a fortnight to find out the house that sheltered Mr. and Mrs. Whitcombe. The question now was—should she go straight to the house and confront him with the crime? At last she decided to do so.

The door was opened by a quiet, sweet-faced young woman.

"Is Mr. Whitcombe in?" inquired Alma briefly.

The woman nodded, smiled, and ushered her into a cosy little sitting-room. A man rose as she entered, and, as she saw him, Alma gave a little gasp of astonishment.

"Eric!" she exclaimed. "You here! I—I asked for Mr. Whitcombe!"

Eric Charteris smiled.

"I am Mr. Whitcombe—pro tem." he said, laughing.

"I thought your name was Charteris?"

"So it is," responded Eric promptly. "I see I must explain. But tell me—what do you want with Mr. Whitcombe?"

And then Alma sat down, still bewildered, and told him who she was and why she had come to the town. Eric listened in blank amazement.

"You—a detective!" he gasped, and laughed again. "Well, now I must tell you my story. Gerald Whitcombe is the husband of my sister Rose and the father of Kitty. The night before the discovery of the—er—little clerical error in his books, he came to me and told me all. It was a sad story, and I pitied the man. Moreover, I could see he was deeply penitent. I decided at once that he must be got out of the country. But there was little time.

"The officers of Scotland Yard think little of a twenty-four hours' start, and I cast about for some means of putting them off the scent and thereby gaining time. So early the next morning the Whitcombes moved from London, leaving the name of this town behind them. As soon as they were safe out of the district, I took the place and adopted the name of Gerald Whitcombe, while he slipped off to the Continent. Since then, I have been waiting for the arrival of the detectives. And, instead, I find you."

"But the detective might have arrested you!" she exclaimed.

"Oh, no," was the reply. "I should have explained, and then I would have gone to Mr. Wilmot, offered him the money, and begged his forgiveness for my sister's husband."

"And now?" asked Alma.

"Now," replied Eric confidently, "I shall have a good backer-up in my pleading. You have played the detective. Now you must be barrister for the defence."

"Oh!" said Alma. "And why?"

"For two very excellent reasons," replied Eric. "First, because you are engaged to the brother-in-law of Gerald Whitcombe, and, secondly, because, but for his daughter, his little Kitty, you might have perished in the sea ten days ago. Surely your father cannot resist such pleading!"

"He'll do just what I tell him!" affirmed Alma,

And he did.

Walter J. Mowbray.

The Mystery of Dobson's Wife.

And How it was Cleared Up.

"A LETTER for you, John, and I really can't make out who it can be from," said my wife, as she took her seat at the breakfast-table one morning two or three months ago.

"The postmark is Kingston. Who on earth do we know at Kingston?" she continued, as, womanlike, she held the letter first this way, and then that, in a vain endeavour to find out who was the sender.

"If you'll allow me, my dear, I'll open it," I replied; "I may then possibly be enabled to gratify your curiosity."

The epistle in question was from an old friend whom I had not seen for years, and the contents I must confess, caused me some surprise. They were as follows:

"Rose Cottage, Kingston.

"DEAR ROBERTSON,—Having recently taken unto myself a wife, and settled down for good, I think it time we should renew our old acquaintance. I shall be very pleased, therefore, to see you and your wife at dinner on Monday next (6.30 sharp), on the occasion of my wife's tenth birthday.—Yours sincerely,

"W. DOBSON."

"'On the occasion of my wife's tenth birthday'!" Surely Dobson must have made a mistake. I read the letter over again. Yes, there were the words, written plainly enough—"my wife's tenth birthday!"

"Whom is it from, and what are you looking so astonished about?" inquired my wife impatiently.

"Read it," I replied laconically, handing the missive across to her.

"Oh, John, he must have made a mistake!" exclaimed my wife when she had finished the perusal of the letter. "He meant her twentieth—or more likely her thirtieth birthday, as I'm sure he must be over forty. Shall you go? Why, I didn't know he was married—did you?"

"Well, yes. Jackson told me a few days ago. By the way, I may as well look Jackson up; his office isn't far from mine; he may have met Mrs. Dobson, and will no doubt be able to set us right as to her age. By Jove! won't I chaff old Dobson about this on Monday!"

"Oh, yes, do, John; mind you ask him all about her. I should so like to know what sort of a person she is. There's the 'bus coming; let me help you on with your coat. Good-bye! Don't forget to bring the note-paper from Laker's, and ask the price of that brown bag, and——"

The rest of the sentence was lost to me, as I rushed down the steps and took my place on the 'bus bound for the City.

About mid-day, during the interval allowed for lunch, I met Jackson.

"Hallo, old fellow, how are you? I was just coming round to see you," he exclaimed as he shook my hand. "I received a letter from Dobson this morning that I wished to show you."

"Why, I was coming round to you on the same errand. I have a letter from him that I wanted to show you."

"Is it an invitation to spend the evening on the occasion of his wife's tenth birthday?"

"Yes." And on comparing the letters we had received we found they were nearly identical.

Digitized by Google

"I came to the conclusion he had made a mistake," I said, "and as I thought it possible you might have seen his wife——"

"Never seen the lady," interrupted Jackson. "Can't make it out; he can scarcely have made a mistake in both letters; and yet it's impossible that he can have married a child only ten years of age. True, he has travelled a great deal in the East, and may have imbibed some Eastern notions. Perhaps he's brought home a 'dusky bride.'"

"Maybe," I replied, "though from what I remember of Dobson, he hadn't a very high opinion of the inhabitants of Oriental countries. Do you intend to go?"

"I think so. However, if you and Mrs. Robertson will call round at my place this evening, we'll talk the matter over. Until then, au reservoir, as we say in the classics. My time's up; I must be off. Wednesday will solve the mystery;" and, waving his hand in a melodramatic manner, Jackson hastened up Chancery Lane.

On "talking the matter over" that evening at Jackson's house, an old aunt of his, who was staying there, and had not been invited to the Dobsons', decided that it would be very improper for us to go.

"You surely couldn't think of going, my dear," she said, turning to Mrs. Jackson. "The girl's parents surely can't be alive, or they would never have allowed such a disgraceful thing to take place."

"But he may have brought home a young Turkish lady, or possibly a Hindoo girl," suggested Jackson; "you know in those countries they marry at a very early age."

"All the more reason that you shouldn't go," replied his aunt; "those Eastern women have no idea of morality at all; and if Mr. Dobson chooses to place himself on a level with heathens, and adopt their customs, he can't expect decent respectable people to visit him."

"It is possible that a Hindoo or Turkish woman may have just as much claim to be called a lady as many an Englishwoman—more than some, perhaps, who are received every day in respectable society," I remarked; "though that of course would not justify Dobson's conduct in marrying a girl of such tender years; still, we ought not to condemn him until we know the facts of the case, so I vote that we accept his invitation."

But Jackson's aunt declined to listen to our arguments, and indeed the other ladies seemed at first inclined to take her view of the matter; ultimately, however, feminine curiosity prevailed, and it was decided that we should go, although the aunt still expressed her conviction that it was "highly improper."

* * * * *

On Wednesday, punctual to the time appointed—indeed, a little before it—Mr. and Mrs. Jackson, my wife and self, stood on the steps leading to the front door of Rose Cottage, and announced our presence by ringing the visitors' bell. A neat little maid-servant answered our summons, and ushered us into a prettily-furnished room, with French-windows opening on to a lawn at the back of the house. With a remark to the effect that she would let her mistress know of our arrival, the trim little servant disappeared.

Her mistress! She spoke of her as any ordinary servant would speak of an ordinary every-day mistress. But then, no doubt, that was because she was used to her.

But speculation was rife in that back room of Rose Cottage, and expectations ran high. There was nothing Oriental that we could see about the furniture, which was of the ordinary type one usually finds in English homes of the well-to-do classes. Moreover, a very English-looking bonnet was resting on a small table in a corner of the room.

"Of course she has adopted the European style of dress, my dear," said my wife.

"I think I should have preferred to have seen her in her native costume, if she is an Eastern lady," remarked Jackson.

Mrs. Jackson turned sharply upon her husband.

"If she is, Thomas! Surely you don't suppose I should have come here had I imagined his wife was an English girl of such tender years? Besides, it would not be permitted——"

"Hush! There's someone coming down the garden."

All eyes were at once turned eagerly in that direction, just in time to catch a glimpse of a very pretty and graceful girl clad in white, and apparently of about fourteen or fifteen years of age. Masses of dark hair fell loosely over her shoulders, but her skin was as fair as ours. She was certainly not a Hindoo, nor was there anything Oriental in her appearance. There was, in fact, a decidedly English look about her.

"I suppose that is his wife," said Jackson, "though she looks rather more than ten years old!"

"Perhaps she's tall for her age," remarked my wife.

"And I'm sure she's English," exclaimed Mrs. Jackson. "I really don't think we ought to remain."

Further conversation was, however, cut short by the entrance of Dobson and the young lady in question.

The ladies of our party drew themselves up stiffly, their skirts rustling ominously.

"Ah, I'm awfully glad to see you all," said Dobson cheerily, shaking hands all round, "it seems ages since we last met, doesn't it?" Then turning to the young girl in white, "Allow me to introduce my niece, Miss Bradley."

Not his wife after all! Was he ashamed to present her to us? He certainly hadn't mentioned her, though I must say he seemed quite at his ease. I wondered in my own mind whether he had so far adopted the customs of the Orientals as to keep her shut up altogether and out of sight.

Conversation was being carried on in a constrained sort of manner, on our side at all events; when it was again interrupted by the entrance of a pleasant-looking, stoutish lady of about forty summers.

"Why, Martha, what a time you've been!" exclaimed Dobson. "I thought you were never coming. Let me introduce you. Mrs. Robertson, my wife!"

His wife! The ceremony of introduction was proceeded with, and I bowed in a bewildered sort of way when it came to my turn, and murmured something about "extreme pleasure—wife of such an old friend," and so on.

Dobson, seeing our looks of surprise, said:

"Why, what's the matter? You will pardon me for remarking it, but really you all seem to be in such a state of astonishment——"

"Well, the fact is," broke in Jackson, "we have been labouring under a delusion, in consequence of a mistake you made in your letters of invitation."

"What mistake?" asked Dobson, looking surprised in his turn.

"Why, you said something about this being your wife's tenth birthday, and——"

"And you imagined I had married a girl only ten years of age!" interrupted Dobson, roaring with laughter. "Thanks, I prefer a lady of maturer years and greater experience in the management of a household. I thought you would have guessed. Don't you know that to-day is the twenty-ninth of February, and this is leap year? It is my wife's tenth birthday, as of course it can only take place every fourth year."

Strange to say, this solution of the mystery surrounding "Dobson's wife" had occurred to none of us, and we were all very much surprised that we had not thought of it before. However, we spent a very pleasant evening, and Mrs. Dobson laughed heartily when we told her how we had been speculating as to whether she would appear in Oriental or English costume, and the arguments we had respecting her nationality.

The scruples even of Jackson's aunt were satisfied when she heard the account of our visit the next day, although that worthy old lady expressed it as her opinion "that it was very stupid of Mr. Dobson not to have worded his letter like any ordinary mortal!"

A. G. Price.

Digitized by Google

The Result.

She: "They say there are microbes in kisses." He: "Nonsense. What dangerous disease do they develop into?" She: "Marriage, sometimes."

She was Fishing.

She: "Have you ever formed any idea of what an angel really looks like?" He (after some deliberation): "No, I don't believe I have." It was curious how shortly after this his visit terminated.

He was Pleased.

"Yes," said the wife's mother, "I see it was a mistake for my daughter to marry you at all. She is just as different from you in every respect as she can be." "Well, well," replied the great brute, "how you flatter me!"

She Returned Them.

She (tearfully): "Henry, our engagement is at an end, and I wish to return to you everything you have ever given me." He (cheerfully): "Thanks, Blanche! You may begin at once with the kisses!" They are married now.

A Lovers' Quarrel.

She (turning to the door): "I think you are just hateful, and I'm never going to speak to you again; so there's no use coming into the drawing-room after me—because I'll be on the rustic seat at the far end of the conservatory."

How Ungallant!

Miss Ratherold (who has just received a proposal): "But, Major, don't you think there is too much difference in our ages?" Major Sharpshooter: "No, indeed! I'm a great deal older than I look, my dear Miss Ratherold."

A Necessity.

George: "Are you ready to live on my income, dear? Maud: "Certainly, dearest, if—if——" George: "If what?" Maud: "If you can get another one for yourself." George: "Another?" Maud: "Yes; another income."

And He Kissed Her.

"Frank," said a girl to her lover, "here's a piece in the paper headed Kismet. What does Kismet mean?" "The word must be pronounced with the 't' silent, Nettie," replied Frank. "Why, that would be 'Kiss me,'" said Nettie. "With the greatest pleasure," answered Frank, as he did so.

Then the Band Played.

It was in a suburban drawing-room that the following conversation is reported to have been overheard. Said the young man who was calling: "Mary, you are the only girl I ever really and truly loved." "Oh, Will," said his companion, "you said the same very thing to that Jones girl only last week. She told me so." "True," answered Will unblushingly, "but that was only a dress rehearsal. This is the first performance."

The Mean Thing.

She: "Yes, dearest, I made this cake all alone." He: "I can't believe it. Somebody must, at least, have helped you to lift it out of the oven."

The Difference.

She: "You were not so dissipated before we were married." He: "Indeed I was, my dear, but when anyone told you so then, you wouldn't believe it."

What Father Thought.

Willie: "Papa is going to let you marry my sister." Featherstone: "How do you know?" Willie: "He said it was better than nothing, after all."

Then the Sun Froze.

Gussie (gleefully): "Bah Jove! All the girls round here smile at me." Tom: "Well, that shows they have some manners. Anywhere else they would laugh outright."

The Unromantic Maiden.

"Dearest Laura, since it is not permitted us to live together, let us together plunge into the river." "But, Arthur, what are you thinking of? I don't know how to swim?"

Quite Provoking.

"We had planned an ideal life; love in a cottage and all that, you know." "Well, why did you not carry it out?" "The man who owned the cottage insisted on having the rent in advance."

Through Sheer Spite.

Mr. Batch: "You say you are going to let your daughter marry young Hobson. But I thought you had a grudge against Hobson?" Mr. Henpeck: "So I have. That's why I want him to have my wife for a mother-in-law."

A Difference.

The Widow: "Yes, Mr. Gibbs proposed last night; but when I thought of poor dear Charles I refused—absolutely refused—to marry again——" Friend: "Indeed?" The Widow: "To marry again before the year was out."

A Fact.

"Like the rest of my sex," said the mermaid, "I suppose I open my mouth a good deal, but——" "But what?" interrupted the lobster. "I never put my foot in it," continued the belle of the sea, as she plunged into the surf.

A Pitiable Mistake.

"I didn't know Miss Passay was interested in chemical matters." "She isn't, that I know of." "Well, I saw her pay a shilling yesterday for a book on the 'Best Methods of Filtration.'" "Yes, poor old girl. She thought it was 'Flirtation.'"

The Prologue.

Pat was a bashful lover, and Biddy was coy, but not too coy. "Biddy," Pat began, timidly, "did ye ivver think of marryin'?" "Sure, now, th' subject has nivver entered my thoughts," demurely replied Biddy. "It's sorry Oi am," said Pat, turning away. "Wan minute, Pat!" called Biddy, softly. "Ye've set me a-thinkin'."

No Need for Argument.

"Put yourself in my place, young man. Would you want your only daughter to marry a penniless youth?" "Put yourself in my place, sir. Would you want to remain a penniless youth when there were rich men's daughters to marry?" "You confess that you'd marry my child simply for her father's wealth?" "And you confess that you withhold her from me simply because of my poverty?" "What other reason do I need?" "What other reason could influence you?" "This talk is quite useless." "Quite." "We have nothing to gain by it." "Absolutely nothing." "You take it philosophically." "Why shouldn't I? Your daughter and I were quietly married a month ago." "Good gracious!"

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID SERIAL.

Dupes of Destiny

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

By Blanche Eardley, Writer of "The Bond Between."

THE PRINCIPAL CHARACTERS IN THIS STORY ARE:

SIR CYPRIAN RUST, who has inherited the baronetcy and estates of Sir Basil Wingate, though he is not the legal heir.

MARCELLA RUST, his daughter, a very lovely girl, who is greatly in love with

PHILIP NULLIUS, the curate of Crawley Village, where the home of Sir Cyprian, Wingate Court, is situated.

LADY VIOLET FRAYNE-LENNOX, whom Marcella believes to be her aunt. She is a very beautiful woman, and loves her niece dearly, but Sir Cyprian has, for some reason, immense power over her, which he uses to further his own ends.

EDWARD DAY is an orphan whom Lady Violet has befriended. He, however, in making unreturned love to Marcella, insults her, and Lady Violet refuses to have anything more to do with him.

CALEB J. JOHNSON, a City magnate and millionaire, who marries Lady Violet, though he knows that her husband is still alive. This husband,

MAJOR RICHARD FRAYNE-LENNOX, is a good-for-nothing, who has been turned out of the Army. Lady Violet believes him dead.

THIRTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER.

"She is your Mother!"

DEACON grinned. "Yes—you understand that, don't you? So come along and take this medicine!"

He seized the trembling creature roughly by the arm, and tried to force the glass to her lips. She uttered a low cry of terror like that of an animal at bay, and Marcella, listening outside, flung all thought of prudence to the wind; she turned the handle, and before either Deacon or the trembling woman he was grasping had realised what had happened, she was inside the room and had dashed the glass in the man's hand to the ground.

"How dare you!" she panted, drawing the frail shrinking figure of the woman closer to her. "How dare you insult a lady in my father's house! You forget, Deacon, that you are one of the servants here. In my father's absence I am the head of the Court."

An evil smile curved the man's Oriental-looking mouth. He had recovered from the shock of seeing her in the room, but his eyes were still puzzled though his mouth smiled.

"So you've found your way down here, miss, 'ave you? I might have known that you would ferret it out sooner or later! Anyway, you'll be sorry that you've tried to interfere with me and my duty."

Marcella's face flushed hotly—the insolence of the man's manner and speech made her tingle with rage.

"You call it 'duty' to try and force an objectionable drink down a helpless, inoffensive woman's mouth?" she said hotly. "But I will not discuss the subject with you; I shall make my complaint to——" She paused suddenly. How could she safely threaten to tell Sir Cyprian of his servant's conduct, when he must surely know of it? Her father was as much against her as he was in league with his menials.

Deacon laughed insolently. "Oh, yes, miss—I am quite ready to be sent away at a moment's notice by the master. He will do exactly as you suggest, no doubt."

Marcella looked at him haughtily. She could not deny that the man was encouraged by her father in his outrageous conduct, and she saw that to continue an argument would be waste of time. "You will please leave this room while I am in it," she said coldly. "You hear?" she flashed—"I order you out of my presence."

He made a mocking bow. "I go now, miss! You shall have no cause to complain of my disobedience!" He left the room and slammed the door behind him, and Marcella heard the key turn in the lock. She was a prisoner, then! Shut in with the trembling, weak creature who had clung to her silently throughout the scene with Deacon.

"You will stay with me now?" the woman cried, her pale face upturned to the strong, self-reliant one above her. "I was longing to see you again. I have had no one with me except Dolly."

Marcella started. "Dolly," that was the name of the dead baby-sister mentioned in her mother's diary.

"How is Dolly?" she said gently.

The weak face brightened. "Oh, she is very well. I think she has grown since you last came here. But you must let me show you the pretty things in the other rooms," she went on. "There are such a lot, and they let me play with them and dust them when I am good."

Digitized by Google

Marcella followed her into the inner rooms that led out of her own, and found herself in a large sort of lumber-room, full of boxes, tapestry, iron safes, and works of art. As she gazed round her eyes fell upon a life-size picture standing behind a screen, and as she looked more closely at it, she gave a cry of amazement and incredulity. Where had she seen that picture before? It was the "Mona Lisa" of Leonardo da Vinci, and surely—surely, she asked herself with a throbbing brain, it must either be the twin one to that once possessed by Mr. Johnson, the millionaire, or—and her heart stood still with a new terror—the stolen picture must be one and the same as that in her father's lumber-room!

She turned to the babbling, laughing creature by her side.

"Go and—and nurse Dolly," she said gently. "I will come after you when I—I have examined these beautiful things."

Left alone, she went down on her knees and closely examined the picture afresh with hungry, eager eyes. Yes—yes—there could be no doubt about it. She remembered having noticed a curious crack in the canvas, and that same crack was on this picture also!

"What does it mean?" she whispered. "Surely," with a low cry of terror—"he has not known of this—this fearful theft? Impossible—and yet!" She buried her face in her hands. Incidents she had long forgotten rose before her with a new significance, revealing an awful possibility to her of fresh horror and shame. She was so immersed in her thoughts that she did not hear the outer door open, and someone enter the room.

A low, amused laugh roused her. She sprang to her feet, and met the cool, blue eyes of Sir Cyprian, watching her as a cat does a mouse. "You!" she gasped. "You!"

"Yes, my dutiful child," he said in a quiet tone. "You don't seem pleased to see your father!" He went towards her, but she beat him off wildly.

"Don't come near me! I could not bear to be touched by you!" she cried. "I know—I know—why you keep this room down here—and I will tell everyone. I will let Mr. Johnson know where his picture is—and that poor mad woman, who is she? What part has she played in your cruel plans?" The hot torrent of passionate words poured from her mouth, until with panting breath she paused and made an effort to pass him.

Sir Cyprian caught her arm in a savage grip. His face was quite pale, but his sapphire blue eyes were glittering dangerously.

"So," he hissed, "that is your game, is it, my dear? You think you have outwitted me—but—but you will think better of betraying me and shouting your mad babble to the world! Shall I tell you why no one would credit any tales you told them? Why you would end in placing yourself in an asylum!" His face was close to hers now, and his hot breath on her cheek. "Because that mad woman I keep down here is an escaped lunatic; she committed numberless thefts, but was proved insane and sent to an asylum. I shelter her here because—do you want to know why?"

Marcella fell back and her eyes met the cruel, glittering ones of the man she called "father."

"Why—why?" she said hoarsely, "tell me why?"

He drew her nearer and whispered: "If you betray what you have seen down here, the world will know it—the world will know that a convicted thief and lunatic is——"

"Ah, don't tell me," she moaned—"don't tell me!"

He smiled fiendishly, and repeated: "That a convicted thief and lunatic is your—mother!"

THIRTY-NINTH CHAPTER.

The Quest of Mr. Johnson.

"Ah, Caleb, you have returned! I was afraid that something had happened to you—you have been so long away!" and Lady Violet, the financier's lovely bride, turned to greet him as he entered unannounced, one afternoon, her drawing-room at the house in Grosvenor Place. For she still maintained a separate establishment, and with the exception of her intimate relations and servants, very few knew that she had married the multi-millionaire, Caleb J. Johnson.

It was nearly a fortnight since the financier had left her so unceremoniously to search for Marcella's sweetheart, and during that time Lady Violet had received only two brief telegrams from him. She had waited and hoped for news both of Mr. Johnson and Marcella, but in spite of having written several letters to her niece, she had not heard in reply, with the exception of one or two notes, written obviously under the supervision of a third party.

The only ray of relief that had come her way was her having seen Philip Nullius so strangely at Paddington Station, and from his presence there had gathered that he had been befriended by the financier. She had also tried to find out whether he had met Mr. Johnson, but Philip had denied seeing anyone in the person of a friend. She had carefully avoided mentioning him to her brother-in-law, Sir Cyprian Rust, when he called upon her one day, though she felt in some strange way that he knew more than anyone else about the reason for the young curate's sudden disappearance. Smiling, suave, and sarcastic, the baronet had in turn failed to elicit any information from her about Mr. Johnson's absence from town when he should have been on his honeymoon. She had given Philip that brief warning to be careful without betraying that she knew he was being hounded down by the strange, bitter hate of Sir Cyprian.

It was almost with a cry of joy that she greeted the financier as he came towards her. She had sent him on her errand in a flood of passionate revulsion against the idea of a honeymoon, when the girl who was far more to her than he could ever be was unhappy in her love. Yet Lady Violet acknowledged to herself with a sensation of surprise that she was genuinely glad and relieved to see the calm, strong face of the man she had married some two weeks ago. She put her hand on his arm, and said again:

"Caleb, why don't you speak? Tell me all that has happened and how you fared while away!"

The financier smiled grimly. His face looked a trifle more cold, and in his eyes the old inscrutable expression was intensified. But his mouth trembled ever so slightly as he answered:

"I am afraid I made but a poor sort of detective—you tried me beyond my capabilities. I did all I could to—to find Marcella's sweetheart, but when I arrived at the house he had been spirited away! I did all in my power," he said, with an odd note of regret in his voice, "but it was no good—I completely botched up the whole affair. I even went so far as to lurk about the place for a day or two, then even that failed to bring me nearer to the object of my quest—and so "—he sighed wearily—"I came back. You are not very upset at my failure, are you?" He took her white hand gently in his and kissed it. He did not try to touch her face, she noticed, and then it struck her that his hair was just a shade more grey.

Digitized by Google

"It has been an ordeal for you, Caleb," she said; "I am sorry I asked you to go. I thought afterwards that it was not quite fair on you—you are the king of finance—but in playing the simple role of guardian to the afflicted you are out of your element." She smiled suddenly. "After all, you will be annoyed with me, perhaps, when you realise that it was a waste of time to have gone at all, although I sent you because it may interest you to hear that Philip Nullius has returned to Crawley."

The effect of her words upon the financier was electrical. He seized her wrists in his, unconscious of the sudden pain his grip caused her.

"What's that! Phillip Nullius alive and well! Thank God!—thank God!" and Caleb J. Johnson laughed a tremulous laugh, that, coming from a woman, might have appeared almost a hysterical one.

"Had you any reason to suppose that he would not return, then?" Lady Violet said quickly, wondering at his strange manner.

The financier looked at her with a sudden furtive glance. "Reason!" he muttered; "no, not any particular reason, except that I was afraid that—that something might have happened to him. It was a lonely place that—and one never knows."

"Well, you will be interested to hear that I met him," Lady Violet continued slowly, "and he told me that he had had some strange experiences, but that he had got out of them single-handed, and was then returning to see Marcella. I wish," she went on quickly, glancing at the stern, tired-looking face before her, "that the poor fellow's parentage was not buried in oblivion—then perhaps Sir Cyprian would not be so set against Marcella marrying him—and I can't help feeling, Caleb, that he is a gentleman in spite of his obscure birth and being brought up in a foundling hospital. It is most unfortunate for him. But Sir Cyprian hates him for some other reason."

"So Sir Cyprian is dead against him, is he?" the financier said thoughtfully, with a peculiar smile. "He objects to Philip Nullius on the score of being of ignoble birth and a penniless curate!"

"I don't understand," his bride answered slowly, "why Sir Cyprian should hate that young fellow so. He has a chance of getting on in the Church, and then Marcella being his only daughter she will have money enough; you see," she explained, "old Sir Basil Wingate, my brother-in-law's uncle, left the whole of his money to Cyprian should his only daughter Helen, whom he had disinherited for running away with an adventurer, die without a male heir who should then come into the property and title, but if, as it happened, Helen died childless the title, with the money and estate, would revert to Cyprian and his elder daughter's son, should she marry—the old man having a hatred of any feminine creature inheriting directly. But, of course, you must be bored by all this dull family history," she said quickly, seeing the financier's eyes grow absent and thoughtful. "I forgot you would wonder who everyone is."

"On the contrary, I am much interested," he said slowly, "and will see whether I can do anything for this—this young man who is such an outcast, and unfit to mate with Sir Cyprian's daughter." He laughed suddenly, and his eyes flashed with a curious light.

"You are very good, Caleb," she said gently. "Marcella's happiness is more to me than my own. I love her as though she were my own daughter, and Sir Cyprian has no right to stand in the way of her happiness—he has obtained his present position only by the fluke of an old man's bitter jealousy, and had Helen Jerningham had a son, then Sir Cyprian would never have owned the Court!" Her dark eyes flashed. "I hate him, Caleb," she whispered hoarsely. "I hate him more than I can tell you—and would kiss the hand that dragged him down!"

"Even though it were mine?" his strong hand closed on hers.

"Yes—yours would be the right hand to wield the weapon," she retorted bitterly. "You are one of us now—and—and"—she finished with a sudden shy hesitancy—"my husband."

"Your husband! Yes, I had almost forgotten I had a wife, Violet," the financier said slowly. "I seem to have lived in a dream the last few days—a dream of the past."

She looked at him curiously. He was the same, yet different; this brusquely fascinating man whom she had married against her will—yet whom she felt she would not unmarry even if she could do so. She remembered his passionate wooing when they had returned from their wedding ceremony, and she had refused to live with him—the passion seemed to have died in him during his absence, giving way to an absent moody manner that piqued her.

"Caleb," she went up to him—her lovely face within an inch of his—"you don't regret—already?"

"Regret," he laughed, and snatched her to him. "You don't know me, Violet. I cannot regret what I went out of my way to plan and bring about, but now I know you are safely my wife—mine against all the world—I am allowing other matters to be uppermost in my thoughts just now." He looked at her with a half satirical smile. "You refused to live with me until I brought you Philip Nullius alive and well—I now intend to keep on the same relations as we are at present, until I have helped Philip Nullius to reinstate himself in the world, and prove himself worthy the hand of even so beautiful a girl as your niece, Marcella Rust!"

"You take a great interest in him," she said slowly.

The financier smiled suddenly. "Yes—you see, Violet, I owe my new role as benefactor to the humble through you—you sent me an unwilling slave to hunt up the curate; now I am interested in him for his own sake—as you were for your young nephew, Edward Day. I have befriended him, and I shall now make it my duty to do the same by—by Philip Nullius."

Lady Violet opened her mouth to remind him that Edward Day was not her nephew—then stopped. After all, why go into a long discussion on that uninteresting young man, of whom she hoped to hear no more? If her new husband had forgotten the occasion when she had referred to him in her first letter, and also when Sir Cyprian had called to take Marcella back with him to the Court on the morning of her wedding to the financier——

"Tell me," she said suddenly, "are you going to Crawley soon, or will you wait? If you go, Caleb, you will see Marcella; you will find out why she does not write me—why there is such a long silence between us now!" She clasped her white hands round his arm, and gazed up into his face. "Caleb, you professed to love me when you brought me the news of my first husband's death! Has that love died now because I sent you away, or do you still care a little for me—enough to yet again do me a service?"

Digitized by Google

The financier looked at her with a grim smile on his mouth, and a strange expression flitted across his eyes—almost as though he had feared she would ask him a question he would rather not answer.

"I love you," he replied gravely, "probably more than I did when I told you about—about the death of your husband," and his mouth gave a queer, contorted little twist, "and whatever you want me to do you have only to command me, and I will do it."

"Then go to Crawley," she answered eagerly; "you are a man and can ask questions a woman cannot. See my brother-in-law, Sir Cyprian, and find out how he is treating Marcella—see her, if you can, and tell me how she looks—if she is ill or in any way wanting me. If I find out that that man has caused her any pain, I will not hesitate to retaliate—to strike at him in a way that will utterly ruin him."

Her eyes flashed and her colour came and went with the strength of suppressed passion.

"Caleb," and her fingers once again clutched her husband's, "you would always be very tender with me should my brother-in-law hint anything to you about my—my first husband—the days when I was first married, and—and was poor?"

He drew her to him with the old protecting gesture.

"If I hear that man say one word about you that I consider impertinent, I will make him eat his words, and thrash him within an inch of his life," he said slowly. "I will certainly go and find out how he is treating Marcella, and if I find her unhappy, she shall come away with me. She will be our daughter!"

Lady Violet's eyes flashed and her lips trembled. "Thank you, Caleb," she breathed softly; then raising her face to his, she said: "You may kiss me if you like." Very gravely and seriously the financier pressed a light kiss on her brow.

"I shall go and look up my secretary now," he said, after a pause; "then within a day or two shall go to Crawley. I shall see you again before I leave." He raised her hand to his lips and the next moment the door had closed gently behind the burly figure of the man of finance.

Lady Violet gazed after him wistfully. She did not quite understand the new Caleb J. Johnson. Something had changed him—had also aged him in a curiously sudden way, and his odd interest in Philip Nullius was almost absurd, if such a frivolous term could be used to describe any action of the financier.

She pressed her hands to her brow. Suppose Sir Cyprian refused to let him see Marcella, and in turn betrayed her secret to Caleb, her second husband, in the light that only her cruel, wicked brother-in-law could speak of!

What would happen then? she wondered feverishly—would Caleb believe it, or would he demand an explanation, and would that explanation mean a breach that would for ever stand between them? She shuddered.

Sir Cyprian Rust was a man who would strike as deeply as Caleb J. Johnson, when he opened his mouth, and his cunning would so weave the net of complicity round her that she would have no defence ready—no excuse save one of regret for the past folly that had made her barter flesh and blood for gold—to sell her peace of mind and self-respect for the life of ease and freedom from monetary distress.

She had done all that, gained the advantage of being able to pension off her incubus husband for so many years until death had rid her of him—but even that she would gladly have forfeited for the joy of having clasped in her arms the human price she had paid.

She flung herself into a chair, and murmured brokenly: "Oh, God! don't let him betray me—don't let me lose what I am trying to regain!"

FORTIETH CHAPTER.

A Face that Was Dead.

In the meantime the financier had jumped into a hansom and was being driven in the direction of the Park Lane residence, where he had installed Edward Day before leaving town.

He had given up his suite of rooms in the Dovermarle Hotel when he had been making anew his plans pending his marriage to Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox, as he had anticipated her making his luxurious town house a resort of all Society, and a brilliant success. But all those hopes had fallen through.

Somehow his plans had not matured as he had hoped they would. His bride had refused to live with him, in fact very few people knew that he had been married; then there was the loss of his celebrated picture, the "Mona Lisa." In spite of that clue of the spade guinea, the police seemed to be still baffled by the mystery.

And of late his successes in the City had had one or two unexpected shocks. A prospectus had gone wrong owing to the sudden withdrawal of two most important directors; and, above all, while he had been away, he had read in the financial papers that his cherished Ruby Duncoran Mine was tottering in public favour; the mine he had taken such trouble to have prospected by one of the best mining engineers, had not caught on; and, lastly, the man Rayne, whom he had met so fatefully on the morning that he had learnt the real identity of the curate, Philip Nullius.

He had not kept his word so far to his old enemy; it had been impossible to send him money without revealing his identity as Caleb Jerningham, one and the same with the influential city magnate, Caleb J. Johnson.

But he would keep his word; he would go to the bank now, before seeing his secretary, young Day, and send bank-notes to the value of the money he had taken from Rayne in their old days of comradeship, when they had worked side by side on the same claim. He raised the flap in the roof of the hansom, and directed the driver to go to the Bank of England.

When he arrived, and was folding the notes in his pocket-book, one of the clerks came up to him obsequiously—as the financier's big, loosely-knit figure was an object of awe and admiration to all those of his fellow-creatures who worshipped his wealth and power. "If you please, sir, would you kindly see Mr. Foster for a few moments? He is in his office."

"Oh, I am glad you have come down this morning, Mr. Johnson," said the head cashier, as the financier walked into his little den. "I was rather anxious to ask you about the signature of two cheques that have been honoured by us, but on looking more minutely into the signatures, I have noticed something a little odd—I wondered whether you had sprained your wrist, or whether you knew about them at all. They are each for £2,000."

The financier took the cheques in his hand, and one glance told him that they were forgeries. But who could have obtained access to his cheque-book, or have written his name so perfectly that even he was taken by surprise at first sight? At the sight of the name to whom they were made payable he started. It was J. Rayne!

"I am not sure," he said aloud. "I sign so many cheques in a week that it would not do to say off-hand that this is not my signature. I could swear to it in a way," he laughed, "and yet I am not certain—who cashed them?"

"A dark man, rather like a Colonial in appearance," was the careless reply. "He had very black hair and bright blue eyes, and his manner was most natural and easy, not as though he were afraid of being asked questions. Of course we will put it into the hands of the police, Mr. Johnson," he said eagerly.

Digitized by Google

"Ah, I should like to have these cheques for a day or two," the financier replied. "When I call again I will know how I intend to proceed, should my suspicions be correct."

As he was being driven homeward to Park Lane, Caleb J. Johnson bit his lip once or twice, and a savage gleam shot from his eyes.

On entering the large imposing mansion that seldom saw its master, he went straight to his study, and, flinging open the door, walked in.

Seated at the desk was Edward Day; he was bending over some papers, and was so intent on what he was doing, that it was not until the financier's large brown hand touched him on the shoulder that he looked up.

When he saw who it was his pale face flushed suddenly, and from his blue eyes that of late had grown hollow and bloodshot, flashed a glance of startled recognition and fear. But he pulled himself together and rose to his feet with a smile of welcome.

"Good morning, sir," he said in his well-bred tones; "your arrival is somewhat unexpected, isn't it? I thought I should hear from you."

The financier nodded curtly. "Yes, I always come and go at my pleasure. By-the-way, I want to see that cheque-book you have of mine, Day," he said suddenly, keeping his eyes fixed on his secretary's face, from which the colour slowly ebbed. "I left it in one of the drawers of that desk."

"I don't know what you mean, Mr. Johnson," Edward said slowly. "I have seen no cheque-book—only notes and things are here, sir." He pointed to a roll of notes that rested on top of some papers in an open drawer.

The financier smiled grimly. "Yes, I wonder you did not use them," he remarked drily. "But there were probably not enough; you were ambitious, and wanted more than a few hundreds! But it was foolish to sign away two cheques within so short a time of each other for the same amount," he continued sarcastically; "you are a promising rogue, Mr. Day, and it will give me much pleasure to see you in the hands of those authorities who undertake to correct perverted ideas concerning other people's property.

"Come, don't dare to bluff it over me, you contemptible young cur!" he rapped sharply, seeing his secretary about to speak. "I've not knocked about the world without being able to read guilt on a face before now. I trusted you—I treated you with confidence, you unutterable young scoundrel, but I shall take good care to prevent you from continuing your brief career as a successful swindler and forger! By to-night you will be lodging in Bow Street, and I shall not be the only person to rejoice at your fate." He went to the bell, but before he could touch it a hoarse laugh broke from his secretary.

"Stop! In another moment you will regret having rung that bell more than any other incident in your life."

Mr. Johnson looked at him coldly. "What do you mean?" he said slowly. "Am I the type of man you imagine can be played upon by threats? You have mistaken your man, Mr. Edward Day. I have not the slightest intention of listening to anything you may have to say for yourself. I am a hard man, and don't intend to unbend to save the pride of such a promising young scamp as yourself."

"No, I have not the slightest idea that I could make you do anything for my sake, sir," panted his secretary, leaning across the table, a curiously ugly smile on his lips; "but I fancy you would sacrifice a great deal for yourself—even the joy of a petty retaliation."

"What do you mean?" The financier's voice sounded crisp and metallic. His hand had slipped from the bell and hung limply by his side, but his eyes never left the white face of the man who had spoken with so odd a note of triumph in his speech.

"Mean?" Edward Day laughed loudly. "Why, that it

The Unemployed.

The two words at the head of this article form what printers call a standing line. Never a winter passes without this melancholy title for a record of want and suffering appearing daily in our journals. It is a pitiable thing, an evil that the wisest statesmen and the richest and most generous philanthropists at their best seem only able to alleviate. To discover a complete remedy for the trouble passes the wit of man, and whoever looks forward to a period when there shall be profitable work always ready for the hand of he who is willing to labour is regarded as a dreamer.

But in our country there is a second vast army of unemployed whose sufferings are never discussed in the newspapers, viz., the thousands who have work to do and are anxious to do it, but who are kept away from office or workshop by ill-health. The amount of work (and therefore of money) lost in this way each year is incalculable. Nevertheless, it is an evil which might in large measure be prevented, for Mother Seigel's Syrup cures indigestion, a cause of immense suffering and loss, as well as a forerunner of many other complaints.

"About two years ago," writes Mr. David J. Thomas, of Central House, Drefach-Llandyssil, Carmarthenshire, September 30th, 1903, "my appetite failed, and I became incapable of work. A dull pain at the stomach, particularly after eating, greatly troubled me. Though I was extremely careful as to what I ate, this symptom gradually grew worse until I was never free from it. I was troubled, too, with wind and dizziness, which sometimes caused me to stagger about. Although very ill, I so far contrived to work through it all. A doctor here prescribed some medicine for me, but it did not touch my complaint, and I was not a bit the better for it. After that another doctor near Carmarthen attended me, with the same result.

"After enduring this misery for about six months, and seeing no chance of recovery under the treatment I was receiving, I one day happily thought of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. I had often heard it spoken of favourably, and resolved to obtain a bottle of it. I had not taken much of the medicine before I discovered that it was benefiting me considerably. My appetite and strength increased daily. All the pain and dizziness left me, and in five weeks I was well and strong again, able to work with pleasure."

To be able to work with pleasure is a sure sign of health, and people in that happy condition are always the last to be numbered among the unemployed

A Victim of Fads.

Recently there died in Bradford a clothworker who was much troubled by indigestion, though not more so than many thousands of people who find their cure in Mother Seigel's Syrup. To obtain relief, he adopted a plan of life the severity of which would have frightened a twelfth century monk. He became a teetotaler, non-smoker, and vegetarian, besides being anti so many things that this column is too short to chronicle them in. But his heroic self-denial availed him nothing, and he died—aged thirty! Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup could have saved him. It is the only sure cure for indigestion and biliousness. Being compounded of fruits, roots and herbs, it causes food to nourish naturally, and is an unequalled digestive.

Digitized by Google

Dupes of Destiny

(continued.)

will be foreign to your usual cleverness to prosecute me for a paltry few thousands, when I can make you sing very small in return by mentioning what I know about you, Mr. Johnson! Lady Violet, your Society bride, will feel proud when she learns what her husband is."

The financier took a step towards him, then paused and laughed; but his laugh was forced, and the large, capable-looking hand was tightly clenched.

"You speak in riddles," he said scornfully. "What do you, a penniless youth, know about me? You had better be careful, Mr. Day; you may find the crime of blackmail laid to you with the one of forgery."

Edward laughed. "I fancy you won't do that. It won't be worth your while to prosecute a penniless youth, and at the same time acquaint the world with the fact that you deserted your first wife and bought off Lady Violet's first husband at a price, thereby making her a bigamist; that is a serious charge in itself, Mr.—Jerningham."

The financier fell back as though he had been shot. His face had faded to a sickly green, and his eyes flashed ominously. "You young scoundrel!" he said between his teeth. "It was an ill day for me when I let you enter my house! So you have been prying and nosing into what is no business of yours? You have spent your time worthily! I feel a deep regret that you have no parents to take a joy in such a son; you would be a shining light to any home."

"Oh, it's all very well to sneer," Edward said carelessly; "but anyway I think you will agree with me that you had better drop the question of those cheques, and I in turn will do my best to forget that I hold any little secrets of yours, Mr. Jerningham."

"You cur!" the financier exclaimed hoarsely. "Don't let me hear that name again. It has nothing to do with guilt, but I dropped it for financial purposes."

"Yes, and to avoid being traced by Mrs. Jerningham, eh?" his secretary sneered lightly. "Did you also buy off Major Frayne-Lennox for financial purposes?"

An ugly, baffled expression shot from Caleb J. Johnson's eyes—a look that spelt murder as it was committed in the days of his youth in Australia.

"Be silent, you unlicked cub—do you hear! If I consent to be quiet on this matter, it is only because I wish to shield your aunt—not because I fear what your petty spite can do. By-the-way," he went on sharply, "you made those cheques payable to—to a man called Rayne—what were they in payment for? What dirty secret does he hold of yours?"

The chance shot went home. Edward Day's face grew suddenly livid, and a haggard, hunted look stole into his eyes.

"Secret? No secret!" he muttered harshly. "What do you mean? Do you—do you——" his voice trailed off into a whisper.

Then it was that an inspiration came to Caleb J. Johnson. He turned slowly, and said with assumption of carelessness: "That girl, the one with the yellow hair—do you treat her well, or have you deserted her?"

Edward Day bit his trembling nether lip, and glared savagely at the man who had regained his coolness in spite of the threat he held over his head. "She is no concern of yours," he retorted savagely, though he wondered what had occasioned the question. He had hoped that no one had ever seen him with the girl—the girl whom he knew he would never see again. Yet Caleb J. Johnson had evidently met them somewhere.

"No," said the financier slowly, "your love affairs are less than nothing to me, Mr. Day. But that is not the question we are discussing. For holding my tongue about your business you expect what?"

Edward looked at him slyly. "That you honour those two cheques and give me another for five thousand!" he said coolly; "otherwise I shall certainly lose nothing by going to Lady Violet, and acquainting her with the fact that you bought a cheque from an old Army man who had threatened disgrace to her first husband. Oh," he sneered, "you are very clever, Mr. Caleb J. Johnson, but I fancy I have the upper hand in spite of your brains!"

"I shall ignore those two cheques you forged," the financier said slowly, "and give you another for one thousand; but not a penny more, d'you hear? You may blackmail as much as you like, but I will put the whole thing in the hands of the police if I have any further trouble with you. Here's the cheque for the thousand," he went on, scribbling on a blank form torn from his cheque book, "and another five hundred for your salary. Now leave my house and my sight for ever!" he snarled savagely. "I won't have you in it five minutes longer!"

Edward saw that to stay and argue with the man with that iron jaw was worse than useless; besides he feared to risk too much by forcing his hand. The money he had would keep him on his feet until he had come into that undiscovered fortune which he felt was his by right.

He was slowly making inquiries, and hoped soon to be a step nearer the great truth—the truth that would give him a father's name and position. Then he would turn over a new leaf, and live a quiet, retiring life for a time—until he could forget what he had been fighting to forget for so long.

He turned on his heel and left the room, after closely examining the two cheques flung at him by the financier, who stood regarding him with a curiously intent gaze.

As he closed the door gently he laughed softly. "Old Moneybags had to pay up more than he liked, anyway. It was rather a surprise for him to discover that anyone knew of his double life, and my lovely aunt is utterly unconscious that she has been made a bigamist by her millionaire husband."

A slow smile of wicked cunning stole upon his face. "By Jove!—that's an idea! It will bring her to her senses and get my own back at the same time."

He went up to his desk and sat down. Suddenly a slight movement caused him to look up. Was it fancy, or did a shadow really fall across his letter? He started to his feet, and glanced with a livid face at the window. Who had been looking in at him?

What pale face and staring eyes were those that, shrouded in a cloud of wet, yellow hair seemed to gaze in upon him, then vanish? With a half inarticulate cry he picked up the ink bottle and flung it with all his strength at the window. "You fiend, keep away!" he muttered; "keep away!"

The sound of falling glass brought a servant into the room.

"It's all right, Simmons," he said with an awkward laugh, "I fell against the table."

The man looked at him, then retired softly, and presently the secretary left the house.

In the meantime Caleb J. Johnson was sitting with his head in his hands in the room where Edward Day had left him. "Oh, God!" he groaned, "I am not much of a praying man—my life has been too busy for that—but I thank Thee that my son is not as this young scoundrel is. At least Destiny has made a good man of him."

(Another grand instalment of this serial next week.)

ARE YOU GENEROUS? ARE YOU MEAN?

ARE YOU CLEVER? ARE YOU DULL?

Whatever you are it is as well to know other things concerning yourself, so send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope, to Ranee, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. A reliable delineation of your character will reach you in return—this will give you the required information

Digitized by Google

RIDER AGENTS WANTED.
One in each district to ride and exhibit a sample 1904 Cycle. Write for special offer. Highest grade fully warranted.
BRITISH MADE CYCLES.
LATEST MODELS £2 10 to £6
New Departure Coaster Hubs, Best Makes Tyres, and best British-made equipment.
200 Second-hand Cycles, all makes, good as new. Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. £1 to £2 10
We send on approval and allow ten days' free trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory.
EARN A CYCLE taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Our agents are making large profits. Write at once for free catalogues.
Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonographs, &c., at half price.
MEAD CYCLE Co. (Dept. 44E)
85-97 Paradise St., Liverpool. 19 Charing Cross Road, London

Secrets of Youth.

How to have a beautiful face and figure. How to have beautiful eyes and hair. How to curl the hair naturally without curling pins or tongs. Little people can be made tall. Noses that are red or ugly shape can be cured, and looks greatly improved.
This Pretty Book will be sent FREE. Ask for "BEAUTY'S BOUDOIR." Stamp must be sent for postage. Peralia Perfumery Co. (Dept. 14) 73 Camden Street, North Shields, Eng.

To Asthma Sufferers.

Instant relief is gained in all cases of Asthma, Bronchitis, Croup, and Whooping Cough, by the use of POTTER'S ASTHMA CURE. Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists in Tins at 1/-. Test it free of charge. Send post-card to POTTER & CLARKE, Wholesale Druggists, Artillery Lane, London, E., for Free Sample Kindly mention this paper.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

£8 10
From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted.
Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

Beauty.

For cleansing the skin, and preserving it from roughness, blotches, hard water, and cold, ICILMA FLUOR CREAM is unique, and alone imparts the Natural rose-white Transparency that needs no powder. Price 1s. 2 samples (different scents), 2d. Icilma (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Rd., Lond., W.C.

PAWNBROKER'S SALE

Every article in new condition.
SUITABLE FOR PRESENTS.
A full list sent post free on application.

13/6 Gent's magnificent 18-ct. Gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch, jewelled movement, perfect timekeeper, 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable curb (pocket to pocket) double Albert same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together.
12/6 Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch, jewelled movement; exact timekeeper, 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed) elegant West-End pattern the two together
14/9 Furs.—Magnificent Alexandra Dagmar necklet and muff; beautiful real Russian sable hair, worth 4 guineas, not been worn; sacrifice for 14/9; approval willingly.
19/6 Genuine Italian Mandoline, by Stridente, Naples; fine tone; 21 ribbed, real rosewood, pearl and tortoiseshell inlaid, in saddler-made case; approval.
21/- Fine Old Violin, by Pietro Antorious; magnificent rich solo tone; in perfect condition, with fully mounted bow and case; approval.
10/6 Lustrous diamond and ruby Half-hoop Ring, set with 5 matchless doublet rubies and 8 real diamonds; solid gold, hall-marked.
7/6 Curb Chain Bracelet, with paddock and safety chain; 18-carat, rolled gold (stamped and guaranteed), in velvet case.
6/9 Brooch; very handsome 18-carat rolled gold, 3 swallows in flight; set lovely turquoise and pearls in case.
21/- Lady's solid gold Keyless Watch, jewelled in 10 rubies, beautifully engraved case, splendid time-keeper; 10 years' written warranty; week's free trial.
8/6 Fashionable Long Neck-chain; genuine 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), beautifully finished; very choice design.
9/6 Organ Toned Melodeon; magnificent 26/- instrument. 12-fold bellows (metal bound), 3 sets steel bronze reeds, and 4 acting stops, including Tremolo and Diapason action; rich powerful tone, perfect order.
9/6 Necklet with Heart Pendant, very pretty Princess of Wales rope pattern; heart set with pearls and turquoise.
12/6 Magnificent 5-row Pearl Collarette; finest quality, mounted with four bars of lustrous Orient diamonds, in velvet-lined case.

Any of the above articles sent on approval willingly.
R. H. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 284 Brixton Road, London, S.W.

JUNO CYCLES

ARE THE VERY BEST
FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN.
Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.
12 MONTHLY CASH OR PAYMENTS of
£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 8 0 „ 15/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/8 „
9 10 0 „ 17/6 „
JUNO Motor Cycles £32, or 12 Payments of 60 each.

JUNO Two-Speed Cycles £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.
Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ltd., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.
SHILLING BOTTLES.

TO CURE DRUNKARDS

without their knowledge, send stamp for FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of a wonderful remedy that has saved homes. Send no money. Address in confidence. WARD CHEMICAL CO., 51 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

Appetite & Digestion depend upon the health of your Stomach and Liver. Keep these right with the right remedy and you will never know the miseries of Wind on the Stomach, Indigestion and Biliousness, or other Stomach and Liver troubles

Page Woodcock's Pills

50 years' increased British reputation tells the tale of genuine merit
Sold by all Medicine Vendors at 1/1½ and 2/9, or post free for price from PAGE WOODCOCK, Ltd., 14 and 16, Euston Buildings, London, N.W. (Late of Lincoln.)
SMITHS

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 1½d. tins everywhere

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally.
Avoid injurious imitations.
In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.
The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)
Of all Chemists, or Post Free for P.O. only for 1/3, 2/10, and 4/7 from the Sole Proprietors:
E. T. TOWLE & Co., Mfging. Chemists' NOTTS.

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S

(The most nutritious)

COCOA

And take no other.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Foolish Objection.

How very silly of your parents, "VIOLET," to expect you to cease meeting the young man simply because he is five years older than yourself! That is quite an ideal difference in ages, and I cannot understand their objection.

Etiquette of Engagements.

THE task of announcing your engagement to friends at a distance, "K. E. T.," should fall on your mother. You, of course, will tell your own particular friends of the matter whenever you like, and a formal note would not be necessary to them, if they are within calling distance. In the case of a man, it doesn't matter how the happy news gets round. He breaks it or not to his friends as he thinks fit.

* * * * *

Now, as to the other question you ask me. It is usual for a girl to go and spend a little time with her fiancé's parents, so that they may become fully acquainted with each other before the wedding. No doubt you will receive some such invitation very soon. It is not usual, by-the-way, for the young man himself to be at home while you are paying this visit to his parents. Of course, if he lives at home, it is different. But, if he does not, the etiquette is for you to spend a little time alone in the society of his parents.

How Quarrels Breed.

"MAY BLOSSOM" tells me of an affair which shows how easily a little tiff grows into an estrangement, if not carefully watched. She used to walk out a great deal with a young man, but they were not engaged. Once he met her in the street while she was talking to another man. Next time they met he passed her by in a very cool manner. "MAY BLOSSOM" was offended, and, just to show it, she went out with the other young man just as often as she felt inclined.

* * * * *

Young man No. 1 saw her frequently, and to show his own feelings he, too, took up with somebody else. Whenever the two met, therefore, they saw each other with different companions. Yet all the time each of them felt an "aching void," and wished to get back again to each other, and have done with the sham. Well, it turned out that the sham sweethearts soon parted, and once more the two were free to resume their friendship. But the young man won't speak to "MAY BLOSSOM" now, and she doesn't care to raise the question herself. What is she to do?

* * * * *

From what you say, it seems that the young man himself rather wants the quarrel to blow over. Of course, in a way, he began it by being cool to you without reason. But it was your own fault that the quarrel grew serious, as you evidently went out of your way to tease him. Why not make amends now as you were the first to start the game of bluff?

Billiards and Love.

"MY sweetheart spends a lot of his time playing billiards," writes "AMY." "Do you think this is right? Should I, as his future wife, ask him to give it up?"

* * * * *

There is nothing wrong in billiards by itself, "AMY." If your sweetheart's playing brings him into contact with bad companions, and results in his spending a lot of money, and giving way to such things as drink and gambling, then you might have something to say about it. But you could scarcely object to his playing billiards, which is, after all, one of the best of games from the mental point of view.

A Mixed Affair.

"I AM very friendly with two young ladies," writes "BOYSIE," "one of whom goes out with me, the other with a friend of mine. The girl who goes with my friend seems to have taken a fancy to me and vice versâ. I like both girls equally, but my friend prefers my girl. What is the best course to pursue? One is plump and skittish, the other slim and proper."

* * * * *

It seems that if your friend prefers your girl, and his girl prefers you, you might make an exchange for the benefit of all parties. As you yourself like both girls equally, the odds should be in favour of the girl who likes you best. Make friends with the latter, and allow your friend his own choice, and all should be in order.

The Backward Young Man.

"R. T." Your previous letter did not reach me. am sorry you suffer so much from shyness and backwardness. It is a good idea to have joined the Christian Association you speak of. But the fact that you do not know any of the girls there, and have no one to introduce you, should not discourage you. It would not be right to join such a society with the sole object of meeting young ladies, as seems to be your idea. You should take an active part in whatever functions are going on, and you would very soon get to know girls in that way. To look upon an association of that kind just as a meeting place is not a right view, and I am not surprised that you have so far failed to make acquaintances. There would be no harm in your speaking to a young lady there, if you had proper reason to do so, or were taking part in the same function.

A Girl with a Distinguished Name.

"I COME of a noble family," writes "EDITH," "and bear a name that is very distinguished indeed. Now, is it not hard on me in marrying, that my future husband's name is a very common one? All through my life I have been respected as a member of a great family, and now I am to be one of a hundred thousand others. I suppose, though, there is no help for it?"

* * * * *

I am afraid you could only retain your maiden name by becoming a professional celebrity, or by living in Portugal—the only country where such is the custom. To your neighbours and tradesmen you will have to be plain Mrs. (whatever your common name may be), and, when one comes to think of it, if a man's fortune is good enough for a girl to share, his name ought also to be good enough. As a final resort, there would be no harm in "EDITH'S" adding her own name to that of her husband, and making a double-barrelled affair of it. That is often done, but I rather fancy that a Mrs. Shakespeare-Smythe would be charged more for her meat by the butcher than plain Mrs. Smith. One has to live up to a big name.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Our New Magazine

No. 1 No. 1

NOW ON SALE NOW ON SALE

THE RAPID REVIEW is for the busy man or woman who wants an up-to-date knowledge of the events and thought of the world. All that is best in Literature, Art, and Science will be brought together in handy form in THE RAPID REVIEW each month, all topics of special current interest and importance will be lucidly explained—in fact, a workable and concise, yet adequate and interesting, résumé will be given of all that is worth knowing in every branch of human activity,

THE RAPID REVIEW WILL SAVE YOU TIME, THOUGHT, AND MONEY.

Sixpence Monthly.

GET A COPY WHILE YOU CAN. YOU'LL WANT IT EVERY MONTH.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED.

Digitized by Google

Constipation

If I were asked to specify THE disease or ailment of the day, I should unhesitatingly answer—"CONSTIPATION."

SO says one of the greatest medical writers of the present day, and he follows this statement by saying that women are the commonest sufferers. Undoubtedly he is right! Just imagine a town with every drain stopped. Would you be surprised to find pestilence and fever abound? Hardly! Where constipation exists, the drains which nature has provided to clear the body of its impurities are out of order, and the impurities are left in the body. The result is that every organ of the body is rendered foul. The liver and digestive organs become clogged and unable to fulfil their functions, the appetite is destroyed, the head either aches or feels dull and heavy, there is heat and feverishness, a dreary don't-care-about-anything feeling, a sensation of irritability with everybody and everything. Sometimes, also, constipation brings on piles. Now, if you have any of these symptoms, remember that constipation is their root cause. Remember, also, that the root cure for constipation, and indirectly for all these symptoms, is the vegetable essence concentrated in Bile Beans for Biliousness. So effective are Bile Beans for this ailment, that in several cases where constipation has been so neglected that it has resulted in stoppage of the bowels, they have, nevertheless, brought about a complete cure. A case of this kind, which occurred a short time back in Birmingham, may be quoted.

Miss Ettie Palmer.
(From a photo.)

At back 253 Gt. Colmore Street, in that city, lives Miss Ettie Palmer. She is now a healthy young woman—thanks to Bile Beans—but she wasn't always. This very ailment, constipation, seized upon her, and its ravages are well illustrated in her case. She says:

"In my case, acute constipation led to stoppage of the bowels. I could not take nourishment, and consequently grew too feeble to work. Having taken to my bed I got weaker and weaker. It was not thought I should live. Indeed, the clergyman of the parish came to pray at my bedside, so near death was I.

"The doctor called in a physician, and it was said my only hope of life lay in an operation, which might or might not be successful. I was taken to the Queen's Hospital, and prepared for operation, but at the last moment my parents stopped all the proceedings and had me taken back home.

"This was in consequence of what they had heard about the power of Bile Beans, and I started upon a course immediately. From the first I improved, and in a few days my bowels were acting normally. I gradually got stronger, and in a short time was back at work. Since then I have worked for twelve months, and have never had a trace of my old complaint. I was so weak at the time I was taken to hospital for the operation that I believe I should never have survived it."

BILE BEANS FOR BILIOUSNESS cure Headache, Constipation, Piles, Colds, Liver Chill, Influenza, Rheumatism, Neuralgia, Liver Troubles, Bad Breath, Indigestion, Palpitation, Loss of Appetite, Flatulence, Dizziness, Buzzing in the Head, Debility, Sleeplessness, Nervousness, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all Medicine Vendors, or Post Free from the BILE BEAN CO., REDCROSS STREET, LONDON, E.C., on receipt of price, 1s. 1½d., or large family size 2s. 9d. per box (2s. 9d. size contains three times 1s. 1½d.).

THE MEDICINE FOR THE MILLION.

BILE BEANS FOR BILIOUSNESS

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 792. Week Ending March 5, 1904. Price One Penny.

WOULD HE BE IN TIME TO SAVE HER?

(A Thrilling Episode in the Dramatic Story, "Almost Too Late." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

THREE GRAND

KODAK

AMATEUR

Photographic Comp titions

£1,000

(One Thousand Pounds)

IN CASH PRIZES.

£500 for Pictures on N.C. Film (non-curling and orthochromatic).

£300 for Pictures on KODOID Plates (thin, flat, and unbreakable).

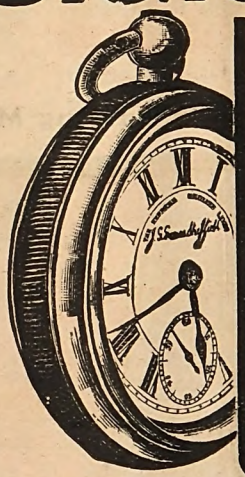
£200 for Roll Films developed in KODAK DEVELOPING MACHINE.

WARNING! — Kodak is applied to Cameras Films, and Products made by the Kodak Company only. Beware of inferior experimental imitations.

Ask your Dealer for full particulars, or write to Dept. 35.

KODAK LTD., 41-43 Clerkenwell Rd., London, E.C.

J.G.GRAVES



THE LARGEST WATCH-SALES FIRM IN THE WORLD.

Send for Handsome Watch Catalogue showing hundreds of designs, post free.

The 'EXPRESS' (Reg.) ENGLISH LEVER, 50/- is sent on receipt of a deposit of 5/- and your promise to complete the purchase in nine more monthly instalments of 5/-. Discount Advantages offered to Cash Purchasers.

Specification.—Keyless or Key-winding, first-grade English Lever, Capped and Jewelled, Safety Winding Pinion, Chronometer Balance, Massive Sterling Silver Cases, made entirely in England, Warranted Seven Years.

Agents Wanted in spare time. Write for Particulars. Good Pay.

J. G. GRAVES, 169 Division Street, Sheffield

SAPON

THE IDEAL CLEANSER

A harmless vegetable compound which dissolves grease so wonderfully that the dirt "drops out" without rubbing and the clothes last longer.

Dissolve the Sapon thoroughly in water; put the clothes into the solution and

SOAK,

SQUEEZE,

RINSE,

WRING. (That's all.)

Send a post-card to SAPON LTD. (Dept. 65), St. Swithin's Chambers, London, for a FREE TRIAL PACKET.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Headache,

Neuralgia & all Nerve Pains

One dose of Kaputine, costing 1d., cures in ten minutes the most violent nerve pain,—every time.

Kaputine is not an aperient, and causes no inconvenience, but is for one purpose only—to cure Nerve Pains.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—and gives immediate relief.

Kaputine, unlike the dangerous white headache powders consisting of one crude drug, is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical Profession.

Kaputine is sold by all Medicine Dealers, Packets of 18 doses, 1/-. Samples 1d. each.

Write now for samples free and post paid to O. G. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

SONGS COPIED

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page.

Mrs. CONYERS,

Chagford, R.S.O., Devon.

Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

FEB 23 1904

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 792.] Week Ending March 5th, 1904. [One Penny.

Containing the Incident Depicted on the Cover.

Reuben Howard sat before the fire, his pipe in his mouth, and gazed gloomily into the reddening embers. His dark face, always sullen and morose in aspect, seemed to-night even more unpleasant than was usual. The black, restless eyes had in them a look of sinister and bitter hatred—hatred against someone whose name he dared not breathe.

The outer door of the little cottage was suddenly flung wide open, and a man, whistling a merry country tune, came briskly into the room. He presented a striking contrast to the other, who still sat over the fire. And yet they were brothers.

Fair-haired, blue-eyed, and frank as the day, Horace Howard was universally regarded as the friend, the confidant, of all and sundry with whom he came in contact. Country matrons thought of him, and then of their daughters, and sighed. And as to the daughters themselves, sunny-hearted Horace Howard had wrought much havoc in more than one tender young heart—unwittingly, it must be admitted, and all unknown to himself, but wrought nevertheless.

The step upon the floor had evoked no movement from Reuben Howard. He did not so much as lift his dark eyes as his brother entered the room. Yet a strange restlessness seemed to pervade him, and a close observer might have detected a certain nervous alertness in his attitude that, as yet, was unaccounted for.

Horace drew a chair near his brother's, and seated himself before the fire. For some time he was silent. But at last he said:

"Reuben, I've a bit of news for you. I don't suppose you'll be very much surprised."

Reuben fidgeted slightly in his chair, but he did not speak, so Horace continued:

"You have, no doubt, guessed already who, among our many fair neighbours, has attracted me most. I met Grace Hazel by the stile in the meadow this evening, and she has promised to be my wife. As to my own feelings—well, they are better imagined than described."

He broke off with a short little laugh. The tone was light, yet it was more than evident that he was stirred by strong emotion, which the tone was intended to cover. There was a tender, happy light in the frank blue eyes that told infinitely more than the words he had uttered how ardently he had desired that which he had now won.

All rights reserved.]

For a moment there was silence between the two. Horace looked towards his brother in some surprise. Reuben slowly removed the pipe from his mouth, and, still without lifting his eyes from the fire, said in a low, constrained tone:

"Glad to hear it, I'm sure. Suppose I must congratulate you? Does she—er—think of you as—as you do of her?"

His voice grew suddenly hoarse, and he cleared his throat. But he said no more. Horace regarded him a little uneasily. What had come over his brother? He was always sullen and morose, it was true, but he had expected a little better feeling than Reuben had as yet displayed. The question, too, was queer. He might have taken that for granted.

"Well," responded Horace, "I should think you might guess that much from the fact of her having accepted me."

Reuben's lip curled disdainfully.

"It does not follow," he said cynically. "You are good-looking, strong, tolerably well-off, and—steady. A matter-of-fact girl would consider these things before the mere question of love. Grace Hazel is no fool, and it is quite possible——"

But Horace stopped him.

"Enough of this," he said shortly. "I am sorry to find you in this mood, to-night of all nights. But, since you ask, I will admit that Miss Hazel is actuated by no such mercenary or coldly-calculating motives as you imply. I have her own words to testify to the truth of this assertion." And a glad little smile came into his face as he let his thoughts go back to that meeting by the stile not more than an hour before, when Grace had confessed her love to him and promised to be his wife.

Reuben lifted his dark eyes for an instant and caught the look. When he again turned his face to the fire it was blacker and more sinister than before. Horace rose and pushed back his chair.

"I'll just run over to the mill," he said. "I expect Tom Hardy's gone home by now. The old mill's having plenty of work lately. There's been a fresh breeze all the evening, and we can do with it, for there's grain enough to grind for the next two months."

He put on his hat, and, whistling as he went, again left the house. As soon as he was gone, Reuben rose, tossed his pipe viciously on to the table, and began to stride savagely up and down the room.

Digitized by Google

"So you've won, have you?" he muttered, clenching his hands together and shaking them at the door through which his brother had gone. "For years you've thwarted and baulked me in every conceivable way. I have been the foil to show off your qualities, your virtues, your excellences. The memory of my dead father is hateful to me, because, when he yet lived, he favoured you, and not me. And now—now you have snatched from me the jewel I have coveted so long, so ardently, and I must stand aside and see it done. She who but yesterday smiled at me and made hope leap up within me till I thought I should have fallen. And she told you she—loved you—loved you!"

Passion had seized him now. His whole frame quivered with strong excitement. He tottered, rather than strode, across the floor. His black eyes blazed, his mouth hardened, his brow darkened. For the time being Reuben Howard was a veritable maniac.

Presently he controlled his outward agitation and once more sat down before the fire. But a glance into his dark face revealed the fact that passion still raged within. Evil thoughts chased each other madly through his disordered brain. He must find a way to prevent his brother's marriage with Grace Hazel. He would try persuasion, pleading, intreaty, not with Horace, but with Grace herself. He would humble himself, even abase himself before her. And then, if that failed, he would threaten.

Meanwhile Horace was walking briskly through the meadows towards the mill, of which he and his brother were owners. It was not yet late—barely half-past nine—and darkness had not long settled down on the quiet earth. Presently he reached the stile where, less than an hour before, Grace and he had whispered their first words of love. He was just about to mount it and cross to the opposite meadow where the mill stood, when he noticed a slim white figure close by. Turning quickly, he peered into the darkness. Then he stepped forward with a glad little cry.

"Why, Grace," he said, taking both her hands in his, "not gone home yet, dear? Is anything the matter?"

The girl lifted her blue eyes to his. The look they gave him thrilled him through and through.

"Oh, no!" she said softly. "It is only that I am very very happy—so happy that I cannot go home just yet. The night is very lovely, and I feel so loth to dispel the influence—the spell—that is upon me. It seems a new world to-night, Horace."

The young man stooped and kissed the upturned face.

"Am I in the new world, darling?" he asked tenderly.

Grace lowered her blue eyes, and the small hands trembled in his.

"You are king of it," she said shyly. "You are even more than that, for you have created it."

Horace bent his head. For a few moments there was a deep hush, and then he said reverently:

"May God help me to be worthy of your love, Grace, since it is only by my worthiness that this new and wonderful world of which you speak can endure through the years that are to come. Would that men might realise this. So long as men are good, and true, and loyal, so long will the women who love them be pure and sinless as the angels of God."

A gust of wind swept by and the girl looked up.

"I suppose I must go home," she said. "Have you told Reuben yet about—about our engagement?"

She blushed as she used the word, and Horace smiled down at her.

"Yes," he replied. "I told him not more than a quarter of an hour ago."

Under cover of the darkness he took her in his arms and kissed her. Then he put her down and watched her as she went across the meadow. When she was out of sight he mounted the stile and went swiftly over the smooth sward towards the distant mill.

* * * * *

It was a month later, and they were still busy at the mill. The surrounding farmers had brought in their corn, and the great, tireless sails of the old mill moved majestically round and round like some great aerial monster. It wa now mid-day, and the hands had gone to dinner. The two brothers were on the point of following their example when a messenger brought a note and handed it to Reuben. The latter glanced at the superscription and passed it on to his brother.

"It's for you," he said shortly. "Looks like Farmer Wood's handwriting."

Horace tore open the envelope and took out the letter it inclosed.

"Dear Horace," it ran, "Can you oblige me by coming here without delay? The matter is of the utmost importance, or I should not ask it. Don't stop for dinner. You can have some here. Please don't refuse.—Your sincere friend,

"John Wood."

"I wonder what's in the wind?" mused Horace as he passed the letter back to his brother for him to read. "However, I can't refuse, so here goes."

He hastily exchanged his miller's cap for an out-door one, thrust his arms into his coat, and hurried off. Reuben watched him as he went with great swinging strides across the meadow.

"One fool hoodwinked," he muttered. "Well, half-an-hour's walk will cool his heels. Now I've got the mill to myself for a little while." And he smiled darkly to himself as he added the last words.

Then he turned to the boy who had brought the note, and who still remained at hand.

"Wait a minute, Davie," he said, and, turning, went into the mill and up to the deserted desk.

Taking a sheet of paper from the rack, he began to write, not in his usual hand, but in imitation of his brother's.

"My Darling Grace—Can you come to the mill at once? I have something very important to tell you. Don't delay an instant, but come. Yours always.—"Horace."

Finishing the note, he put it into an envelope and directed it.

"Take this to Miss Hazel at once," he said to the boy. "Don't hang about on the way, and don't wait for an answer. As soon as you've delivered it, run off home to dinner. If you're quick, I'll give you a shilling."

The boy took the letter, and, waiting to hear no more, darted off. When he had disappeared Reuben Howard returned to the mill.

"It's lucky I've got the knack of copying handwriting," he said with a mirthless laugh. "I fancy I shall be able to persuade the lovely Grace into taking me for a husband instead of that school-boy brother of mine. If not, I'll use a novel argument."

A sinister gleam shone in his dark eyes, and he paced restlessly to and fro the floor. The past month had wrought some change in his face. It was not only morose, not only sullen now. It was diabolical. Had a brain specialist looked into those glittering dark eyes, he would have stated his opinion that the man was on the brink of madness. They shone with a lustre until now subdued, as though the fire that still burnt fiercely in his breast sent forth its flames to light them, too, and mount, perchance, even to his very brain.

Slowly he began first to ascend the stair of the mill to the store-room above, and then the long ladder that led up to the great iron wheels and revolving rods of the moving mill. Reaching the top, he put out his hand and slipped a strong iron tongue into the thick cogs of the main wheel. There was a sudden jar, and instantly the great mill stood still.

He descended to the road again.

Not a soul was in sight, save for a fluttering white dress far across the second meadow. An ugly smile came into Reuben Howard's face as he saw it. Turning, he looked upward at the great mill-sails. One had stopped almost directly over the doorway of the mill. He propped a ladder against the wall, so that it reached the end of the lower sail. Once more he glanced across the intervening stretch of meadow. The fluttering white dress was nearer now. He watched it as it came over the stile and descended on the other side. Then he disappeared into the mill, and, stationing himself behind the wide-open door, silently waited.

Digitized by Google

A step on the roadway without, the gleam of a white dress through the chink of the door, and Grace Hazel, with flushed cheeks and fast-coming breath, stepped into the mill. The heavy wooden door slammed to, and the two were alone in the grey old building—face to face with each other.

"Good morning, Reuben," she said, timidly holding out her hand. "I have come to see Horace. He has sent for me. What is the matter?"

A frightened look was slowly creeping into the blue eyes. Reuben saw it and laughed a dry, mirthless laugh.

"Well, the truth is," he said, edging towards the closed door of the mill, "the letter you received was not from Horace at all, but from me."

"You!". Grace stared at him in dull surprise.

"Yes, from me. All's fair in love or war, they say, so I've sent the young idiot off on a wild goose chase, to give me an opportunity of talking with you. I needn't mince matters. You know quite well what I want—what I have wanted for years, but have been afraid to ask. I want you—you, Grace Hazel, for my wife—and—and I mean to have you."

For two or three minutes the girl stood as if spellbound, staring blankly into the dark face of the man before her. Presently she said:

"Reuben, don't you understand? Hasn't Horace told you? I thought——"

A flash of the dark, menacing eyes stopped her.

"All that goes for nothing," said Reuben positively. "He has stood in my way all my life. But there is an end to all things, and the end has been reached now. I mean to marry you, Grace, and will brook neither his nor any other man's interference."

A faint colour was coming into Grace Hazel's cheeks.

"You don't seem to consider me," she said, a little defiantly.

Reuben fixed a look upon her that chilled her very soul.

"Do you refuse to marry me?" he asked, and his voice sounded clear and hard.

"I do." The answer was low but quite distinct.

Grace took a step towards the door. But Reuben was between it and her.

"Listen," he said hoarsely, and the girl saw that he was trembling violently as though from strong excitement. "I will give you one more chance. If you then refuse, I—I will kill you. Will you have me?"

"No," she said. "Let me out of this evil place."

But the man heeded her not. With a swift spring, he had her in his strong arms, and she was on the floor of the mill. Thrusting his hand into the pocket of his coat, he drew out a piece of stout cord. With this he bound her two wrists together, leaving the ends of the cord dangling some six or eight inches beyond the twisted knots.

Then he lifted her in his arms and went towards the door. Opening it, he looked out. No one was in sight. Up the ladder with his struggling but helpless burden, till he reached the end of the great sail. And there he bound her by the cord that held her white wrists, and, descending, looked up at her with a hideous grin on his dark evil face. Cry after cry rang across the meadow, but not a soul responded. It was the hour of the mid-day meal, and no one was abroad. Reuben looked up at her as she hung, pale and trembling, from the end of the great sail.

"One more chance," he shouted. "If you won't marry me, I'll start the mill. Will you?"

"Oh, no, no, no! I can't, I can't! Oh, have mercy on me, Reuben! Think of Horace!"

Plunging into the mill, he sprang up the stairs, then up the top ladder, and forced the iron tongue from the cogs of the wheel. The machinery creaked and groaned. There was a faint sound of grinding from below, and the shadow of a great sail, slowly moving, fell upon the window. A shriek of despair rang through the air, and, with a laugh of hideous madness, Reuben rushed down the ladder and stairs and out across the smiling meadows.

And the great sails of the mill commenced to go slowly and majestically round. and, with them, that white unconscious figure, whose wrists were being slowly crushed by the tightening of the twisting cords.

But someone was racing through the meadow—his fair face pale and drawn, his blue eyes strained towards that pinioned figure on the mill-sail. By a lucky chance, he had met farmer Wood half-way between the mill and his house, and quickly learnt that he had been made the dupe of some, as yet, unexplainable plot. So he had hurried back, filled with an unknown fear, till the sight of that fluttering white dress up among the sails of the mill had sent his feet flying over the smooth green grass of the meadow. Who she was he knew only too well. How she came there, he did not stop to think. The sight of his brother, rushing, shrieking, out of the mill and across the meadow in the opposite direction struck him as strange.

His one thought was of her. Would he be in time to save her?

As he drew nearer, he saw she was unconscious. Each revolution of the great sails would give one more twist to the sharp thongs that bound her slender wrists. But a few, and the cord would cut its way deep into the fair white flesh till even the bones beneath would snap and the muscles sever. Oh, would he be in time?

Faster and faster he went—up the slope that led on to the roadway—then, with a half turn to the left, along the path to the door of the mill.

His knees shook and his breath came in choking gasps as he tore madly up stairs and ladder, till he reached the great revolving cog-wheel and laid his trembling hand on the iron tongue.

Then he glanced over his shoulder and out of the window. One sail came round. No, that was not the one. Another. No.

Still another, and it came down more quickly than the others had done. There was a clank of iron, a scraping jar, a groan, and the great machinery came once more to a standstill. Down the ladder and stairs again, and out of the mill-door.

He had stopped the mill at the right moment, and she hung almost in the very spot where, a few minutes before, she had been bound.

The ladder was lying by, and Horace placed it against the wall and was up it in an instant.

A sharp cut with his knife, and the limp, unconscious figure slipped into his arms and across his stout shoulder. Tenderly he carried her into the mill and unfastened the cruel cords that bound her wrists. The tears were in his blue eyes as he saw those two deep-red wales upon the white flesh where the cords had tightened. A few more turns—perchance only one—and they would have cut into the fair wrists and roused her to consciousness with the increasing torture. Kissing her white, set face, he ran for water, and, returning, began the task of restoration.

It was some minutes ere she opened her blue eyes. When she did, her gaze rested on his anxious face, and she smiled. For a moment or two there was silence, and then Horace asked:

"Was it my brother?"

"Yes. Did you save me, dear?"

"Thank God, yes."

There was a sound of hurrying feet outside the mill. The door was pushed open, and two men rushed in. Seeing Horace they advanced.

"Mr. Horace," said one, "we're all sadly grieved to have to tell ye, but Mr. Reuben's jumped off the top of Eagle Crag into the sea. Old Mother Martin saw him do it, and she says he was a-shrieking like a madman."

Horace turned his face away. and the men slipped quietly out of the mill-door. Presently Horace turned once more to the girl by his side. She was not slow to respond. The poor bruised wrists were about his neck and tears of sympathy were in her eyes.

"Poor Reuben," she whispered. "Do not blame him, Horace. He was not in his right mind. Let us be kind to his memory."

Horace bowed his head.

"So long as I have you," he said tenderly.

Walter J. Mowbray.

Digitized by Google

MISS WHITE.

A Story of Last Leap Year.

It was on a morning early in January eight years ago that my office boy—I beg his pardon, junior clerk—brought me her card, upon which was simply inscribed:

"Miss White."

"Some old frump," I thought to myself, "who wants to bring an action against her next-door-neighbour for calling her bad names over the back garden wall!" I should mention that I am a solicitor, with more prospects than clients.

"Show her in," I said.

A moment later when I looked up there stood before me one of the prettiest girls I had ever seen.

"Pray be seated," I exclaimed, rising in a hurry. Breach of promise flashed through my thoughts, but then no human man engaged to so pretty a woman would ever break it off. Tall, and strikingly handsome, she showed not a trace of want of self-possession. I am a bad hand at describing a beautiful girl, so can only say that I believe I fell in love with my unknown client then and there.

"What can I do for you?" I inquired.

"I want your advice, Mr. Tremaine," she began, in a low and pleasant voice, "and so that you can quite understand it, I will begin my story at the beginning. I was left an orphan when quite a baby, and have been brought up by an aunt. I am quite independent, however, having an income of four hundred a year, to which I succeeded two years ago. My aunt has one son, who, encouraged by her, pesters me with his attentions, and has now taken to threatening me. I do not want to marry him; I hate him!" she exclaimed determinedly. "I must tell you he is only twenty—three years my junior, and has been very much spoilt by his foolish mother. And now can you advise me?"

"I can certainly try and frighten him with a warning letter couched in legal phraseology," I said; "or you can have him prosecuted and bound over."

Miss White shook her head.

"No," she said, "not that."

"Shall I write to him?"

"Please. I have written down his name and the address."

"Of course," I said, as she rose to go, "you could retaliate by threatening to leave yourself. Why not do so?"

"I have done so, and it is useless. He only says he will follow me and shoot me."

"We can stop that bluster," I said; "I will write him a letter at once, which I think will have the desired effect."

My pretty client rose and smiled.

"Thank you, Mr. Tremaine," she said, offering me her hand; "and what do I owe you, please?"

I didn't know what to say to this, and could only stammer something about leaving it for the present.

"But," she said, "I thought solicitors always charged six and eightpence for a consultation, and so much for every letter they wrote for you. You see, you are the first lawyer I have ever consulted."

She said this with so charming a smile that I fell more deeply in love with her than ever.

"We will see," I said, "what effect my communication has upon the gentleman. I assure you it is the usual custom."

My client put out her gloved hand, saying "Good morning," and I was left alone with my thoughts.

Somehow after she went work was very distasteful. I wrote to that young cub, her cousin (whose name, I should mention, was Arthur Thornton), a letter that I afterwards had reason to believe considerably alarmed that gentleman, and as I wrote it the pretty face of my new client seemed smiling at me from the chair in which she sat.

I was not a very young man, though a comparatively poor one. I was thirty, and some of my friends were kind enough to consider me good looking, and I wondered as I worked whether I should ever see Miss White again.

A fortnight later I dined with some very old friends in Kensington, whom I had known from boyhood. Almost the first person I saw on entering the room was my fair client. The recognition was mutual, and my heart gave a thrill of delight, for I fancied I saw a gleam of pleasure leap into her beautiful eyes as we were introduced.

"You appear to have met before," said our hostess, looking from one to the other. Miss White smiled.

"Only professionally, I am sorry to say," I murmured.

"Your letter has had the desired effect, Mr. Tremaine, but how long it will last it is difficult to say. Much to my relief, my cousin has been called out of town."

"Please rely upon me in every way," I said; and we drifted into unprofessional channels. To me Miss White seemed more charming than ever, and she was not only charming, but clever to boot. I fell deeper into the toils than ever, and mentally anathematised my hostess when she disturbed our tête-a-tête by bringing another guest to present to my companion.

"Oh, Forget-me-not," she said. "I want to introduce Mr. Clifford to you."

I fear I must have glared at Clifford by the way he looked at me. But I felt it.

He was, to a certain extent, a celebrity, having recently published a volume of third-rate poems, which had, through some freak of the public, run into a second edition. Miss White, knowing this, beamed upon him in a manner that in anyone else but herself I should have thought effusive. I left them discussing the art of minor verse; but, though I did not take her down to dinner, I had the felicity to sit next to her, which comforted me on the principle that half a loaf is better than no bread.

"May I venture to make what may seem an impertinent remark?" I said during dinner. "Mrs. Vere called you 'Forget-me-not.' What a very pretty pet name!"

Miss White's face dimpled all over.

"It is my Christian name," she said.

"Most charming and most appropriate."

"Everyone is kind enough to say so; but it was my mother's wish, and she died when I was three weeks old. After all, girls are christened 'Rose,' 'Violet,' and 'Lily,' so why not 'Forget-me-not'?"

"I consider it a most delightful name," I said, and, what was more, I meant it. That dinner was all too brief for my happiness. It made me mentally resolve to cultivate the friendship of the Veres far more than I had hitherto done. I went home to my dingy chambers feeling that my favourite flower in the world was the Forget-me-not, and I was deeply in love with my charming client.

* * * * * * *

The next morning at my office a disagreeable surprise was awaiting me. I received a visit from Mrs. Thornton, who, with unmeasured expressions of rage, demanded the reason of my interference with her son's love affair. I tried my best to calm the lady, expostulated with her, even attempted to reason with her, which was silly, because he who attempts to reason with an angry woman is not diplomatic. After a stormy quarter of an hour she flung herself out of the office in a towering passion.

Digitized by Google

"Here is a pretty kettle of fish," I thought to myself, ruefully. The next thing that would probably happen would be that the young gentleman himself would also come to my office and threaten to shoot me! I carefully observed the size of the office poker in the event of such a contingency. Making all due allowance for Mrs. Thornton's disappointment, I felt a deep and sincere pity for my client, and vowed to myself there was nothing in the world possible to be done that I would not do on her behalf.

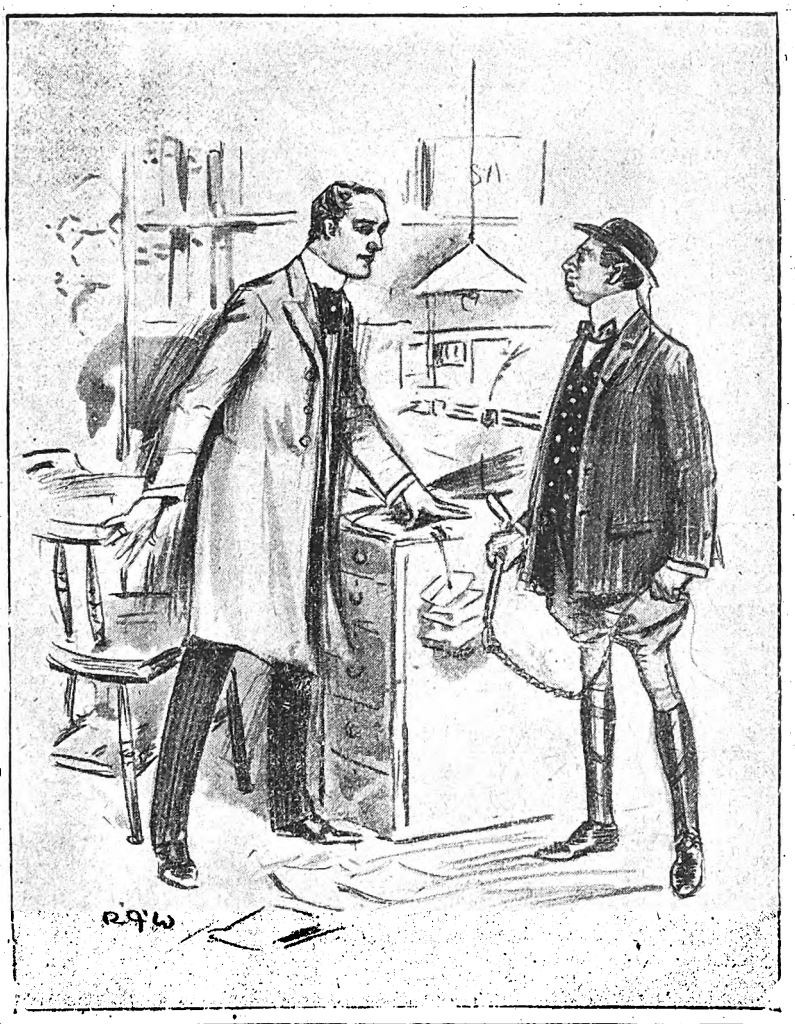
Strange to say my fears were realised within a week. One morning a card bearing the name of "Arthur Thornton" was brought to me. Bracing myself for the encounter, I ordered him to be admitted. Judge of my surprise—he proved to be a thin, plain, undersized stripling, with a vacuous countenance and an expression upon it of more idiocy than cunning.

The only redeeming feature of his face was his eyes, which were black and malevolent. He carried a horsewhip in his hand, and his first words left me with very little doubt as to his polite intentions towards me personally.

"Your name is Tremaine, isn't it?" he demanded bluntly.

"It is," I said.

"I have come to horsewhip you!"



"I have come to horsewhip you!"

I smiled, and leant back in my seat, but I kept my eyes fixed upon him.

"My dear sir, gentlemen don't do these things. I presume you are a gentleman?"

"There's a jolly sight too much presumption about you, Mr. Tremaine! You have taken the liberty of interfering in my affairs, and I mean to make it very warm for you before I have done with you."

"Your cousin requested me," I said, "to write to you on her behalf. I did so, as her solicitor. I fail to see what right you have to dictate to me in the matter at all, Mr Tremaine, that's my candid opinion."

"Right!" he exclaimed, flourishing his horsewhip. He made a lunge at me with it, but I was a moment too soon for him, and though the tip of the cord grazed my cheek, it was in my possession, and Mr. Arthur Thornton was lying, dazed, on my office floor within the space of ten seconds. Tremaine is a Cornish name, and I had done a little wrestling in my youth.

"Get up, you cur!" I exclaimed, giving him a not very gentle kick.

He crawled to his feet, looking as though he could have killed me.

"You don't suppose this sort of tomfoolery will do your wooing any good, do you?"

He made as though to rush at me again, and I pinned him by both arms into an easy chair like a baby.

"Don't be a fool!" I said curtly, "unless you want me to send for the police, which I certainly shall do if you dare to lay a finger on me. Now listen to me. Your cousin comes to me for my advice. I give it to her. She declines to marry you. That being so, there is no law in England by which you can make her change her decision. I know what both you and your mother want, and, as Miss White's solicitor, I am justified in telling you that I shall protect that young lady to the very utmost of my power."

He attempted to rise, his eyes burning with black hatred.

"Sit down!" I shouted, so loudly that my clerk, hearing, tapped at the door.

"It is all right, Jenkins; you can go away," I said; and turned my attention to Thornton again. He had sat down in the chair again.

"I haven't finished with you yet. What sort of man do you call yourself, not only to attempt to force a girl to marry you because she has money, but to be fool enough to try and take the law in your own hands? Are you aware I could prosecute you for attempted assault?"

"Where's your witness?" he muttered.

"In my possession," I said grimly, showing him the horse-

Digitized by Google

whip; "and in my possession it will remain until you give me both an apology for your outrageous conduct and a written undertaking not to annoy Miss White after this date with your unwelcome attentions. Do this, and you can go; but you don't go till you do both. You're in a cleft stick, young man, and don't you forget it."

"I sha'n't!" he muttered sulkily.

"Jenkins," I shouted, "fetch a policeman."

The cub went white to the lips. There was a pause, during which I flourished the horsewhip ostentatiously. Jenkins tapped at the door and entered.

"Did you call, sir?"

"No," I said. "I thought I should want you, but I find I do not."

Jenkins' face when he caught sight of the horsewhip was a picture of astonishment, and for the sake of my own personal dignity, I felt compelled afterwards to explain matters to him to a certain extent. When he had retired, and closed the door, I faced my visitor once more.

"Now then," I said, "what are you going to do?"

My brave gentleman began to whimper, which was a good sign.

"Make out your paper," said he, with a poor attempt at bravado. I called Jenkins.

"Sit down, Jenkins, in my chair, and write as I dictate."

"I, the undersigned, hereby undertake never to molest or annoy Miss Forget-me-not White from this date. Should I do so, I leave it in the hands of Mr. H. Tremaine, solicitor, to prosecute me for an assault attempted to be committed by me upon him this day.—Signed."

"Now," I said, "get up and sign!" I still carried the horsewhip. With some hesitation Mr. Arthur Thornton rose to his feet and affixed his signature to the document. I promptly and dramatically locked it up in my safe.

"Jenkins, show this 'gentleman' out. His weapon is mine by right of conquest."

* * * * * * *

I did not see or hear anything of my pretty client for some time, beyond that we met at the Veres' one afternoon. I gathered from her manner then that she knew nothing of the encounter at my office. I had not supposed Mr. Thornton would tell her, and I certainly had no intention of doing so myself. She was, if possible, sweeter than ever, both kind and gracious to me, with the result that I went home in the seventh heaven of happiness.

But, alas! I awoke in the morning in the last depths of despair. Reason, they say, comes with the dawn. How could I, a struggling solicitor, barely able to earn a living, hope that "this one bright particular star" would deign to shine upon me? Forget her I never should. But I realised in the morning to the full my folly and presumption in having fallen in love with a rich woman. But all the same, I loved her, and I could not tear myself away from the Veres'. While reproaching myself for my folly, I still went there in the hope of meeting her, for I confessed to my secret heart that the world held but one woman for me, and that one woman was Forget-me-not White.

But one morning, at the end of February, I was sitting in my office surrounded by dingy parchments, through which seemed to shine the face of the woman I loved. History repeated itself, and Jenkins brought me a card with the two words inscribed upon it, "Miss White." My heart leapt, and then went still a moment later. How foolish of me, I thought. Of course she had only thought of me as a client. Of course I was bound to see her.

She entered, gracious and beautiful, and gave me her little gloved hand, then sat down in the very chair in which she had sat before.

"You are very unkind, Mr. Tremaine," she said with a delicious smile. "You have never been to see me." I stammered something about being busy, and she laughed the merriest laugh that surely ever a solicitor's office rang with.

"I have some news for you," she said. "My cousin has gone abroad. He sailed for New Zealand on the Orinoco yesterday. And before he went he made me a confession."

I started. What had he told her? I soon knew. My client put out her two hands to me, and I could almost have sworn there were tears in her eyes.

"Thank you, Mr. Tremaine, with all my heart, for what you have done for me!"

I would have given all I possessed in the world to have taken her in my arms and kissed her. I pressed her outstretched hands, and let them fall as quickly as possible.

"Don't look so serious," she said gaily; "I too have a confession to make." Here she hesitated a little, and I fancied I saw a blush creep over her face.

"A confession?" I echoed.

"Yes, a confession," she said. "I am thinking of getting married."

"I congratulate him," was all I could find to say.

"But you don't even know his name."

"Whoever he is, he will be lucky who wins you."

"Mr. Tremaine, I really believe you hold a very high opinion of me." The temptation was too great for me.

"I think you the most beautiful and lovable woman in the world," I said with emphasis.

Her face went as red as a rose.

"But," she said, "you haven't inquired the name of the gentleman I think of marrying."

"I would rather not know," I exclaimed. "I love you too much, but I shall pray for your happiness ever and always. Forgive me for having said so much, but I could not help it."

She gave me an adorable smile.

"If you will give me a sheet of paper and a pencil," she said, "I will sit at your desk, if I may, and write the name down for you to read when I am gone."

She sat in my chair and pushed away the parchments that littered the table.

"What a dreadful muddle!" she said. "You want someone to come and tidy it up."

My heart was beating so fast that I could not speak. She picked up a pen and wrote a name upon the sheet of paper I had given her. Then she looked up at me with a bright face.

"What is the date?" she said.

With a glance at my calendar I told her.

"There," she said, folding it carefully; "now I must go. Promise me that you will not look at that for an hour."

"I promise," I said, feeling somewhat mystified. She held out her hand to me.

"Good-bye," I said.

"Au revoir," was her reply, and before I knew it she was gone.

* * * * * * *

An hour later I looked at the paper. To my utter amazement it bore nothing but my own name, Harry Tremaine, and the date, February 29th. It flashed upon me with a suddenness that almost unnerved me, that the year was leap year, and that Forget-me-not White had proposed to me!

She is now Forget-me-not Tremaine, and vows that in all the eight years of our happy married life she has never once regretted that proposal of hers. The sheet of paper on which she wrote my name hangs framed in my study.

Clifton Bingham.

A HANSOM CAB AND A HORSE are offered
AS A PRIZE.
See This Week's "BIG BUDGET."
ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

Exciting Series.

DECOYED!

A Striking Series of Astonishing Revelations.

Told by the Decoy Herself.

OF WHOM YOU READ.

Vivienne D'Alton, the decoy. She, an innocent girl, unwittingly leads young gentlemen of good social standing to their ruin at the hands of her father.

Beverley D'Alton, who poses as a millionaire who has made his money by judicious speculation. He assumes to lavish great affection on his daughter, from whom he has been separated for many years.

Mrs. Sherwood. A florid person, who is introduced to Vivienne by her father as a great friend of her dead mother. She lives with the D'Altons, and requests Vivienne to call her "Aunt Flora," which the young girl reluctantly does.

Annchen. A lady's maid, whom Vivienne greatly detests. She seems to be on very familiar terms with Mrs. Sherwood and Mr. D'Alton.

NINTH EPISODE.

A Letter from Viscount Broomville.

As soon as I reached my own rooms with the two letters I had secured, I locked the outer door behind me, sat down, and made myself mistress of the information intended for me.

The first letter I opened was from Sophie Melrose it ran:

"My Dear Miss D'Alton, "It was exceedingly kind of your father to arrange all about the Specialist so promptly, though I must confess we should have been a little more grateful if we could have seen you before we left. But there was not even time to come round and inquire how your sprained ankle was getting on, for as the Specialist is leaving England to-morrow, not a moment is to be wasted. I am so thankful that you mentioned poor Alan's affliction to your father, whose kindness, in taking all the worry of arranging things off our hands, has won our everlasting gratitude, even if the great Specialist to whom he had wired instructions should not be as successful as is hoped. To-night, after he has seen Alan, I will write again, and let you know what he says.

"Meanwhile, I am,

"Yours gratefully and affectionately,

"Sophie Melrose."

Was I very much amazed at the contents of this letter? I fancy not. But I was certainly distressed, for it is a terrible thing to have such doubts as mine resolved into certainties, and the missive, which Annchen was on the watch to intercept, told me a multitude of things.

It told me, for instance, that there had been a conspiracy to prevent me seeing the Melrose family again, and that the pretended appointment at the office was merely a ruse to keep me out of the way while my father posed as Alan's Good Samaritan. It also told me that Annchen had overheard my conversation with Sophie and that she had reported it verbatim. And, still more frightful revelation, it told me that my anxiety concerning the origin of Alan Melrose's brain trouble was only too well founded.

This being so, how could I hope that anything but evil was at the bottom of the hasty removal of the patient, or that such a person as the vaunted "Specialist" really existed? No wonder I scented danger. And no wonder that I was wildly anxious to warn the deluded victims against the enemies who were plotting their ruin.

Only too certain was I now that, if my father could prevent it, Alan Melrose would never recover his memory. For, if he did, he would be able to tell what he had done with the missing £80,000. I could have solved that mystery myself, in the light of what had happened to-day. Or, rather, I could feel sure in my own mind concerning it. But actual disclosure ought to come from the victimised man himself, and, dreadful as it would be for me, I felt that I should be compelled to indorse the proclamation of my own father's villainy!

But how to warn the Melroses that it was an enemy, and not a friend who was directing their movements, and raising hopes that were never intended to be fulfilled? There was no mention of the name of the place to which they were journeying, so I had no immediate means of communication with them. True, Sophie had promised to write again as soon as she reached her destination. But would she be in a position to do so? And even if she were successful in dispatching another letter to me, was it not probable that it would be intercepted?

I was now face to face with the fact that my relatives were nothing better than a gang of unscrupulous schemers; so, painful as it was to take sides against my own father, the only course open to me was to fight him and Mrs. Sherwood with their own weapons, and, for the present at least, to put on a mask of unsuspecting amiability.

Digitized by Google

If possible, I must devise a means of preventing the withholding of letters intended for me, and I was trying to form a plan in that connection, when my eyes lighted upon the other missive which I had rescued from Annchen's clutches. I was both amazed and relieved when I read it—amazed at its contents, and relieved to know that its writer was safe.

For it came from Viscount Broomville, and this is what it said:

"Dear Miss D'Alton,—If I were to tell you one half the things that have befallen me since you saved my life at Knightsbridge, you would hardly believe me to be speaking the truth. Many reasons have induced me to risk writing to you now, for the time has come when you ought to be warned that your own life and liberty are no safer than mine have been for the last few weeks. Never mind how I know this. And, for Heaven's sake, do not run away with the idea that I exaggerate the gravity of the situation. Be on your guard. Go nowhere without other escort than that of your relatives. And beware of taking food and drink that is not shared by them. If this letter reaches your hands, it may save you from danger. If it does not, it will be because restraint is being exercised upon your correspondence; so I warn Mr. D'Alton and Mrs. Sherwood that if any harm befalls Miss D'Alton, there are those who will avenge her at once. The former is the instigator of several attacks upon myself, and I am simply biding my time before I declare all I know. If that time is hastened by any doubt as to the continued welfare of Vivienne D'Alton, the first to bring her enemies to justice will be her ardent well-wisher,

"Broomville."

So Viscount Broomville guessed the real nature of the great millionaire, too! And his fears were so strong on my behalf that he found it necessary to send me a warning which would have seemed preposterous if my own suspicions had not been already aroused. Indeed, he had so worded his letter that whether it reached me or not, it was calculated to be of good service to me, although it was hard to believe that my own father would do me an injury, for the fact remained that he had heaped pleasures and luxuries upon me ever since I came home from school.

"Please, miss, the master sent me to see if you were coming down to tea."

Annchen's voice, respectful but penetrating, was making itself heard on the other side of the locked door, and, thrusting the two letters into my pocket, I rose and turned the key.

"How long has Mr. D'Alton been in?" I inquired, with surprising nonchalance, considering the anxiety of mind I was in. Nor would one have imagined that there had been a rather unpleasant incident between the girl and myself, unless the fact that she was even more deferential than usual argued increased hypocrisy.

"Only a few minutes, miss," she answered. "He told me to say that he had good news about some friends of yours."

Without questioning the necessity of sending a message like this, I quietly went down to the drawing-room, and found both my father and Aunt Flora beaming with good nature.

"There, my dear," chuckled the former, "confess that I stole a nice march upon you this morning!"

"So I fancy. You never intended to join us at the office," was my steady reply.

"Certainly not! It was all a scheme to get you out of the way, while I packed off young Melrose and his sisters to interview a specialist in mental ailments who intends leaving the country almost immediately. I fervently hope that the poor fellow will come back cured, if only for my own sake."

"For your sake? How can it affect you?"

"My dear child, it is a matter of £80,000. Alan Melrose had made every preparation for investing that sum in one of my companies when this strange mental darkness overtook him. Meanwhile, he has deposited the securities somewhere, and they will probably remain safely hidden in some queer place until he recovers his memory. So, you see, it is greatly to my interest to expedite his recovery."

So there was no secrecy about the matter at all! Could it be possible that my mind was warped, and that I twisted every trivial circumstance into an indication of evil? My father's candour simply bewildered me, and he answered one or two more questions of mine quite frankly the while we took our seats at the table, being for a wonder without any guests.

"Bryce brought you straight home instead of taking you to see Clarissa Greatham? Of course he did. He had my orders to that effect, for I wanted you to be home in good time, so that I could tell you all about the Melrose plans before you got uneasy. They should be in Edinburgh in time to let you have a letter by to-morrow morning. Miss Melrose promised to write to you, and I suggested that she should wire on arrival."

Really, if it had not been for Viscount Broomville's letter, I should almost have felt ashamed of my dreadful suspicions. But I felt it rustle in my pocket as I happened to withdraw my pocket handkerchief and I was instantly reminded of the warning: "Be on your guard. Go nowhere without other escort than that of your relatives. And beware of taking any food and drink that is not shared by them."

"Vivienne, my child, you look quite done up, and you are eating nothing," observed my father, looking anxiously into my face. "Drink your tea; it will do your good."

While I had been toying with the food on my plate and meditating on Lord Broomville's letter, my father had been kindly thinking of my welfare, and I was mechanically about to lift the cup of tea to my lips when I happened to glance up at Mrs. Sherwood, who had sweetened it for me. Her eyes were sparkling with anticipation, her lips were parted eagerly, and there was altogether such a strange look upon her face as could only be produced by the expectation of something unusual.

Crash!

The tea-cup slipped from my nerveless fingers, and the contents were spilt on the dainty costume that had been donned for the first time that day.

"I'm so sorry," I murmured between lips that I knew to be ashy pale. "I'm afraid my frock is quite spoilt. It was very clumsy of me."

"And clumsiness isn't exactly in your line, eh?" sneered Mrs. Sherwood, who was now looking like a baffled demon. "It isn't always wise to overwhelm girls with luxuries. It makes them extravagant and careless."

"Flora, how dare you talk so foolishly? Can't you see that the child is quite ill? I've noticed once or twice that you felt spiteful towards her, but I thought you had more sense and more feeling than you are showing now."

My father had evidently lost his temper, for his voice rang out so angrily that every word must have been heard by the two men who waited upon us. Mrs. Sherwood immediately began to protest that she had not meant to be ill-natured, but I did not wait to hear the argument finished. I was almost hysterically overwrought, and, bursting into tears, I hastily made my way back to my own rooms.

* * * * *

After I had recovered my composure, I tried to realise my exact situation. In the eyes of the world, I was the petted and only child of a millionaire whose name was a household word, and who was credited with being one of the most charitable men alive.

As such I was a girl to be envied, for very few could hope to attain the pinnacle of happiness and prosperity upon which I was supposed to be securely placed.

But, in the quiet of my own room, I saw a very different picture. I was one of the most unhappy of mortals, for I must either share the awful guilt which cast its shadow about me, or I must denounce my own father as a cheat, a thief, and possibly, though I tried hard not to believe it, a murderer!

No wonder I was in a state of extreme nervous tension. And no wonder that I feared attempts upon my own life, now that I had shown myself to be so uncomfortably observant as to be a dangerous companion if only one-half of my suspicions were true.

Was there a drug of some sort in the tea which I had deliberately wasted? Or was my imagination really running away with me? If the former, how was I to escape other attempts upon my life or sanity? Lord Broomville, whose letter I carefully burnt, had warned me against the possibility of foul play. But how was I to avoid it as long as I remained an inhabitant of Park Lane?

Digitized by Google

This question set me thinking in another direction. I would run away and watch from a safe distance the disentanglement of the mysteries which nearly drove me distracted.

Fired with this idea I began to gather my jewellery together. It was very valuable, for costly presents had been simply heaped upon me, and I knew that it would yield me plenty to live upon until matters were solved one way or the other.

But I was not yet destined to carry out my intentions, for without even a preliminary knock, Mrs. Sherwood entered my boudoir, being immediately followed by my father and a gentleman whom I did not know.

"Ah, in your bedroom, are you, dear?" called out Aunt Flora. "Do come here a minute, your father has brought someone to see you."

Hastily thrusting my jewel-case out of sight, I went into the boudoir, and bowed stiffly to the stranger who had so unwarrantably forced himself upon my notice. I was feeling very mutinous, and very determined to show my objection to this encroachment upon my liberty, so I looked the stranger none too amiably in the face. But, strange to relate, I no sooner met the steadfast glance of his piercing grey eyes than my own dropped obediently, and, much to my subsequent amazement, I soon found myself agreeing with childish docility to the directions given me.

"I have brought Dr. Farnie to see you, Vivienne. Your nerves seem to be in a most extraordinary state, and I feel so anxious about you that I want you to describe your feelings and sensations to the doctor, so that he may know what to prescribe."

"There is no need to trouble your daughter," interrupted Dr. Farnie's voice, which was so gentle, so melodious, and so soothing, that it was a pleasure to listen to it. "I can see for myself what is the matter. She is nervous and overwrought, suffers from bad dreams, and is tormented by the malignant imagination that is such a frequent accompaniment of hysteria. But we will soon change all that. Less excitement, earlier hours, and fresh air, instead of heated rooms, will work wonders, and a simple tonic will do the rest."

"Nay, doctor, I think you exaggerate the case," remonstrated my father, who, as he sat in a big armchair, and looked with tender solicitude at me, appeared to be the personification of benevolence. "My daughter is certainly a bit hysterical, for, as I have already told you, she burst into tears because she accidentally spoilt a new dress. But she has shown no signs of being troubled by a malignant imagination, and——"

"Pardon me, I think you will find my diagnosis correct," was the firm reply. "I have had much experience with hysterical girls, and by far the most painful part of their malady is their tendency to create troubles that do not exist. Why, I knew one poor girl who actually imagined that her own mother was conspiring to murder her."

"Incredible!" exclaimed my father.

"Awful!" added Mrs. Sherwood.

And I? Well, it must be owned that Dr. Farnie's words and manner exercised such an influence upon me that I, for the time being, thankfully believed myself to be the victim of painful delusions, and cast aside the awful suspicions which had begun to make life a torment to me.

"The doctor is right," I murmured shamefacedly. "I've thought all manner of dreadful things, and my day-dreams seem to have been worse than those I have dreamt while asleep."

My father, and the doctor, and Mrs. Sherwood all smiled at me, and the doctor said kindly: "After all, Miss D'Alton, you are not so far gone in hysteria as the other young lady I mentioned, for a patient no sooner awakes to a conviction that her fancy has been playing her tricks than she is on the high road to recovery. And now to begin my treatment. Suppose Miss D'Alton goes for a drive at once, in an open carriage for the sake of the fresh air, and, while she is out, let her call at whichever chemist she prefers, and ask him to give her a bottle of Campbell's Nerve Tonic. It is a patent medicine, but it is as good as anything I can give her myself, and the mere fetching of it will benefit her."

I smiled gratefully at the doctor, for I guessed why he wanted me to fetch the remedy myself. A patent medicine in a sealed bottle could not possibly have been tampered with by anybody, and there was not even room left to imagine an intentional curb on my liberty when Aunt Flora observed: "Well, I'm glad it's something she can look after herself, for I don't want to go out again before dinner if I can help it."

I protested that there was no need for anyone to accompany me, and when, after the others had left me, Susan came in to help me to dress for the carriage, I almost felt happy again.

"Campbell's Patent Nerve Tonic" proved very difficult to procure. The first shop at which I called had never heard of it, but an assistant at the second shop thought he could get me a bottle of it the following day. I gave him an order for a supply, and then, being desirous of removing all my delusions as soon as possible, I gave the order to drive to a shop near the Haymarket.

Each time the footman saw me into the carriage again, and then mounted the box beside Bryce. It was pleasant to know that I could go where I liked without fear of restraint, and my spirits had been raised so much that I even looked forward with pleasure to the little dinner-party which was to take place at our house that night. The guests had all been invited by my father, and I had not even asked their names. But, by way of making up for previous disinclination to entertain guests I resolved to be very amiable, and was smiling with anticipatory pleasure when I again left the carriage in quest of the "Nerve Tonic."

"Had I better go into the shop, miss?" inquired the footman. "There's a perfect crowd outside."

So there was, but I saw that it was easy to pass it, and was about to do so when, moved by some central impulse, the crowd parted, and I saw in its midst the pathetic figure of an old lady whose face was the picture of misery, and whose hands were outstretched pleadingly to a big policeman who was keeping the crowd from pushing her about.

"You don't know who you are, madam? And you don't know where you live? Nor remember nothing at all about yourself?"

The policeman was putting these questions kindly enough, when a tall, foreign-looking man came forward, and said eagerly: "Ah, there she is! Poor old thing! I thought we had lost her again!"

"Why, do you know her?" inquired the policeman, and the man answered promptly: "Know her? Of course I do! Why, she's my mother's sister. But she's a bit off in her upper storey, and gives us heaps of trouble."

"Well, you had better see her safe home before she comes to grief."

The old lady looked at the man who claimed to be her nephew, and shrank back. "I don't know him!" she protested. "He is strange to me!"

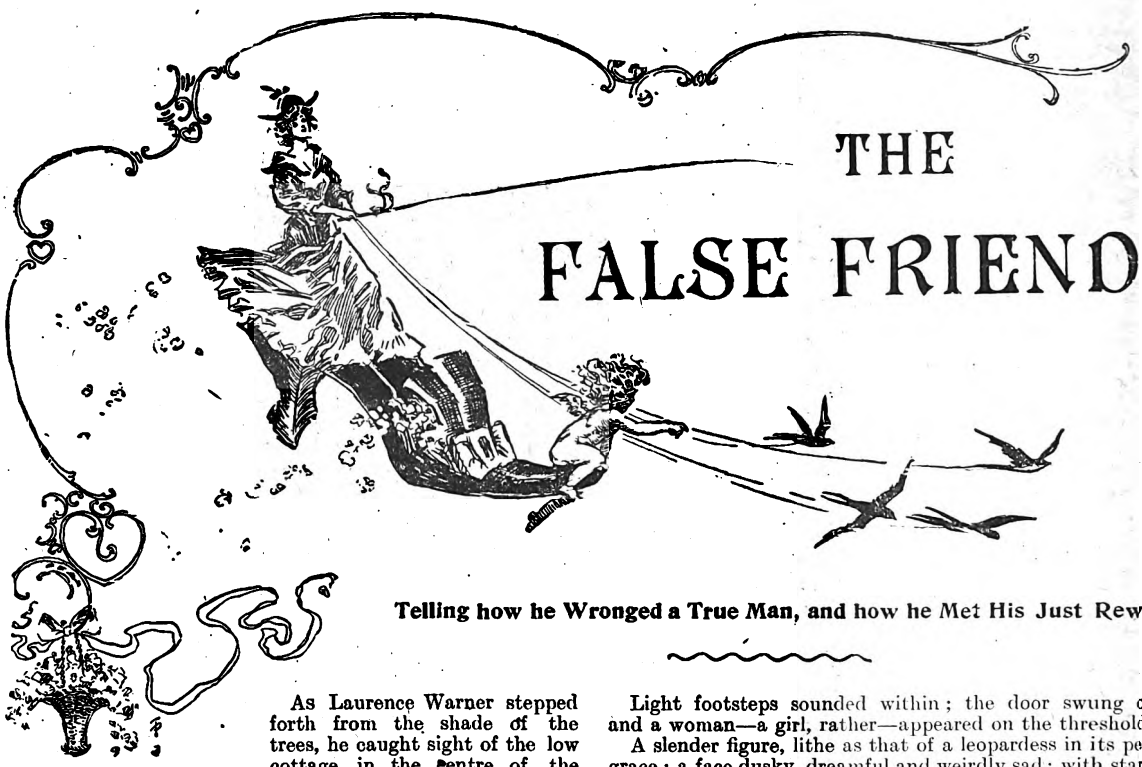
"Yes, it's hard luck when you forget your own relations. But come along, Aunt Jane. It's time you were having a good feed at home."

The policeman stepped back, and the stranger was grasping the old lady's hand to take her away with him, when I sprang forward to prevent this being done.

For whether I was the victim of malignant fancies or not, I was certain of this: The old lady who had lost her memory was she who claimed to be Miss D'Alton, and the man who posed as her nephew was the "Bird of Evil Omen."

(Another instalment of this exciting series next week.)

Digitized by Google



THE FALSE FRIEND.

Telling how he Wronged a True Man, and how he Met His Just Reward.

As Laurence Warner stepped forth from the shade of the trees, he caught sight of the low cottage in the centre of the grassy glade, and suddenly stopped. An involuntary cry broke from his lips.

"Is this the place?" he murmured sadly. "Is it here that Annie Metherell, the delicately-nurtured and pretty beauty of Wilmington, now drags through the dark days of an embittered and joyless life? And yet, however unwillingly, I was one of those who wrought this evil. Why, indeed, have I ventured here? Through your long silence, why has the voice of hope ever made itself heard in my heart? It is because, perhaps, you are life itself to me. It may be, love, that once again you will listen to my pleading."

The warm flush of hope mounted to his pale, marble-like features. He threw back his handsome, fair head, and cast a rapid glance about him.

It was a wild and lovely scene, that which met his gaze. On his left moved the dark, slow waters of the river, bathed now in waves of amber light from the rising sun. Round about, rising from the wind-stirred reeds as from a floor of emerald, were numbers of oaks, draped from the crown to the lowest bough in a floating web-work of moss, that glistened in silvery greenness beneath the dew of early morning.

The glade before him was carpeted with a grass that, growing in thick tufts, with outward falling blades, seemed at a little distance an expanse of green tulips.

In the centre of this expanse a column of blue smoke rose slantingly into the air; it curled from the chimney of the cottage referred to above.

Besides the smoke and a white curtain hanging before the window that looked towards Laurences Warner, no signs of human occupancy were visible.

These details he had taken in with that single sweeping glance.

Hesitating a moment, his hand, resting on the trunk of an oak, shook slightly, and into his dark eyes came a look of longing that was deep unto pain; then, crossing the glade with swift steps, he approached the door of the low building and rapped upon it.

Light footsteps sounded within; the door swung open and a woman—a girl, rather—appeared on the threshold.

A slender figure, lithe as that of a leopardess in its perfect grace; a face dusky, dreamful and weirdly sad; with star-like eyes; a cloud of hair, dark as the gloom of a starless tropical midnight, falling over the shoulders in thick waves.

On seeing her—this young and glorious creature—Laurence Warner, uttering a low, glad cry, involuntarily stretched forth his hands.

"Annie," he breathed, "Annie Metherell!"

She echoed his cry. Her face grew wan with a mysterious anguish. Recoiling from him, as if in fear, she reeled.

"Laurie! Oh, Heaven! Why do you come here?"

An expression of bitter disappointment darkened his face; yet the hunger in his grey eyes deepened.

He came closer to her, and would have taken her hands in his; but, with an imperious gesture, she checked him.

"Why," he repeated, "have you only such words as those for me? Oh, my love, what have I done to merit them?"

A vague, shrinking wonder looked at him out of those great magnetic orbs. Her nervous lips curled with a faint, scornful smile.

"Need you ask me, Mr. Warner? What is Annie Metherell—friendless, beggared—to you?"

"To me? My life, my love, my all!"

She drew her breath sharply.

"Hush! Have you come to deride me? Are you a demon, that you approach me after what has passed? And yet"—her voice sinking into the plaintive minor key of regret—"I once loved you."

"Once, Annie? I do not understand. You bewilder me! Tell me, dearest, what you mean."

The pleading music of that voice seemed to shake her very soul. A convulsive tremor ran through her frame.

"Laurence," she prayed, "have pity on me! I am weak—oh, so weak!—and the memories of the past still live to mock me. Leave me, I beseech you, if you would not madden one whose heart you have almost broken."

"But, Annie——"

"Go!" she interrupted brokenly. "Remember the grave in the veld, and——"

Digitized by Google

She checked herself with a low shriek. Her eyes had turned from Laurence to a third person who suddenly appeared upon the scene.

"Aye!" exclaimed a deep and menacing voice at the young man's side, "false friend, hypocrite, murderer, that you are, begone!"

With a start of surprise, a swift pallor of anger, an instinctive clenching of the hands, Laurence swung round.

An old man, clad in threadbare garments, but of an imposing and patriarchal beauty, stood before him. One arm was lifted, as he wildly waved him back from his child. Hair and beard of hoary whiteness streamed over his shoulders and breast. His deep-set eyes blazed with the half-mournful wrath of some great prophet of old.

Seeing him, the manner of Laurence instantly changed. His face softened, and a bewildered look crept into his eyes.

"Mr. Metherell!" he said.

The blaze in those grand eyes deepened.

"I!" he returned haughtily. "Now tell me why you have followed us here?"

A moment of silence.

Laurence looked at him with the expression of one who doubted the evidence of his own senses.

"I came," he said, at last, "to claim my promised bride."

A quick, desolate cry followed his words. The beautiful eyes of Annie Metherell were riveted upon him in a horror-stricken, yet fascinated, gaze.

"Too late!" she exclaimed, in a faint and moaning voice. "Heaven, be pitiful! Oh, my brother—my brother!"

Laurence listened as one in a stupor. His mind was in a whirl.

The old man stepped closer to his child, and spoke in a tone of ineffable tenderness:

"Go, dear one; this is no place for you. Leave me to deal with him."

She hesitated, shuddered, and, still gazing at Laurence, held forth her delicate hands beseechingly.

"Have mercy on us!" she whispered. "Remember, he is old, and he has been deeply wronged. Do not—please do not take from me the only creature that is left to love me!"

He did not answer her. A deathly paleness had drifted into his cheek, and his face sank upon his breast.

The old man spoke again.

"Go, Annie, and fear nothing. I will be with you soon."

She bowed her graceful head, with a last look at Laurence, and disappeared into the cottage, closing the door after her. Her lover had made no attempt to detain her. He now turned to Mr. Metherell.

"Perhaps you will condescend to explain," he said wearily. "You call me an assassin — she evidently deems me one. I do not understand. I have never injured either of you intentionally. Will you kindly enlighten me?"

The old man broke into a wild and hollow laugh.

"Is this your wish?" he asked.

His companion bent his head.

"Then it shall be gratified, Laurence Warner. When you accompanied Walter to his home in Wilmington, we welcomed you as a friend. That was six years ago. You remained with us until you won Annie's love, and, believing you a man of honour, I sanctioned your suit. But you betrayed the trust we reposed in you. The war breaking out, you went where duty called you. Before you left us, however, you begged Annie to communicate with you whenever it was possible. You, it was understood, would do the same. Did you keep your promise? She kept hers. She wrote you four letters."

Laurence could not repress a slight start.

"I never received any of them," he said simply.

The old man lifted one hand with a gesture of scorn and disbelief.

"Did you not? Nor did she receive any of yours!"

"Ah!" The white teeth closed on the gleaming, flossy moustache. "And yet," he murmured sadly, "her faith could not have been so small. There is more to tell, Mr. Metherell."

"More!" A groan broke from the old man's lips. "Wretch!" he cried. "If you knew—— But, stay! You shall be satisfied. See!"

He took from his pocket a folded and torn slip of paper, and held it towards Laurence in one shaking hand.

"Look," he continued hoarsely. "Those words were written by your victim as he was dying."

Laurence took the paper, and glanced rapidly over the

"Begone, false friend and murderer!" the old man cried.

Digitized by Google

few words scrawled upon it. The writing had been done with a blunt instrument dipped in some darkened liquid. As he gazed upon it, he grew faint, and his heart seemed to pause in its beating. He read it once again.

"Father, I am dying. Laurence Warner is my murderer, for I——" (a blur), "in bottle. I write this with my blood.

"WALTER METHERELL."

The paper dropped from the young man's hand. His face was ghastly. A hunted, desperate look crept into his eyes.

"And you believe it?" he whispered, voicelessly. "In Heaven's name, tell me who gave you this?"

"It was found," returned the old man, in faltering tones, "clenched in Walter's stiffened hand. He who gave it to me buried my boy on the veld, the night that Jackson was slain."

"He who gave it to you!" repeated Laurence. "Old man, it was I who buried your son."

"You?" with a glance of loathing.

"Yes, I!" Laurence passionately replied. "I found him, as you say, on the veld. He had been shot down by some unknown person in the darkness. He breathed his last in my arms."

"Do you expect me to credit this?"

"Old man, you must! Merciful Heaven!" he cried, in a voice of horror. "How can I endure such a charge—I who am innocent?"

The words were scarcely spoken when the door near which he was still standing was thrown open, and Annie again appeared on the threshold.

Her glorious face was bathed in colour; her bosom heaved with excitement; her great glowing eyes gleamed like moonlit jewels.

"Father," she exclaimed, clasping her hands, while her sweet voice shook with emotion, "I was afraid, and, listening, I have heard all. I have heard and I believe. He could not—no, no, he could not have been guilty of this crime. Laurence," she continued, turning to him almost humbly, "you told me just before you left us, that you had a friend who would see that your letters reached me. You did not mention his name, and I forgot to ask you then. Who was that friend?"

A dim but sweet hope, awakened by her gentle words, stirred through his heart. He looked at her, however, with wondering eyes.

"He is known to you, Annie. His name is Eric Devine."

"I thought that it might be so," she whispered, with a start.

"Ah!" muttered her father wonderingly. "It was he who clung to us so faithfully through all our misfortunes. He is still our friend, poor Eric!—our only one, perhaps!"

"And," added Annie, in a hushed voice, "it was he who brought us the tidings of Walter's death."

Her eyes, as she spoke, met those of Laurence, and something in their expression caused the blood to leap more warmly through his veins, while his face kindled into an eager, waiting beauty.

But when she turned from him a moment later to her father, that expression changed. A quick pallor shot into her cheeks and her eloquent features, one moment a-quiver with joy, the next grew rigid with horror.

"Do you understand?" she asked.

The old man shook his hoary head.

"No, child. Tell me what you mean."

"You shall soon know, father. Heaven is merciful. It has heard my prayer. Laurence"—her tones lingered caressingly on that name—"when you buried Walter you found on his person a photograph—mine—and a package of letters from his betrothed, did you not?"

The articles in question were instantly laid in her hands. Involuntarily the three drew closer together. The flush of hope on the young man's face deepened.

With an impulsive movement, unnoticed by her father, Annie stretched forth her little hand and laid it on her lover's arm.

"Do you remember," she asked, "my brother's last words?"

"Only the substance," he replied, trembling like a woman beneath her touch. "He bade me tell the dear ones at home that he died a Christian, and that his last thoughts were of you and of her whom he so devotedly loved."

Tears rushed to the listeners' eyes.

She turned to her father, her voice faltering piteously:

"Look at him," she said. "Could Walter's murderer speak of him thus?"

The old man was staggered. He moved backward a step, an expression of bewilderment settling on his face.

Then the paper that Laurence had dropped caught his eye. He lifted his head and was about to speak.

Bang!

It was the sharp report of a gun among the trees.

It was instantly followed by a loud cry of pain. Then a white puff of smoke, curling upwards, slowly dissipated among the leaves.

The three, turning at first with one impulse in the direction of the sound, then looked at each other in mute inquiry.

Annie was the first to speak. Her face had grown white to the lips. The truth had suddenly flashed upon her mind.

"It is Eric Devine," she gasped. "He has shot himself, Laurie. It is the work of Nemesis. But come, let us go to him."

With the swift grace of a Diana, she crossed the glade and disappeared among the trees.

Laurence and her father followed more slowly. A low cry of pity came back to them through the sylvan silence. They had gained the edge of the glade.

They now pushed aside the rustling reeds, and looked upon a startling and mournful scene. A tall and nobly-proportioned man, in a dark shooting suit, lay prone upon the earth, in the shade of a huge oak, before them.

His gun rested near him, entangled among the reeds. His hat had fallen back from his brow, and a gleam of sunlight, stealing through the leaves and mosses above, played over his convulsed lips the brilliant mockery of a smile.

His head was supported by Annie, who knelt like an angel of mercy by his side. She had torn her handkerchief into strips, with which she vainly sought to staunch the blood that oozed from a round, dark hole in his breast.

Her face, bending above him, was now filled with the light of tenderest pity. She felt that this poor creature was dying.

He turned his head at the approach of Laurence and Mr. Metherell, and the glazing eyes, that had a moment before looked at Annie with such agonised intreaty, were fastened upon them.

"Laurence Warner!" he muttered, in a hollow voice. A scowl contracted his handsome brows. "Do you know," he said, "that the bullet which laid me here was meant for you?"

Mr. Metherell started, and Annie, with a faint cry, drew back.

But Laurence, bending over him, felt in that moment only a compassion for the dying one, and smiled.

"I believed it," he said.

"I was a false friend to you, Warner."

"Yes, I know it now."

"Still, I did not wish to be your foe, if my passion for Annie had not almost maddened me. You knew how I loved you?" turning to her.

"Yes," she answered, in a low voice. "But I kept the promise I gave you when I told you we could still be friends. I said nothing—not even to him."

A dim smile touched his lips.

"It is well. And now, as I have but a little while to live, I want to make a confession. Old man," he continued, addressing Mr. Metherell, "it was not Laurence Warner who killed your son."

"Villain!" he exclaimed involuntarily; while Annie, starting to her feet, uttered a cry of joy.

The fading eyes looked up at him imploringly.

"Do not curse me now—I cannot bear it. Listen to me. It was all a mistake. I meant to kill Warner. He was

Digitized by Google

A GRAND NEW COMPETITION

£25 IN CASH PRIZES!

CASH DOWN.	CASH DOWN.	CASH DOWN.
1st Prize.	2nd Prize.	3rd Prize.
£10.	£5.	£2.

And Eight Cash Prizes of £1 Each.

A NOVEL CONTEST FOR OLD AND YOUNG.

Full particulars will be announced next week of a splendid new competition for readers of "Short Stories."

The competition will be of an absolutely unique description, and will appeal to everyone, whether they are old or young, poor or wealthy.

NEXT WEEK. NEXT WEEK. NEXT WEEK.

Remember that the competition starts next week, that is, in the issue of "Short Stories" dated March 12th. Do your friends a good turn by drawing their attention to that number, and place your order with your newsagent for your copy without delay in order to avoid disappointment.

£25 IN CASH PRIZES.

near our lines that night, and I thought he was seeking Walter. I followed him into a thicket, and lost sight of him. Soon after I heard someone approaching, and, thinking it was he, I fired. A cry—it was Walter's voice that uttered it—undeceived me. At the same time the moon came out from behind a cloud and shone on his face. Horrified, I turned and fled. When I ventured near the spot next day, I saw only a newly-made grave."

His voice had sunk almost to a whisper. Shudderingly, the three drew closer to catch his words. The old man broke the momentary pause.

"But the paper," he said, "with the words written on it in blood?"

"My work—mine," whispered the dying man. "The letters, too—I destroyed them—his, intrusted to me, and hers, obtained by treachery. I managed to prevent a meeting between him and Walter, until—until—— Laurence, where are you?"

"Here—here beside you, Eric."

"It grows dark—the night is closing in. I—I would pray; but it is useless. What was I saying? When I saw you just now, I knew that all my scheming had been in vain. Mad with jealousy, I was about to fire, when the gun became entangled among—Annie, Annie! Oh, pity me. It is cold; and the starless night—oh, God!"

At that desolate cry, she clasped her hands, and looked at Laurence. He, the wronged one, was blind with tears.

"Speak to him, child," he whispered. She sank upon her knees again, with a glance that thrilled him to the soul.

"I am here, Eric. Can you not see me? Do you not feel the touch of my hands?"

His mind wandered. A cry of horror broke from his lips.

"Do you not know the spot? There is the grave. See how wanly the moonbeams tremble over it. Hear the ghostly whisper of the midnight wind. Does it whisper to him? Will it rouse him from his dreamless slumber? Last night his spirit crept into my tent, and stood beside me. I felt its icy presence—I saw the dread, accusing eyes. I—oh, Heaven, save——"

The voice died away. His head sank back. The unseeing eyes glared piteously upward, through the waving moss and softly rustling leaves.

A moment later, as Annie rose, Laurence felt a hand touch his. The old man was regarding him with humble, supplicating eyes.

"Forgive me," he said, in a stifled voice. "You have been deeply wronged; but you are generous. May Heaven reward you, Laurence."

A smile like a wave of light broke over the sweet, grave beauty of his lips.

"Heaven has blessed me," he said, "in giving me back my own."

He turned as he spoke to Annie. Her face, now bathed in tears, quivered with wordless tenderness. She drew nearer to him, and folding her hands upon his breast, laid her cheek upon them.

"Laurie," she whispered, "forgive me, and take me back to your heart."

And she felt his silent answer on her lips.

W. F. Jackson.

Digitized by Google

The Problem Solved.

Telling of a Love that was Tardy to be Discovered.

"Do you know, Harrington, I can never tell why you don't marry?"

I laughed, but made no reply. I could not tell why myself. I had frequently had this remark made to me, and it had always set me thinking, but I never arrived at a satisfactory solution of the problem.

Everything undoubtedly pointed to me as a marrying man, yet here I was, at nearly forty years of age, still a bachelor, and, so far as I could judge, likely to remain one. It was not want of money that influenced me. I had a comfortable income, being the manager of an opulent City house, where my duties, if somewhat onerous, seldom detained me more than seven hours away from home.

I was a very quiet individual, and when I returned from the City about six o'clock daily, my chief pleasure, after tea, was to make myself as comfortable as possible in an easy-chair, with a pipe and a book.

Perhaps, in the evening, I got Maud to sing and play a little, for I was fond of music, but that was my only diversion.

I have said that I searched vainly for the causes of my continued celibacy, but nevertheless there was one thing which weighed with me to some extent. That was Maud. I wanted to see her married; then, I thought, I should soon follow her example.

Whom I should marry I had never troubled about. Some widow probably—a woman about my own age, who would attend to my comfort, and be a companion for me. I never thought of marrying for love. I was too old.

Maud was twenty-two and not engaged yet, but I had hopes that she soon would be.

This very Henry Brown, who had questioned me on the subject of matrimony, was, I felt sure, in love with my ward. I still call her my ward because, although she is of age, I still consider myself her guardian. As such I had asked many eligible young men to gather around me at my Hampstead villa, hoping that in this way I might find a husband for my girl. But somehow she had never taken to any of them, and I was doubtful even about Brown, for although he was obviously attracted by her, I had never detected anything but friendliness in her treatment of him.

She had been quite a daughter to me. Her father, a dear cousin and schoolfellow of mine, was an officer. He had married when little more than a boy, but, dying suddenly five years later, had left his wife and her one child almost penniless on the world. I had helped them as well as I could, for I was not then as well off as now, but Mrs. Thorpe only survived her husband a year or so.

Then Maud was an orphan, and I had adopted her. I had sent her to a boarding-school, where her education had been well seen to, and when she was seventeen, and her schooling over, I had quitted the rooms I had hitherto occupied in Islington, and bought the villa I still inhabit. Then I had engaged a kind of superior housekeeper in a clergyman's widow, and started housekeeping at thirty-eight.

Brown and I were alone in the dining-room. He was a nice young fellow, a clerk in our office, and I had asked him to my house pretty frequently lately. He had always seemed delighted to accept my invitations, hence my belief that he was in love with Maud. I encouraged him, for I have stated that my great wish was to see the dear child married.

After his remark as to my marrying, we puffed away at our cigars in silence for a few minutes, I watching the clouds of smoke as they ascended, and thinking deeply. Smoking always makes me contemplative. But Brown interrupted my chain of thought.

"Well, I wish I was married," he said.

"A very laudable desire," I replied; "and you can easily attain your object, I should think. Your salary is quite enough to start upon in a quiet way."

"Oh, I know that," he said; "but"—puff-puff—"the fact is, I'm uncertain as to whether she'll have me."

"Whether she'll have you? Are you in love, then?"

"Yes," he said; "there's no use disguising it any longer, Harrington. I love your Maud. May I ask her to become my wife?"

"Oh, by all means, and all success attend you," I replied gaily.

"Thank you," he said. "I will—this very evening too. I'm tired of this suspense."

Before we could say any more, Maud herself entered the room. She invited us to stop smoking and go into the drawing-room, where we were to have some music.

As I looked at her pretty figure and her masses of auburn hair, which fell gracefully over her forehead, I couldn't wonder at anyone being enraptured with her.

Then we put down our cigars, and followed her into the adjoining room. Mrs. Graham, my housekeeper, was out this evening, so when I had listened to one song, I left the two young people to themselves, and I went back into the dining-room.

"While he is proposing I will have a cigar," I thought; "perhaps I will be able to finish it before I have to congratulate them."

Would she accept him? I did not know. Why not? It would be the best thing she could do. But somehow at this critical moment I began to think how it would affect me. Things did not altogether appear in the rosy hue I had imagined they would if Maud were settled in life.

How lonely I should be! Yes; but I should soon be marrying too. But that, after all, was problematical; I might not get anyone to marry me.

The widow I had pictured as a suitable mate might not be forthcoming. Maud's leaving would cause a blank in my life; there was no use in trying to disguise the fact. I should have no one to care for then—no one to plan for. Yet how purely selfish it was of me to think thus; let me rather look at the matter as it would affect Maud. She had everything to gain by marriage. If she accepted Brown, I was confident that she would find him a good husband. He might not be rich; but he was a clever young fellow and sure to rise.

Digitized by Google

How it was I don't quite know, but a remarkable idea came into my head. Why had I never asked Maud to marry me? I tried to dismiss the thought as preposterous. Why, I was like a father to the girl, and she, doubtless, looked upon me in that light. Forty-three and twenty-two—it was absurd! I wished that Brown and I could have changed places; then I smiled at such a wish. I placed my hand involuntarily to my head; there was no denying it, I was getting bald. "No, James Harrington," I said bitterly; "the widow is the match for you. Oh, confound the widows!" I muttered.

The door opened. Brown, no doubt, coming to tell of his acceptance. I must try to congratulate him; but he did not come with the blithe step of a successful lover.

"She has refused me!" he said briefly.

It should not have been so, but a load seemed lifted from my mind. I said:

"I'm sorry for you."

He did not reply. After a few moments he said:

"I think, if you'll excuse me, I'll not stay any longer. A walk will do me good. Besides, I cannot bear to meet her at supper; I would look such a fool."

"He would look such a fool." Wounded vanity, I thought, rather than wounded love. I hoped so.

Somehow, I said good-bye to him with a light heart, and, closing the house-door behind him, I went into the drawing-room.

Maud was sitting at the pianoforte, playing softly. How pretty she looked! I wondered that I had never noticed her beauty so much before to-night. I went towards her.

"Maud," I said, "you have refused that poor young man."

"Yes," she said simply.

'Then you do not love him?"

"Of course not."

"Maud, I should like to see you married."

The soft music was continued for a short while, then she stopped suddenly, and said:

"I shall never marry!"

"Nonsense! Why not?'

"I don't believe I shall ever love anybody excepting, of course, my dear guardian, whom I don't want ever to leave."

"Then you do love your guardian, Maud?"

"As well as I should my dear father, had he lived."

Foolish heart! I did not like the comparison.

"Maud!" I said impulsively, "do you think you could ever alter your resolve as to not marrying, if I asked you?"

She looked up, but did not appear to understand me.

"Am I too old for you to marry me, Maud?"

She rose from the piano, and put her arms round my neck.

"No," she said; "I don't care how old you are, for I love you. Because I loved you I resolved never to marry; because you love me I will break my resolve."

We were married a month later.

When Brown and his wife come to see us occasionally he and I often laugh over that night. He was young and soon recovered from his disappointment, and his Lucy makes him very happy, he says.

It was on one of these visits, when the ladies were in the drawing-room, and he and I were in the garden smoking, that he said to me:

"I know now, Harrington, why you did not marry sooner."

"Why?"

"Because you were in love and didn't know it."

I did not reply, but I acknowledged to myself that he had discovered the true solution of my matrimonial problem.

Frank Gardivan.

Our New Competition.

You will learn all about our new competition in next week's issue. I feel satisfied that the great majority of readers will enter it, and that all who do so will derive great enjoyment therefrom. Everyone will have an excellent opportunity of winning one of our cash prizes. Do not forget that full particulars will be published in the next number of Short Stories. Another announcement, which tells more about the competition, appears on page 301.

Result of the Juggled Letters Competition.

Those competitors who at the close of the competition tied for the prizes were given other lists to solve, and eventually the following five competitors, who succeeded in solving the most lists, agreed to divide the three cash prizes; so a cheque for £8 has been sent to each:

Andrew Dawson, 5 Bayham Street, Camden Town, N.W.; Miss P. Nicholls, 54 Prince Street, Deptford, S.E.; F. W. Southey, 46 Woodbine Road, Gosforth, Newcastle-on-Tyne; A. Wood, Outlane, Huddersfield; Miss E. Wood, Outlane, Huddersfield.

The Billiard Tables have been awarded to:

G. W. Parker, 36 Fourth Avenue, Manor Park, E.; W. A. Rutherford, 16 Roman Road, Ilford, Essex.

As the Gramophones could not be divided, and more competitors were in the running for them than there were Gramophones offered, we have sent to each of these competitors a cheque for £1.

Winner of the Eighth Love Problem.

I have very much pleasure in announcing that James Henry Sheppick, "The Elders," Elder Road, Bramley, Leeds, is the winner of the guinea I offered in connection with the Eighth Unsolved Love Problem. Another one of this interesting series will appear shortly.

A Hansom Cab and a Horse for a Prize.

I should like to draw the attention of my readers to the fact that the Editor of The Big Budget is offering a hansom cab and a horse as a prize in a competition that is just starting in his paper.

Should the winner prove to be a person to whom a hansom cab would not be acceptable, a cash prize would be given instead.

A New Serial Coming.

In a few weeks' time there will be starting in this paper a grand new serial by a most popular author. The story will be one of enthralling interest. I will tell you more about this next week.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

THE TWO PAPERS.

How Love Lived Through Adversity.

"Gerald Mannerley is coming back."

"What? Never!" ejaculated Tom Frankfort as he helped himself liberally to bacon and eggs.

"Yes, he is," went on the speaker, "Charlie Forsyth told me so himself last night."

"Well, he has got pluck!" returned Tom, "I should have given Odsey a wide berth if I had left it under such a cloud as he did."

"Rubbish!" said Ted. "If the chap didn't take the money, why not stick to his guns and live it down."

"Easier said than done, Ted. I fancy he'll meet with a lot of 'cold shoulders,' for, after all, one doesn't want to go hob-nobbing round with a suspected thief."

"Gently, gently, Tom," said Dr. Frankfort, a mild, benevolent-looking old gentleman, glancing reprovingly over his paper at the two frank, boyish faces. "Don't be too hard on him; after all, nobody knows much about the affair."

"No, and I think you ought to be ashamed of yourself talking about Gerald in that way, Tom; why, he couldn't possibly do a thing like that. Gerald Mannerley a common thief—oh, it won't stand talking about!"

"Nobody was talking to you, Miss Spitfire," said Tom, glancing across at his sister as he spoke. "Why, what a face you've got, you look like a boiled beetroot, and besides, what business is it of yours, I'd like to know?".

"None whatever," flashed back the girl, "but I'd be man enough not to trample on anybody who was down, if I were you!" As she spoke she rose hastily from the breakfast-table, and left the room, for the tears were perilously near Cicely's eyes, and she knew the consequences of a breakdown in the presence of her brothers. The three were absolutely devoted to each other, but in the manner common to some brothers and sisters, had a way of sparring between themselves. Let anyone else say a word against Cicely, however, and the boys would soon "have it out" with them, at whatever cost.

"Tom, you shouldn't speak in that way to Cicely," said the old man gently. "I am afraid you are very rough with her." This with a sigh to the memory of the gentle wife, whose influence he felt was sadly missed by his children.

"I didn't mean to hurt her feelings," said Tom, shuffling uneasily on his chair. "I'm sorry, dad."

When breakfast was over, Tom made his way to the large, old-fashioned garden, where he was pretty sure of coming across his sister. There she was, right enough, and Tom began his blundering attempt at an apology.

"I say, Cicely, I didn't mean to be unkind about Gerald, but you know——"

"Never mind," interrupted the girl, ready as ever to accept the olive branch. "But I say, Tom"—looking at him with intreating eyes—"be kind to Gerald if he does come home, won't you?"

"I'll let him make a door-mat of me if he likes," said the boy impulsively, "but, Cicely, don't you really think he did take that money?"

"I'm quite sure that he didn't," said the girl earnestly, "and, Tom, think what it must mean to him to be looked down upon and shunned by everybody when he is innocent, and I am sure that he is—Oh, I know it, I know it!" said the girl passionately, the tears gathering in her lovely eyes as she spoke.

"Never mind, old girl," said Tom, putting his arms round her, and kissing her in awkward, boyish fashion. "Cheer up, and as for Gerald—well, if anybody says half a word against him, I'll—I'll—knock him down, that's all," and he looked as if he meant it too.

Thus it was that Gerald Mannerley had two very warm-hearted champions down away in the old-fashioned village where his home was situated. It was quite true that he had left it under a cloud, almost seven years ago. Cicely, then a warm-hearted little tom-boy of fifteen, had been startled by the sound of gravel thrown up at the old school-room window, as she sat there curled up in a huge arm-chair, trying to spoil her pretty eyes by reading in the uncertain light of the fire. How well she remembered rushing to the window with the full expectation of seeing Gerald, for it was a common means of communication between the three merry little souls at "The Gables," and the tall, lonely, rather sad-faced youth, who was just nearing man's estate. Though several years older than any of his three friends, Gerald was very fond of looking them up, and the four together had many a long expedition round the country-side during the holidays, or whenever they could escape the vigilance of their different tutors and governess.

"Is that you, Cicely?" Gerald called up as he saw the brown head with its long, tangled curls appear at the window.

"Yes, Gerald, shall I come down?"

"I wish you would, I want to speak to you," said he, in an odd, muffled sort of voice. With careless indifference to wraps of any sort, Cicely sped down the stairs and out into the garden by the side door to where Gerald was standing in the fast gathering twilight.

"Cicely, I'm going away," he said abruptly.

"Going away, Gerald! Wherever to, and when?" asked the girl, startled by his white face and the look in his deep-set grey eyes.

"Oh, anywhere—I don't care," said he recklessly, "I've come to say good-bye, Cicely, and I want to ask you if you hear anything about—if anybody tells you that I——Oh, I can't say it, Cicely!" desperately, and then with a rush, as if the words choked him. "Will you believe that I never touched the money if they tell you about it?"

"What money, and who says you touched it?" said the girl in bewilderment.

"Some money my uncle has lost, and he thinks that I—that I——"

"The old beast—as if you could," burst in his warm-hearted little friend, incoherently.

"Thank you, Cicely, I thought you, at any rate, would believe me," his proud, sensitive face clearing a little at the girl's ready sympathy. Then, "Would you mind kissing me, Cicely, just this once—I may never see you again, you know?"

"Of course I will!" she cried, flinging her arms round his neck and kissing him—not once, but many times in hearty childish abandon.

As she did so Gerald's face flushed, but he was white to the lips as he unwound the clinging arms, and murmured—half under his breath: "Good-bye, Cicely, my little darling—Good-bye, I must not—dare not—ask you to remember me."

"Oh, but I shall!" said the girl, bursting into tears at the sight of his face. "And, Gerald, whatever they say I shall know that you are good—that you never touched the hateful money." But here she stopped, for Gerald, unable to bear any more, after holding her two hands in a grasp which made them sting, pushed her almost roughly aside, and fearing that she should think him unmanly if he betrayed the emotion he could no longer hide, rushed down the garden path and out at the gate.

Digitized by Google

He left the village the next day, and after the usual nine days' wonder as to his disappearance, and speculations as to its cause, his name was rarely mentioned by those amongst whom most of his early life had been spent. Left an orphan when he was six years old, he owed everything to his uncle—Roger Coventry—who was more than fond of this boy, who looked at him with eyes so like Ella Graham, that even after all these years they would bring back to the old man the memory of that "might have been," for, although he had married, and in a way been happy, the real love of his manhood had been given to Gerald's mother. It was something of a blow, then, when, after a week's absence from "Gate House," he returned to find the £100 he had left, as he thought, securely put away in his large old-fashioned bureau, gone, with not a trace to tell whose hands had removed it, or what had become of it. Thinking it over, he remembered Gerald's presence in the library as he had locked the money into the little secret drawer, depositing the key—carelessly as he admitted to himself, when he found out what had happened—in the corner of the left-hand top drawer underneath the loose papers there.

"Is that you, Cicely?' cried Gerald as he saw the brown head with its long tangled curls appear at the window.

It was not his habit to keep loose money in the house in this way, but his daughter Constance was leaving England the following week with some old friends—the Westertons—who were going out to India, and had invited her to accompany them, and he thought it might prove useful for some of her numerous preparations. Always eager for pleasure and society, Constance had worried her father into allowing her to accept this invitation much against his will. She was never happy in her luxurious though quiet home, and spent her time chiefly in a ceaseless round of gay visiting and pleasure.

On her return from London, Mr. Coventry had tried to persuade her to give up the idea of the Indian trip, and settle down quietly at home for a while. However, he found her heart so set upon going, that in the end he gave way in his usual easy fashion, although, as I have said, most unwillingly. Constance being so often away from home, uncle and nephew were thrown very much together, and were firm friends in spite of the great difference in age, and the really kind-hearted old man's somewhat irascible temper. It was with no real feeling that anything would be seriously wrong, that Mr. Coventry sent for Gerald, to question him as to the money.

"Gerald, my boy, you remember my putting that money in my little secret drawer about ten days before I took Constance down to meet Mr. and Mrs. Westerton?"

"Yes, uncle, I do," answered Gerald in an embarrassed way, flushing scarlet as he did so.

"Well, I can't find a trace of it anywhere, and——"

"Don't ask me anything about it, Uncle Roger, please, I'm awfully sorry I can't explain," broke in Gerald, looking the picture of miserable confusion and conscious guilt.

"You can't explain, sir? Why, what is this—explain what?" Gerald made no answer, simply standing with compressed lips as his face changed from red to white, and back again to red, while his eyes had a dangerous gleam in them which showed how great was his effort at self-control.

"You know something of this money, sir," with a keen glance at Gerald's confused face, "and you will either explain to me or leave this house," thundered the old gentleman in a fit of passion, which was made infinitely worse by the thought that it was Ella's son, whom he had cherished and cared for ever since her death, who was, thus defying him so outrageously, nay, who had degenerated into a common thief. "Why couldn't the boy have asked him for the money openly? There must be more behind all this!" The thought stung the old man almost to madness, and with his eyes blazing with wrath, he pointed to the door, saying:

Digitized by Google

"Once more, you either explain or go; I will harbour neither traitor nor thief."

"Uncle," gasped Gerald, almost stunned by the cruel insult. "Is that what you think of me?"

The old man made no answer, simply stood there, pointing mercilessly towards the door, and the next day Gerald shook the dust of Odsey from his feet.

* * * * *

Barely turned twenty when all this occurred, he had a desperate struggle for the first few years of his new life. He would look back in after years and wonder how he had weathered the storm, but his was one of the characters which ripen best under adversity, and he put forth all his strength of mind and body to get the better of cruel circumstances. He drifted from one thing to another at first, until—always fluent with his pen—he was fortunate enough to attract attention by one of his journalistic articles. More work was offered him, and then, as his capabilities became recognised, a small, but permanent position was given him by the well-known firm who had helped him in the first place. Things were easy after that, but it was not until he was twenty-seven that the mantle of "fame" descended upon him. Already well-known as a clever journalist, he published his first book, and its success was instantaneous. "The Enigma of Fate" was commented upon and read far and wide, for the man had succeeded in putting something of his own strong, virile nature into it. The book found its way to brown-haired Cicely and her brothers, and also to the lonely old man at "Gate House." As he pored over the pages which could only have been penned by a noble, true nature, Roger Coventry's heart yearned for the sight of Gerald's face once more, and the longing to clasp his hand and ask forgiveness for his harshness, became so great that he procured Gerald's address and wrote the letter, which eventually brought him back again to the old home.

"Dear Gerald,—Will you forgive an old man's hasty temper, and come and see me? I have never solved the mystery of the £100, but of this I feel sure—a man who writes as you do has no such sordid blot on his mind. I ought to have known you better, my boy, but—ah, well—'let bygones be bygones.' I suppose you have heard that the boat in which Constance sailed for India went down with all hands on board, so I can sign myself in all truth, your lonely, as well as repentant,

"Uncle Roger."

Gerald's reply to this was a telegram:

"Shall be with you next week."

There was a lump in the old man's throat when they met which grew larger and more uncontrollable than ever, when Gerald, his deep eyes fixed on his uncle's face, said:

"I know what became of that money, Uncle Roger. Can you trust me?"

"With all my heart, my boy," said the old man. "Let us say no more about it."

After this a very happy month ensued, and Gerald was not long in finding out that his warm-hearted little friend had kept her promise of "remembering him." Through all these years the memory of those childish words had been with him, and always, the clasp of soft arms would seem to be about his neck, in moments of solitude and remembrance. To Cicely also he had said:

"Can you trust me?" But her answer had been even more satisfactory than Uncle Roger's.

"With my life, for now and always, Gerald."

Gerald was satisfied, for he had always known that Cicely never doubted him, but as he gazed into those dear eyes, a feeling of deep thankfulness rose within him, that he was sure always of one woman's absolute trust and faith. They were in the garden, where Gerald had said "Good-bye" that night, when with such a sore heart he had sought Cicely's sympathy.

"Let us go and tell Uncle Roger, Cicely."

Cicely's reply was a brilliant blush, then she said laughingly: "How anxious you are to let people know, Gerald."

"Well," answered Gerald, "the dear old fellow will be so delighted to know that you are to reign at 'Gate House.' He told me this morning that I must never leave it again—that he was tired of being 'Master.'"

So they went happily together, and nothing could have exceeded the old man's gratification as he kissed Cicely's sweet face, and said that he must welcome her very soon to "Gate House."

"I am getting a very old man now, my dear," he said, patting her soft cheek, "and I want to see my boy perfectly happy."

With that he went for his usual nap, leaving the lovers together in the cosy, old-fashioned library. It must have been fully an hour after this, that Cicely declared: "They had talked enough nonsense for one afternoon," but, oh, what sweet nonsense it was. She loved to hear it, but, woman-like, would protest, and draw herself away, knowing that she would be quickly taken back to the shelter of those strong, loving arms.

"Isn't that the bureau where the money was, Gerald?" she half-whispered, as she nestled there.

"Yes, darling, Uncle Roger says he has never put anything of any importance in it since; he dislikes the thing so. Force of association, I suppose."

"Oh, then, I may look at it!" said the girl, rising. She pulled out the various drawers, shutting and opening them as if they fascinated her. Gerald rose, and, pushing the slide back, showed her the secret drawer where the ill-fated money had been put. It was quite empty, but Cicely pushed it backward and forward with a thoughtful look in her eyes, as if she would fain have read its secret. Suddenly the drawer jerked.

"Why, it won't open, Gerald," and then, "There is a paper behind, can't you hear the sound?" With another little jerk, the drawer was dislodged, and with it a folded paper, which had evidently been caught in the framework somehow. On the outside was written in characters which were beginning to fade: "Dear father, forgive me, but I have taken the money which you told me was here, to pay some bills I owe in London before going to India. I——"

Cicely read this much, and then stopped with a frightened look on her face.

"Gerald, what does it mean?"

"It means, my darling, that this explains the mystery of the £100. I saw Constance take the money, but I didn't know she had left this note for Uncle Roger. I felt that I couldn't say anything about it to him, much as I blamed the girl—but—his own daughter, you know, Cicely."

"We will tear up this note, Cicely," he said a moment later. "You know now, and it won't make things any better to trouble Uncle Roger about it. Whatever were Constance's faults, death has wiped them all away, and——"

"Give me that note, Gerald," came a stern voice from the open balcony window—the very one from which Gerald had seen his cousin take the money—and the old man, with white, set face, came forward into the room. Cicely handed him the note which he read through without a word, and then tore it slowly up, giving voice unconsciously to the very thought which had rankled in his mind when he had blamed the man before him for this same deed.

"Why could she not have asked me for it openly?" He stood for a few moments, his hand over his eyes, and then murmured: "Poor Constance—poor girl! As you said so generously just now, Gerald, 'Death has wiped it all away.' My boy—once more—you forgive me?"

I have only one other thing to say—Cicely's wedding-present from Uncle Roger was the old bureau, and in its secret drawer, on their return from their honeymoon, they found a paper, the title deeds of the "Gate House" estate, with its yearly income of £10,000.

"So you will have no need to work, only just whenever you like," said the happy little bride, after they had read the mysterious looking epistle. "This is a nicer paper than the other, Gerald."

"Yes," he answered fondly, "and one I am glad to find if only for your sweet sake, my darling."

Biddy Lamb.

Digitized by Google

Plot and Counterplot.

The Story of a Very Close Shave.

ARTHUR FERRIS was tall, fair, handsome, and twenty-eight. He was also a possessor of a long head, inherited from the maternal side of the house. He was likewise a dutiful son.

It was the two latter circumstances that had, on more than one occasion, saved him from making a triumphant ass of himself. Just fancy! If it had not been for his long head, it is more than likely that he would have fallen desperately in love with that bewitching governess of the Hastings, with whom he had spent several weeks in the country one summer five years ago. But he had given himself time to think, and had fled between two days, much to his later satisfaction.

Then there was that dear little Miss Dixon, whom he had met at the seaside. It had been a glorious evening—that last. They were sitting on the verandah, where they might see and yet be unseen. The soft, dreamy strains of a Strauss waltz floated out from the ballroom. There was the pale, silver light of the moon, the murmuring of the waves on the beach—and all that sort of thing, which you have read about so many times that you have learnt to skip it in the novels.

Well, Elsie was going away—too, too soon. They had talked in sighs and murmurs for half an hour; Arthur's left hand clasped Elsie's dimpled right one, his right arm was about her waist; both hearts beat vigorously, as hearts will on such occasions, and Arthur had just opened his mouth to tell Elsie what she had been expecting for two weeks, when there was a step close at hand, a rustle of skirts, and the cooing voice of the maternal Ferris said:

"I beg your pardon, but will you please excuse Arthur a few moments? There are those miserable business affairs that must be attended to in time for the post."

And thus he was saved a second time, for Elsie had not a penny, and neither had he—at least, not many of them. There were several other occasions when his own long head, or his mamma's, had helped him out—for Arthur was somewhat susceptible. But it is not of these I have to tell.

His time had come. The in-every-way-desirable young person had presented herself. True, she was not so young as she had been; but, then, that was a mere trifle. She was just his own age, of as good a family as his own, and an heiress of considerable degree. She was not—well, not exactly handsome, and was rather inclined to what is politely called plumpness, but Arthur's mamma and Arthur's long head gave their approval—and Arthur did not care who she might be so long as she possessed the above qualifications, particularly the one involving a very neat fortune in her own right.

Besides, Arthur was getting a bit desperate. In fact, he had so far exceeded his own salary and the maternal allowance (which, by the way, was as large as Mrs. Ferris could afford), that nothing short of a miracle, or a matrimonial alliance such as he had been so long seeking, could save him from getting into very deep water.

And thus it came to pass that this winter found him engaged to Miss Bernice Field, much to the satisfaction of his mother, who was visiting in London, and to whom he had, like the dutiful son he was, sent the gratifying news at once.

He was disappointed, however, on one point. He had pleaded artfully for an early marriage, but Miss Field had set her foot down with much firmness, and said he must go through a long probationary period—all of which Arthur failed to understand. He had always been noted for his persuasive powers, and had flattered himself that Bernice, with her gentle, clinging, bud-like ways, would succumb at once.

Now, be it known, that Miss Bernice Field had not arrived at years of discretion for nothing. Neither had she—a not unprepossessing young person, with nearly twenty thousand in her own right—passed through the experience of ten seasons without gathering unto herself much knowledge of the ways and wiles of wicked man. She had had, as might have been expected, offers to a high number, but thus far the gentlemen concerned had failed—by reason of their unanimous desire to touch her purse—to touch, in the first place, the all-important key to it, which was hidden away in her plump bosom. And Miss Bernice Field was worldly-wise in her day and generation.

She was certainly in love with Ferris—there could be no doubt of that. It is quite as certain that she was very seriously in love with him, but, with the wisdom born of experience, she did not let him know one-half of what she felt for him.

If anyone had told Ferris that he was just now in a very shaky position, he would have scoffed. His chum, Ed. Cross, who was spending the winter at the house during Mrs. Ferris' absence, had once suggested that "there's many a slip," but Arthur merely shied a shoe at him and whistled serenely.

It was in this frame of mind that, one evening in February, he ran lightly up the steps of the Field mansion to call on her whom Cross unfeelingly referred to as his "little lady-love." It was warm, and the front door stood ajar. The footman was not in his accustomed place, so Ferris, with the air of one who knew just where he was going, stepped inside. From the open door of Papa Field's study came the sound of voices in earnest discussion, and one of them spoke his own name.

He halted, irresolute, as would anyone else under like circumstances. Papa Field was speaking.

"Of course, my dear, you are your own mistress, and I can only advise you. It seems to me, however, that you have done a very foolish thing to engage yourself to this young Ferris. True, he seems an exemplary young fellow, and he comes of an excellent family; but it is well-known that he has only a small allowance from the estate, in addition to a beggarly two-hundred-a-year salary. How do you know it is you, and not your money, that he wants? It is a brutal question, I know; but it is one you have probably asked of yourself half a dozen times concerning other young men."

Digitized by Google

Arthur, out in the hall, standing in much the same attitude a child assumes when speaking its first "piece" in school, winced, but waited for the answer. It came in serious, thoughtful tones, which indicated plainly that Miss Bernice also had considered this very matter.

"N—no, I am sure you misjudge him, papa. Of course I understand how he is situated financially, and all that. But I am sure he is honest and honourable, and that he—cares for me very much. There are a thousand ways by which I can learn much that you cannot, and——"

"Yes—yes, I understand. But suppose you should put him to the test, do you think he would come through—ah—er—unscathed, as it were? Suppose you should tell him that I had lost all your money and mine in unfortunate speculation—that we were beggars, and had not a penny we could call our own? Are you afraid to try him?"

There was a brief silence. Then:

"I don't like to tell a falsehood, papa; but it would be only a 'white lie,' and perhaps for the best. Yes, I'll try him to-morrow night."

"That's my dutiful girl. Now run along and let me work."

There was the sound of a kiss, and the perspiring young man in the hall hastened to get out of the house. He wanted time to think, but the first thing that entered his head as he reached the pavement was a fanciful picture of the dainty Miss Field, with her one hundred and sixty pounds avoirdupois, "running along," and he smiled broadly. Then he walked rapidly over to the next street to catch a cab to his club, there to hold a confab with Cross.

On the steps he hesitated a moment. "Had I better go back now?" he thought. "No; she won't have her little tale of woe ready, and might be put out if I call to-night. I might give myself away, too. Better have time to get my speech prepared." And this astute young man went in and proceeded to make himself comfortable.

The next evening, with his usual light heart and good spirits, he rang the door-bell of the Field mansion. "Yes, Miss Field was in," Peter said. Ferris went into the drawing-room and sat down, running rapidly over in his mind the various tender speeches he had prepared for the emergency. Bernice was a long time coming, he thought, for one who expected him.

Presently she entered—slowly—heavily. Her head bent low over her ample bosom, and her breath came short and fast. Ferris went forward to meet her, his arms outstretched. He was something of an actor himself, and he knew it.

"Bernice! Darling! What is the trouble with my little girl?" (Another good stroke. Miss Field liked to be called "little.")

"Oh, Arthur! I don't know how to tell you. It is too dreadful! Papa——"

"What? Has your father been——"

"Oh, no, not that, but—worse! Arthur, we are—beggars."

And Miss Field, delivering these last words with wonderful impressiveness, hung her head, and sobbed bitterly behind her lace handkerchief.

Then it was that Ferris, like the young man of action that he was, put his arm as far round his tearful fiancée as possible and with some difficulty, led her to a seat and pulled her down on his glossy shirt-front.

He was very, very sorry, as she must know. But it was nothing. Her father would recoup himself—he had many influential friends. As for her, had she not him—her Arthur? He would not, he once interrupted her to say, permit her, through a sense of false pride, to cast him off now, when she most needed him. No, never.

He had three hundred a year. It was not much, he knew, but they could live on it. And did she suppose, for one instant, that he had expected to live on his wife's money? No! A thousand times no!

"We will have a quiet little wedding, dearest, and after it is over we will go quietly to our own little cottage in the suburbs, which you and I will get ready in the meantime, and there we will be the happiest couple in the world. What! Bernice, am I to understand that you laugh at my cherished plans?"

For Bernice had leapt to her feet and was laughing heartily.

"Why, you foolish boy, I was only teasing you a bit. Don't you think I'd make a good actress? Papa and I haven't lost a——"

Here was Mr. Ferris' opportunity. She had doubted him; oh, cruel blow! If she could not trust him now, how could she have any faith in him when they were married? Perhaps, after all, it were best—

And he strode haughtily to the door.

But this was not part of Miss Field's programme, and she did what any very-much-in-love woman would do under the like circumstances, so that in a very few seconds two people were sitting on a divan, in a very lover-like attitude indeed.

* * * * *

An hour or so later, a young man, walking briskly down the street, was reflecting on the vagaries of Chance and his own good luck.

If Peter had been at the door—if he had been ten minutes later—if he had sneezed in the hall—if——

"It was an awfully close shave!" he reflected, and he stopped and shook hands with himself, much to the amazement of the policeman at the corner.

Ronald Wood.

Kitty: "Harry Dix says you are as pretty as a picture." Clara: "Nonsense! He didn't mean it." Kitty: "Oh yes, he did. But, of course, you know Harry's taste in pictures isn't anything to brag about."

"Did you tell Clarence you would cut him off without a penny, if he married that girl?" "No," answered the wise father; "the fellow would marry her in spite of that. I told the girl."

Dolly: "Fred called me an angel last night." Molly: "Yes; he told me he thought that you were rather flighty."

EVERY HOME SHOULD POSSESS
PEARSON'S HOME MANAGEMENT.

Edited by "ISOBEL" of HOME NOTES.

TO BE ISSUED IN

TWELVE FORTNIGHTLY PARTS.

PRICE SEVENPENCE NET EACH.

PARTS 1, 2 AND 3 NOW READY.

This work is the most thoroughly up-to-date and exhaustive work on Household Management ever published, and contains 12 Beautiful Coloured Illustrations, 64 Full Page Illustrations, together with a large number of Cuts in the Text.

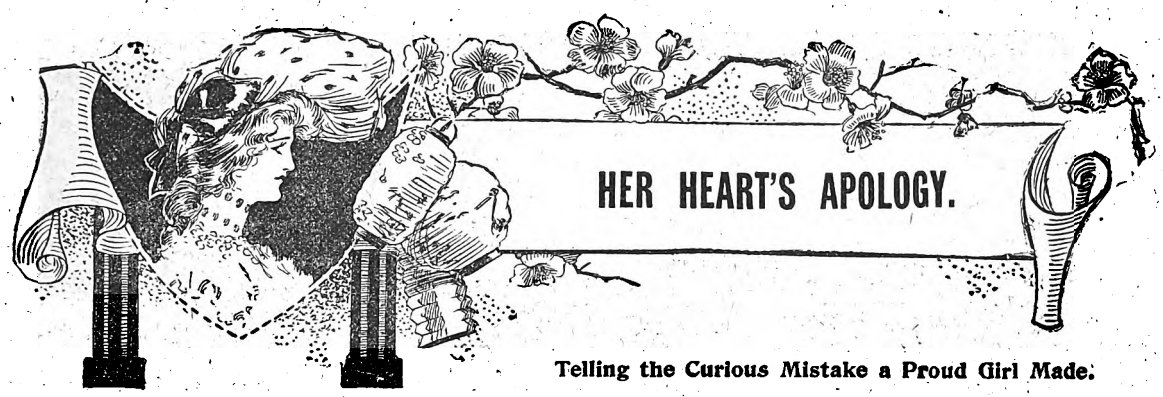
The various sections of this work are written by well-known authorities and include, amongst others, "Madge" of Truth (Mrs. Humphry), Mrs. Wilson, Chief Instructress, National School of Cookery, London; Mrs. Rattray, Diplomée, National School of Cookery, London; Lydia Leney, M.D., Clinical Assistant to the New Hospital for Women and Children.

The subjects are treated with such thoroughness as to render the work invaluable to every home.

Some of the subjects dealt with are: General Management of the Home, Plain Cookery with Recipes, High-class Cookery with Recipes, Carving, Folding of Serviettes, Spring Cleaning, Laundry Work, Dairy Work, Choice of a House, Furnishing and Decorating, Furnishing Small Homes, Doing up a House, Etiquette, Toilet, Sewing, Poultry Keeping, Gardening, Indoor Flowers, Home Doctoring, Legal Points, etc., etc.

To be had at all Railway Bookstalls and Newsagents, or of the publishers, C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google



HER HEART'S APOLOGY.

Telling the Curious Mistake a Proud Girl Made.

THERE was a blaze of lights in the Arsdales' house, and the sound of music and voices came floating through the open windows and across the still night air; so that a belated pedestrian, passing down Maple Avenue, said that they were giving another of their big dances, and he wondered how much it would cost old Arsdale a year to entertain on such an enormous scale!

The passer-by was wrong, however, for this was in reality a small and entirely impromptu affair, arranged by Miss Estherina at a moment's notice, in honour of a party of friends who had come up from town to dine with them and who were going back by the midnight train.

The friends had expected to meet Mr. Arsdale in town, but at the last moment he had sent them word that he had been unavoidably detained and would not be able to come down until the 9.30 express; and now, instead of Mr. Arsdale, a boy had come with a telegram, which said: "Shall not be home to-night; staying with Judge Cavendish. Send law-papers down by Dick to-morrow."

Miss Estherina laughed gaily. "Just like poor, dear papa," she said, "not to remember that Dick has gone to Oxford for Charles Davis' wedding!" And turning to the friends from town, she added, with amusing plaintiveness: "You really ought to let yourselves be persuaded to stay here now. How can you think of going down to-night and leaving poor mamma and me, two helpless women, alone in this wilderness of a house?"

This gave rise to many jests and bright suggestions, one of which was that Mrs. and Miss Arsdale should abandon the house and accompany their friends back to town. But Mrs. Arsdale added the climax to the amusement of the party by her complacent announcement that "she should not be afraid to stay in a haunted house with her daughter, for Estherina was as good as any man."

There was at least one man among the little company who thought that Estherina Arsdale was better than any man—or than any other young woman; and he thought, too, that the object of his adoration had never looked more lovely or more unattainable than she did that night. Her black gauze dinner-gown was so wonderfully becoming to her rich colouring and majestic style of beauty; and her dark eyes were as brilliant as the superb pendant of diamonds which lay upon her perfect neck, and rose and fell and flashed its thousand points of light with her every breath and motion.

"But, Miss Arsdale," questioned a youth from the city, "if you should be awakened to-night by a burglar in the house what would you do?"

"Shoot him!" she replied, without an instant's hesitation, and Mrs. Arsdale added:

"Estherina is a good markswoman, and, indeed, I was myself in my earlier days."

Harold Ingraham lingered a moment after the other guests were gone.

"Mrs. Arsdale," he said, "joking aside, will you not permit me to stay here to-night on guard? I assure you I should be most happy——"

He spoke to the mother, but his eyes were fixed upon the daughter's lovely face.

"Mr. Ingraham, you are very kind, but I could not think of such a thing. And you must not take our jests so seriously; my daughter and I have often been alone together, both in the country and in town, and neither of us is at all nervous."

"But, at least, cannot I be of service in closing up the house?"

His eyes sought Estherina's with a mute appeal, but she only smiled and shook her head.

"Hannah always sees to the closing up; you are really very kind, but there is nothing you can do."

There was no possible excuse for lingering now, so, with a gentle pressure of her lovely but unresponsive hand, he went away; and his heart grew heavy as he traversed the few hundred feet that lay between their homes, and thought how self-reliant Estherina's nature was and how hopeless it seemed that she would ever accept his protection or his love.

After Ingraham's departure Mrs. Arsdale went at once to her room, but Estherina remained in the drawing-room for a few minutes while Hannah was locking up the house.

She bent for a moment over a jar filled with the roses that Ingraham had brought to her that night; and as she inhaled their fragrance she thought, with a mild compassion, of his infatuation for her, and wondered a little why it had not been possible for her to return his affection. She certainly liked him—but then she liked a dozen other men as well; and she tried to find some sufficient reason to explain her indifference to them all.

"It must be because I have never found a nature as strong as my own," she thought. "It would be insufferable to be tied to a husband upon whom I must necessarily look down; and it is the fate of all strong natures to be lonely—to stand apart by themselves, as if upon an inaccessible mountain height."

Looking up from her reverie, she saw Hannah struggling with a window which refused to let itself be shut.

"Come, let me try it," she said. "There!" she added triumphantly, for while Hannah held back the lace draperies Estherina had reached forward among the palms which gracefully filled the window-niches, and, with a slight exertion of her superb strength, had closed the unruly window and turned its refractory catch. Then she drew back with a little smile of satisfaction, not unpleased to have shown physical superiority as well as the mental power of which she was so proud.

She slowly ascended the broad stairway while Hannah was extinguishing the lights, and she saw with some surprise that her mother had made all her preparations for the night while she had been dreaming in the room below.

"Come, hurry a little, Estherina," Mrs. Arsdale said. "You will sleep in my bedroom with me to-night, and I am tired, and want to get to sleep quickly."

Digitized by Google

Estherina therefore hurried rather more than was usual with her, and in a few minutes entered her mother's bedroom, as stately and handsome in her dainty, white-ruffled wrapper, over which her luxuriant dark hair fell in heavy braids, as she had been in her black gauze evening gown so short a time before.

She carried a little case of polished wood, which she placed upon the table, saying composedly:

"Dick's revolver; it won't be needed, of course, but it's just as well to have it handy."

Then she locked the doors, and put out the light.

In the middle of the night Estherina was awakened suddenly by a sound like stealthy footsteps on the roof. Like a flash it came over her that her father and brother were away, that the jewels and the plate which they were known to have were a tempting bait, and that the burglars they had been talking about for years had come at last!

Quickly and slowly she rose, and slipped on her dressing-gown, while she awakened her sleeping mother with the words:

"Hush, don't be frightened; there's a man on the roof. If I see him I shall shoot!"

Swiftly reaching the table where it lay, Estherina caught up the revolver, and then turned to the French window, which stood open upon a tiny balcony. The whole place was bathed in moonlight. She saw a shadow pass swiftly across the roof and disappear just where a ladder was upreared outside the window of her dressing-room.

"Thieves! Murderers!" cried Estherina in a ringing voice; and the report of a revolver was heard on the still night air. Again she cried out: "Help! Robbers! Don't let them get away!"

And again and again the sharp report of the revolver rang through the night.

Answering cries were heard in the distance and soon ft approaching footsteps, and while Estherina still stood like a beautiful statue in the pale moonlight, a smoking revolver clasped in her hand, and Mrs. Arsdale crouched in the window beside her, Harold Ingraham came dashing up, the first to arrive, hastily dressed and breathless, and white with alarm.

Other neighbours quickly followed; the frightened servants came flocking down, and a thorough search was made through the house and also through the grounds, lest the thieves might still be lurking in the bushes about the place.

Estherina's statement was calm and positive; and the ladder, together with heavy footprints on the soft turf below her window, were additional and most-convincing proofs of the attempted robbery, which, as far as could be ascertained in this first hasty examination, had been without success.

After a while those who had come to their assistance went away one by one. Some went to carry the story of Estherina's bravery back to those at home and to see that their own fastenings were secure, while others had gone to rouse the sleeping village officials, so that active measures might be employed to trace the would-be robbers.

Ingraham had again offered his services to Mrs. Arsdale, and this time she had accepted them gratefully, for she admitted that she felt a little nervous now, and dreaded lest the robbers should return. So during the few remaining hours of the night he remained in the house, pacing slowly to and fro in the now dimly-lighted and quiet drawing-room, so recently the scene of brilliant repartee and mirth.

Estherina, meanwhile, sat by the window overhead, and watched the moonlight grow pale and fade away in the first dim light of dawn. She was not nervous, but calm—yes, very calm, and well satisfied that she had proved herself so efficient in the late emergency—even though in the uncertain moonlight she had missed her aim.

The pale light on the horizon grew rosy in the glow of the coming sunrise. Estherina saw that her mother was sleeping peacefully now, and she went softly away to her own room to dress and then, early as it was, joined Ingraham, who was now walking up and down the gravel path before the door.

She was annoyed to find that he had removed the ladder, though from the crushed and trampled grass she easily found the place where it had stood. As she was looking at the heavy footprints she discovered something else—a clot of red that stained the ground, and then another, and still another.

She turned to Ingraham; he, too, had seen the crimson spots, and started visibly, but he checked the words that had risen to his lips as Estherina said, in a low voice:

"Then I must have hit one of them, after all. See, you can trace him by these drops of blood here—and here. He went round the house and off in that direction."

She straightened herself, and went on composedly:

"I thought last night they had not taken anything, but I was mistaken. My diamond pendant is gone."

Ingraham started, and a curious pallor overspread his face.

"Your pendant, the one you wore last night—gone?" he stammered.

"Yes," she replied. "I carelessly left it lying on the bureau in my dressing-room. I never thought of it again until this morning, and then it was gone. The ladder was just outside that window," she added significantly.

Ingraham seemed so disconcerted at this intelligence that Estherina thought scornfully that he was not much of a man, and she felt something very like a contemptuous pity for him at the moment.

"Now, I wish to recover my pendant at any cost," she went on after a short pause. "I am very fond of it, apart from its value; and I am even more anxious to get it back than to have the robbers brought to justice. If I wait until papa's return to-night it may be too late, so may I ask you to put the matter into a good detective's hands at once, and also to advertise in all the papers, offering a suitable reward and no questions asked?"

"Don't do that, I beg of you, Miss Arsdale," Ingraham said impulsively.

Estherina looked at him in some surprise.

"Why not, I pray?" she asked, with a slight elevation of her beautiful level brows.

"Because I dread for you all such publicity; and—and I think the chances for the pendant's recovery are better the more quietly we can work. I wish I could persuade you to leave it entirely to me."

But the idea of publicity was not altogether distasteful to her, and when the Weekly Gazette made its appearance with a long, sensational account of Miss Estherina Arsdale's beauty and bravery she bought up a dozen or two copies, and sent them broadcast to her friends.

But neither the slow local authorities nor the detectives could succeed in tracing the robbers; nor did the advertisements which were repeated week after week in the papers bring any tidings of Miss Arsdale's precious diamond pendant, and Estherina had now begun to despair of ever seeing it again.

Digitized by Google

But the thieves had made no further attempts to enter the house, which had now been made doubly secure by the latest burglar alarms and by the presence of a fine young mastiff which Dick had brought with him from Oxford, where the news of the burglary had reached him.

The summer festivities had gone on without interruption, and every different set of guests at the Arsdales' had been regaled with the story of Estherina's bravery, until that young woman had begun to tire of all the praise that she received.

One warm afternoon she was reclining in a low deck chair, awaiting the return of a driving party of Dick's friends. Ingraham, on his way up from the train had seen her there alone and joined her.

Conversation had now languished, and Estherina was watching him from under her half-closed eyelids, half amused at his glances of undisguised admiration in her direction.

He was still her devoted attendant—her slave—upon whom she looked down, with a curious sort of pity, from her own solitary height. She sometimes even admitted to herself that she would miss not him exactly but his unfailing attentions after the inevitable question had been asked and answered.

As they were sitting thus a strange, unusual sound caused them both to turn at the same moment, and they saw Lion, the mastiff, who had been ailing and kept tied in the stable for a day or two, approaching rapidly. His head hung down, his eyes were dull and staring, froth dropped from his lips, while from his open mouth came a dull and terrible sound that struck Estherina with a sudden horror. It was evident, on the instant, that the dog was mad.

With a cry of absolute terror, she sprang through the open window, overturning the pots of palms in her flight, but never pausing until she had reached her room and shut herself safely within. Then a horrible fascination impelled her to look from her window at what was taking place below.

But she was unprepared for the sight which met her eyes. Ingraham, upon whom she had looked down so long from her superior height, had not attempted to escape, but had caught the brute by the throat, and was holding him out at arm's length, while his fingers were closing tighter and tighter, like a vice, choking away the struggling animal's breath.

But would Ingraham's strength hold out? She had never dreamt of such strength in those slim, white hands. Would not the brute, in his agony, wrench himself free, and bury his cruel fangs in the flesh of the man she—once—thought she despised?

"Ah!" She caught at the window-frame for support, for Ingraham, suddenly hurling the weakened brute to the ground, had caught up his heavy stick, and dealt a blow so swift and true that Lion neither moved nor moaned.

Still trembling in every limb, Estherina slowly descended the broad stairway. Once or twice she had to stop a moment to recover herself, and when she at last reached the foot Ingraham was gone, and two of the workmen he had sent were carrying the dead mastiff away.

Suppose, in the desperate encounter, the dog's teeth had even grazed his hand! The anxiety and suspense she felt were maddening, and she hastened in to send the first servant she could find to follow Mr. Ingraham and bring her word whether or not he had escaped unhurt.

She went into the drawing-room to await the answer, and there the first thing that met her eyes were the palms she had overturned in her hasty flight. A feeling of shame came over her and mingled with other new and unknown emotions as she thought of her sudden and cowardly retreat and contrasted it with Ingraham's instant courage.

She had lifted one of the palms upright and had turned to raise another when she saw that the jar in which it had stood had been broken in its fall and was lying now in two pieces, like an open shell. At the same time she caught sight of something sparkling, yet half concealed by the broken fragments and the earthen pot of the prostrate palm. She bent down, uttered a low cry, and rose again with her long-lost diamond pendant in her hand.

At that moment Ingraham entered the room.

"They told me you had sent over to inquire. I am unhurt, but I should be, beyond measure, happy if I thought that you really cared," he said, in tones that showed he was in earnest.

"I do care," she answered slowly, while her colour came and went. "I care very much; I think I have been looking at things all summer through the large end of the glass, and—and it has just suddenly been turned round; but—I cannot see things plainly even now."

Her upturned glance was almost appealing; Ingraham had never seen her so lovely, so gentle, before.

"Look," she continued slowly, and the diamond pendant glittered in her outstretched hand. "I have just found this; it was in that broken jardinière. There must have been just space enough for it to lie concealed."

"Ah!" he exclaimed with evident satisfaction, "I was sure it would be found at last!"

"Found!" she repeated. "Then you think it was not stolen?"

He bit his lip, but did not reply, and she went on hurriedly: "Could it not have been stolen and afterwards placed here by the thief, either out of fear of discovery or for some other reason and knowing that it would be found and restored to its owner some day? I see you do not think so, but then, how else could it have come here?"

She paused, and seemed to be rapidly considering her own question in every light; then she started, and said in a low hurried voice:

"That was the window I closed myself that night; it was hard to shut, and I leant far in among the curtains and the plants. Could it have been—oh, do you think that the chain could have become loosened? But, Mr. Ingraham, the ladder—the footsteps I heard on the roof? You are still silent. Do you think I could have been dreaming? Don't you think there was any robber, then, at all? Oh, what a pitiful fool I have made of myself, then; and you have known it all this time!

"But the ladder and the drops of blood—you saw that, too there must have been a man prowling about the place that night! Mr. Ingraham"—in a tragic tone—"I remember that we had painters working here then; could it have been their ladder? And the blood-drops—oh, could they have been—red paint? And you have known this all the while, and—I thought you——"

"But, Estherina, no one knew except me, and no one will ever know. My darling, it was such a natural mistake; and I never intended you to be undeceived."

Her haughty pride was now all gone, and, with a new, sweet, self-abasement, she said:

"You are the most generous and the bravest, manliest man I have ever known!"

John Sharp.

Digitized by Google

A Near-sighted Relative.

She: "I understand that old man Millyuns is a distant relative of yours." He: "That's right. He's so distant that he isn't able to recognise me."

They Agreed.

Lodger (quarrelling with landlady): "I haven't lived in lodgings for six years for nothing." Landlady: "No, and you're not going to live here for nothing, either."

Needed Coaching.

Young Farmer (apologetically): "I know I'm a perfect bear in my manners, Miss Edna." Sweet Sixteen (hesitatingly): "No, you're not; you—you—have never hugged me yet!"

Not What She Expected.

Lady (of uncertain age): "I have put your seat next to mine, Mr. Rawlinson. I hope you do not mind?" Mr. Rawlinson: "Mind, my dear lady! You know how little it takes to satisfy me."

A Cruel Suggestion.

Elderly Heiress (sadly): "No, Mr. Jones, my heart is dead to the tender passion. The only man I ever loved, or could ever love, was killed at the battle of—of——" Mr. Jones (disappointed, and reaching for his hat): "Waterloo?"

A Relief to Him.

Old Gentleman: "Do you think, sir, that you are able to support my daughter without continually hovering on the verge of bankruptcy?" Suitor: "Oh, yes, sir, I am sure I can." Old Gentleman: "Well, that's more than I can do. Take her and be happy."

What He Thought.

"Are you aware," asked the sweet girl graduate, as they strolled along the sandy shore, "that the moon affects the tide?" "I know it affects romantic lovers," replied the young man in the scene; "but I was under the impression it lost its power after they were tied."

She Preferred a Comet.

"I wish I were a star," he said, smiling at his own poetic fancy. "I would rather you were a comet," she said dreamily. His heart beat tumultuously. "And why?" he asked tenderly, at the same time taking her unresisting little hand in his own, "and why?" "Oh," she said, with a brooding earnestness that fell freezing upon his soul, "because then you would come round only once in about fifteen years."

Q. E. D.

"Do I love George?" mused Clara softly. "Or is it simply a sister's affection I feel for——" Just then Bobby burst noisily into the room and interrupted her meditations. "Get out of here, you little wretch!" she shouted, and seizing him by the arm she shot him through the door. "Ah, no," she sighed, as she resumed her interrupted train of thought; "my love for George is not a sister's love. It is something sweeter, purer, higher, and holier."

She Didn't Mean to be Unkind.

Missionary (who is really braver than he looks): "Our station was so remote, that for a whole year my wife never saw a white face but my own!" Sympathetic Young Woman: "Oh, poor thing!"

A Worse Fate!

He: "Archibald saved the widow from drowning, you know, but he couldn't save himself." She: "You surely don't mean that he lost his life?" He: "Not exactly. The widow married him."

The Reason Why.

"Mamma seems to have a great fascination for you," remarked the beautiful girl. "She does fascinate me," he admitted, "by keeping me guessing as to whether you'll be like her at her age."

As They Do Things Now.

George: "May I steal a kiss?" Maud: "No, George. You're too old-fashioned for me!" George: "Pray explain." Maud: "If you were up-to-date you'd have kissed me first and asked afterwards!"

Ready to Start.

"If you were going to elope, which would you prefer—a motor car or——" "Oh, Charles, I never thought of doing such a thing; but if you insist, let us not wait—I'm an awfully good walker!"

The Soft Answer.

Wife: "Surely, dear, you don't mean to say that you're going to take a sea voyage and leave me behind?" "Yes, dear; the doctor says that I must absolutely keep away from all sweet things for a time!"

A Sheep as for a Lamb.

Host: "Come, come, Brown. Do go home, old man; it's two o'clock. What will Mrs. Brown say?" Brown: "Rest easy, my boy. Mrs. Brown was just as mad three hours ago as she's going to be all night."

Very Ambiguous.

She: "And are you really so much better since you returned from your trip abroad?" He: "Yes, indeed! I'm quite another man, I assure you." She: "Well, I'm sure all your friends will be delighted to hear it."

Proof Positive.

"There's one thing I will say," remarked Mrs. Showoff, "and that is that my daughter Arabella has a fine disposition." "Indeed." "Yes, the way she sits for hours listening to herself play on the piano shows remarkable self-control."

His Plan of Campaign.

"You seem to have no ambition," asserted the strenuous one. "But I have," said the indolent man; "I intend to be rich." "Then why don't you work—like Brown, for instance?" "Ah," said the indolent man, "I've had my eye on him for some time. Good fellow, Brown! I like to see him piling up wealth. He's working for me." "Working for you?" "Yes; he's killing himself making a fortune, and I am planning to get it by marrying his widow."

Gave the Game Away.

A dear little bride in a railway carriage was like most brides in desiring to avoid identification as a bride. The husband went out to smoke. An old lady opposite talked to her. "You are lately married, my dear, I know," she said kindly. "Oh, no—we have been married a long time," returned the younger woman briskly. "Ah, excuse me. You are so young, and you seem so happy." "Oh, we have been married eight, yes, eight years." "Well, well! And I thought at first you were on your wedding journey." "Oh, no! My husband will tell you—here he comes—that we have been married eight years. Haven't we, George?" "Yes—yes, certainly," he replied. "Do you know, Katie," he added with a wriggle, "I have some of that awful rice down my back yet."

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID SERIAL.

Dupes of Destiny

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

By Blanche Eardley, Writer of "The Bond Between."

FORTY-FIRST CHAPTER.

Two Girls.

"You are better now? Come, try to eat this," and a gentle hand raised the dark head on the pillow and put something to the lips of the girl lying there.

Marcella looked up startled, into a white face bending over her. She had been ill for some days, but did not recognise the face of the nurse bending over her. It was not that of one of the Court servants—for poor Jane was still ill—neither was it that of quite a lady, yet there was a certain refined sweetness about the expression of the mouth and in the fairness of the skin that spoke of "better days," and a superior position.

"Who are you?" she said, raising herself on her elbow and fixing her large, dark eyes on the girl. "It is only a few days since I was hurt—I think it must have been in another room, not this—and yet your face is that of a stranger. How did you come here without my knowing?"

The girl looked at her sharply. "I was telegraphed for," she said curtly. "You had fallen and hurt your head, and Sir Cyprian sent for a nurse."

A slow stain of colour dyed Marcella's face. She remembered how—in the room downstairs—her father had told her something awful—something that had robbed her of reason almost, and made her long to die! But she was alive, alive and well, and she could not stay under that roof another day. She raised herself up, and speaking hurriedly said: "Help me to dress, please. I am going away at once!"

The girl pushed her back gently. "You must stay where you are—those are the orders I have, to keep you in bed and not let you get excited. Sir Cyprian said you were to be given your medicine when you woke up."

She went to the table and poured into a glass some drops of a white-looking fluid from a bottle. Marcella put it to her lips and tasted it. Suddenly she drew back with a sharp cry of terror. "N—no, I can't drink it," she moaned. "It is nasty stuff. He is trying to poison me—to frighten me into an idiot like he did my mother!"

"Hush!" said the nurse sharply; "you mustn't talk like that, dear! Who would want to poison you? No one could wish to kill a girl who's got rich relations."

"You don't know," Marcella panted, her eyes blazing with fire. "You don't even know my name! I am Marcella Rust, and they hate me—Sir Cyprian hates me, and wishes me dead, as he wishes Philip Nullius!"

"What is Philip Nullius to you?" the other girl said quickly. "They told me you were a visitor to the Court—but, Marcella!" her voice broke off abruptly. "They say, too, that you've got hallucinations, and I mustn't listen to you."

"Ah, but you will, you will!" Marcella clutched her arm. "You are a woman like myself, and in the name of womanhood you won't stand by and see me killed. I am alone—my lover, Philip Nullius, can't know that they are trying to kill me, and my letters to my aunt, Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox, are stopped. I have no friend—none if you turn against me."

The effect of her wild beseeching words was miraculous upon the girl standing by the bed. A startled look flashed into her hollow blue eyes. "Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox, your aunt!" she gasped. "Then—then you are the cousin of—of Edward Day!"

Marcella looked at her in surprise. "No, Edward Day is no relation of mine," she said proudly. "He was adopted by my aunt out of charity, because he was a foundling, but she cast him off when he insulted me once by asking me to marry him. I hate him more than I can tell you," she continued, "but what do you know about him? What is he to you?"

The white-faced nurse's reply was a strange one. She fell on her knees by the bed, and, flinging her arms round Marcella's, sobbed: "I will be your friend, dear—your enemies are mine—yes, mine to the bitter end. Those you hate I also hate, and my hatred for Edward Day is even stronger than yours—for he is my husband!"

Marcella sat up and clutched the kneeling girl with both hands. Her face was flushed, and her fever-lit eyes burnt with excitement.

Digitized by Google

"Your husband! Your husband!" she repeated. "Edward Day your husband! Surely you cannot mean that he was married to you when he——" She stopped suddenly.

The other girl raised her head from the bed in which she had buried it, and pushed back the loose yellow hair on her brow. Marcella noticed vaguely that she had a nasty cut on her temple, which had but recently healed.

"Yes, I understand," the girl said slowly, "he was my husband when he asked you to marry him. He planned black-hearted villany for you, and in another way for me too; but, thank God, his plans failed each time!" Her blue eyes sparkled with a strange lustre as she murmured again the words, "failed each time!"

"What was your name?" Marcella said quietly. Strangely enough she felt suddenly better now that a fresh interest had been brought into her life, making her forget her own troubles, and for the nonce play the comforter. Her quick, eager brain regained the balance it had momentarily lost under the weight of the burden of sorrow that had so nearly overpowered it. There was someone weaker than herself—more sinned against perhaps, and she would bring her wits and heart into the service of the prostrate girl whom Chance had flung across her path at the eleventh hour.

"My name was Lottie Haste," the girl answered slowly, drying her eyes that had moistened. "But my husband—Edward Day—thinks I am dead," she smiled strangely, "and now I would rather remain so for a time. I have something to accomplish before revealing myself to him as his living wife."

She turned to Marcella suddenly. "I actually thought you were an enemy," she breathed. "I hated your name when that cur lied to me about you so cruelly; I longed to see you dead even, but now," she placed her thin hand on Marcella's, "I will help you in whatever you wish; do all I can to spoil the plans of those that you say hate you. Tell me," she went on, "you mentioned just now that your lover, Philip Nullius, was hated by Sir Cyprian, who wished him dead. Why is that? What harm has he done?"

"I don't know," Marcella murmured. "I only know that for some strange reason my father wishes him out of the way. He knows Philip is my lover, and yet that cannot be his only reason for being so bitter against him. The other day he came back after having been kept away for a very long time, and though he did not tell me everything, I feel that my father was mixed up in his absence in some way, and only a few days ago I managed to prevent him from meeting a man who had met him when he was away.

"This man called him the 'Vicar,' and I heard him talk about someone called the 'Spade,' thinking Philip was one of themselves, for he had a disguise on. There is some conspiracy on foot, I know, and yet I cannot gauge my father's attitude."

Her new friend stole a quick glance at her, full of wonder and pity. She had listened quietly and intently to all that Marcella had said, and her eyes had contracted at the mention of the names "Vicar" and "Spade," but she had kept silent.

"Tell me," she said abruptly, "does Sir Cyprian have any men friends here to see him. Do you know any by sight?"

Marcella puckered her fine brows thoughtfully. "No, only the horrid doctor he brought to see me once. I think his name was Winter." She shuddered at the recollection of the cruel, soft-voiced man, who had insinuated that she was not responsible for her actions. "And then," she went on; "there is a man whose name I do not know, but I have seen him several times here; he is tall and conspicuous by a black beard and very dark hair and eyebrows; sometimes he wears glasses also. He puzzles me very much but I don't fancy he has anything to do with Philip.

"Oh, Lottie!" she exclaimed passionately, "help me—you have suffered through a man I hate—perhaps I have also suffered through a man you hate! Our lives, so long separated though running on parallel lines, have touched at last at one common junction; you won't refuse to be my friend, will you, Lottie? I—I am so afraid of some things, and I may perhaps be your friend also."

Lottie's hand closed over hers firmly; then the two faces, one dark, one fair, met in the kiss of fellowship and goodwill.

"I will do everything that I can to help you, only don't show by look or gesture that we are anything but nurse and patient. I will appear to do all that Sir Cyprian tells me, and keep our secret knowledge to ourselves. It will never do to let him find out that we are friends."

"How did you come here?" Marcella said thoughtfully. "Tell me who sent for you, or brought you to the Court?"

Lottie hesitated, then answered: "Sir Cyprian wrote to my father and asked whether I could come to look after you. I was just home from London, and although not fit for much, having had an accident," she laughed suddenly, a harsh bitter note, "I came on straight here, where I was told a young lady suffering from hallucinations was ill, and that I was to keep her quiet and listen to nothing she might say, as she was not in her right mind. Will you promise to do all I tell you, and not to question anything, dear?" she went on earnestly. "Believe me, I can and will help you to the best of my ability."

Marcella put her hand in that of the other girl. "I promise," she began, when the door was suddenly opened, and Sir Cyprian entered the room. His face was unchanged, save for one or two lines that had been added to those already round his mouth and eyes. They gave him an older look, and in his eyes themselves there was a furtive gleam as though he were on the alert for a sudden surprise. But his voice was soft and his smile gentle, as, after one flashing glance from the nurse to his daughter, he said:

"Is she taking her medicine, nurse?"

"She has only just woke up," Lottie said politely. "I have, however, given her the medicine," and she looked swiftly at Marcella; a glance the girl in the bed replied to with the slightest flicker of her long lashes.

Sir Cyprian smiled and approached the side of the bed, his blue, steely eyes shining with satisfaction. "I hope you are a good girl, Marcella, my dear," he said softly, placing one white hand on the silent girl's shoulder, beneath which she shrank as from a poisonous animal. He saw the gesture and pressed his hand more firmly on her shoulder. "You are going to be good now, Marcella?" he repeated.

"I am sure she will, Sir Cyprian," murmured the young nurse politely. "She is a little drowsy now, perhaps it is the medicine."

He started slightly and fixed his cold eyes on the fair, thin face of the girl he had secured as nurse. But it was a blank, and a satisfied smile rose to his lips. "That is well," he said slowly; "see that the medicine is given three times a day, and come to me as soon as more is required. Dr. Winter is in attendance also, but he has gone out on an errand." He moved to the door, after having stroked the shoulder of the apathetic girl once again. "Nurse, I wish to speak to you outside; I won't keep you waiting long."

Lottie followed him silently.

"Well," she said curtly, "what is it? I must get back to my patient soon."

"I want to tell you this, my dear young lady," he said, holding her arm tightly. "That if I discover you don't play straight by me, you will find it difficult to avoid a little unpleasantness for yourself. Remember, you were saved from a suicide's grave; if that fact leaked out, you might be the recipient of attentions not quite free from embarrassment—you understand?"

While he had been speaking, a strange, enigmatic smile flitted across the girl's pale, worn face, but her voice was well under control when she answered him.

"Yes, I understand, Sir Cyprian. You may depend upon me to do my duty, and I thank you for your warning," she added quietly. "I shall not forget it."

He smiled and touched her cheek caressingly. "You are a very nice little girl, but you need watching. If the truth were known perhaps you could throw some light on the subject of the missing inmate of Water Grange?"

Digitized by Google

With the assurance of a trained actress Lottie raised her eyes to his. Her face had not changed colour, and her voice was quite steady as she said: "I was there for a few days only; I know nothing of a missing inmate. Was there one?"

Sir Cyprian bit his lip angrily. It annoyed him that he had betrayed himself to the quiet, self-possessed girl who was evidently in the dark. But his voice was light and careless as he replied: "Perhaps I was misinformed, after all. However, go back to your charge now, and see that she does not escape from her room. I want her well looked after."

As he moved away Deacon came up to him, and Lottie heard the servant say: "If you please, sir, there is a gentleman in the library who wants to see you on important business."

For an instant the Baronet's face changed its colour, and his eyes flashed a questioning glance into those of his servant. The man interpreted the unspoken question and answered: "The gentleman did not give me his card, sir, but his name is Mr. Caleb J. Johnson, sir."

The baronet breathed gently, and his face relaxed from the sudden tension that had seized it. He went down the stairs thoughtfully, and Lottie gazed after him with a set expression on her weary face. She had heard the name of the millionaire before. He was the man who had made Edward Day his secretary; she had found that out some time ago. Why had he called?

She went into the bedroom. Marcella was sitting up in bed, her eyes fixed on the door. "Who is that?" she whispered. "I heard Deacon's voice saying someone had called. Can it be—oh, can it possibly be Philip Nullius?"

Lottie shook her head. "I think not—I heard the man say it was Mr. Caleb J. Johnson, the millionaire."

Marcella sprang up excitedly. "Mr. Johnson!" she exclaimed excitedly. "I wonder why he has called. What has brought him to the Court? Lottie, come here, I want to tell you something—you can help me now if you will."

FORTY-SECOND CHAPTER.

An Unknown Champion.

Sir Cyprian closed the door behind him, and approached the millionaire with outstretched hand, and a smile of genial good-humour. "This is indeed a pleasure, Mr. Johnson. Have you come from Lady Violet?"

Mr. Johnson looked at him thoughtfully. This man with the youthful face and sparkling eyes both interested and repelled him at the same time. This was the man who for long years had enjoyed the money and position that by right were another's. But whether the baronet was ignorant of the fact was a matter that Mr. Johnson had not decided in his own mind, and which he had determined to find out. But firstly he delivered himself of Lady Violet's message. "Yes," he answered civilly, "I have come from my wife, and she desires me to say that she would like you to allow me to take Marcella back with me; she is very fond of her, and has been much worried lately at not hearing from her."

"Ah!" Sir Cyprian rubbed his soft white hands together with a pleased smile. "Is that so? It is really very good of my dear sister-in-law to take so much interest in my daughter. Marcella is also very devoted to her aunt—very, in fact," he laughed softly, "I am almost jealous sometimes, Mr. Johnson, of the affection that exists between them."

Mr. Johnson made an impatient gesture. He saw through the affectation of the man and it disgusted him. "Then in that case, Sir Cyprian," he said civilly, "you will have no objection to letting Marcella return with me to town? We will look after her well."

Sir Cyprian sighed regretfully. "If you had only come a few days ago how pleased I would have been to let Marcella accompany you, but while I was in town the last time I made arrangements for her to go to some friends of mine in the country, and she left yesterday. I am so sorry this has happened."

"What is her address?" the other man said brusquely.

(Continued overleaf.)

FATNESS

PERMANENTLY CURED BY

"ANTIPON."

SOME PLAIN FACTS.

"ANTIPON," the great permanent cure for Corpulency, is the most powerful fat absorbent known. It destroys and expels all superfluous fatty matter with amazing promptness. It acts from the very first dose, producing within the first day and night a decrease in weight varying from 8ozs. to 3lbs. After this there is a constant daily reduction until natural graceful proportions are permanently attained.

"ANTIPON" not only reduces abdominal fat and ugly deposits that show themselves in baggy cheeks, double chin, and bulky limbs; it dissolves and eliminates the more dangerous internal fat which clings around the vital organs and which may, if neglected, cause fatty degeneration of the heart, liver, and kidneys, a condition of continual menace to life. Difficult breathing, sudden palpitation of the heart, and other grave symptoms of disease soon disappear after a short acquaintance with the surprising curative action of "Antipon."

"ANTIPON" is a builder up of healthy muscular tissue; whilst the superfluous fat is being destroyed, the powerful tonic action of the medicine is proved by a keener appetite. More generous nourishment is taken. This makes rich blood—pure blood, the system being freed from waste fatty matter and other unwholesome deposits. That is the building process which goes on simultaneously with the clearing away of the dangerous deposits of fat.

"ANTIPON" dispenses with help from drugs of any kind—purgatives and sudorifics are alike unnecessary. No unreasonable restrictions as to living are required. On the contrary, those who use "Antipon" must "feed up," so that sound muscular fibre shall be a compensation for the loss of weight.

"ANTIPON" is a pleasantly bitter liquid, non-mineral, and certified absolutely harmless by a number of physicians who have investigated the ingredients. "Antipon" has received the written approval and warmest support of these authorities. A course of "Antipon" makes a new being of any stout person, for, with the permanent reduction of weight, there is a revivifying of the whole system—a fresh endowment of strength and vitality.

"A new preparation which bids fair to revolutionise medical science."—Sheffield Independent.

"'Antipon' will prove a lasting blessing to thousands."—Lady's Realm.

December 8th, 1903.

"The Hon. Mrs. B—— would be much obliged by the 'Antipon' Company sending off to her one large bottle of 'Antipon.' It has certainly much reduced her. She feels so much lighter and better in consequence."

"Ticehurst, March 30th, 1903.

"I received the 2s. 6d. bottle of 'Antipon,' and am very much surprised to find it so efficacious. I was fifty-four inches round the abdomen, and am now forty-eight inches only." "E. W——."

"Bournemouth, July 2nd, 1903.

"I have taken two bottles of 'Antipon,' and am a stone lighter than when I commenced taking it. (Mrs.) "F. R——."

"Antipon" can be had of Chemists, Stores, etc., price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d. per bottle, from Stock or on Order, or should any difficulty arise, may be obtained (on sending cash remittance), post free, under private package, direct from the Sole Manufacturers—

THE "ANTIPON" COMPANY,
13 Buckingham Street, Strand. London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

He was annoyed that he had once again arrived too late on another quest for the woman he loved.

The baronet smiled; he was enjoying himself hugely. He had always hated the big successful City magnate, whose path seemed one continuous stretch of gold, and he hated him the more since by making the woman whom he had for years kept under his thumb rich and independent of him, she was no longer his slave to sway to the dictation of his commands, to force to his superior will, and to dictate his own terms to as in the days before she had met the millionaire, Caleb J. Johnson. And for all the power he had lost, he hated more intensely the stranger who had robbed him of it. He rejoiced to be in the position to hurl a shaft at the head of the man, whose wealth, compared with his own, was as a vast, unfathomable ocean to a shallow pond; and he owed the millionaire one for having attempted to interfere with his plans some time ago. He had vowed to get his own back, one day, and that day had arrived earlier than he had anticipated.

"I am glad to be able to give you her address," he said slowly, "because Violet may like to write her at once. It is c.o. E. Haste, Esq., Water Grange, Berks."

"Water Grange!" the millionaire started and looked at him in amazement.

Sir Cyprian smiled. "Yes; do you know it? You appeared as though the name were not an unknown one to you."

Mr. Johnson reddened slightly. The note of mockery in Sir Cyprian's voice galled him. He felt that he had placed himself at a disadvantage in having betrayed his acquaintance with the name. He returned the baronet's gaze, however, with one as cool. "No, not that I can remember, but the name struck me as being uncommon. So you are keeping Marcella there! For any length of time?"

"Until she is better; the doctor feared that her nervous system was in danger of collapsing, but the fresh surroundings will do her good." Then, before Mr. Johnson could make any comment, he went on suavely: "I trust that you have received news of your famous picture. It must be vexing to know that all this trouble is in vain. I remember Marcella mentioning how you prized it."

"Yes," the other returned absently. "It is vexing, but the last bulletin from Scotland Yard was more reassuring. They have traced a man whom they have been watching in London to the country, and though they are not sure, they fancy he is connected with the theft in some way."

Sir Cyprian laughed. "Ah, that is most interesting! May I inquire what their waiting has brought forth? Is the man well-known to the police, or just a suspicious character who really may be quite harmless and innocent of all evil?"

"I don't know much more now than I have already told you," the millionaire replied curtly; he wanted to get away, to tell his wife that he had failed a second time in fulfilling her commands.

"Not even the fellow's description? That is always so interesting, I think," Sir Cyprian laughed lightly.

"I believe that the man the police are searching for is this wonderful 'King of Spades,'" Mr. Johnson answered. "They say he has a black beard of a peculiar shape, and is of a dark type."

Sir Cyprian shivered. "It is to be hoped that they will bring such outlaws to justice. It is dreadful that they should be at large like this; but won't you stay and lunch with me, Mr. Johnson?" he said genially.

The millionaire shook his head. He was beginning to hate his wife's brother-in-law more and more, and could not resist a thrust at him that would ease his feelings, and assure him on a certain point.

"I am afraid my time is not my own to-day, otherwise I would be delighted. By the way, what a beautiful old place this is! You inherited it after the old Sir Basil Wingate died, did you not?"

"Yes," the baronet answered carelessly. "He left an absurd will, cutting off his daughter, my cousin Helen, and her offspring because she ran away with some scamp of an adventurer. So it was just as well there was no child born to her."

"How do you know there was not?" Mr. Johnson said quickly.

Sir Cyprian shrugged his shoulders. "Because, although I was the heir I did not wish either my cousin or her children to suffer through her father's eccentricity, so I had every search made to ascertain what became of her, and heard she died in Australia childless. I was prepared to make a handsome allowance to them," he finished benevolently.

Mr. Johnson looked at him, a slow sarcastic smile curving his large mouth. "I am sure you are a very good man, Sir Cyprian, to take so much interest in the poor and needy. By the way," he added abruptly, "have you seen anything of that curate, Philip Nullius?"

Sir Cyprian raised his eyebrows in surprise. The sudden jump from one subject to another was disconcerting, but he answered politely. "I hear he is still on a holiday; I knew he had gone, because I offered him some introductions, but one fell through and I heard no more. Why do you ask?"

"Because I have some knowledge of that young man's parentage," the millionaire said slowly. "I want to see him put right in the world; he is worth it."

Sir Cyprian's fair skin paled suddenly. What did this blustering milloniare know of the secret of Philip Nullius? Why should he have sprung it so suddenly upon him? Surely he could not know that Philip Nullius was the son of his cousin, Helen Jerningham! Impossible—only he knew that, and he had resolved that the secret would die with him and perhaps the curate also. But in spite of the change of colour he laughed hardily. "Oh, well, I don't set much store on the birth of foundlings! They all claim to be heirs to peerages and similar nonsense. I heard my sister-in-law say the other day that Edward—the boy she had adopted—was a waif in reality; so mysteries can't well be wrapped round them all."

"Edward!" The millionaire started as though he had been struck. It was but a coincidence, of course, but an odd one. And he had forgotten that his wife had ever mentioned the fact about Edward Day—the rogue and blackmailer! Then his thoughts flew to the memory of Philip Nullius' face, and he rejoiced that there was not the slightest doubt about him. He, at least, was genuine. He turned to Sir Cyprian. "I am glad you say that Philip Nulluis is away; I heard that he had returned here the other day to see Marcella."

Sir Cyprian's face grew livid. "Who told you that? I mean how do you know that he has returned? I was away and did not see him; I was not even aware that he had returned from his holiday."

"No?" queried the millionaire drily. "I thought that perhaps he had gone back to Water Grange!"

"What do you mean? Do you intend any insinuations concerning that beggarly curate?" Sir Cyprian said haughtily. "My only objection to him was that of not having the position or money upon which to support a wife such as my daughter Marcella; otherwise I am indifferent to the young man."

Mr. Johnson wheeled round suddenly. "Then why did you take so much trouble to have his rooms searched by your menials for the papers he possessed when living near Water Grange?" he said fiercely. "They were not found, and you were disturbed by it! How do you account for that?"

A swift expression of mingled fear and hate crossed Sir Cyprian's face, but the next moment he laughed softly. "Really, Mr. Johnson, you surprise me by the interest you take in that young curate. Since you must know, I was certainly anxious to get possession of the love letters my misguided daughter had written him; of other papers I am in ignorance that he possessed any! You seem better informed than myself, Mr. Johnson." he said mockingly.

The millionaire bit his lip. "Perhaps I do," he said shortly, "more than you think, Sir Cyprian. But I won't trespass on your time now; I will go and call upon Marcella at Water Grange. Good-day."

The door closed before Sir Cyprian could retort. He ground his teeth savagely. "Confound you, you moneyed upstart. So you fancy you have got on a trail, do you, and you mean to thwart my plans, queer my pitch! That woman

(Continued on page 318.)

Digitized by Google

Gifts Worth £25,969

to users of Soap. You use it. Get some of the money. Save your wrappers of

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER.

THE BEST SOAP FOR ALL PURPOSES.

Equally good for Bath, Toilet, and Nursery, as well as for Household and Laundry. Made from the Purest Materials and has

THE LARGEST SALE IN THE WORLD OF ONE POUND TABLETS.

WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER

GIGANTIC PRIZE COMPETITION

120,419 PRIZES.

FULL PARTICULARS ACCOMPANY EACH TABLET.

Send Wrappers of Watson's Matchless Cleanser, Watson's Sparkla or Watson's Nubolic Soap to

VALUE £25,969

JOSEPH WATSON & SONS LTD., WHITEHALL SOAP WORKS, LEEDS.

Every competitor in the previous competition received a prize. THOUSANDS OF COSTLY AND USEFUL ARTICLES.

TO CURE SICK HEADACHE.

Sick headache means an overtaxed stomach and a derangement of the digestive organs.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

have proved themselves a boon for removing that distressed feeling and discomfort. A dose will remove the immediate cause, and if repeated for a few days will enable your system to work normally.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

Digitized by Google

shall pay the penalty; she shall fall with me—roll in the mud as well. But I shall not be defeated yet; there is nothing that fellow can trace to me. It is only supposition, after all, but how did he learn about Water Grange? How know about the papers in the room?" He took one or two impatient steps down the room, his smooth brow furrowed by a deep line of thought. Things had not gone as he had planned for a long time. Failure had dogged his intentions regarding the curate; twice had he evaded the trap that had been laid for him. Sir Cyprian could not help thinking that the hands that had saved him had been those of women. Woman's instinct was so much more alert and ready to act than a man's, and on each occasion Sir Cyprian saw the trail of the feminine instinct.

"I must stop him from knowing any more; how can I manage it, I wonder? The curate has disappeared again; he is sure to be in London, probably trying to ferret out something about his compulsory imprisonment."

He turned to the table and picked up one or two letters that had just arrived, and which he had taken from the post-bag. One was from Edward Day saying he would be calling during the week, as he was leaving London. Sir Cyprian smiled. "Ah, a good idea, I will use him to bait the other with! He is ambitious and unprincipled; he will fall in with my plans, especially as I shall offer him a very good prize. Better far that she should marry Edward Day than Philip Nullius. I will hold what I have held a little longer." He laughed again. "So Mr. Johnson anticipates bringing to justice the 'King of Spades.' I hope he will; I should like to see him in the dock—a place as yet new to him, I should fancy." Then, with another laugh, he sat down and took up his pen.

In the meantime, Mr. Johnson was waiting at the station for the up-train to London. A boy brushed past him, and when he turned to utter a sharp protest, he saw something lying at his feet. It was an envelope; he picked it up, then the train steamed into the station and he secured his carriage. When it started he opened the letter curiously. Inside was a sheet of paper, on it were the words:

"Philip Nullius gone to London. Marcella is ill at Court. Don't trust Sir Cyprian; stay away from Court if you wish to help Marcella."

Mr. Johnson folded up the scrap of paper with a sudden smile. He had almost believed at first that Marcella was at Water Grange, so straightforward had Sir Cyprian seemed to be, but now this letter proved two things—first, that Marcella was being kept from her aunt for some purpose of her father's, and secondly that there was one person in that strange household a friend to the imprisoned girl.

"She will be fairly safe for a few days," the millionaire muttered. "Now to report myself to my wife, and then"—his voice softened—"and then to look for my son—my boy."

FORTY-THIRD CHAPTER.
The Stab in the Dark.

When the millionaire reached Lady Violet's house in Grosvenor Square, he was shown immediately into her presence, and, when he saw her, fell back in amazement. So pale, wan-eyed, and tragic she looked, that he guessed something had happened out of the common to make her, the Society leader, careless of her appearance. He took a step towards her.

"Violet, you are ill; what does it mean, this dreadful change in you?"

"Stop!" She waved him off passionately. "Don't come any nearer, Caleb. I—I—want to tell you something—to ask you something—you must, you shall tell me the truth."

"What is it?" he said dully. He knew that she had learnt something—something perhaps of the deceit he had practised upon her—but how much only Heaven knew.

"When you had left me the other day," she said slowly, speaking with difficulty. "I received the following letter. It told me much that had puzzled me in the past, and also showed me that the man I had imagined a man of honour was but a poor, pitiful creature, not fit for a woman's confidence or respect."

He took the letter from her. It was short and to the point.

"If Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox were to ascertain where the body of her first husband is, she would learn that it was only his clothes that were thrown into the river—his body having been seen on board a ship in the full possession of health and a thousand pounds paid him for his silence and the promise to keep out of England. The thousand pounds was the price that was paid by her second husband, Mr. Caleb J. Johnson, for the privilege of marrying her, he having held over Major Frayne-Lennox's head the threat to use a certain dishonoured cheque that has come into his possession. Lady Frayne-Lennox is congratulated on her second marriage."

The face of the millionaire, Caleb J. Johnson, grew livid, and a sarcastic smile touched his lips, as he turned to the woman whom his deceit had made a bigamist. "So you chose to listen to this anonymous correspondence, rather than ignore the letter as a mad bit of spleen on the part of a man who hates me—and perhaps you also?"

She put her hand on his arm and gazed steadily into his face. "Caleb, I thought you were at least man enough to own up when you have done wrong. I can see through all this pretence, and it hurts me more than what you did. But, oh," she wailed, "why did you do such a thing—why did you commit such a wrong?"

He looked at her, a bitterly sad expression in his eyes. "Because all my life, Violet, I have let nothing stand in the way of my getting what I wanted, no matter what it was—gold, power, or love; whatever barrier stood between me and my desire I broke down through sheer force of will. I have done several shady actions in my life, of all of which now I am heartily ashamed, and wish I could wipe them out—I have wronged the dead, trampled on the weak, and——"

"And me," she cried, "you have wronged me, the woman you married, more than all."

He raised his hand suddenly and grasped her arm. "No, Violet, after all I have wronged you least of all; I put away from you the presence of a dissolute man you hated, and who was but a drag on you; I have made you my wife in name only—I sinned this time for love, like any hot-headed boy, but in all else I have done my best to make the reparation I could, Violet. Only a few knew of the form of marriage through which we went—we can drop out of each other's lives if you like, when I have done my duty."

"What duty? What do you mean?"

"I have a task before me—one just begun, and which I have neglected long enough. I will put that right, and then—"

"Yes," she whispered, awed by the look on his face she had never seen before. "What will you do then, Caleb?"

He smiled wearily. "I will put myself out of your life as ruthlessly as I entered it. I think I know the villain who sent this anonymous document to you—and"—his eyes suddenly flamed with fire—"and he shall pay for his act."

She caught his arm in hers. "No, no! Caleb, no violence! Nothing like that; promise me! I—I—was naturally horrified at first, but I will try to forgive you. We must part, but let us at least part friends, without bad blood between us, or the wreaking of vengeance on others!"

He took her hands in his and crushed them until she nearly cried aloud. "Violet, I will try to do your bidding, but tell me; if that man—you know whom—were to be really dead one day, would you marry me again? Would you be my wife in very truth?"

A slow flush coloured her cheeks as she answered. "Should you bring me news that the man had really died, I think, perhaps, that I would marry you again."

He bent over her hands and kissed them reverently.

"Let me tell you now," cried Lady Violet, "while we are both natural, and speaking as soul to soul, I once committed the most unnatural act in the world. I am a bad woman, Caleb, I let my own child——"

She stopped suddenly. The door had been flung open and a man was announced.

He came forward slowly

Then Caleb J. Johnson spoke, and his voice thrilled both his hearers; it was so full of suppressed emotion and feeling:

"It's Philip," he cried, "it's Philip Nullius!"

(Another grand instalment of this serial next week.)

Digitized by Google

Secrets of Youth.

How to have a beautiful face and figure. How to have beautiful eyes and hair. How to curl the hair naturally without curling pins or tongs. Little people can be made tall. Noses that are red or ugly shape can be cured, and looks greatly improved.

This Pretty Book will be sent FREE. Ask for "BEAUTY'S BOUDOIR." Stamp must be sent for postage. Peralia Perfumery Co. (Dept. 14) 73 Camden Street, North Shields, Eng.

£8 10

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted. Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

TO CURE DRUNKARDS

without their knowledge. Send Stamp for FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of a wonderful remedy that has saved homes. Send no money. Address in confidence: WARD CHEMICAL Co., 51 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

FREEMAN'S

TRADE MARK

THE ORIGINAL & ONLY TRUE

CHLORODYNE

Best Remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 6s., or postage free by the INVENTOR, R. FREEMAN, 70 KENNINGTON PARK ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

RECOMMENDED BY MEDICAL MEN.

N.B.—Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Justices James and Mellish, decided in favour of Freeman's Original Chlorodyne, and against Browne & Davenport, compelling them to pay all costs. —"Times," 24-7-73.

JUNO CYCLES

ARE THE VERY BEST.

FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN.

Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.

CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of

£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 8 0 „ 15/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/3 „
9 10 0 „ 17/6 „

JUNO Motor Cycles, £32 or 12 Payments of 60/- each.

JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles, £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.

Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ltd., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

Penna

Elastic Rubber Heels don't slip or splash, are up-to-date, being the Pioneer, and the heel made on purely hygienic principles to relieve the Nervous System. No rotary movement to retard progress, strain or turn the ankle. Will outwear several leather heels and save the soles from friction and wear. They are economy and comfort. Beware of clumsy imitations. Ask your Shoemaker for PENNA Heels, and see PENNA on each Heel. Ladies', 9d.; Men's, 1/3 per pair. Write for Pamphlet.—HOWISON & CO., 4 SNOW HILL, LONDON, E.C.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

EARN A BICYCLE

distributing circulars and taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Active Agents wanted in each district. Large profits easily made. Highest grade fully warranted

BRITISH MADE CYCLES

LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6

New Departure Coaster Hubs, Best Makes Tyres, and best British made equipment throughout.

200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, good as new, £1 to £2-10

Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. We send on approval and allow Ten Days' Free Trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer. Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos half prices.

MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 44e, 85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool, 19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

BORAX EXTRACT OF SOAP

Careful housewives know the value of this soap. They have tried it and found it to be all that we represent—the best washing powder money can buy. One trial will add you to the number who have found the best.

Ask your grocer for it.

WRITE FOR FREE SAMPLE, &c.

The Patent Borax Co. Ltd. Birmingham.

BORAX STARCH GLAZE IMPROVES ALL STARCH.

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S NERVINE

Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented.

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Stores, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

DON'T COUGH for KEATING'S LOZENGES EASILY CURE THE WORST COUGH.

One gives relief. An increasing sale of over 80 years is a certain test of their value. Sold in 13½d. tins everywhere.

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

THE DAILY EXPRESS

1D. / 2

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 529)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

BLOUSE.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Unwelcome Attention.

"I WAS introduced to a man some time ago," writes "EDITH," "but at the time took rather a dislike to him. I thought he seemed rather as though he might be given to drink. Well, this man seems to have taken a very great fancy to me. He never misses an opportunity of speaking to me, and often crosses the street with a view of meeting me. In fact, he is getting rather more pressing than I like. As he was introduced to me by a very dear friend, I cannot be rude to him. What should I do?"

* * * * *

You will lose nothing by being polite to him always. In fact, I think continued politeness is often the very best cure for such attentions. There is no better way of showing a man that you do not care for him than by always being polite. Try it for six months. If this does not have the desired effect, write to me again, and I will prescribe something else.

A Lax Lover.

"WE have been engaged two years," writes "WORRIED," "but so far my lover has not yet said anything definite about our getting married. When he proposed, he was not very well off, and I do not think his position has improved much since. Ought I not to ask him about it, as my family often talk about the matter, and other girls tease me."

* * * * *

It must depend on your lover's position. When he proposed to you, did he not give you some idea of his prospects? Have they improved as much as he expected? And, do you think he has been making serious efforts to place himself in a position to marry? Think it well over before you speak to him. If you do not think he has worked hard enough, and is not seriously trying to improve matters, then you should certainly raise the question.

Beginning Young.

"LOVER." So you are seventeen, and very fond of girls. You want one all to yourself, but are so shy that you have not the courage to speak to them. At the same time, you say you like reading this page very much. Well, I am glad to hear that, but I hope you have not taken it into your head that because other people fall in love very young, you, too, must do the same? At seventeen there is no need whatever for you to start sweethearting. In fact, I think it would be much better if you turned your mind to something likely to help you in life. Instead of casting about to find a girl, you should just wait until you see one who really attracts you, for whom you feel you would do anything. Don't run away with the idea that you must go sweethearting, as though it were necessary for your health. If you are of a loving turn of mind you will soon enough find the girl who attracts you, and who at the same time will be attracted by you.

A Case for Waiting.

"RONALD."—Yes, you would be doing wrong in taking your sweetheart from a good home in order to marry her, when your salary is only one pound a week. Wait until you are in a better position, unless, of course, your wife is able in any way to earn something at home. Certainly it would not be wise for her to go out to work after you are married, seeing that she has not done so before. No, "RONALD," I fear you must do what a lot of others have to, and that is to wait.

Marrying Beneath Him.

WHAT a long letter you have written me, "UNFORTUNATE"! I gather that you are very much in love with a girl who is rather beneath you in social position, and that, while her parents approve of you, your parents do not approve of her. Further, that it would break your hearts to separate. You are nineteen, she is eighteen.

* * * * *

Well, why be in such a hurry about it? I suppose you do not think of getting married for some years yet. It would be very foolish if you did. Why not decide to wait three years? If, after that time, you are still as fond of each other as ever, and your position enables you to marry, then surely your parents will not object simply because of the difference in social position. It is a very old-fashioned idea that people should only marry those of their own exact standing, for everybody nowadays is educated, and if a girl is able to bear herself as a lady, the man who rejected her because of trifling differences in position would indeed be a snob. I advise you to wait until you are older and better able to make up your mind as to whether you love the girl sufficiently to marry her without the consent of your parents.

On Taking Your Sweetheart to Dances.

"W.P." asks if it is correct for him to take his fiancée to dances. He has not done so as yet, because he hates the idea of her dancing with other men, and does not see how he could avoid such a thing. Could he take her, and arrange to dance all the dances with her alone? The girl is herself very much concerned because "W. P." has not as yet taken her to dances, while he has gone to them himself.

* * * * *

What a one-sided sort of man you are, "W. P."! You go regularly to dances yourself and dance, I suppose, with all sorts of other girls. Yet you are terrified to take your own sweetheart for fear she might dance with other men. Well, well! If she trusts you not to flirt too much, cannot you trust her? Do you not think she loves you sufficiently to be true to you, and yet have the enjoyment of dancing? And, as a matter of fact, "W. P.," dance-flirtations are as a rule dull affairs, and I don't think many hearts are stolen by them. It would be very bad manners to dance all the time with your own girl, if you should take her.

Money Presents.

"I AM to be married soon," writes "MABEL," "and a well-to-do relative asked me the other day what I would like for a wedding present. I did not tell him at the time, saying I would think it over. Meanwhile, I wish to ask your advice. I have not told this relative, but the fact is, my fiancé is none too well off. In fact, what we should most like would be a present of money. Do you think my relative would be offended if I hinted that a cheque would be the most acceptable present?"

* * * * *

It is quite usual for relatives to give cheques as their wedding presents to young couples. Without actually asking him for a money present, you could quite easily hint to him that the funds are not so high as they might be, and then, no doubt, he will do the necessary thing.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Our New Magazine

AN INSTANTANEOUS SUCCESS!

Read what others say about "The Rapid Review":

The "Christian World" says:

"The Rapid Review will make a bold bid for public favour."

The "Evening Citizen" says:

"First numbers are by no means a very safe criterion to go by. However, the first number of The Rapid Review is of a promising and inviting character. It really fulfils in a fairly satisfactory manner, the promises made before-hand by its founder. And it is, in particular, a sign of the times. Now-a-days everybody is more or less in a hurry. We have all so many things to do, so many different interests to engage our attention, that we have only a limited time to spare to any one subject. Compression is the order of the day, and it is compression that Mr. Pearson has set before himself as the guiding and controlling principle of The Rapid Review."

The "Leader" says:

"The Rapid Review, of which the first number is before us, promises to have an interesting future. At least, it will not fail for want of ambition. By no means a mere review of periodical literature, it has excellent sections devoted to 'Books of the Month,' 'Plays of the Month,' 'Art of the Month,' and even to 'Music of the Month,' in the last of which there is an attempt at giving something of the actual scores.

The "Daily Mail" says:

"The Rapid Review promises to be a rapid success."

The "Times" says:

"The Rapid Review is certainly packed with all kinds of matter on every subject of the day, and it is copiously illustrated. On matters of politics and religion it presents all sides impartially. For all who seek knowledge in condensed extracts which can be rapidly digested the magazine seems well conceived."

The "Morning Post" says:

"The pages devoted to 'Contemporary Thought' are bright and necessarily up-to-date, and the literary and dramatic criticism is what one expects of a magazine which, besides being new, means and deserves to live."

The "Carlisle Journal" says:

"The new publication aims at giving in a comprehensive form the news of the month in politics, music, the drama, and science, and an epitome of the contents of the most interesting books, magazines, reviews, and other periodicals which are published in this country. This aim has been fairly attained, and the first number will be found to contain a great variety of information and good reading. There are numerous illustrations, and the frontispiece consists of a portrait of the Speaker, which is a good, but somewhat severe, likeness of the distinguished member for Carlisle."

The "Brighton & Hove Society" says:

"Thank heaven, in The Rapid Review we have something that rings true to Imperial ideas in every sense. It certainly lives up to its promise of being the busy man's vade mecum, and, from the outset, gives a good index—that invaluable feature. In the 'Topic of the Month,' it discusses Russia and Japan, our New Army, and the Fiscal Controversy. It has men, books, plays, art, science, and music of the month, besides woman's work and interests. It deals with contempory thought in all its branches, with the country and all its life and pursuits, and, as a special feature, discusses the latest idea of general interest. Its pages are brightened by a profusion of illustrations, portraits, caricatures, both British and foreign, bits of music, diagrams, etc. It treats of everything of interest under the sun, and elsewhere for that matter. It is simply a marvellous compendium, and so thoroughly up-to-date that it even has a "Stop Press Supplement.' Can enterpr se go any further? and all for 6d. We cordially welcome it, and wish it every success."

No. 2 of "The Rapid Review" will be ready March 11th. Order your copy to-day.

6d. Monthly.

C. ARTHUR PEARSON LIMITED.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"MENE"

A SAMPLE ½ DOZEN OF THESE FAMOUS SANITARY TOWELS IN ASSORTED SIZES, WILL BE SENT POST FREE FOR SIX STAMPS.

NONE EQUAL THEM FOR CLEANLINESS COMFORT & ECONOMY

SOLD BY ALL UNDERCLOTHING HOUSES AND CHEMISTS.

LADIES SHOULD WRITE FOR SAMPLE TO MISS HAYNES, 55, FANN ST. LONDON E.C.

10/6 EVERYWHERE

THE REST ARE NOWHERE COMPARED WITH "OCEANIC" BOOTS

Manufactory, Northampton.

ORDER AND BRIGHTNESS PREVAIL WHERE

"MATCHLESS" METAL POLISH IS USED

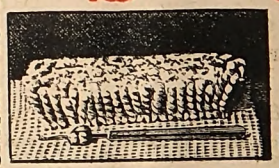
BRITISH ALL THROUGH.

Free from Acid, Poison & Grit.

PRODUCES QUICKLY A LASTING BRILLIANCY.

Manufts The Matchless Metal Polish Co. Ltd. LIVERPOOL.

THE "SIRDAR" RUG-WOOL



FIRST & BEST FOR RUG & MAT MAKING

ENDLESS WEAR.

BRIGHT IN FINISH! OF SUPERIOR QUALITY!

May be had in 30 Art Shades from the principal dealers. Insist on having the "SIRDAR" & TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.

PLAIN DIRECTIONS FOR RUG & MAT MAKING FREE.

WHOLESALE ONLY FROM:—

HARRAP BROS. BECTIVE MILLS, WAKEFIELD.

SCRIVEN

HERE'S LONG LIFE TO OUR BOOTS OBTAINED BY USING

10,000,000 PEOPLE WEAR THEM

The WOOD-MILNE REVOLVING RUBBER HEEL

WITH THE NAME WOOD-MILNE STAMPED ON EVERY PAD.

SCRIVEN

FENDERS AND BEDSTEADS

of Every Description Direct from Works.

Also CURBS, FIRE IRONS, BRASSES, FIRE GUARDS, &c.

Send particulars of your requirements.
Sketches and Prices can be sent on at once.

SPARKHILL FENDER AND BEDSTEAD CO.,
B88 DURHAM ROAD, BIRMINGHAM.

"The pickle of pickles."

THE MILITARY PICKLE.

A choice condiment of Oriental Fruits and English Vegetables.

HAYWARD BROS. Ltd., 319 KENNINGTON ROAD, S.E.

Digitized by Google

NEW COMPETITION STARTS WITHIN.

SHORT STORIES

No. 793. Week Ending March 12, 1904. Price One Penny.

"THE STING SHALL LIE IN THE TAIL OF THE LETTER!" SHE CRIED.

(A Dramatic Episode from the Powerful Story, "Cara's Conspiracy." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

THREE GRAND

KODAK

AMATEUR

Photographic Competitions

£1,000

(One Thousand Pounds)

IN CASH PRIZES.

£500 for Pictures on N.C. Film (non-curling and orthochromatic).

£300 for Pictures on KODOID Plates (thin, flat, and unbreakable).

£200 for Roll Films developed in KODAK DEVELOPING MACHINE.

WARNING! — Kodak is applied to Cameras, Films, and Products made by the Kodak Company only. Beware of inferior experimental imitations.

Ask your Dealer for full particulars, or write to Dept. 35.

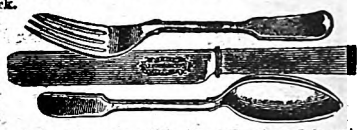
KODAK Ltd., 41-43 Clerkenwell Rd., London, E.C.

J.G.GRAVES'

Direct from my Factory to your Home.

THE "ENTERPRISE" PARCEL, 25/-

Contains: 6 Table Knives, 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Knives, 6 Dessert Forks, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Table Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon, 1 pair Sugar Tongs, and 1 Pickle Fork.



The Knives are made of best Sheffield Steel and fitted with 'Ivorette' Handles. 'Ivorette' is the best known substitute for genuine Ivory. The Forks and Spoons are made of 'Columbian' silver, a hard metal guaranteed to wear white throughout and is not affected by acid foods, or exposure.

Sent on receipt of 2/6 and your promise to pay the balance in nine more monthly payments of 2/6. Discount Advantages to Cash Purchasers.

Catalogue of Sheffield Cutlery and Plate, post free.

Agents Wanted. Write for Terms.

J. G. GRAVES, 169 Division Street, SHEFFIELD.

GIVEN AWAY

with next week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 531)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

BOY'S SUIT.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY!

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of "Short Stories," 12/3/04. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, we will forward, Direct from our Looms to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in 20 different patterns and art colourings, to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for our goods below the actual cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the purchasers all middle profits.

OVER 200,000 SOLD DURING THE PAST 12 MONTHS.

GIVEN AWAY! GIVEN AWAY!

With every Carpet we shall Absolutely Give Away a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs for 9/6.

Money Willingly Returned if Not Approved.

Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials Received.

Illustrated Bargain Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Table Linen Curtains, &c., post free.

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants.

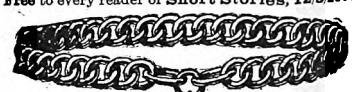
WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Sale Price: 3/6 Postage 4d. extra.

Free Gifts.

Sizes: 38, 40, 42.

F. HODGSON & SONS, City of Leeds will Present Free to every reader of Short Stories, 12/3/1904.



carriage paid, on order for 3/6, with postage, for one of Tailor Made Cloth tume Skirts, in trimmed with mer-plings, and fitted pocket. We shall include FREE with each Skirt a Massive 18-ct. Gold Pattern Curb Bracelet, with Heart Pendant, mounted with Pearls and Turquoise, and scented with Forget-me-Nots. Cased with Pure Gold.

receipt of postal stamps 4d. extra, for our Ladies' Beautiful Serge Dress Cloe- Black or Navy, richly cerised silk effect trimmed with good lineneite

Money willingly returned if not approved. Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Curtains, &c., post free.

Address: F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.), Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Headache,

Neuralgia & all Nerve Pains

One dose of Kaputine, costing 1d., cures in ten minutes the most violent nerve pain,—every time.

Kaputine is not an aperient, and causes no inconvenience, but is for one purpose only—to cure Nerve Pains.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—and gives immediate relief.

Kaputine, unlike the dangerous white headache powders consisting of one crude drug, is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical Profession.

Kaputine is sold by all Medicine Dealers, Packets of 18 doses, 1/-. Samples 1d. each.

Write now for samples free and post paid to

O. O. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 18 3 1904

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 793.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending March 12th, 1904.

CARA'S CONSPIRACY.

The Story of its Beginning and End.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

"My love—my sweet!"

Passionately Neville Dacre looked down into the darkly-fringed blue eyes, which drooped shyly beneath his ardent glance.

A pair of soft red lips met his in a long, clinging kiss, and for a few moments the lovers were silent, content to rest in that rapturous embrace.

Outside the rain fell heavily on that November day; but the conservatory in which the lovers stood was like a dream of tropical fairyland, wherein a crystal fountain rose and fell softly in its marble basin.

Muriel Vernon gently released herself from Neville's arms and returned the gaze of his dark-grey eyes with a glance of deep love.

How had she contrived to win the affection of this handsome man, the squire of Grangeside village?

Only an hour ago he had come to call nominally upon Mrs. Adair, the old and invalid lady with whom Muriel for some years had lived as companion.

But he had found Muriel alone in the conservatory which opened from the drawing-room at "Grangemount," and Neville Dacre, who had long looked for this opportunity, took the blushing girl in his arms and whispered that he loved her devotedly.

"How can you love the insignificant companion?" asked Muriel, presently, when she and Neville sat side by side on a softly-cushioned couch.

Neville glanced proudly at the lovely face that rested on his shoulder.

"Insignificant!" he repeated fondly. "My darling, I cannot allow you to malign the prettiest girl in Grangeside village!"

He kissed her again passionately on the lips.

"My sweet, I have a little confession to make," said Neville, looking gravely at Muriel, whose face assumed an alarmed expression at this sudden transition of tone. "Don't be afraid, pet. My confession has to deal with money matters."

Muriel's brow relaxed as Neville Dacre uttered those words.

"Only money," she said in a relieved tone. "I thought you were about to tell me something very serious indeed."

Neville Dacre smiled at this contemptuous reference to money matters.

"I must confess the case is rather serious in my eyes, darling," he said, lightly stroking the golden head. "But I will be as brief as possible in my narration."

For the first time Muriel Vernon then heard that Neville Dacre, in addition to his property in Grangeside, owned several coffee plantations in Ceylon.

The bulk of Neville Dacre's income was, indeed, derived from these estates; but by the last mail the young man had learnt that, owing to the systematic defalcations of his managing overseer, his revenues would prove considerably curtailed.

"In fact, my sweet, I shall have to go in person to look after things," concluded Neville gravely. "If not, I stand to lose nearly the whole of my money. I shall be absent most probably for twelve months, and at the end of that time I shall know my prospects one way or another."

Muriel raised her head from her lover's shoulder and sat bolt upright, her hands trembling, and her face blanched at this announcement.

"Neville, Neville, don't leave me!" she faltered brokenly, her blue eyes filling with tears. "I cannot bear you to go away! Never mind money; I don't care how poor you are, as long as you are with me and I have your love."

Her lips quivered as she spoke, and her pleading tones strangely affected Neville Dacre. As he took her in his arms again and whispered endearing terms of love, imploring her to be brave for his sake, the velvet curtains which divided the drawing-room from the conservatory parted in the centre, and a woman's form, erect and imperious, appeared between the opening.

As the newcomer saw Neville Dacre passionately embrace Muriel her whole face changed its expression.

With all the force and passion of her proud nature she loved Neville Dacre, and until this moment had fondly believed her love returned. The unexpected sight of Muriel resting in Neville's arms and Muriel receiving Neville's kisses roused all the fierce torments of jealousy.

As the haughty woman pressed her hand to her throbbing brow a rush of vehement hatred for her successful rival shook her frame, and between her clenched teeth Cara Wyndham vowed vengeance on the girl who had supplanted her.

"After all, Neville, twelve months will soon pass," she heard Muriel say. "I shall be here with Mrs. Adair, and you will write often to me, won't you, darling?"

"Every mail," said Neville fervently. "The time will soon pass, dearest. In twelve months' time I shall come back to claim my wife. Poor or rich, you will be true to me, Muriel, I know?"

From her hiding place Cara Wyndham saw Muriel's form quiver with suppressed sobs.

How long she stood watching the pair she could never tell.

She saw Neville Dacre soothe Muriel into a calmer mood, and heard the two plan out their future life.

"Keep our engagement secret until I return," said Neville, gravely. "As you possess no relations, I suppose you must continue to live here with Mrs. Adair. And, though she is very kind, still she might make some objections to my suit."

Mrs. Adair had fallen into the same error as her niece Cara, and that the companion, Muriel Vernon, pretty and charming

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

as she was, should form the great attraction for the young squire, might prove a somewhat disagreeable revelation.

Although possessed of a generous heart, Mrs. Adair was undoubtedly eccentric, and in the first flush of anger Neville Dacre imagined that Muriel might be made to suffer for her mistress' disappointment.

Muriel also was not unconscious of Mrs. Adair's hopes, and felt relieved at Neville's wish to keep the engagement secret.

And then the moment came for the last farewell.

The secret watcher from behind the curtains clenched her hands in deadly anguish and rage to see Neville Dacre rain down kisses on Muriel's white face, and to hear again and again his burning vows of love.

"I leave England to-morrow. In a year's time I shall return to claim you as my wife. Muriel, my heart's darling, be true to me!"

As Cara Wyndham dropped the curtain suddenly and fled to the privacy of her own room Neville's last words echoed again and again on her brain.

"In twelve months' time, Neville Dacre," she cried, "you will return to make Cara Wyndham your wife. I swear you shall never marry Muriel Vernon. I will utterly destroy her happiness. She shall learn what it is to supplant a revengeful woman."

* * * * *

"Sidney, you are in love with Muriel Vernon!"

Six months had elapsed since Neville Dacre had left England, and a new visitor had arrived at "Grangemount."

Sidney Peyton, Mrs. Adair's nephew, suddenly made his appearance one day under his aunt's hospitable roof, and on being introduced to Muriel Vernon had stared at her with such marked admiration that the girl changed colour under his bold glance.

From that day Peyton, whose protracted residence in America had apparently caused a strange deterioration in his manners, openly showed his feelings for Muriel, and only awaited an opportunity to declare his love.

On that hot July evening he and his cousin, Cara Wyndham, had strolled after dinner to the banks of the little stream which flowed peacefully through the grounds.

Cara, dressed in a daffodil silk gown, which suited her dark beauty, stood in the shadow of a giant oak tree and surveyed Peyton with a certain scorn.

"You cannot deny it," she continued, as Peyton puffed moodily at his cigar and made no reply to her charge. "You are in love with Muriel Vernon!"

"I acknowledge it," he said curtly, facing Cara in the moonlight. "She is pretty enough to justify any man worshipping her."

Cara laughed contemptuously and flashed a mocking look at the young man.

"As pretty as she is penniless," she said cuttingly. "I thought you would have looked higher than your aunt's companion, Sidney."

Peyton smiled curiously and flicked some cigar ash from his sleeve.

"If Miss Vernon will have the grace to accept your humble servant," he said slowly, "I shall be the happiest man in England. By Jove, how pretty she looked to-night at dinner in that simple white frock!"

A flush of anger rose to Cara Wynham's face. She threw off the lace hood on her hair and looked at Sidney Peyton with a passionate scorn.

"How can you afford to marry a penniless girl?" she said, contemptuously. "At present your income is scarcely large enough for your own wants. How do you propose to make it answer for two?"

Her cutting tone roused Peyton's anger.

"Don't trouble yourself about my concerns, Cara!" he said, fiercely. "I intend to marry Muriel Vernon, and I will permit no one to interfere with my plans."

An ironical laugh broke from Cara Wyndham's lips.

"Never prophesy until you know," she said, taking a step nearer to the young man in order to watch the effect of her words. "Considering that Muriel Vernon is engaged to another man, I fancy someone is very likely to interfere with your plans."

A deep oath escaped Sidney Peyton. With a sudden movement he gripped Cara's arm and fixed his fierce eyes upon her.

"Engaged?" he repeated furiously. "What is the man's name?"

"Neville Dacre," said Cara, vindictively, resenting her cousin's fierce grip. "He and Muriel have been secretly engaged six months, and when Neville returns from Ceylon they are to be married."

"And how came you to learn the secret?" asked Peyton angrily. "Does Muriel confide all her love affairs to you?"

Cara Wyndham freed herself from her cousin's grasp.

"No," she said, sullenly; "I overheard Neville Dacre confess his love to Muriel."

Peyton threw a quick glance at her stormy countenance.

"You love this man yourself," he said, noting her sudden start. "And in spite of your affected friendship for Muriel Vernon you would give much to break off her engagement to this Dacre. Am I not right, Cara?"

For a moment his companion hesitated.

Peyton watched her lips quiver as if about to open.

And then Cara, with a vehement gesture, turned rapidly from him in the direction of the house.

He followed her quickly and laid his hand on her shoulder.

"Come, Cara dear," he said, soothingly, "let us be friends. Perhaps my last question was rather impertinent. But if you will help me to gain Muriel Vernon for my wife I will tell you why I can afford to marry a penniless girl."

"Then there is some hidden motive in your wish to gain Muriel?" asked Cara, eagerly, her face lit up with the prospective joy of ridding herself of her successful rival. "Trust me, Sidney; I will do all I can to help you."

At that very instant it chanced that Muriel Vernon, in obedience to Mrs. Adair's request, came out on the terrace which ran past the drawing-room and searched anxiously for the two guests.

The two watchers withdrew further into the darkness of the trees, and in another moment Muriel had vanished from the terrace.

The sight of her pure beauty had aroused conflicting emotions in Sidney Peyton's breast. He turned to Cara with a harsh laugh.

"We might be the angels of darkness plotting against an angel of light," he said, with a touch of self-scorn in his tone. "Cara, shall we give up our scheme?"

A fallen tree lay in their path. Cara seated herself upon it and motioned Peyton to take his place at her side.

"Waverer!" she said scornfully. "Do you wish to marry this girl?"

Peyton smiled.

"I only wished to try you, Cara," he said, half-flippantly. "When you have heard my story you will see that, though I love Muriel Vernon for her own sweet sake, there are other weighty reasons why I am determined to succeed in my suit."

In low tones, as though afraid the very trees might hear his secret, Sidney Peyton confided his base tale to the woman seated by his side.

With a heart beating with passionate envy Cara Wyndham learnt that, unknown to all save Sidney Peyton, Muriel Vernon was the heiress to forty thousand pounds.

While travelling in America Peyton had come across a middle-aged Englishman named Forster, who was dying in an out-of-the-way district from the result of an accident.

Mr. Forster had been thrown from his horse and fatally injured.

In the presence of Sidney Peyton and the innkeeper the dying man had signed a will, leaving all his money to the niece whose name and abode were mentioned in the document.

Peyton had faithfully promised to see the will duly carried out, and Mr. Forster died happy in the thought that the niece whom he had so shamefully neglected for such a length of time would now be amply endowed for the rest of her life.

The plan of winning Muriel Vernon for his wife before acquainting her with the news of her wealth had speedily flashed into Sidney Peyton's mind.

Digitized by Google

This scheme it was which had induced him to prolong his visit at "Grangemount." The daily sight of Muriel's beauty and sweetness had but added fuel to his passion, and now Peyton, by fair means or foul, was resolved to win Mr. Forster's heiress for his own wife.

The two conspirators sat on the fallen tree, weaving plot after plot to ruin Muriel's happiness.

In Cara Wyndham's heart raged a storm of violent passions. To her other crime of attracting Neville Dacre Muriel had now added the wickedness of inheriting more wealth than Cara Wyndham.

The passionate woman rose from her seat.

"Trust me, Sidney," she said, clenching her hands tightly. "If you will but follow my instructions Muriel Vernon shall be your wife in less than six months."

The following afternoon Cara Wyndham, clad in a gorgeous dress, seated herself at the writing-table in her own sitting-room.

By the open window, dreamily looking out into the sunlit garden, stood Muriel Vernon. Her thoughts were far away in Ceylon. Only that afternoon she had written to Neville Dacre, telling him how daily she awaited his return, and how slowly the time passed by during his long absence.

Suddenly Cara turned round from the table and accosted her.

"By-the-way, Muriel," said Cara, pausing, pen in hand, and fixing her dark eyes on the girl's fair face, "you remember Mr. Neville Dacre, who used to visit here so frequently last summer?"

What a hypocrite Muriel felt as she forced herself to answer calmly: "Yes, Cara, I remember him perfectly well. Why do you ask?"

"Only because Sidney and I were talking about him this morning. I was rather surprised to hear that he was about to be married very shortly to a wealthy girl."

The floor reeled beneath Muriel's feet; she grasped the window ledge to support her trembling limbs.

"Married!" faltered her suddenly parched lips. "How do you know, Cara?"

Miss Wyndham laughed carelessly.

"Oh, Sidney met this girl somewhere, and she told him of her engagement to a Mr. Dacre of Grangeside. So naturally I came to the conclusion that, as there was only one Grangeside in England, the happy bridegroom must be the Neville Dacre we know."

Her cruel eyes gloated over the sight of Muriel's blanched face.

The girl had swallowed the story even better than she had anticipated.

"But, after all, Dacre is not such an uncommon name," faltered Muriel, forcing herself to speak. "I don't believe——"

Cara interrupted her contemptuously.

"My dear Muriel," she said, with an icy stare, "surely because Neville Dacre indulged in a little flirtation with you the fact of his marriage with a wealthy heiress need not excite you quite so much!"

"Cara, how dare you speak to me in that manner?" cried Muriel, suddenly roused to fury by the unexpected taunt. "Neville Dacre never flirted with me. He is my betrothed husband!"

With her blue eyes flashing wrathfully, her slight form drawn up to its full height, Muriel Vernon seemed utterly transformed from the quiet, gentle girl whom Cara knew.

A scornful laugh broke from Cara's lips

The secret watcher saw Neville rain kisses upon Muriel's brow.

"Mr. Dacre the betrothed husband of my aunt's companion?" she said, fixedly staring at Muriel. "How utterly ridiculous!"

"It is true!" cried Muriel passionately. "I am engaged to Neville Dacre, and until I hear from his own lips that he has given me up I will trust him with all my heart."

As she swept proudly to the door Cara Wyndham's sneering tones again reached her ears.

"Perhaps you are unaware that Mr. Dacre has lost his fortune, and that only a marriage with a wealthy girl can save him from ruin. If I were you I should be ashamed to drag a man down to poverty."

Scarcely had she ended her cruel speech before the door closed violently, and Cara Wyndham found herself alone.

Down the passage Muriel hastened to her own room. Her eyes were blinded with scalding tears and her bosom heaved tumultuously.

Her letter to Neville lay on her dressing-table. She took it up with trembling hands. Should she let the missive go, she asked herself, with all its words of love?

"No," cried Muriel passionately; "Cara is right! I will never drag a man down to ruin. This very afternoon Neville shall be released from his engagement."

Digitized by Google

She dried her eyes impatiently and took out a sheet of fresh notepaper.

Fired with her sense of wrong, Muriel Vernon wrote swiftly the words which surged into her brain:

"I give you back your freedom. From this moment all is at an end between us. I no longer love you.

"Muriel Vernon."

Hastily she inclosed the few lines in an envelope, and directed it to Neville Dacre.

Then, in fear lest her resolution might fail, she rang the bell for the maid, and asked that her letter might be sent at once to the post.

As the maid left the room Muriel's face lost its look of fixed determination.

Her lips quivered brokenly, and with a low moan she threw herself on the bed, weeping as though her heart would break with sorrow.

Little did she guess that at the same moment Cara Wyndham was bending triumphantly over her writing-table, inditing a note to Neville Dacre on the pretence of requiring information about the climate of Ceylon.

"The sting shall lie in the tail," cried the treacherous woman, looking up as she hastily scrawled the following postcript:

"By-the-way, we hope to have a wedding very shortly at 'Grangemount.' My cousin, Mr. Sidney Peyton, who has recently come into a large fortune, is engaged to my aunt's companion, Miss Vernon. I wonder if you remember her. She and Sidney are passionately in love with one another, and I am sure you will acknowledge that Miss Vernon will make a pretty bride."

"There!" murmured Cara Wyndham scornfully, stamping the letter with the seal that hung on her chain, "I think Mr Neville Dacre will be rather surprised to read that Miss Muriel has jilted him for a richer man."

* * * * *

Far away in Ceylon Neville Dacre lay tossing on his bed, delirious with fever. Every now and again his hand plucked restlessly at the coverlet, and a cry of "Muriel! Muriel!" broke from his parched lips.

The fateful letter had accomplished more than Cara Wyndham had wished. On the memorable day when the English mail had arrived Neville Dacre had hastened home in the expectation of finding a letter from his beloved Muriel awaiting him.

Since his residence in Ceylon affairs had gone ill with him. The defalcations were even more serious than at first apprehended, and Neville Dacre, in his anxiety to return to England as soon as possible, threw himself into the difficult task of overhauling his business with more zeal than wisdom. Worried and overworked, his constitution became enfeebled by the climate, and, unknown to himself, the fever already burnt in his veins.

With a strange feeling of giddiness he tore open the letter directed in Cara Wyndham's handwriting, reserving Muriel's epistle to the last.

"Muriel engaged to Sidney Peyton!" he said, mechanically, aloud, as though repeating a lesson. "Miss Wyndham is jesting. Of course she doesn't know Muriel is my promised wife."

Conscious that his brain was beginning to reel still more, Neville seized Muriel's letter and ran his eye quickly over the contents.

For a moment he stood rooted to the spot, unable to understand the full import of the words. He passed his hand over his brow in a vacant, helpless manner.

"I no longer love you—free—all at an end!" said Neville Dacre stupidly. "What does it mean?"

Then, like a lightning flash, the terrible truth burst upon him.

Muriel was false to him—Muriel, whom he had loved so greatly! No, no, it could not be true! And yet the words were in her own handwriting.

Could it be that she had preferred wealth with another man to Neville and comparative poverty? This Peyton was rich and——

His distracted thoughts proceeded no further.

With a cry of anguish Neville Dacre staggered backwards and fell senseless on the floor.

In this condition he was found by his servant, and was carried off to bed, where for many weeks he lay prostrate and unconscious with a raging fever.

In the meantime, at "Grangemount," Muriel Vernon grew daily more wretched with her own thoughts, and under the pressure of Sidney Peyton's attentions. The young man seemed never absent from her side.

One bright morning in September the three were seated at breakfast. Muriel's cheeks were thin and pale, and the dark rings beneath her eyes told of inward trouble and unhappiness.

Despite her letter releasing Neville from his engagement, the girl had hoped against hope that the next mail would bring her word from her lover, rebuking her for her words, and telling her of his faithful love.

But already two mails had come in, and no letter had reached her bearing the welcome postmark.

Silently the unhappy girl sat over her breakfast, her eyes bent on the white cloth, while Sidney Peyton took up the daily paper, and affected to be immersed in its contents.

"Come, Sidney," said Cara Wyndham, briskly, "pray tell me some news. Is there no one married or dead whom we know?"

Peyton's hand trembled slightly as he rustled the newspaper, and feigned to search anxiously down the columns.

"Alice Graham married!" he exclaimed suddenly, in an excited tone.

"Isn't that the great heiress you told me about?" asked Cara Wyndham, noting Muriel's change of colour. "Who is the lucky bridegroom, Sidney?"

Peyton affected to look again at the announcement.

The words that sounded on Muriel Vernon's ear were: "On the 12th instant, Alice, daughter of the late Charles Graham, to Neville Dacre, formerly of Grangeside, England."

"Neville Dacre!" exclaimed Cara, in a tone of affected surprise. "So he is married at last! You told me you thought Miss Graham was engaged to him."

"So I heard," said Peyton, coolly, looking at Muriel's suddenly blanched face with savage joy. "Someone told me she had met this Dacre, and he had fallen head over ears in love with her. And as she was almost a millionairess, I suppose she could afford to marry anyone she liked."

Whiter and whiter had grown Muriel's face.

At any cost she must leave the room and flee from those prying eyes of Peyton's, which seemed to guess her secret.

"Excuse me, Cara," she gasped forth, with a piteous smile. "My—my head aches; I will go to my room."

Her voice quivered brokenly.

She rose from her chair, and, with shaking limbs, tottered from the room. Half fainting, and grasping at the wall for support, she contrived to reach her own chamber.

Uttering a heart-broken cry, she threw herself down on the bed.

Neville was married! Then after all he had proved false! He had forgotten her, and this heiress was now his wife!

"My heart is broken!" moaned the wretched girl.

Downstairs, in full triumph at the success of their stratagem, the two conspirators looked at one another with congratulatory smiles.

"That was a splendid idea to insert this fictitious marriage announcement," said Cara, laughingly. "Muriel will doubtless be weeping her heart out at Neville's perfidy. It will be your task to console her, Sidney."

Peyton smiled vindictively.

"I shall do my best, Cara," he said. "I must persuade Muriel to marry me as soon as possible. It would be very awkward for me if the other witness to the will suddenly took it into his head to inquire if Mr. Forster's directions had been carried out."

The weeks flew by, bringing the fallen leaves of autumn in their train. Muriel Vernon, pale and thin, went about the house trying her utmost to forget her absorbing sorrow. Mrs. Adair daily grew weaker and weaker, and relied more and more upon Muriel's devoted ministrations. Cara Wyndham and Peyton appeared to have taken up their permanent abode at "Grangemount."

Digitized by Google

"Muriel is in the conservatory," said Cara, one cold afternoon in December, when Peyton had come in from a long walk. "Go and talk to her now. Perhaps she will listen more favourably to you."

Cara was seated in the drawing-room. He was about to answer her when the maid entered the room.

"Mr. Neville Dacre," she said, quietly, unconscious of the shock of her announcement. "He is in the library, Miss Wyndham, and wishes to see you immediately."

Both Cara and Peyton had drawn a deep breath of agitation. As the maid left the room the two looked at one another in terrible dismay.

"The game is up!" said Peyton, hurriedly. "He will see Muriel, and find the truth out for himself."

"No, no!" said Cara, in an agitated whisper. "I have a good plan, Sidney."

She came nearer to him, and laid her hand on his sleeve.

"Listen!" she resumed, with blazing eyes. "Neville Dacre will ask if Muriel is yet married. I shall answer 'Yes.' And to prove my words I will bring him into this room. You must go into the conservatory, and contrive that Muriel shall stand with her back to the drawing-room. I will draw the curtains away from the glass door, and, when you hear me cough slightly, seize Muriel in your arms and kiss her passionately. Neville Dacre will then believe my words."

"The game is dangerous," said Peyton, hoarsely; "but I will do anything to keep this man from making his appearance."

Cara glided into the library, her heart beating fast with excitement. At her entrance Neville Dacre confronted her, a stern, set look on his pale face.

"Miss Wyndham," he said, quickly, after the first conventional greetings were over, "I have risen from a sick bed, determined to hear with my own ears that Miss Vernon has been false to me. You were ignorant that, before I left England, she and I were engaged. I cannot believe Muriel is capable of jilting me. Tell me that it is not true!"

His voice faltered, and he looked intreatingly at Cara. Her eyes met his with a sorrowful glance, as though grieved to see his suffering.

"How could Muriel behave in that callous manner?" she cried, reproachfully. "Alas! I regret to say she is already Sidney Peyton's wife. If you will come with me to the drawing-room, you will see for yourself whether Muriel has not forgotten you."

Quickly she led the way to the drawing-room, and with a noiseless footstep drew aside the fold of the velvet curtain. As one in a dream, Neville had followed her, and now stood at her side.

"Look!" exclaimed Cara softly, as she gave a slight, warning cough. "There is Muriel, in her husband's arms!"

Yes, it was true. With his own eyes Neville Dacre beheld the girl he loved lying in Peyton's arms and receiving his kisses on her lips. The sight was too sickening. With a groan he dropped the curtain, and forgetting even to say farewell to Cara Wyndham, he rushed from the house, convinced by his own eyesight that Muriel Vernon was the heartless, mercenary woman he had hitherto refused to believe.

"From henceforward you deal with a man who has overheard all your base conspiracy!" cried Neville.

* * *

"Muriel, how do you like my gown?" asked Cara.

In the luxuriously furnished bedroom of her London house Cara Wyndham stood before a splendid mirror, arrayed for a fashionable reception. A magnificent gold brocade robed her beautiful figure and enhanced the rich tones of her wonderful complexion.

A slight girlish form, dressed in mourning, rose from an armchair and stood beside the heiress.

"Cara, you look superb," said Muriel Vernon, whose pale, sweet face wore a pathetic expression in its large, deep-violet eyes. "You will create a sensation at Lady Temple's."

The diamond tiara in Cara's dark hair flashed brilliantly as the heiress walked slowly along the bedroom, illuminated with the soft light of innumerable wax candles.

"I am glad you think my dress becoming," said Cara, fastening a diamond necklace round her throat. "To-night, Muriel, I want to look my very best."

"Good-night, Cara," said Muriel, with a depressed, tired feeling at her heart. "I hope you will enjoy your evening as much as you wish."

"Sidney Peyton is to be present as well," said Cara, coming across to Muriel and looking down into the girl's violet eyes. "Muriel, when do you intend to reward his devotion?"

"Never!" answered the girl, meeting Cara's glance firmly. "I do not intend to marry anyone, Cara."

Before Cara could answer, Muriel had left the room, and had taken her way downstairs into the street.

That lovely evening in April her thoughts were very bitter. A week after Peyton had insulted her in the conservatory, an insult for which he had apologised contritely, Mrs. Adair had died suddenly.

Digitized by Google

In remembrance of Muriel's devoted services a small annuity was left to her. The girl had come up to London, hoping to obtain some employment, and for the last four months had eked out her annuity by giving music lessons. Of Neville Dacre she had heard nothing further. His house in Grangeside was shut up, and when Muriel left the village it was with the thought that her former lover was still resident with his wife in Ceylon.

Cara Wyndham and Peyton had also come up to London. The former had taken up her residence in town for the season, and Peyton proved a frequent visitor.

The young man grew daily more and more bitter at his non-success with Muriel.

Time after time he met the girl at his cousin's magnificently appointed house; but Muriel still refused to listen to his protestations of love. Little did she dream that Neville Dacre was also in town, and that his name was coupled together by gossips with Cara Wyndham's.

A changed man was Neville Dacre in those last few months. Moody and cynical, he had met Cara Wyndham in town, and in a spirit of recklessness, had plunged into a desperate flirtation with her. Muriel had played him false on account of his poverty, he thought bitterly. Why should he not marry for money, then?

Peyton, of course, kept in the background when Neville made his appearance, and, owing to Cara's skilful management, the two men had never met.

At eleven o'clock that evening Lady Temple's superb mansion was thronged with a brilliant crowd, among whom Cara Wyndham moved restlessly along in the society of her cousin. As yet Neville Dacre had not appeared, and a look of angry disappointment began to creep over Cara's features.

She and Sidney Peyton were sitting together in a dimly-lit alcove, which was divided from an iron balcony by a large screen. Save for the two people the room was deserted.

"Sidney," said Cara suddenly, "I am ashamed of you! Have I not kept up a pretence of friendship all these months with Muriel Vernon simply that you might have an opportunity of meeting her at my house? How is it you have not succeeded in winning her yet?"

Her taunt aroused Peyton's anger. He leant forward, and spoke in a sneering tone.

"Why have you not succeeded in marrying Neville Dacre? Your grand idea in writing that letter hasn't quite accomplished its end. Muriel still loves that man. Suppose I tell Neville Dacre that his old sweetheart lives in London, and is still unmarried? I don't think he would be long before he found himself at No. 14 Pembroke Crescent. What would you say, Cara, if I sent him that address?"

His jeering words filled Cara with a new-born fury. Passionately she answered back, unconscious that Peyton's last words had been overheard by a man who had sauntered idly on to the balcony from the adjoining room.

As Miss Wyndham's angry tones sounded from behind the screen the listener drew nearer and nearer to the pair. His face wore a strange expression; his eyes gleamed with anger as Peyton, in bitter recrimination, recounted savagely the difficulty he had met with in keeping secret the fact of Muriel's inheritance.

"But she shall never know," ended Peyton, sneeringly, "unless she consents to be my wife!"

Suddenly from behind the screen a man's form emerged. Cara Wyndham started violently, and gazed, terrified, at the newcomer. It was Neville Dacre himself!

"This time, Mr. Peyton, you have reckoned without your host!" said Neville, in a cold, stern voice. "From henceforth you deal with a man who has overheard all your base conspiracy! Unless you give up Mr. Forster's will by to-morrow I will place the affair in the hands of the law!"

As he strode fiercely from the room Cara Wyndham sank, half fainting, on the chair. The man for whose love she had plotted and schemed now looked upon her with unutterable loathing and contempt.

Her plots were discovered, and in Neville Dacre's eyes she was for ever outcast and despised.

"Take me away, Sidney!" she gasped, looking up at Peyton with a ghastly expression on her face. "I cannot breathe!"

* * * * * * *

At ten o'clock the next morning Muriel, seated in her quiet, dingy room, heard a thundering knock at the front door.

In another moment a tall, manly form had burst into the room, and ere Muriel could speak Neville Dacre had clasped her to his heart.

"My love! My sweet!" he cried, passionately, raining down kisses on her pale face. "I have come back at last! Darling, say you love me as much as ever!"

"Neville, Neville, you have no right to ask me!" gasped Muriel, trying vainly to release herself from those strong arms. "Where is your wife?"

Neville laughed gleefully.

"Here," he said, pressing a long kiss on her soft mouth. "Muriel, sweetheart, I have much to tell you."

Leading her to a couch, he sat down by her side, and unfolded Cara Wyndham's conspiracy.

"False, malicious woman!" he cried, in anger. "She would have robbed me of my true love, and you of your just inheritance."

Muriel looked up at him with a deep tenderness in her glorious eyes.

"Dear love," she whispered, winding her arms round his neck, "we can afford to forgive her now. Out of our great happiness, dearest, let us give some pity to one who has so deeply sinned."

A great wave of love swept through Neville's heart as the sweet intercessor smiled pleadingly into his face.

"My beloved," he said, gently stroking the golden head which lay against his shoulder, "it shall be as you wish. When Cara Wyndham sues for pardon she shall learn the goodness of the most forgiving soul the world has ever contained!"

* * * * * * *

A year after a broken-down woman crept to Grangeside, and asked humbly for an interview with Mrs. Neville Dacre.

Lovelier and more radiant than ever, Muriel came into the room, and found Cara Wyndham standing by the mantelpiece.

Haggard and worn, she was changed almost beyond recognition, and the sombre black dress she wore accentuated the pallor of her face.

"Muriel," she said, feebly, as the girl came to her with outstretched hands, "I have come to ask forgiveness for all the evil I worked. Six months ago I married Sidney Peyton. My punishment was just. He has gambled away every penny of my fortune, and has now deserted me. Before I leave the country I wish to ask your pardon."

Muriel's sweet eyes looked into those of the penitent woman.

"Fully and freely I forgive you," she said, gently, taking Cara's hand. "My own happiness is too great for words, and if for the moment you darkened my life, I learnt the great lesson that the furnace of affliction only tests and strengthens the value of true, faithful love!"

Harold Prior.

Lady (engaging a footman): "Are you clever at the table?" James: "Yes, mum." Lady: "And you know your way to announce?" James: "Well, mum, I know my weight to a pound or so, but I should hardly like to say to an ounce."

"I want your daughter and a modest dowry to boot," said young Green to old Keener. "Well, I've wanted something to boot for a long time," said the old man, "and I think you'll do very nicely." The defeated suitor disappeared like a lightning flash.

"May I have the pleasure of seeing you home?" he bashfully asked. "Certainly," she graciously replied. "There is a high hill just in front of the house, or, if you prefer it, you can climb a big tree in the field. Go anywhere so that you can get a good view."

Digitized by Google

The Handsome Neighbour.

The Story of an Unjust Suspicion.

"Oh, I am so glad you have come, Maurice!" said pretty little Emma. "If you can't discover what is the matter with Howard, his case is hopeless."

Handsome Maurice Aubray was the very man for an emergency, and had come to his brother's post-haste, summoned by Howard's distressed wife.

"I have just shaken hands with both Howard and your sister," said Maurice. "He looks peevish; but that is nothing new. I suppose you have not indicated the object of my sudden coming?"

"Not a syllable. Marian simply consulted with me as to what would be best. She fears he is losing his mind."

Maurice laughed a little.

"It's rather depressing here. Don't you find it dull?"

Emma blushed, and glanced along the grass, unaccountably disconcerted.

"I—I don't know. I like the country."

"This is the country, with a vengeance! I dare say you have no society at all. Who lives in the house next door?" asked Maurice, scanning the pretty Gothic building through his eyeglass. "A brick wall to divide the two gardens! How odd! Not an asylum, or that sort of thing, is it?"

"Oh, no," replied the young lady. "A young man lives there—a hermit."

"A hermit! Handsome, of course?"

"Oh, very handsome. He is a student, and writes."

"I see—another Tennyson?"

Just then there was a tap on the window-pane. Maurice entered the house quickly. He was met by his sister-in-law—a beautiful woman, whose face was pale and careworn.

"Maurice, your brother is ready to receive you now," she said. "I hope you will be able to clear away this terrible cloud that hangs over us. I have sent for you as a last step."

"I shall do what I can, of course; but are you sure you don't exaggerate matters a little?"

"Not the least. I begin to grow satisfied he is mad. He remains moody and sullen in his room all the time—seldom speaks to me—when a servant knocks at the door he gives way to a burst of fury—all night he paces the floor—are not these things the signs of insanity?"

"Of insanity, or dyspepsia. And can you not imagine whether there is a secret foundation——"

"None—none! I assure you there is not the shadow of a cause. We live like hermits, and under almost no expense. For several years Howard has not spent half his income."

Maurice frowned, and shook his big head

"Puzzling—puzzling," he said. "Well, depend upon me to do my best."

Howard Aubray was in his study. Slender, pale, and dark, he looked the picture of an invalid; and this effect was heightened by another fact—he was crippled. He sat in his chair, silent, gloomy, and suffering; his cheek resting upon his hand. At the entrance of Maurice, he did not rise, but peevishly offered his hand.

"I am glad to see you, Maurice," he said; "though you probably don't think so. Sit down—tumble those books off that armchair. What on earth has brought you to this forlorn place?"

"Wanted a change of air and scene," answered Maurice briskly. "My old rule, you know—bird of passage."

"You always were an active spirit, it is true; and I, passive as a stone monument. Don't you think I look like the fiend himself?"—and he cast a sour sneer at the cornice.

"You don't look well, I admit, and I know very well there is something at the bottom of it."

"There is!" said the invalid, clenching his fingers with sudden fury. "I am the most miserable dog alive, and I couldn't hide it if I would. It is strange I have not blown my brains out long ago."

"Well, what's the trouble? Some nonsense, I dare say."

"Yes; very foolish," said Howard Aubray, with a short laugh. "Amusing enough to others not in the same fix."

"Owe money?"

"I owe vengeance—a debt that is accumulating from hour to hour, from minute to minute, at compound interest!" he cried, rising and limping about the floor. "I have discovered that my wife is in love with my handsome neighbour! Too absurd, isn't it, to treat seriously? Such an old story, you know; but it ends tragically sometimes!"

"What do you mean?"

"You, perhaps, noticed the pretty house next door? A very good-looking and very fascinating young man lives there—Mr. Ashley Travers. He is not a sulky cripple like me, and the lady who passes for my wife has been discerning enough to see the difference."

Maurice heard this with alarm and pain. Of all the conjectures he had made regarding the cause of his brother's conduct, the miserable truth that he was on the rack of jealousy had never entered his mind.

"You cannot be serious," he said.

"Perhaps you will learn better soon. I am waiting, and on the watch; the drama draws to a close."

"We never had anything from each other in the old days, Howard," said Maurice, kindly. "Many a scrape we were in together, and many the licking we shared, eh? Do you remember the time we took away the eggs from old Willock's hen and put goose, turkey, and duck, and all sorts of other eggs under her? And have you forgotten old Willock's fright when his old hen came marching out of her nest one morning with almost every feathered thing in creation among her brood, instead of the expected Brahmas? And don't you recollect the unmerciful trimming we caught at home? My bones ache yet!"

Digitized by Google

Maurice was laughing uproariously over these reminiscences, and his mirth was contagious, for his brother laughed too, long and heartily—evidently for the first time in many months.

"Why, then, can't you trust me as fully now as you did in those times, Howard?" continued Maurice, following up his advantage. "I hope I am as true, and certainly there is no doubt I am much less giddy. I have learnt a thing or two in all these years."

"You always were shrewd and clever, Maurice, and perhaps I had better be frank with you after all. You know what a life I am forced to lead, and Marian has been forced to share it. She has not had my resignation; her love has been a woman's love—ardent enough to begin with, but cooling with time and trial. Her fidelity has changed from that pretty sentiment we read of in poetry to that other sort we too often experience—the fidelity of a slave who clings to you because he can't get away."

"This is unjust—most cruel! You wrong her; she never loved you more devotedly, Howard."

"She has been holding conference with you, I see," said Howard, with a dark, peevish smile. "What she has said will weigh nothing against what I have seen. Last night I was standing at the window at the top of the staircase. All kinds of idle fancies were in my mind. Suddenly I looked down into the garden, and—I suppose you noticed the brick wall which divides it from that next door?—two persons stood there—my wife, in her white hood, was one, lingering on this side of the wall and leaning over. On the other side stood my handsome neighbour, Mr. Ashley Travers. I watched them with a good deal of interest. It was a situation suggestive of that in Millais' picture. Presently Mr. Travers leant over and kissed my wife, she waved her hand, and they separated. These things I saw, remember."

Maurice looked very grave and disturbed. "But you have been troubled for weeks, they tell me."

"With good reason; about a month ago I found a love-letter, in my wife's handwriting, which first gave rise to my suspicions."

"Indeed!"

"Judge of this for yourself."

He handed his brother a note in Marian's well-known penmanship, and these were the contents:

"My Own Ashley,—You are too imprudent; sometimes I believe we are observed. Patience, and all may yet be well. In any event, do not doubt my love and faith."

"I don't know what to think," said Maurice, as he handed the note back. "I thought Marian the purest and best of women. My advice is, to go to her at once and demand an explanation."

Howard Aubray laughed bitterly.

"She could explain it, of course—what woman could not? You don't know the cunning of the sex, my good brother. She would give me such a plausible explanation that I should rather doubt my own senses than not accept it. No! You know what I mean to do?"

"You must not act rashly. Come, let us take a good long drive together, and have the benefit of the fresh air. I am ready to act with you in anything that concerns your honour; but sometimes there are things done which cannot be undone."

Howard Aubray did not care to go; but his brother insisted. They rode far away together, discussing but the one wretched subject; and night had fallen as they returned. The horse and vehicle were given to the groom at the gate, and the two brothers walked towards the house on foot.

The moon was just visible through the trees. Everything round about was cut white and sharp in its brilliant light.

So pleasant was the scene that, for the moment, Howard, also, forgot everything in contemplation. There was not a chord in his nature unmoved. The air, stirred very lightly by the breeze, was full of that peculiar fragrance which belongs to a summer evening in the country. Bright as the moon was, its splendour did not dim a single constellation, and overhead the heavens glittered with the stars that had mustered there.

"Intoxicating!" murmured Howard.

They went on, passing the garden gate, the latch tinkling softly; and then quietly across the deep grass. The fire-flies were darting about, and from the distance came the deep-mouthed bay of a watch-dog.

Suddenly Howard paused.

"Look!" he said, his eyeballs fierce and round in the moonlight, and his face pale as death.

By the brick wall on this side stood a woman with a white hood on her head. It was Marian.

On the other side stood a young man, tall and dark. He held her hand, and her arm shone white as ivory under the golden shimmer that fell streaming from the stars.

Suddenly he leant over and kissed her.

With a horrid oath of fury and despair, Howard Aubray took something from his breast and held it before him. There was a flash and a report, and then a scream. The figure reeled and fell.

Maurice ran towards her instantly, and, falling on his knee, raised her up. It was not Marian—but poor little Emma!

* * * * *

Happily the wound was not serious, or the result of a hypochondriac's diseased imagination might have wrought a more costly cure than followed as soon as he had discovered the truth. That his pretty sister-in-law should, in the absence of other occupation, fall deeply in love with a handsome neighbour, was the most natural event in the world. That, knowing Howard's prejudice, she should conceal her passion, was no more strange. But at first it seemed odd that she should wear Marian's hood, though that also was presently explained when it appeared that the article was particularly bewitching to Mr. Ashley Travers' senses, and the young lady had none of her own. There remained only one dark doubt—the love-letter.

"Well," said Emma, defiantly, "everybody can't write a good hand. I never could. Marian was always clever with her pen, and I don't think it was any more than sisterly service to come to my assistance."

"Nor was it," said Howard, kissing his wife.

Walter Edgar McCann.

To Those About to Marry.

Don't let the knot be tied without knowing something about the character and disposition of each other. This you can find out by sending a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope, to Ranee, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. In return an accurate delineation of your character will be sent. If you both obtain these delineations, and then compare them, you will be able to decide whether a happy marriage is likely to result.

Digitized by Google

Exciting Series.

DECOYED!

Told by the Decoy Herself.

A Striking Series of Astonishing Revelations.

OF WHOM YOU READ.

Vivienne D'Alton, the decoy. She, an innocent girl, unwittingly leads young gentlemen of good social standing to their ruin at the hands of the man she believes to be her father.

Beverley D'Alton, who poses as a millionaire who has made his money by judicious speculation. He assumes to lavish great affection on Vivienne.

Mrs. Sherwood. A florid person, who is introduced to Vivienne by her father as a great friend of her dead mother. She lives with the D'Altons, and requests Vivienne to call her "Aunt Flora," which the young girl reluctantly does.

Annchen. A lady's maid, whom Vivienne greatly detests She seems to be on very familiar terms with Mrs Sherwood and Mr. D'Alton.

TENTH EPISODE.

Under Hypnotic Influence!

On the instant all my old doubts and fears made themselves felt; and, hurriedly stepping forward, I put a detaining hand on the poor dazed creature's arm.

"Miss D'Alton," I murmured eagerly, "do you remember me?"

A little cry of joy answered me, followed by broken words of sorrow. "I do not know. I remember nothing! Oh, why has this terrible affliction befallen me?"

"Come, none of that," said the "Bird of Evil Omen." "Policeman, just move this crowd, till I get my aunt into a cab."

"Do nothing of the sort," I enjoined. "This lady is Miss D'Alton, my great-aunt. That man is a scoundrel, who is an entire stranger to her, and I shall hold you responsible if you let her fall into his clutches."

"But what am I to do, miss? I can't keep her here."

"No. Send that man away. Then I will tell you what to do with Miss D'Alton."

The "Bird of Evil Omen" protested against being baulked of his prey. But my dress, my carriage, my servants, and my evident wealth, carried weight, and the fellow was hustled to the outside of the crowd, where he could hear nothing.

"Here are three sovereigns," I whispered to the policeman. "If you will take Miss D'Alton where she will be absolutely safe from enemies, and will see that she is kindly looked after until I fetch her myself, you shall have ten pounds more, But, mind, don't let her out of your care to anyone but myself. I shall not send for her, nor write for her. I will come myself and will perhaps bring a doctor. You understand?"

The policeman did understand, and said so. Then he added in a low voice: "Perhaps I'd better not say where I'll take the lady. But you can find out if you will inquire for P.C. 941 at Marlborough Street Police Station."

Satisfied that the policeman was discreet, I handed him my card, and then turned to Miss D'Alton.

"If you will go with this constable, and wait till I come to you, all will be well. But please do as he tells you."

Although Miss D'Alton's memory was gone, she was sane enough to understand that I was her friend, and readily promised obedience. Then I saw her driven off in a hansom, and, forgetting all about the nerve tonic, I re-entered the carriage and gave the order to drive home.

Dr. Farnie said that I was subject to malignant delusions. But surely this could not be a delusion? Yet where did the connection between the "Bird of Evil Omen" and Miss D'Alton come in? Was it possible that somebody had been playing tricks with the old lady's memory? And was that why she never came back to dine with me as she had promised?

If she fell into evil hands soon after she visited me, that would account for her continued absence. And—sinister thought!—if she was merely an impostor, as my father and Mrs. Sherwood had told me, who could have an interest in depriving her of the faculty of memory? If, on the other hand, she was not an impostor, what else could I think but that she was being deliberately kept out of the way by—no, I daren't say the names even to myself!

Some curious feeling on the subject must, however, have possessed me when I refrained from taking the old lady home with me, and, still more strange, in spite of what had been told me against her, I no longer doubted in my own mind that she was really my father's aunt.

And the "Bird of Evil Omen." How many times had I seen him? Once this afternoon, when he was trying to decoy Miss D'Alton. Once at Knightsbridge, when he was about to assassinate Viscount Broomville. Once on board the boat in which we crossed over from Rotterdam. And once outside Rotterdam, on the night Mr. Graysworthy was murdered.

"Mr. Graysworthy! Why, he also had dealings with my father, and——"

It was a mercy that the carriage stopped opposite our own house, for my thoughts were swirling towards madness again, and it was almost a wreck of a girl who walked slowly indoors.

Digitized by Google

Within the entrance hall the fountain was playing. It was now dusk, and the wonderful arrangement of palms and electric lights, which converted the place into a veritable fairyland, was being fully appreciated by Dr. Farnie. He was sitting in an American rocking-chair, but he rose to his feet to meet me when he saw me enter.

"H'm!" he said, looking critically at my pale face. "I'm afraid your outing has not done you much good. You had better let me give you a dose of the tonic at once."

"The tonic?" I faltered. "Why, I forgot to ask for it."

"You forgot to ask for it? Then you have been enjoying yourself so much that you forgot your ailments?"

The doctor, as was quite natural, hardly looked pleased at my admission, but I hastened to soothe his wounded professional pride by saying: "No, doctor, that isn't it. I really tried at one or two shops, and then something happened which put self out of my head altogether."

"Won't you sit down here and tell me all about it?"

I had only about enough time to be dressed for dinner, and I knew that my father liked me to be punctual. But the doctor's manner and voice were infectiously soothing, and, with a sigh of relief, with which all my worries seemed to take flight, I sank into the chair he had just vacated. Then I told him what had happened while I was out. Still, notwithstanding the fact that I had once more relegated my wild suspicions to the realms of nightmare, I instinctively resisted the strong impulse to be quite frankly confidential, and my story had several important reservations.

For instance, I did not betray the fact that I had seen the "Bird of Evil Omen," otherwise Kaspar, at any time before this evening, and I spoke of him as a loafer who apparently wanted an opportunity of robbing the unfortunate old lady who had lost her memory.

"She came here once and claimed to be my father's aunt," I added. "But both he and Aunt Flora assured me that she was nothing of the sort. Still, that was no reason why I should leave her at the mercy of a street hooligan, so I gave the policeman some money, and told him to take her to a place of safety."

"Yes?"

Dr. Farnie was listening with an air of intense eagerness, which gave place to apparent chagrin when I answered: "That is all."

"But you must know where the old lady was taken to?"

"Indeed I do not. I left it to the policeman's judgment. Perhaps he has taken her to the workhouse infirmary."

I was firmly convinced that the answer I gave was both necessary and wise. But I was possessed by a most extraordinary feeling, which seemed to command me to be confidential against my own better judgment, and it was only by dint of determined mental resistance that I was able to be discreet.

In the light of after events I know exactly what was the matter with me. The doctor was a hypnotist, and he was trying his power upon me. To some extent he was successful. But I still retained the ability to resist his influence in part, and that accounts for the fact that he was not altogether successful in compelling my confidence.

Nevertheless, he again managed to impress upon me the idea that certain terrible doubts of mine were nothing but chimerical fancies, and when I subsequently met my father and Aunt Flora at dinner, I felt as amiably disposed towards them as I did when I went out to buy the "nerve tonic."

Both were in the best of spirits, and both inquired kindly after my health, but not with ostentatious solicitude, for we had several guests to dinner, and they naturally kept every anxiety in the background.

"This is a most delightful meeting, Miss D'Alton," murmured a stout, middle-aged gentleman who sat next to me at the dinner table, and whom I recognised as Prince Alexander Gorouki, a wealthy Russian whom I had met a few times. "I have dreamt of some such blissful moment as this ever since—since—ever since we parted, two days ago."

I glanced up at the speaker in mild astonishment, for he did not look like the kind of person to be airing "Love's young dream." But his gaze was as ardent as his words, and, though I could not help feeling flattered at having charmed so exalted a personage as a prince, I blushed with confusion at the open manner in which he showed his admiration.

Nor was my embarrassment lessened when I glanced across the table and saw Lord Balder scowling fiercely at His Highness, and my relief was great, in more senses than one, when a telegram from Sophie Melrose was handed to me.

"Arrived Edinburgh—all well," she wired. "Letter to follow."

This telegram showed another of my doubts to have been unfounded, and I should have enjoyed the rest of the evening all right if the impetuous wooing of Prince Gorouki had not been so practically supported by my father.

In the drawing-room the Prince never left my side, and he actually contrived an opportunity to ask me to marry him. It was on my lips to say "No." For, though my girlish vanity was undoubtedly flattered, I knew I could never care for this hopelessly plain-looking man. But, strange to say my will seemed suddenly to lose control of my words. Then, as I murmured something which the Prince interpreted as "Yes," I looked up and saw Dr. Farnie's piercing eyes gazing straight at me.

What followed seems like a dream. The Prince gleefully announced my acceptance there and then. My father gave me a paternal kiss, and spoke a mixed sort of speech, in which he alternately lamented the prospective loss of his only child, and gloated over his ability to give her a dowry worthy of the rank which was to be hers.

Lord Balder had taken a hurried departure. But Aunt Flora and the doctor were profuse in their congratulations, and I went to bed that night, knowing that I had promised to marry a man I did not like, but that my will was so held captive that there seemed to be no way of escape for me.

* * * * *

When Susan came to attend to me the next morning, her face was wreathed in smiles, and she handed a tiny package to me, with the words:

"From His Highness the Prince. His man brought it just now."

I had spent a sleepless night, not in dwelling upon my coming grandeur, but in wondering how I could escape it, and in thinking how happy I should have felt if Viscount Broomville had been my promised husband, instead of the man who had won my consent through no willingness on my part. I could even yet hardly understand how it was that I found myself pledged to marry somebody whom I did not love, and it was with a painful sense of helplessness that I opened the little package that Susan had brought to me so proudly.

It contained a wildly extravagant love-letter, in which I was implored to settle the wedding-day forthwith. The ring which accompanied the letter was a scintillating diamond half-hoop, which I would fain—if I had dared—have thrown away from me, for was it not the outward and visible sign of future bondage?

"I won't wear it," I whispered to myself. "I won't wear it! I was mad to answer the Prince in so halting a fashion, that he mistook my 'No' for 'Yes.' It was wrong, too, for I can never marry him."

"And the master says, please will you come down punctually at half-past nine, miss? He wants to speak to you before His Highness calls, and that will be at ten o'clock."

Ten o'clock! And it was already eight! Was I only to have two more hours of freedom before the bargain was clinched beyond undoing? Or had I still time to escape from the net which seemed about to enmesh me?

"Susan," I said, "are there any letters for me?"

"The postman has not been yet."

"Then run downstairs at once, and be careful to secure every letter intended for me. Mind, it is important. Don't let anybody else touch them."

Digitized by Google

Susan, who very likely wondered at receiving such an order, ran off to do my bidding, while I drank the cup of tea she had brought me. Then, both bodily and mental activity suddenly returned to me and I hastily began to dress myself, preparatory to going out.

"I have time to take a hansom and find Miss D'Alton before breakfast, and to see if the antidote will have any effect upon her. If it turns out that her ailment is not amenable to the antidote mentioned in the book of poisons. I shall then be more convinced than ever that my doubts are unfounded.

"Please, miss, I was too late to catch the postman. Mrs. Sherwood had the letters, and she says that there are none for you."

This was the message brought up by Susan, and I felt more disappointed than I could say to hear that Sophie Melrose had not written to me, according to promise. However, there were many things which might have hindered her, and I strove to make the best of my disappointment, the while I hurried softly downstairs, and watched my opportunity to slip out unobserved.

In this I was successful, and, walking up Park Lane, I took a hansom at the Marble Arch, and was soon on my way to the Marlborough Street Police Station. Arrived there, I made inquiry for P.C. 941. He was not on duty, but he had evidently expected me, for he had left a message to the effect that if I would call at his address, I should find my relative all right.

The place was not far from the police station, and I was just about to give the cabman the order to drive thither, when my attention was attracted to two men across the street, both of whom seemed to be considerably interested in watching my own movements.

One of them was unknown to me. But the other was the "Bird of Evil Omen," and I guessed at once that he was biding his time to discover what had become of Miss D'Alton. It had no doubt been easy enough to connect the policeman with the police-station. But, in the density of traffic which prevailed at the time Miss D'Alton was driven away, the fellow must have lost track of the hansom, hence his espionage of the police-station.

Now, the sight of this man had exactly the opposite effect to that produced by Dr. Farnie. The one laid all my doubts to rest. The other revived every one of them in full force, and I knew that his near vicinity prognosticated disaster to somebody.

In this case I believed Miss D'Alton to be the victim aimed at, and, with overpowering force, there came to me the conviction that she must, after all, be a person of some importance. Otherwise, what reason could there be for pursuing her?

"I will get the antidote prepared at the nearest seed shop," was my instant determination. "If I can restore the unfortunate old lady to her normal senses again, she will be able to denounce her enemies and keep out of their clutches."

"Drive to the nearest place at which I can buy some bulbs," was the order I gave, and I soon found myself entering an establishment at which it would be easy to procure what I wanted.

But, oddly enough, I did not appear to be alone in this intention. The "Bird of Evil Omen" had been equally expeditious. So had the other man who seemed to be watching me at Marlborough Street. And, still more curious, their business took them to the same counter to which I was shown!

I tried to appear to take no notice. But I was shaking all over, and even my voice trembled as I asked for some tulip bulbs. There was a basket of these on the counter, side by side with a basket of lily bulbs and another of hyacinths. Without asking the price of any of them, I took three big tulip bulbs and asked the assistant to put them in a paper-bag for me. I intended to visit a chemist next, to have the juice properly expressed, but was wondering all the time what the person at my elbow meant to do with the hyacinth bulbs he was buying.

Could there be any special antidotal virtue in the latter? Or was Kaspar Krause merely planning to keep me in sight, so as to prevent me from carrying out my purpose?

I carefully kept my back turned to the fellow. But I knew he was there, and I was undoubtedly frightened of him. Still, I did not actually see how he dared harm me in broad daylight, and in the presence of other people, and I was just turning to pick up my purchase, after paying for it, when there was a stifled exclamation, a muttered oath, and a short scuffle, followed by the violent expulsion of the "Bird of Evil Omen."

"I beg everybody's pardon, more particularly yours, Miss D'Alton," said the man whom I had already fancied to be watching me, and whose voice I joyfully recognised as that of Lord Broomville, though his outward disguise seemed still perfect. "The fact is," he continued, as he grasped my hands warmly in his, "I knew that fellow meant fresh mischief, and I have kept him under surveillance this last day or two."

"But that does not excuse you from violently ejecting a customer from our shop," interposed the angry manager, whose wrath was, however, appeased on the instant when Lord Broomville presented his card, with the words: "Sir. I will gladly pay any loss you may have suffered. But I thought it time to interfere when I saw your customer slyly changing his packet of bulbs for those bought by this lady."

"Did he do that?" I exclaimed, in greater excitement than ever. "If so, there can no longer be any doubt that it is important to secure some tulip juice at once. Listen, Lord Broomville, I have a strange tale to tell you."

Drawing his lordship out of hearing of everybody else, I began a rapid and succinct recital of my reasons for wanting to experiment upon Miss D'Alton, but without implicating either my father or Mrs. Sherwood, and explained how the "Bird of Evil Omen" seemed to be trying to baffle my attempts.

"He shall baffle you no more," was the assurance given me. "I have been on his track for awhile, and he is just about at the end of his tether."

"And so are you, impostor, and rogue that you are!" interrupted my father's loud, angry voice, and heavy hands were simultaneously laid upon both Lord Broomville and myself. "Constable, do your duty! Arrest the cheat who palms himself off as Lord Broomville. As for you, Vivienne, you will yet live to be thankful that I traced you before your elopement was an accomplished fact. Dr. Farnie, take her home."

And then, though my whole nature tried to resist the baleful influence brought to bear upon me, I had no sooner met the gaze of Dr. Farnie's mystic eyes, than I was powerless to do anything but allow myself to be taken homewards, while my unfortunate champion was forcibly handcuffed and hustled into a four-wheeler.

(Another instalment of this exciting series next week.)

Farthest South.

A wonderful story of the perils, hardships, and privations endured by explorers in the Far South is told by Lieutenant Shackleton, of the "Discovery," in the current number of PEARSON'S MAGAZINE. The "Discovery" was fitted out by the Royal Society and the Royal Geographical Society, and dispatched to penetrate as far as possible towards the South Pole. Though the ship itself became frozen in, Captain Scott, the Commander of the Expedition, headed a sledge expedition which actually penetrated to within 463 miles of the Pole, beating all existing records by over 200 miles.

Lieutenant Shackleton made one of the party, and he tells us how they spent Christmas Day on practically the most southerly point of the earth's surface trodden by the foot of man. No one should miss a chance of reading this wonderfully interesting narrative.

Digitized by Google

KITTY THE COOK.

And How She Married Her Mistress' Son.

WHEN Harry Calton and his bosom friend, Jack Manners, on the same day, in the same church, married Mabel Lawton and her dearest friend, Fanny Keywood, a contract was made between the two couples. It was this: They bound themselves that if one family had a son and the other had a daughter, that son and daughter, when they arrived at a proper age, should become man and wife.

There was nothing novel or original in such an agreement; if there had been, the parties to the contract would never have made it, for they were neither novel nor original in anything—they were simply maudlin with romance, and this covenant was merely the effect, of which a strict attention to novels, love tales, and plays was the cause. So much by way of prologue.

Now for our story.

Calton and Manners had died full of years and gout and rheumatism, and each had left a large fortune to his wife.

They had each left, as well, a child—Calton a daughter named Kitty, Manners a son named Richard, otherwise Dick. The old men had forgotten, long before their deaths, all about their agreement on their wedding-day; but not so with the mothers. They had been in correspondence for the last five years about nothing else.

The children had now reached their majority, and the mothers were anxious for the consummation of the plan.

"Mother," said Dick, at the breakfast-table, "there is no use in urging that girl Kitty's suit, for I will never marry her."

"How do you know, my son? You have not seen her for twelve years, and you might be delighted with her," returned Mrs. Manners coaxingly.

"I know I shouldn't," Dick said. "She was a red-headed abomination when she was a child, and I'm certain she's the same now."

"Oh, Richard!"

"Even if she was as handsome as Eve, I wouldn't marry her. I'd feel disgusted the moment I met her, and so would she if she had any sense. We'd be introduced, we'd look at each other, and say to ourselves, 'And this is the person I've got to marry!' and then we would hate each other."

"Well, it seems to me, Dick, that you might at least wait until you see each other, before you make up your mind. This is too bad," whined Mrs. Manners, wiping her eyes with a napkin, and not discovering her mistake until she rubbed some mustard into her blue orbs, which occasioned the use of her handkerchief in good earnest—"just when I thought I had such good news for you!"

"What is the news?"

"She's coming here."

"Who? Kitty Calton?"

"Yes. I received a letter this morning from her mother, saying Kitty would start in a day or two."

"Oh, Heavens," groaned Dick. "You must stop her," he said seriously. "If she comes, I go. I know what she'll be; a little stuck-up person, full of the French airs she acquired by studying abroad for twelve years; she'll say, Mon Dieu, and ma foi, and she'll talk about her naiveté and gaucherie and her chic; she'll speak bad French in the present tense, indicative mood, of the first conjunction, and she'll commence all her questions with Est-ce-que, and then stick like the young man at the Veneerings' party. I sha'n't see her, that's settled. Write to her mother and say we are going on a visit, and we don't know when we will return; or, better, go to town, see Mrs. Calton, explain openly that I will never marry a Frenchified wax doll, but that I want a wife who knows how to keep a house in order, can cook, preserve, sweep, bake, darn, sew, mend, dust, and, as the advertisements say, 'make herself generally useful.' In short, a woman like my respected mother; and, so that you may kill two birds with one stone, find a cook who can cook, and fetch her back with you."

An idea seemed to strike Mrs. Manners, and she answered gaily:

"Well, Dick, everything is for the best. If you won't marry her, you won't; so I'll do as you say."

After breakfast she made a hurried toilette, and took the first train for the city.

Towards evening she returned with as pretty a little piece of femininity as Dick had ever seen before. The dainty, curly-haired little woman straight-way went to the kitchen, and then Mrs. Manners informed her son that she had made matters all right with Mrs. Calton, and that the pretty conglomeration of muslin, curls, pink and white, was a new cook she had engaged.

With the advent of the new cook came luxuries such as had never been seen on the Manners' table before. The cuisine was perfect. Richard's stockings were mended so neatly that an old pair of socks was better than a new pair. His shirts, too, were washed and ironed so perfectly that their whiteness and gloss caused envy in the bosoms of all his male friends.

But another change had been effected by the cook. The pink and white young lady, whom the hottest fire never made red and white, was accustomed to take a seat in the sitting-room in the evening and attend to her sewing—the kitchen being locked up—to save gas, Mrs. Manners said; and Dick remained at home at nights, something unusual for him.

In fact, Dick was in love with the cook, and he found a hundred excuses a day to go to the kitchen and have a word or two with the curly-headed little woman.

At first she was very cold to him, but gradually, as she saw his respect increase with his love, the ice of her reserve began to melt under the warmth of his passion, and the young man was correspondingly happy.

At length Dick found himself so entangled in the net of love that nothing but marriage would free him; so he entered the kitchen one afternoon, and, with a preamble, proposed marriage.

"Will you marry me?" said he.

"No; I will not," she answered.

"Why?"

"I'm a cook, and you're a gentleman."

"You're a lady as well as a cook, and fit to be a gentleman's wife."

"I daresay I am; but I don't want to be a cook all my life."

"Then marry me."

"And work to support you?

"Why, my dear, I'm rich!"

"You mean your mother is."

"Well, she would deny me nothing."

"I don't know about that. You don't know how she'd act if you married her cook. Besides, I've no fancy for a man who can't support himself and his wife without help from his mother. I understand you, Dick, and I admit that I love you."

Digitized by Google

"My darling!" he cried, embracing her.

"There, now, stop. You wouldn't marry a wax doll of a girl who couldn't keep a house in order, cook, carve, preserve, darn, mend, sew, dust, and sweep. I heard you say so."

"That is true," ruefully remarked Dick.

"Well, I will not marry a man who cannot support me by his own labour. I don't want a club-house swell or a man of Society for a husband; I want a real man, a hard-fisted workman, who can knock down a giant if he harms me; a good honest son of toil, one whom I'll be proud to point out as my husband, and on whose shoulder I can lean my head, and, confident of his strong love, know no fear in the world."

"What do you want me to do, my darling?"

"Learn a trade; be a man—an independent man. When you have earned enough money to buy a set of furniture, and can show me that you are able to support me, I'll say, 'Dick, I'm yours.'"

"I'll do it," cried Dick.

Next day, without a word of opposition from his mother, which he thought rather strange, he left home, went to the City, and made arrangements with a friend of his, a carpenter and builder, to learn a trade.

Dick was a natural mechanic. No workman was ever needed at home; he mended everything. There was no tool he couldn't use, and, therefore, at the end of six months there was not a journeyman in the shop that could compare with him for good work. Then he rented a little shop, and set up for himself.

Strange to say, his first order came from Mrs. Calton to thoroughly repair three of her new houses.

Mrs. Calton recommended him to all her property-owning friends.

At the end of a year he had a really good business.

Then he went home one Saturday night, with a bank-book and a plain gold ring in his pocket. He went in the kitchen; no one was there.

On his way upstairs he met his mother. Embraces followed, and he asked:

"Where's Kate?"

We have hitherto neglected to mention that the cook's name was Kate.

"Not in," answered Mrs. Manners; "but Kitty Calton is upstairs; come and be presented."

"Hang Kitty Calton!" said he.

"There need be no embarrassment, Dick; she's engaged."

"Oh, she is, eh? Well, come along."

"Miss Calton, my son," said Mrs. Manners, presenting him

Dick looked up.

"What!" he yelled, looking at the lady. "Kate, by Jove! what does this mean?"

"I'm Kitty Calton and Kate, the cook, too. I tried you, my dear, and you stood the test nobly. You've proved yourself my ideal of a man. Take me, if you will, my darling."

And he did take her, while the old lady discreetly looked out of the window, and thought of her youth.

"And you were all in the plot against me, eh?" asked he.

"Yes," exclaimed the ladies, half frightened now they were found out,

"Well, I'm glad of it. Kate, you've made a man of me. I insisted on my wife being a worker, and it's a poor rule that won't work both ways."

Three days after, the little village church—but, pshaw! the intelligent reader can guess the rest.

R. Durrant.

The young man was talking to the wealthy widow on the absorbing topic of marrying her daughter. In fact, he had gained the widow's consent to the match, and she was adding a few flourishes to the daughter. "You know," she said, rather diffidently, "that my daughter is not poor." "Oh," he responded, encouragingly, "don't worry about that. I'm poor enough for two."

Our New Competition.

You will find full particulars of our new competition on page 337. I hope that you all will enter it. There is absolutely no reason why you should not, for everyone has an equal opportunity. The competition will form a profitable and fascinating pastime. Before you start, however, read the conditions carefully. They are quite simple and straightforward. No correspondence in connection with the rules can be entered into, but should any point of importance arise it will be dealt with in Short Stories.

A Splendid New Serial.

In a very few weeks' time now there will start in this paper a grand new serial story written by the well-known author, Arnold Bennett. This is a story of very strong force, and its plot and characters are interesting in the extreme. The heroine is a young lady who, the daughter of a multi-millionaire, is accustomed to have her own way in everything, at the same time, however, remaining a most lovable personage. I feel sure that Mr. Arnold Bennett's story will be highly appreciated by all the present readers of the paper, and at the same time will attract a great number of fresh subscribers. Next week I will tell you something more about it.

The Tenth Unsolved Love Problem.

"The Heart of Claire Gilchrist," which will be the tenth in our series of our Unsolved Love Problems, will appear next week. I shall offer a prize of one guinea in connection with it. The problem is a very pretty one and nobody should miss reading it or refrain from attempting to solve it.

As soon as possible I will publish the name of the successful competitor in the Ninth Problem Competition.

A Japanese Cover.

The cover of next week's number will be an exceedingly pretty one. It will illustrate an intensely dramatic Japanese love story, written by a favourite contributor to this paper. Nobody can fail to like either the daintiness of the cover design nor the power of the splendid tale. Look out for it on the bookstalls and in the newsagents' windows

A Prize of a Hansom Cab and a Horse.

The Editor of The Big Budget is offering the above novel prize in a competition that has just started in his paper. Procure a copy of this week's B.B. and read all about it. It may be worth your while.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

THE HOUSE IN THE CORNFIELD.

Telling How the Scheme of Wild Kate Failed.

"Oh, dear!" uttered a sweet, distressed voice, so suddenly and so distinctly that Ray Braddon reined in his horse, with a muttered exclamation of surprise, for he had believed himself to be quite alone on the dusty highway.

What he saw, on turning his head a little to one side, was a demure little creature with big blue eyes, red, ripe, strawberry lips, and rippling, fair hair.

She was half sitting, half reclining on a mossy bank, and it needed but that first startled glance to assure the young man that she was in trouble of some sort. In an instant he had leapt to the ground, rushed to her side, and was asking anxiously:

"What is the matter, miss? Are you hurt?"

Her big, frightened eyes scanned his face earnestly, for a few fateful seconds, as he bent over her, and then she cried, with a half-repressed moan of pain:

"Oh, my ankle! I'm afraid it is broken."

Her head dropped back, her eyes closed, and she looked so white, and lay so motionless, that Ray felt sure she had fainted.

He was mistaken, however. Feeling greatly distressed and perplexed, and not at all equal to the emergency, the young man had scarcely begun to think what available resources were at hand, when the long lashes lifted again, and a second searching glance was flashed into his face.

"You must think me very silly, sir," and a flickering smile parted the tempting lips. "But I'm not used to pain, and am such an arrant coward——"

"Pray don't speak of it," Ray interrupted, more earnestly than he was aware. "But if you will tell me what I can do to save you I shall be much obliged."

"My friends will be dreadfully frightened."

"Shall I find them, and send them to you?"

"And leave me here alone until they can be brought?" she cried, in a dismayed voice. "Oh, no, no!"

Observing his wondering stare, she added:

"I must have lain here an hour already. I slipped down a little way off, but managed to crawl to the roadside. Oh, you don't know how dreadful it is—the loneliness, and the—the—pain, I mean! I was getting more nervous and hysterical every minute."

Covering her face with both hands, she began to sob piteously. The sight of her distress stirred Ray's chivalrous spirit as nothing had stirred it for many a long day.

"Never mind, I won't leave you," he said, reassuringly. "But I suppose something must be done. If you could only ride my horse, now——"

"How good you are!" she exclaimed, lifting a face in which smiles were already chasing away the tears. "Yes, I'm sure I can ride, and then you need not leave me——"

The rose-red flush that crept up to the softly-flowing hair aided the sentence more eloquently than words could have done.

"Are you strong enough?"

"It isn't far, and I would suffer anything rather than remain here."

Ray said no more, but raised her slender figure in his arms as gently as he could, and after several awkward attempts (for even a little woman of eighteen is not a burden to be despised) he managed to lift her into the saddle, where she easily supported herself by clinging to the pommel.

"This is so nice," she said quite gleefully. "I begin to feel like myself again."

"Does your ankle still pain you?"

"A little. But it is easier. I hope it is only sprained, after all."

Ray was gazing straight into her pretty face, and had unclosed his lips to make some reply, when he paused, startled by the ashen pallor that had suddenly overspread her piquant features.

She was looking down the road with a frightened glare in her lovely blue eyes. Turning in that direction to ascertain the cause of her alarm, Ray saw only a very pretty, stylish-looking young lady in a dark-green riding-habit, mounted on a grey mare, who was slowly approaching.

"Do you know that lady?" Ray asked. "Shall I appeal to her for assistance?"

"Oh, no, no! Not for the world."

Her alarm was genuine. Ray saw that very readily, so he only bowed in reply, and stepped a little to one side for the newcomer to pass; though he did feel greatly surprised at his companion's reluctance to have anything to do with the lovely stranger.

As the latter drew nearer, she appeared to look sharply at the little tableau in the shadow of the hazel-bushes, and a contemptuous smile curled her lips. It vanished instantly, however, when she had obtained an unobstructed view of Ray's face, and stopping short, she cried out breathlessly:

"Ray Braddon!"

The name seemed to have escaped her lips involuntarily. As soon as it was uttered, a flush of annoyance mounted to her forehead.

"Do you know me?" exclaimed the young man with dilating eyes.

"I—I—have seen your photograph," the lady stammered in reply.

A good deal startled, Ray was about to question her further, when a low moan from his companion called him to her side. She was reeling in the saddle, and could scarcely maintain her position.

"I'm faint!" she gasped. "Support me."

Thus commanded, he could do no less than offer his shoulder for her to lean against, and slip one arm about her waist.

She seemed to recover very rapidly.

They had not occupied this position many consecutive seconds ere, relieving herself, she again assumed an upright posture.

"Thanks!" she murmured. "I'm afraid you find me very troublesome."

"Not in the least," he responded gallantly.

Being once more at liberty to devote some attention to the other young lady, he was about to address her, when he discovered that she had ridden on, and was already some yards distant.

"I'm glad she's gone," said his companion, in a tone of relief.

"How extraordinary that she should have seen my photograph!" exclaimed Ray. "I was never in this part of the country before, and I'm sure her face was strange to me."

"Heaven grant you may never know more of her than at present."

Digitized by Google

"What do you mean?" he asked, startled by her earnestness.

"I know that creature by sight." Her voice fell. "They call her Wild Kate here. That is all I am willing to tell you about her."

"Ah-h!" uttered Ray, and involuntarily he sighed, for the young lady's face had greatly pleased and attracted him.

"What was that name by which she called you?"

"Ray Braddon."

"Then my ears did not deceive me. I am very glad to see you," and she held out her hand, smiling sweetly. "I am Blanche Gordon."

The young man was surprised and delighted. He could scarcely believe the evidence of his senses. It was a mission to Blanche Gordon that had taken him into this unknown country—a very odd mission, by-the-way.

A mutual friend—an eccentric old man—had died only the week before, leaving ten thousand pounds in available cash to Blanche, and he, Ray, had undertaken to convey the money to her, and deliver it in person.

It seemed a little singular, to say the least, that he should meet Blanche and form her acquaintance in this romantic manner. But he felt greatly pleased that it had so come about.

"This is a surprise!" he ejaculated, raising her hand to his lips.

"I hope we will be all the better friends for the circumstances under which our meeting took place."

"It will not be my fault if we are not," he said, warmly, adding, after a slight pause, "I suppose you received my letter announcing Mr. Graham's death and the bequest he had made in your favour?"

"Oh, yes! Ten thousand pounds was the amount, I believe?"

"Yes. I have the money and shall be happy to resign it to you at the earliest practicable moment."

She turned away her face—perhaps to conceal the strange glitter that came into her velvety eyes.

"You don't mean to tell me that you have the whole amount with you?" she asked, very low.

"Yes."

"It seems a large sum to carry about."

"True. But I took care that no one should learn the fact save the cashier of the bank who paid me the money. I had written to you beforehand to announce my intention, and, as you will remember, cautioned you to say nothing about it."

"Yes."

"It was Mr. Graham's dying request that I should bring you the money."

"You were very good to undertake such a responsibility for a stranger," she murmured, her lips strangely white.

"I'm glad I did undertake it."

The glance that accompanied these words was expressive enough to recall the crimson to Blanche Gordon's lovely cheeks.

"I can see the hand of Providence in all this," she faltered.

"So can I," Ray responded, driven beside himself by her beauty and winning ways. "Mr. Graham was my friend as well as yours, and I know he cherished an ardent hope that we might be mutually attracted when we made each other's acquaintance; and Providence seems to be furthering his wishes."

The lady who approached cried out: "Ray Braddon!"

It was a foolish speech, and Blanche's cheeks flushed redder than ever at all it implied.

"Come," she said rather nervously, "why are we lingering here? You are to take me home, you know."

"Certainly."

He grasped the bridle-rein, which was hanging loose, and they set out at once, traversing the highway a few hundred yards, and then turning abruptly into a rough cart-track nearly overgrown with grass and weeds.

"My home is poor and forlorn," she said, with a smile that seemed constrained. "But I shall soon change it for a better one, now that my ship has come home, you may be sure."

Ray made no reply. Just at that instant he caught a glimpse of the stylish-looking young lady in the green habit halting at a bend in the road and looking back at them very earnestly. There was something in her behaviour that struck the young man as being very peculiar.

Blanche had not seen her, however, and as the overhanging shrubbery shut her from view almost immediately, he did not speak of her.

The way seemed lonelier and wilder as they proceeded. After a lapse of about fifteen minutes, they emerged from an avenue of trees and came suddenly upon a cornfield of about two acres in extent, in the middle of which stood a two-storey, unpainted house, whose broken windows, dismantled shutters, and ruinous chimneys presented anything but an inviting aspect.

"Yonder is my home," said Blanche. "A dreadfully lonely place, isn't it?"

Ray was too polite to utter his real sentiments, so he answered:

"It has not the appearance of being inhabited at all."

"Oh, the best rooms are in the rear of the house, and we occupy those."

At another time our hero might have experienced some misgivings. But with this fairy-like vision at his side, and claiming his protection, he could think of little else.

Digitized by Google

To be sure, it did strike him as singular that Blanche should remain in so secluded a spot, but Mr. Graham had told him nothing about her except that she was poor, and an orphan, so he speedily dismissed the perplexing subject with the mental decision that necessity, and not choice, compelled her to abide there.

As he led the horse up to the house along a very narrow path through the corn, he could not help remarking the deathlike stillness that reigned everywhere.

"The house is deserted!" he exclaimed.

"Oh, no. I will soon prove to you the fallacy of such a conclusion."

Very shyly she put out two beautifully-rounded arms, and Ray, yielding again to the subtle spell with which she seemed to have enthralled him, lifted her from the saddle and bore her to the stout oaken door.

Producing a key from the pocket of her dress, she let him into a dark, dismal-looking passage, along which he carried her, kicking open a door at the other end with his boots.

He found himself in a large, square apartment very rudely furnished with a lounge, a table, and a few dilapidated chairs. An unprepossessing man of about fifty sat near one of the high windows, smoking a dirty black pipe. Ray scarcely looked at him until he had carried his burden to the sofa and left her there. Then he turned to him with a muttered apology for his abrupt entrance.

"I hope you will pardon the seeming rudeness——"

"Never mind, youngster," interrupted the man, in a guttural voice. "No harm done. We don't stand on ceremony in these parts."

His manner was meant to be conciliatory, but in spite of this fact Ray took a sudden and strong dislike to him.

"This is my uncle, John Gordon," said Blanche, in her sweetest tones. "He has been like a father to me all my life. I love him dearly."

This last was uttered half in deprecation, as if she were aware of Ray's distrust and found it necessary to give a reason for having a protector so manifestly uncongenial.

"Ah, yes, to be sure."

"Uncle John," she added, in the next breath, "I was unlucky enough to sprain my ankle while rambling in the woods. But I ought not to term it an unlucky incident, after all, for it was the means of making me acquainted with this kind gentleman, who brought me home. I'm sure you will be as much surprised as I was to learn that he is Mr. Braddon."

"Mr. Braddon!" ejaculated John Gordon. "Well, I declare, if this isn't a curious circumstance! I am delighted to see you, sir, de-lighted!"

Out went his horny hand, which Ray was compelled to take, and the grip of those muscular fingers could only be compared with a vice.

"Mr. Braddon has brought the money that eccentric Mr. Graham left me," said Blanche, after a pause.

"All of it?" questioned her uncle, an evil glitter in his wicked black eyes.

"Every penny," answered Ray.

"Hum! Ten thousand pounds is a fortune. Won't you look grand, Blanche, when you have so much money to spend? You'll buy no end of silks and laces and ribbons, I suppose?"

"As if you needed any such furbelows to enhance your beauty!" murmured Ray, close to her sea-shell ear.

She lifted a coquettish glance to his face.

"Am I beautiful, Mr. Braddon?"

"Incomparable!"

"I'm afraid you are a sad flatterer. It is wrong to teea a simple girl's vanity." And she shook her head reprovingly. "You should not do it."

"How can I help telling you what must be palpable to every observer?"

"But I'm not accustomed to compliments."

"That is strange."

But we will not transcribe the whispered dialogue that went on. This is a specimen of its tenor, and I spare Ray the mortification of seeing it in black and white.

Nothing was done to relieve the pain one would naturally suppose Blanche must suffer with her sprained ankle. Indeed, she said not another word concerning it, and Ray's head was so completely turned that he forgot all about it before he had been in the room fifteen minutes.

Nearly an hour passed, and presently John Gordon seemed to wax uneasy, for some reason or other. He rose from his chair and began to walk the floor with hurried, impatient strides. At last he paused in front of Ray and said, more roughly than he had yet spoken:

"Where's the loot, young man?"

Ray's eyes dilated a little, seeing which Blanche hastened to explain.

"He means the money so generously bequeathed by Mr Graham. I think he finds some difficulty in believing in its reality before he has seen it."

"I beg your pardon. I was in danger of forgetting my errand entirely."

Rising as he spoke from the seat he occupied at Blanche's side, he stepped to the table, and produced a large roll of bank notes from an inner pocket.

"Here is the money. It is in one thousand pound notes. If you will be good enough to count it——"

At this moment, hearing a rustling movement just behind him, he turned his head a little, and saw Blanche not more than three feet distant, standing as firmly upon her feet as he stood on his.

The human mind is such a mystery! Somehow the recollection of the pretended sprain came back to Ray's just then like a flash, and with a torrent of the wildest suspicions.

"You!" he gasped. "Why, how——"

He got no further in what he was about to say. There came a whizzing sound in the air, and a heavy blow, dealt from behind with a stick wielded by John Gordon's muscular arms, felled him, stunned, to the floor, but not before he had heard voices and a scurrying of footsteps in the passage that led to the outer room.

When Ray's senses returned, he was lying on the couch, and the young woman in the green riding habit sat beside him, bathing his face and temples with water.

"Where am I?" he asked, faintly.

"Hush! I will tell you all you wish to know when you are more fully recovered."

Glancing past her, his attention was arrested by a group at the other end of the room, and he beheld "John Gordon" and "Blanche" sitting on the floor, with their arms secured behind them, looking very fierce and crestfallen, while several men stood near, as if to guard them.

"What does this mean?" he demanded.

He was soon put in the possession of a few startling facts. It was the real Blanche Gordon who sat beside him, and the other was Wild Kate, who, as an unprincipled associate, had laid a deliberate plot to rob and murder him, making the house in the cornfield the scene of the meditated exploit.

It came out afterwards that the mails had been robbed, and Ray's letter to Blanche had never reached her, but had fallen into the hands of Wild Kate, who, of course, at once gathered all the particulars concerning Mr. Graham's bequest, that she was able, with the view of retaining the ten thousand pounds for her own benefit.

When the real Blanche met Ray in the highway, she was not aware of her benefactor's death, but she recognised the young man from a photograph of him which Mr. Graham had sent to her a few months previously.

Wild Kate she knew by sight, and, suspecting foul play when she saw the two take the path leading to the house in the cornfield, she had instantly summoned help and followed them.

Need I add that Ray married Blanche? Scarcely. My story would be incomplete without this ending.

B. Winwood.

Digitized by Google

£25 IN CASH PRIZES!

1st Prize, £10. 2nd Prize, £5. 3rd Prize, £2.

And Eight Cash Prizes of £1 each.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find six signatures. Each of these signatures is the ordinary signature of the person to whom it belongs. The writing is not assumed for the occasion; it is just the way in which each of the persons signs his name to letters or to cheques.

What you have to do is to write in the space opposite each signature the name (initials, Christian name and surname) which you think it to be. Before you begin look well at No. 1, the solution of which is given. Many of the names will be those of well-known people, others will be names of ordinary folk like yourself. No one but the Editor is in possession of the correct names of all the signatures shown. If you are in doubt as to the correct rendering of any signature or signatures ask some of your friends. When you have filled up the coupon to the best of your ability, cut it out and keep it by you until you see an announcement in SHORT STORIES telling you to send it in together with the coupons which will appear in subsequent issues of SHORT STORIES.

CONDITIONS.

(1) The name must be clearly printed in ink opposite each signature. (See Example).
(2) Only one name is allowed in each space.
(3) No alterations are allowed in the words.
(4) When you have filled up your coupon, cut it out and keep it by you, together with the coupons which will appear in subsequent issues of SHORT STORIES, until the closing date is announced.
(5) Each competitor may send only one set of coupons, but all the members of one household may compete. Each set will be accepted independently. And the coupons composing it must be put in numerical order and fastened together at the top left-hand corner.
(6) In all cases the Editor's decision is final, and competitors may only enter on this condition.

COUPON No. I.

No. 1. EXAMPLE.	J N. MONTGOMERY.
No. 2.
No. 3.
No. 4.
No. 5.
No. 6.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

Digitized by Google

Mysterious Mr. Brown.

Telling How He Made a Noble Resolve.

WHEN he first came to Greenford, no one could understand who or what he was, and, what was worse, no one, in spite of all their endeavours, could find out.

This was sad, because scandal-loving Greenford always held that a mystery meant something suspicious, and when Greenford gossips could not discover what the something suspicious was—at any rate, to their satisfaction—it was worst of all! Mr. Brown simply came there one day, took a small furnished villa from an agent, had his modest luggage sent up from the station, and settled down then and there.

He was an unpretentious little man, about fifty, grey, and scrupulously neat in his attire and person. He paid a month's rent in advance, and ordered dinner at seven o'clock of the housekeeper who had been left in charge of Eglantine Villa. Having taken a walk, he returned, dined, sat and wrote letters, and went to bed respectably early.

It was Mrs. Gittings, the housekeeper, who started the mystery. Though self-styled a housekeeper, she was not above gossiping with servants of lesser rank in domestic servitude, and when asked by the "general," who was in the employ of Mrs. Lancaster, a dozen doors off in the Station Road, for particulars of her new master, she frankly avowed herself puzzled.

This was some days afterwards, and Mrs. Gittings had had opportunity to study Mr. Brown.

"He don't grumble, he don't give no trouble, he don't worry about what I gets him. He's a perfect mystery."

"Is he married?" questioned Mary Jane.

"He ain't got a wife with him," said Mrs. Gittings solemnly, "and when he's at home he writes letters by the score."

"Perhaps he's a hauthor," put in Mary Jane.

"Letters, I said, not books and things. Oh, and I forgot," burst forth Mrs. Gittings. "He asked me yesterday where your people lived, and I happened to be clearing his dinner-table when your Miss Ada went by, and I pointed her out to him, of course asking him to excuse the liberty, and he was smoking in his arm-chair, and he jumped up quite interested like."

"They've got a huncle in foreign parts," said Mary Jane, much impressed. "I wonder if it is him come home? I hear them a-talking about him sometimes, saying how rich he is, and that he ought to give some of it to them, to help them find theirselves husbands, I suppose."

"I've heard of that uncle before to-day, or someone very like him," remarked Mrs. Gittings, rather oracularly, "and it would take a precious sight of ready cash to gild your two eldest, Mary Jane. Now, if it was Miss Amy, now——"

"She's a darling," broke in Mary Jane, "and there ain't a blessed thing as I wouldn't do for her. But the other two—well, there!"

And Mary Jane sniffed contemptuously.

Perhaps it is unnecessary to add that the gist of this conversation was promptly repeated to the Lancaster household by the judicious Mary Jane before very long had elapsed.

"What is he like?" demanded Mrs. Lancaster, who was not above talking gossip with her inferiors.

"I haven't seen him, ma'am, but he saw Miss Ada, Mrs. Gittings told me."

"It can't be my poor husband's brother come home at last, Ada," said Mrs. Lancaster, later on; "he would surely come and see me at once."

"Us, you mean," put in her eldest daughter disagreeably.

"I haven't heard either of him or from him for twenty years," went on Mrs. Lancaster calmly. She was accustomed to her daughter. "I wish I could find out if it is really he."

"Call on Miss Jackson, she knows all the talk of Greenford," said her daughter Annie.

"My dear, the poor man hasn't been here a week yet."

"That doesn't matter, mamma—to Miss Jackson."

"I wonder where he deals?"

"I wonder which church he will go to?" "I wonder——"

"If his ears are burning!" said Amy Lancaster saucily, speaking for the first time. She was the youngest of the three, and the prettiest, with a trim, rounded little figure and a curly head, well balanced on a pretty pair of shoulders.

"Have you done those curtains for Mr. Townsend's bedroom, Amy? If not, go and get them done at once."

Amy pouted, but she obeyed her mother. It may seem a strange thing to say, but Amy's two elder sisters could not forgive her for being pretty! They were tall, angular, and flat—I had almost said scraggy; Amy was plump, soft, dimpled and enticing. She never went out, or but rarely. When asked why Amy had not come to some evening party, concert, or entertainment, Mrs. Lancaster would reply:

"Oh, she is too young! Besides, I could not possibly inflict you with all three girls."

"But Amy plays so charmingly!" one lady ventured to remark.

"I do not care for her to 'show off' in public," replied Mrs. Lancaster coolly.

So it will be seen that poor little Amy was something of a Cinderella in the Lancaster household. But she found comfort and consolation in her piano, and did everything that fell to her lot to do—and that was by no means a little—uncomplainingly and smilingly. She had another kind of comfort—but of this later on.

Mr. Brown had been in Greenford quite a fortnight, running up to town two or three times a week, walking briskly now and then over Greenford Common, living a perfectly peaceful existence.

Digitized by Google

But though he did not know it, he was much talked about in Greenford, and, though they did not know it, he was well acquainted with the four members that constituted the Lancaster family. He had met them at intervals, but whether by accident or contrivance, who could say? Even Mrs. Lancaster herself never guessed that the little grey man who rode up to London in the same compartment as herself one morning was the mysterious Mr. Brown.

But one afternoon, visiting at the vicarage, she found that little grey man chatting pleasantly to the vicar's wife:

The introduction nearly took away her breath, and the shock of bitter disappointment she suffered did not help to bring it back again.

This her husband's brother? Good gracious, no! The notion was too ridiculous. However, she swallowed her disappointment, made herself most agreeable, and presently invited Mr. Brown to call upon her, and meet her daughters.

"Who knows," she thought to herself, "he might be a chance for Ada or Annie." She had very adroitly learnt the fact that he was a widower from his own lips.

She little guessed that Mr. Brown was secretly amused at her scheming, saw completely through her, in fact, and that to be invited to call at 70 Station Road was the very thing that he wanted.

"Girls!" cried Mrs. Lancaster, on her return. "Who do you think is coming to call upon us?"

Ada and Annie looked interrogation. Amy went on playing softly on the piano.

"The mysterious Mr. Brown," said Mrs. Lancaster triumphantly.

"Oh, when?" cried Ada and Annie in a breath.

"Why is he mysterious, mother?" said Amy.

"We know so little about him, dear, who he is, and where he came from."

"Well, do we want to know?"

"My dear child, go on making that noise, and don't be so ignorant," said her mother snappishly. And Amy turned round again to the piano, and went on playing, with a tender little smile creeping round her pretty mouth. Two or three days later Mr. Brown availed himself of Mrs. Lancaster's kind invitation and called at No. 70. He was received most cordially by all three—mother, and her eldest daughters. But in spite of cordiality and leading questions, very little personal information could they extract from him beyond that which he chose to give them. How were they to know that he knew what they were aiming at? With extreme tact, Mrs. Lancaster managed to lead the conversation to her dead husband's brother Richard.

But Mr. Brown merely remarked "How strange!" in an uninterested manner.

"Mrs. Lancaster, I am told that you have a daughter who plays very charmingly," he remarked presently. "I am so passionately fond of music. Which of these young ladies is it?"

Ada and Annie could have bitten their lips in vexation; this was what Mrs. Lancaster had wished to avoid if possible.

"Mrs. Preston, the vicar's wife, told me," said Mr. Brown.

"It is my youngest, Amy, Mr. Brown," smiled Mrs. Lancaster. "I don't know where she is."

She had ordered her not to appear lest she should spoil Ada's or Annie's chance, and she had replied promptly that she didn't want to meet the old frump.

"Ada, or Annie, will one of you find her?" said Mrs. Lancaster sweetly.

"Oh, bother!" said Amy when found. But she put a mutinous little curl, that would stray over her forehead, into its proper place, and came downstairs.

"Will you play something for me?" said Mr. Brown, when he had been introduced. "Mrs. Preston tells me you play beautifully."

Amy Lancaster coloured with pleasure. Praise to her was a rare thing, and she was proud of her playing, and knew, too, that she could play well. Mr. Brown listened to her with the close attention of the true lover of music. He crossed the room at the close.

"I have heard that played in many lands," he said, "but never with greater feeling. Young lady, you are an artist. I most sincerely congratulate you. Mrs. Lancaster, will you do me a great favour, and allow your daughters to come and see me sometimes, and give me the opportunity of hearing Miss Amy play? I am a lonely man, a lonely old man—and I hope you will not refuse."

Mrs. Lancaster consented graciously, but she was not feeling very gracious, as Amy well knew. And poor Amy, too, knew of the petty slights she was likely to undergo because of her success.

"I shall be delighted," she murmured, with a blush that made her look prettier than ever. Then Mr. Brown took his departure.

When he had gone, Mrs. Lancaster sat thinking. "Why not Amy?" ran the burden of her thoughts. "If Mr. Brown loved music, why not Amy?" But Ada and Annie were furious, though they only vented their spite by sarcastically

He suddenly came across Amy sitting on a secluded rustic seat with a handsome young man.

Digitized by Google

congratulating Amy on her prospects of becoming an old man's darling. You see, neither they nor their mother knew anything about Jack!

* * * * *

Two or three days afterwards, Mr. Brown was taking his customary constitutional over Greenford Common, when he suddenly came upon Amy, sitting on a quiet and secluded rustic seat, with a rather handsome young man, who was not only talking to her very earnestly, but holding her little hand closely in his. Mr. Brown lifted his hat and would have passed on, but Amy impulsively jumped up, and he paused.

"Oh, Mr. Brown!" exclaimed Amy, "please do not tell mother you have seen me! Let me tell you. This is Jack—Mr. Meredith, I mean, and we are secretly engaged, and, oh——"

She covered her pretty face with her two hands to hide her confusion.

"My name is Brown, Mr. Meredith, and I am pleased to meet you. I congratulate you on possessing a most charming little sweetheart, and I hope you'll deserve her."

"I intend to, sir," said Jack in a manly, pleasant voice. "We were just speaking of you and your admiration of my little girl's playing. It is not my fault our engagement is a secret," he went on frankly, "we both thought it wise to wait until I am in a better position before I go to Mrs. Lancaster. She would only refuse to hear me now, and we should be parted. As it is, we can meet like this occasionally—and we can wait."

Amy looked up in her lover's face with tears in her eyes.

"Spoken like a man and a lover," said Mr. Brown. "Tell me—what are you, and where are you?"

Jack Meredith told him.

"Thanks. Now, good-bye. Go on with your courting. It is the Spring of one's life, the love-making time! I was young once, and in love, too, long ago. I'm an old man now! I'll keep your secret, never fear!"

"Don't go!" cried Amy, "please!"

"I said I was an old man," said Mr. Brown with a smile, "but I'm not so old as to forget that two used to be company in my young days, and is so still, I fancy!" and he walked briskly away, laughing.

"Well!" said Amy.

"Well!" replied Jack.

They sat and discussed Mr. Brown for a little while, then the conversation, after the fashion of lovers' talk, drifted back to themselves.

* * * * *

That was Amy's comfort, though the secret engagement now and then marred it. They had met when Amy had been visiting an old school friend in London, and what Jack had told Mr. Brown fairly explains their position. He was poor, too poor to dream of marrying, but if Amy would wait for him, he would work for her. Would Amy wait for him? What a foolish question to ask. Jack managed to steal a few hours now and then to spend with his sweetheart, and the old rustic seat where Mr. Brown had surprised them was their trysting place, where they met and parted, when Jack went back to smoky London, and Amy returned home, happier, yet sometimes to shed a few tears in her own little bedroom.

* * * * *

"What a good thing it would be for Amy—for all of us," thought Mrs. Lancaster. "Mr. Brown must have money, he is a gentleman, and not so very much older than Amy. But I do wish it had been one of the others!" with a sigh.

After this Mr. Brown and the Lancasters met frequently, out of doors, for it was summer-time, and Ada and Amy had been twice or thrice to Eglantine Villa, and Mr. Brown had listened with keen delight to Amy's playing. It occurred to Ada that he watched her, as a cat does a mouse, with bright eyes that let nothing escape their observation.

She told her mother this, and Mrs. Lancaster was delighted. But if she had only known it, Mr. Brown was watching her too! He had now quite established himself in Greenford society, such as it was, and his ears were always wide open at the mention of the Lancasters.

He even saw through Mrs. Lancaster's plan for him to fall in love with Amy, and the thought of this often made him give a quiet chuckle. He remembered Jack.

He noted Ada's veiled bitterness, though she always wore her most pleasant manner for his benefit. He saw through Annie's selfish disposition perfectly; and he formed a pretty correct notion of Amy's life at No. 70, though he never said a word to her when chance happened to afford an opportunity of doing so, and Amy herself never alluded to the snubs and slights that were her daily lot.

Amy came down to breakfast with a very bright face one morning. There was a letter in her bodice, not far away from her beating heart.

"Good news?" asked Annie, sourly noticing her happy face and shining eyes.

"Only a letter from—Nellie Bowman," said Amy, colouring.

"She writes to you very often," said Ada.

"Twice a week. We arranged that when I was in London."

"Oh, Amy, that letter so close to your heart is in a masculine handwriting!"

"You never show us her letters."

"You were not at school with her, so they would not interest you."

"I insist," interrupted Mrs. Lancaster, who had been listening to the conversation, "upon you showing your sister that letter, Amy!"

Amy half rose from her seat, with her hand on her precious possession as if to protect the secret. Mrs. Lancaster little knew what result her insistence would have.

"After breakfast," Amy faltered.

"At once!"

After all, thought Amy, remembering the splendid piece of news concerning Jack and herself, the great and glorious unexpected thing that his dear letter told about, the "scene" would have to come sooner or later. So she slipped it from her dress, and handed it, not without a trembling sensation at her heart, to her mother.

"A love-letter!" almost shrieked that horrified lady, when she had read the first words.

"Yes," said Amy boldly, "from the man I am engaged to and am going to marry."

"Go to your room!" exclaimed Mrs. Lancaster, almost beside herself with anger; "you ought to be ashamed of yourself."

Amy walked proudly out of the room, holding her curly head like a princess, and Ada and Annie were left to bear the brunt of their mother's rage and disappointment.

"To think that she should deceive me under my very eyes! I shall consult Mr. Brown!"

Ada laughed bitterly.

"Our refuge in distress!" she said; "he won't sympathise with you, mother!"

Mrs. Lancaster gave a shriek of horror, and sat down suddenly, grasping the letter in her hand.

"What is it now?" asked Annie, who was not sorry to see Amy in disgrace.

Mrs. Lancaster had been perusing the letter.

"He knows him—Mr. Brown! It says so here. It's a plot! Listen." And she proceeded to read from the letter in her hand. "Great news, my darling." Here Mrs. Lancaster shuddered. "I have been offered a berth in the Perpetual Insurance Company's offices, at a salary of £300 a year. I shall come and see your mother at once now, and ask her for you. Do you think Mr. Brown had anything to do with it? You remember that day at our seat he asked me where he could find me. It certainly seems like it."

Mrs. Lancaster could only sit and gasp.

"Three hundred a year is not to be sneered at," said Ada Lancaster.

"But, Mr. Brown," began her mother.

"Pooh!" exclaimed Annie, "she would never have married him even if the writer of that letter hadn't been first in the field."

Digitized by Google

"I would have made her!"

"Nonsense. That sort of thing is only done in books and plays, not in real life," said Ada sagely.

Mrs. Lancaster finished the letter, then sat and thought for a few minutes.

"Go and tell Amy to come down," she said at last. Annie went, but returned quickly with a frightened look on her sallow face.

"She's gone!" she said.

"Gone? Impossible!"

"Her hat is not there."

"But where can she have gone?" the mother demanded.

"To Mr. Brown, of course," said Ada. At that moment a knock at the front door proved the truth of this remark, for Mr. Brown entered the room, holding Amy by the hand.

"I have brought this naughty young lady back to say she is sorry!" he said; he spoke quietly, but there was a kind of twinkle in his eyes.

"I am sorry, mother, but I intend to marry Jack all the same!"

At this defiant speech Mr. Brown's twinkle developed into a smile.

"I see nothing to laugh at!" said Mrs. Lancaster indignantly.

"No, indeed," echoed Annie, and received a sharp glance from her mother.

"I know Mr. Meredith," said Mr. Brown, "and think very highly of him, so highly that I have obtained him a berth in a company with which I am concerned, at a handsome salary—quite enough for him to marry on."

Amy threw a grateful smile at Mr. Brown, and pressed the hand that still held her own.

"I leave this young lady with you, Mrs. Lancaster. If you take my advice, let her marry Mr. Meredith, and say no more about the past."

"It's the only thing to be done, it seems," said Mrs. Lancaster despairingly. All her castles had crumbled to the earth.

'I have only one other thing to say," Mr. Brown continued, "and that is to tell you that your husband's brother, Richard, will call upon you at four o'clock this afternoon."

Mrs. Lancaster gave a startled cry of utter astonishment, and sank into the nearest chair.

"You know him?" she faltered.

"Intimately. He has been my closest friend for eighteen years. Good morning." He put Amy's hand to his lips and was gone.

"Oh!" was all Mrs. Lancaster could say. But it meant volumes. Mr. Brown had been no doubt keeping a watch upon them all, and reporting his opinion to Richard Lancaster. This was in fact just what Mr. Brown had been doing, but Mrs. Lancaster would not have felt very happy or flattered had she known in what terms he had expressed himself.

Mrs. Lancaster struggled to her feet, and tottered from the room.

"I shall go and lie down," she said; "I cannot see this man." She still held Amy's love-letter, and she handed it to her again, much to Amy's joy—"Tell him I consent."

Amy kissed her mother tenderly at this, and would have helped her from the room.

"No," said the mother, "not you. Ada?"

* * * * *

The rest is soon told. Jack Meredith arrived, glowing with the good news, and found Amy waiting to rush into his arms and impart her own good news. What they said what they did—well, is it not written in the chronicles of lovers for time immemorial?

Richard Lancaster that same afternoon had a brief and business-like interview with his dead brother's wife, at which Mr. Brown was present. He had sent, he said, his friend Mr. Brown to Greenford, when, on his arrival in England, he found out where Mrs. Lancaster was living—in order to learn such truths, either pleasant or unpleasant, as it would be improbable, even impossible, he, a rich man, could ever find out for himself and personally. He had received Mr. Brown's reports, and had formed his intentions for the future upon them to a great extent. He quite approved of Amy's suitor. In fact he was a large shareholder in the company. He intended to allow Mrs. Lancaster £500 a year until her death, her two daughters Ada and Annie £1,000 each, as a marriage portion.

Mrs. Lancaster stared at him in stupefaction.

"Then you must be very rich, Dick," she stammered.

"I am. Somewhere about a quarter of a million, I think, isn't it, Brown?"

Mr. Brown nodded. He was quietly enjoying the whole thing.

"Your daughter, Amy, I shall adopt, and as I am never likely to marry again, and am childless, I shall make her my heiress, allowing her £500 a year for her marriage portion."

And then Mrs. Lancaster fully realised how badly she had played the good cards she had held, and how much she had lost.

* * * * *

"You will marry me still, Jack!" said Amy, when she heard the news, and only Mr. Brown was within hearing.

"I ought to say no," said her lover, "but I cannot!"

"And I wouldn't let you if you could!"

They moved away together hand-in-hand.

"How happy they are," mused Mr. Brown, watching them with a strange look in his eyes. "He will make her far happier than I could have done. It is better so. And yet—I should have loved her very dearly!"

Clifton Bingham.

'Take Care of No. 1.'

That is a very old piece of advice, "take care of Number 1," and a very important one.

Moreover, it applies equally well to other things, and in certain cases well repays one to follow it.

There is, for example, No. 1 of THE RAPID REVIEW, the New Magazine which has taken the reading public by storm. In a few years the early issues of THE RAPID REVIEW will be decidedly valuable, and they will always be very interesting possessions, enabling you to compare them with the current number at some future time, noting the various changes and improvements which have taken place.

So remember, if you have got No. 1, to take good care of it. If you have not got it, try your best to obtain a copy, and finally, to make certain of getting No. 2, which is out on March 12th. Price Sixpence.

THE RAPID REVIEW is the Magazine of the day. It keeps you up-to-date in everything, from the War to the latest Periodicals, from Books and Plays and Music to Woman's Work and Interests. It is full of interesting matter concerning the things you care about, and it will interest you deeply in the things which (up till now) you have not paid particular attention to.

Digitized by Google

She Knew.

Young Hobbs: "Mamma, what animal is the king of beasts?" Mrs. Hobbs (with a significant look at her husband): "Man!"

His Discovery.

She (reproachfully): "Before we were married you used to say you couldn't live without me." He: "A man never knows what he can do till he tries."

What She Meant.

"She is a very sweet girl." "Why, the heartless flirt had promised to marry four different men." "Well, that's what I mean; her manners are most engaging."

A Delayed Luxury.

"Here we have only been married two days, Clarence, and you're scolding me already." "I know, my dear; but just think how long I have been waiting for the chance."

Thoughtless—or Cruel?

Miss Oldgirl (who writes): "I am thinking of writing a love story founded on my own experience." Miss Maybudd: "Oh, dear me! Couldn't you bring it to a happier ending?"

He Could.

Practical Father: "If he says he loves you I suppose he does; but can he support you?" Daughter: "Why, papa! You must know that it wasn't his fault that the chair broke."

It Was Admirable.

The Fiancée: "I'm sure that you would be cool in the presence of danger." The Fiancé: "Well, I don't like to boast, but you should have seen the way I kept my nerve when I called on your father."

An Old Adage.

"It can't be possible that Hardup's going to marry Susie Banknote. Money enough, I suppose, but an ugly, shrivelled-up little thing, as thin as a straw." "But have you never heard that drowning men catch at a straw?"

Careful.

Paul (aged ten): "Gladys, do you truly love me?" Gladys (aged nine): "With all my heart." Paul: "Then let us fly together to the end of the world." Gladys: "But, dearest, I haven't learnt my to-morrow's lessons."

His Reward.

"I thought," he said, "that I knew how to make love." "And don't you?" "Why, it didn't seem to work right when I told Rose she was the only girl I had ever loved." "What did she say?" "She said she'd never marry a liar."

A Honeymoon Experience.

The Groom: "Would you mind if I went into a smoking compartment, dear?" The Bride: "What! to smoke?" The Groom: "Oh, dear no. I want to experience the agony of being away from you, so that the joy of my return will be all the more intensified."

A Convincing Argument.

Flipper: "Why does he object to his wife going out alone in her motor?" Flapper: "Because he can't see how one unmanageable thing can manage another."

Temperate.

Guest: "I hear your husband is a spiritualist. Have you ever seen any sign of a spirit?" Domineering Wife: "In my husband? Well, I should hope not!"

What She Feared.

Clare: "He pressed me to tell him if I really and truly loved him." Maude: "And did you tell him?" Clare: "Not I. I was afraid if I did he might stop the pressure."

Well Defined.

"I say, pa," queried little Billy Eagerlearn, "what's an echo?" "An echo, my son," replied the old man, with a sigh long drawn out, "is the only thing that can diddle a woman out of the last word."

His Ardent Desire.

Mrs. Homeleigh: "There is one certain thing about our girls—they are always self-possessed." Papa Homeleigh (grimly): "Yes; they're too self-possessed. I wish they'd get someone else to possess them."

A Bad Outlook.

Daughter (pleading for her lover): "But, father, I am positive that it is not my money he is after. He says he would marry me if I were ever so poor." Stern and Prosaic Father: "Yes, he looks as if he had no better sense."

His Request.

She (bored): "No, Mr. Lytely, I can never love you. I honour and respect you. I am sure you would make some other woman a good husband. I——" He: "Well—er—could you—er—give me a letter of recommendation to my next place?"

A Wilful Misunderstanding.

Young Miss Lookout: "Where are you going, papa?" Rev. Mr. Lookout: "To the Temperance meeting. We intend to inaugurate a movement to save the young men of the country." Young Miss Lookout: "Try to save a really nice one for me, will you, papa, dear?"

He Was Sure of That.

"I don't believe," said Mrs. Sentimental, fishing for a compliment, "that I am as dear to you as I used to be." "Dear to me!" repeated her spouse, "dear to me! Almira, you grow dearer and dearer to me every year of your life!" And, glancing sorrowfully at the bills the postman had just handed him, he hurried away to catch the next train.

Rather Annoying.

Young Lady: "Now, Jane, I repose great confidence in you. If you see young Mr. Brown coming up the garden path about dusk tell him not to enter the porch, but wait for me at the side wicket-gate." Jane: "How awkward, miss!" Young Lady: "And why awkward, Jane?" Jane: "Because that's the very place my young man's in the 'abit of waiting at!"

The Final Twist.

Gussy: "Good gwacious! Cholly, whatevah is the mattah with you?" Cholly (pale but collected): "Not much, old fellah; but I have just left Miss Silverton's. I was about to propose to her when her father entered the room and asked me my business. I fully explained, and he laughed in my face, pulled my nose, made a corkscrew of my hair, slapped me on both cheeks, temporarily made a doormat of me, turned me upside down, almost inside out, called me a 'jumped-up cad,' and then threw me down the stairs and into the street; but, by Jawve! if he had done any more he would have woused the Bwitish lion within me."

Digitized by Google

Her Father's Daughter.

An Episode in the Life of Olga Barotski, Russian Subject.

"And so your good father is dead?"

"Yes, sir!—and as among his papers I found the letter—addressed to your Highness—which I have just had the honour to hand to you, I thought it better to——"

"Quite right, Mr. Thorne!—quite right!—I am very glad to see you! Your father, you know, was for many years not merely my secretary but my friend. I mourn his loss—learnt now only from you—more, far more than I can say. For his sake—for your own—I welcome, with all my heart, his son—my godson!"

"Your Highness is very kind," said Maurice Thorne deferentially, but with a manly directness of manner not unpleasing to, or lost upon the distinguished-looking man to whom he was talking.

"Not more so, I am sure, than your father's son deserves. But pardon me a moment while I read this letter once more."

The handwriting was shaky almost to illegibility, indicating that the writer must have handled the pen with distressful difficulty:

"Your Highness,—I am relying upon the fact of a life spent in your service to win me forgiveness for addressing you from what I know to be my deathbed. When I left you a year ago I was practically a dying man with but one anxiety, one care—the future of my only child—my son Maurice. It is, then, of him that, with your gracious permission, I wish now to speak, seeing that hours only now remain to me.

For reasons which I cannot state here I am leaving the lad without means of any kind. Profession he has none, for—criminally, as I now see it to have been—I have kept him at Oxford, hoping against hope that I might live till he took his degree. Now all that is at an end, and, unless my one desire is accomplished, he will have, at eighteen, to face the world, not only a pauper, but educationally unfit to battle with it.

For the sake, then, of the father, who, I venture to think, served you long and faithfully, will your Highness befriend the son? Maurice is a good lad, a true and honest lad; and, upon my dying word, has never forgotten that he is godson to a Prince of the House of Romanoff. I think your Highness will find him useful, for he is well read and speaks both Russian and French as perfectly as it is possible for an Englishman to speak them.

One thing more. Years ago your Highness intrusted me with a secret, which I need not say has inviolably remained with me ever since. Five years later I visited St. Petersburg in your Highness' interests, on a mission known only to yourself and to me. While there I became possessed of certain information concerning this secret which I here confess I refrained then from communicating to you, fearing to add to your already heavy burden of sorrow. Now, when I would divulge to you the truth—which is contained in a paper delivered to me by one now dead—I cannot; for on another and subsequent visit to Russia—which your Highness will doubtless remember—this paper, which never left my person, was stolen from me on my way from Moscow to Warsaw.

I have reason to believe that both thief and paper are at this moment in London, and that machinery—of a wild and dangerous socialistic character—will shortly be set in motion to offer you the document—at a price.

And now, solemnly warning your Highness—as one who, when you receive this, will have solved the greatest secret of all—that the welfare and happiness of you and yours depends upon your possession of the paper I speak of; and once more committing my dear son to the consideration which I feel you will not withhold, I bid your Highness a grateful farewell, being now, as I have ever been proud to be, your Highness' humble and obliged friend and servant,

"Gilbert Thorne."

To His Highness The Grand Duke Ivan Nicolavitch.

"Do you know the nature of the contents of this letter?" asked the Grand Duke.

"No—except that I suspect they in some way concern myself."

"You are right," was the reply. "Your father has here asked me to do what I can for your welfare. I am glad to be able to realise his wishes. I am a childless man, and an exile. From henceforth be to me as a son. You are at Oxford?"

"Yes," said Maurice, "at Christchurch."

"Very well, then; you will return there next term, as usual, and for the future regard this house as your home."

For the moment the contrast between the little house on the borders of the New Forest and the palatial building in Park Lane staggered the boy a bit. He had, of course, heard his father many a time talk of the Tsar's brother, who, two-and-twenty years before had been suddenly deprived of all his State offices and of his rights as a Russian subject, and exiled from his country indefinitely; but he had been too young to understand, or to take an intelligent interest in the details, even had they been explained to him. His disposition, however, was eminently adaptable, so that though this was his first visit to the Prince's house, he quickly accustomed himself to the new order of things.

* * * * *

The Grand Duke Ivan Nicolavitch was, in the year 1880, commander of the Imperial Guard and military Governor of the Capital.

A great favourite with the reigning Tsar; he was also, in addition to being enormously wealthy, secretly opposed to aristocratic influence and to the despotic system of government.

The Tsar, however, was not altogether ignorant of his brother's unorthodox opinions, and, desirous of binding him, if possible, more closely to his own order, proposed to him a marriage with a princess of a reigning German family. This alliance the Grand Duke, much to the Tsar's astonishment and displeasure, declined, assigning no reason.

Digitized by Google

Determined to get to the bottom of things, the Emperor set his Chief-of-Police to work, to discover such evidence, if any, of his brother's private mode of life, as should explain the motive of his refusal to accept his august relative's proposal.

The evidence, thanks to the spy system, was not long in being forthcoming.

It had long been remarked that the Prince had been in the habit of making periodical visits to Moscow, and of remaining there, sometimes for a week. It was now discovered that for three years he had been the husband of a lady—one Kaniska Barotski, an opera singer of some reputation in the old Muscovite metropolis—but that the couple were childless.

Relentlessly angry at the news, the Tsar, not only as has been said, deprived his offending brother of all his rights, privileges, and State offices, but, in addition to exiling the Prince, had his unoffending wife seized and deported to Siberia. For the Grand Duke this was the last straw; and once in his adopted home in England he once and for all cast himself adrift from all the traditions of his race, and threw himself into the hands of the moderate socialists of his own nationality, who had their headquarters in London.

Fortunately for himself, and as foreseeing that which should come upon him, his wealth, except, of course, his Russian landed property, had for years been invested in British and American securities, thus enabling him to keep up his position as a great Russian noble.

He was a man of great intellectual gifts, and of a charming personality. Now about fifty years of age, he looked ten years younger, and many were the fair British maidens who would have been delighted to console and comfort the solitary man, and to share with him his London palace and that still finer place in the northern part of the kingdom, Bayard Castle.

Such was the man with whom Maurice Thorne, his late secretary's son and his own godson, was suddenly, by a turn of Fortune's wheel, called to dwell. Most people said it was "extraordinary luck" for the lad; while youngsters of his own age raised their voices in vain wishes that they had "that beggar Thorne's chance."

One person there was to whom this social promotion of Maurice Thorne's did not come as an unmixed blessing.

This was a certain young lady of Maurice's acquaintance with whom, indeed, he had had a tender understanding, ever since the day, two years before, when he had, in veritable knight-errant spirit, rescued the sixteen-year-old damsel from under the hoofs and horns of an infuriated bull in the forest.

With Maurice's departure for London, Enid Eskeet's love-light went nearly out.

Here was Maurice in the very vortex of social delirium and dissipation, with neither time nor, perhaps, inclination to think of the little girl in the old Hampshire town, who had nothing to put in the place of the pleasantly sweet daily association of the past two years. But at least there were his letters—and such letters—full of boyishly enthusiastic love—after all, the purest and the best, in this selfish, hard-living world of ours.

By-and-by she came to regard the position of affairs, as between herself and Maurice, with more equanimity until a certain day, when Maurice had been four years with his adopted father.

All through this time it may be said that the Grand Duke Ivan Nicolavitch was ever restlessly expecting and looking for the event which should place in his hands the mysterious paper.

As yet, however, its present holder had made no sign, although the Prince had spared neither money nor time in seeking to discover the name and whereabouts of that individual.

It was his nephew now who sat upon the Russian throne, so that although his implacable hatred of his late brother survived that brother's death, there was just a chance that he might accept the Imperial invitation to resume his position, social and military, at the Russian Court, should such an invitation, as was not unlikely, be extended to him.

Then occurred that which altogether altered the aspect of everything, alike for the Prince and for Enid Eskeet's young but whole-hearted lover.

* * * * *

For weeks the hoardings about the West End of the Metropolis had blazoned forth, in rainbow-hued fashion, the coming to London from the Continent of a bright particular star in the theatrical firmament.

This was no other than the famous Russian singer and dancer, Olga Barotski.

In St. Petersburg, as indeed, in every city throughout the Russian empire, this lady with the wonderful voice, with the inimitable grace of motion, and the possessor of the finest diamonds in Europe, reigned as queen without the shadow of a rival near her throne.

Previously tempted in vain to visit London, she had at last, by an offer of unexampled magnitude, consented to accept a six weeks' engagement at a big house near Leicester Square.

But it was not alone as singer and dancer that La Belle Olga sought to capture the plaudits of her audiences. She sang and danced in a cage of six full-grown Bengal tigers!

Round the ring, ascending from below, was built up a railing of solid, bright steel bars, within which the growling beasts, and the lovely, supple-limbed performer were electrically thrown into brilliant relief.

The promised show create dquite an anticipatory thrill amongst the lovers of the sensational, although the ever-watchful philanthropist was already stirring to protest.

Maurice happened to be "up" from Oxford on the occasion of La Belle Olga's London début, and expressed a strong desire to witness the fair Russian's performance.

Always ready and willing to give pleasure to his adopted son, the Prince, himself having also a curiosity to see this strange product of his native country, proposed to accompany him, a box being secured on the grand tier.

"What a splendid creature!" exclaimed the Prince, "and," after a few seconds' steady regarding of the performer, "how like!—how like!"

"Like, sir! Like whom, or what?"

The other did not reply for the moment, but continued to gaze fixedly at the tall, stately woman in the ring, as she burst forth into a perfect flood of song; one of her hands resting upon the head of the most magnificent tiger of them all.

Then again did the exclamation escape him, his eyes the while fastened, as by invisible fascination, upon the face of the venturous yet apparently fearless singer.

"Kaniska's image!"

Maurice saw, then, that for some reason, his companion was deeply moved, so that he refrained from speaking, until it should please the Prince to break his reserve.

Digitized by Google

Then it was that, her song finished amid a storm of applause, La Belle Olga turned and directed her gaze full at the two men in the box.

The effect upon each was altogether different.

It was now the turn of Maurice to be silent, and to regard with rapt, whole-souled eyes the woman before him.

As for the Prince, rapidly taking a card from his case and scribbling upon it a few words in Russian, he opened the door of the box, called an attendant, and bid him take the pasteboard round to the lady's dressing-room, so soon as she could reach it.

The attendant knew the Prince's identity, and was all respectful eagerness.

"Does your Highness wish for an answer?"

"No! My coat and carriage! Come, Maurice!"

At that moment La Belle Olga slowly left the ring, the quick clang of the steel gate behind her sounding to Maurice like the shutting of the gate of Paradise itself.

"Maurice," said Ivan Nicolavitch, breaking the silence as the carriage drew up at the Park Lane house, "I expect a visitor to-morrow afternoon. What say you to a run down to Southampton. Your Enid will be glad; and—and I wish to be alone."

"Very well, sir!" replied Maurice wonderingly. "If you wish it, of course; but I thought that you and I had arranged to go to Lord's, for the Oxford and Cambridge?"

"Yes, yes—I know! but—well, you can go without me to Lord's. Yes, that will, perhaps, be better, as I may want you before the evening."

* * * * *

In her dressing-room at the theatre sat La Belle Olga—alone, with, between her dainty, jewelled fingers, the card of His Imperial Highness the Grand Duke Ivan Nicolavitch. Her face, with the contracted brow and the compressed lips, was full of anxious thought. There was no hardness in her eyes, as some, envious of her professional and social triumphs, had spitefully maintained; while just now, there was an especial tenderness, a wistful, far-away expression of intense longing about them which contrasted with her somewhat bizarre, if gorgeous and be-jewelled, costume, which was absolutely pathetic.

"And he comes to me first—my father! My father!—of whom I have never even heard till that villain Bouteneff—who stole, among other things, the paper from the old Englishman Thorne, thinking it was of monetary value—told me of his existence. Why did the Governor of the Russian Prison, when in St. Petersburg, four years before then, seek out this man Thorne and give him this paper? I don't know! I don't know! but I do know that I outwitted, at the point of the knife, Bouteneff the cunning! and took from him the paper which told me—told me—— But I will wait until I meet my father to-morrow!"

* * * * *

In the library at No. 106 Park Lane, the master of the house sits, watching and listening for something—somebody who shall change for him the whole course of his life

A card is brought to him.

"Olga Barotski."

If he lives to be a hundred, Ivan Nicolavitch will never forget that first hand-clasp—that first kiss from his daughter's lips.

"How like! how like!" he still repeats.

And she!—she nestles up to him with that passionate gratitude for protection—the protection Nature ordained for her.

"Tell me," said her father, "tell me of—of your mother!"

For answer she gave him a paper in an open envelope.

"I will leave you while you read it," she said.

"Nay!" he answered. "I need you! stay by me—Olga—my child!"

But the strong man well-nigh miscalculated his power of self-restraint

The paper was in Russian, and in his wife's handwriting. It ran:

"Beloved,—They have killed me! But I bore it—for you. But, oh! the knout! ("And I—I live to read it!") Ivan! I am leaving you, and my little Olga. The Governor, who knows you, will see that you get this. Oh! my husband! continue to love me in your heart as I die loving you! I cannot write more. Farewell.—Your one love and wife,

"Kaniska."

"And my brother ruled Russia by the grace of God!"

It was all he said. Then Olga stole gently to his side and in almost whispered words told him how an escaped convict from the mines had, after her mother's death, carried her away, and brought her up to animal training and a professional life generally. Becoming acquainted with her birth and her father's name and rank, he had played a waiting game, until Olga's promptitude had wrested the paper from him, circumvented his plans, and once more consigned him to Siberian capitvity.

It was while she was recounting the adventures of her life, and listening to his story of his own lonely existence, that Maurice, sick of a lonely afternoon, entered the library.

"Maurice," said the Prince, taking Olga by the hand, and presenting her to the young man, "this is my daughter—given to me, as I feel, from the dead!"

She was all graciousness, as befitted the child of kingly race.

"My father," she said, "has told me of you, and of the Enid you love in the town by the sea. I want to see her, for she will be my sister, this beautiful Enid of yours!"

And so it was that he awoke out of his feverish dream. Olga, his adopted father's daughter, was lovely, queenly, good, but—she was not for him. His loyalty to his little English rose returned in full force, and he was only grateful to this beneficent and beautiful being who had so well and truly brought him to his right mind.

* * * * *

Ivan Nicolavitch never returned to Russia; although repeatedly urged to do so by his nephew the Tsar. He lives in contentment with his daughter, who, to the philanthropists' satisfaction, appeared no more in public, after that first night's performance.

Maurice is now secretary in his father's place, and with his pretty little wife makes up the happy quartette which meets once a week at dinner at No. 106 Park Lane.

Maurice—who knows—invariably reminds his wife, after every one of these social meetings, that things are as they are because Olga is as like her mother, as she is "her father's daughter."

T. H. Latham.

A Thrilling Story of Love and War.

JUST PUBLISHED—A

SIXPENNY EDITION OF THE FAMOUS NOVEL,

THE AYRES OF STUDLEIGH.
THE AYRES OF STUDLEIGH.
THE AYRES OF STUDLEIGH.
THE AYRES OF STUDLEIGH.

6d. By ANNIE S. SWAN. By ANNIE S. SWAN. 6d.

THE AYRES OF STUDLEIGH.
THE AYRES OF STUDLEIGH.
By ANNIE S. SWAN.

To be had at all Railway Bookstalls, Booksellers, or post free for 8d. from C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID SERIAL.

Dupes of Destiny

By Blanche Eardley, Writer of "The Bond Between."

FORTY-FOURTH CHAPTER.

Connecting the Links.

When Philip had reached London after burning the papers that had so filled him with horror and dismay, he went straight to the Foundling Hospital, where he had been brought up from a baby, and saw the superintendent. He was an old man now, with a kindly, time-worn face, and his eyes lit up at the sight of the boy who had blossomed forth into such a promising man, and become a credit to the hospital. Philip had asked him at once to tell him all there was to tell about the occasion when he had entered the home, whether there was anything on him, or sent with him, that would give him some clue to the unknown past. It was more for Marcella's sake than his own that he had begun the quest, for he had determined that, once he could prove himself at least clean from any disgraceful stain, he would take the girl he loved from the atmosphere of the Court, in which her beautiful, pure nature was being crushed by the pernicious influence of Sir Cyprian and his friends.

"All I can tell you, lad," the old superintendent said, "is that you came here with a few rags on, much worn and of no importance. The only thing of any value was a gold locket."

Philip uttered an exclamation. "A locket! Why was it not given to me before—it was mine—my mother's; perhaps it contained her photograph."

The superintendent shook his head. "No, Philip, we opened it and it was empty—the glass on both sides being smashed as though someone had deliberately torn whatever it had contained out of it; but I will see where it is and bring it to you. It must have been forgotten when you left us, but it is safe enough." He brought the locket to Philip—a tiny gold pendant of no value, except that it once was his mother's—that intangible link that connected him with the shades of the past—the past that had held those shadowy shapes of his unknown parents. For Marcella's sake he hoped to know that the mother who had worn it was one worthy that niche he had always reserved in his heart for her. He touched it softly with his fingers, then put it in his pocket. He was disappointed that there was no face upon which to feast his eyes. He turned to go, when the superintendent called him back.

"By-the-way, Philip, a gentleman called on me some weeks ago, and asked me some of those same questions. He happened to be the doctor of the ship where you were born, and he also asked me whether I knew anything of your baby-brother—the twin with yourself, whom some passenger had taken up. I did not know anything of the matter, so he went away very disappointed."

"My brother!" Philip exclaimed. "To think that all these years I have had a brother in the world with myself, perhaps yearning to meet someone belonging to him. Perhaps—God help him!—starving for food, ill and no one to comfort him! Tell me the name of that doctor?" he said quickly. "I will go to him at once."

He left the home with the address of Dr. Slade in his pocket, but when he reached it, he was told that the doctor had left England for an indefinite period. He turned away disappointed—then a sudden thought struck him. He would go to Marcella's aunt, Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox. She would let him talk freely to her. She knew Marcella loved him.

When he arrived he found Lady Violet talking to the financier and millionaire, Caleb J. Johnson.

"I am afraid I am intruding," he said politely. "I came to talk to you, Lady Violet, about Marcella."

Mr. Johnson put his hand on his shoulder. "We were talking about you, Mr. Nullius, some time ago," he said, in a voice that slightly trembled. "I—I am glad you came in, and so is Lady Violet."

Philip gazed from one to the other wonderingly. The storm cloud that had swept over them had left its mark on their faces. The millionaire especially was suppressing some deep emotion. Philip wondered what it was.

"I came," he said slowly, "to beg of you, Lady Violet, to get Marcella away from the Court. My hands are tied; I am powerless to move," he went on passionately, "for until I have some name to offer Marcella how can I ask her to be my wife? So I want you, Lady Violet, to take the place of Marcella's mother, and bring her away. She is, as you know, unhappy, and lately she has been frightened several times by a mysterious man with a black beard and blue glasses who lurks about the Court. It's not safe for her to be there alone."

Digitized by Google

The effect of his words was peculiar. Lady Violet started, and uttered a low cry of pain and horror; while Mr. Johnson said in a loud, excited tone:

"A man with a black beard! Why, there is a man of that description whom the police want in connection with the theft of my 'Mona Lisa'!"

Lady Violet laughed harshly. "Not that, Caleb—don't say—don't say—that." Then she fell insensible between the two men.

Between them Mr. Johnson and Philip Nullius raised the unconscious woman, and laid her gently on the couch.

"Shall I ring?" Philip queried, wondering at the pallor of the financier's face. It was as though some hideous doubt had suddenly clutched him by the heartstrings. Yet how could anything he said have brought that look into the great financier's face?

"No, don't ring," Mr. Johnson said slowly—his eyes glanced at the white face of the beautiful woman whom he had of his own folly dragged into a bigamous marriage—"I think she will come round soon, and servants chatter."

"I am sorry," Philip began, an apologetic note in his voice; "it was my fault for blurting out so suddenly what I should have kept to myself. I forgot for the moment that Lady Violet was so deeply attached to Marcella that the very idea of there being a mysterious stranger frightening her at the Court was enough to terrify her out of her life."

The financier looked at him oddly. "Naturally," he said quickly. "Women are much more easily upset than men; but tell me, Mr. Nullius, have you also seen that man with the black beard? He seems to have taken upon himself the role of bogey!

"Yes," Philip answered gravely. "I saw him quite accidentally once, speaking to a man who had done his best to keep me in durance vile for some strange reasons of his own, and again I saw him that same day on the platform at Paddington with——" He stopped suddenly. Good Heavens! What had he been going to say? To tell the man who was the husband of Marcella's aunt! As a lightning flash the memory of that late afternoon came back to him, and he saw that he had completely forgotten the incident of the meeting he had witnessed as the train had borne him slowly out of the station.

The woman speaking to the man with the black beard had been none other than the financier's proud Society bride!

He understood her sudden collapse in the middle of his speech to her husband, but why had she withheld her knowledge so long, unless it was for the sake of her niece?

Philip thought he could understand the reason for silence, if, like himself, the poor woman was the bearer of so sinister a secret that honour forbade speech. He glanced up and caught the financier's eyes fixed upon him with a searching expression in them.

"You saw the man with the black beard with—whom?" Mr. Johnson said slowly. "Why did you pause so suddenly unless you had a reason in doing so?"

Philip flushed hotly. He felt the note of suspicion in the financier's voice, and it hurt him. He had almost thought that Lady Violet's husband had unbent a little from his distant brusqueness of their former meeting. His voice was, however, cool and collected as he replied:

"My reason for pausing, Mr. Johnson, was that I was not quite certain whether the person with the man was a friend or just a casual stranger asking a question. The train had gone before I could watch them any longer."

The financier frowned thoughtfully. Why had his wife—for so he still regarded her—cried out at the mention of that mysterious bearded man? She in her purity and goodness could not have been otherwise than shocked at the thought of Marcella being frightened by a man looked upon as a member of a dangerous gang. Yet he had felt strangely upset at the few words that had dropped from her lips before she fainted. After all, they might have been just the result of an overwrought brain.

He turned to Philip suddenly. "You mentioned something about trying to find your name—er—Mr. Nullius—the name of the parents who left you in infancy. Have you any clue to their identity?"

Philip shook his head regretfully. "I'm sorry to say I have not, sir. The few things I possessed of any value were stolen from me some time ago from the lodgings I had in the country. I felt it sorely, because although they were only one or two odd love letters of my dead mother, I prized them for her sake, but," he added, "I don't despair of finding out one day; the grave even cannot hold a secret when God means it to be revealed. And now I learnt for the first time to-day from the authorities at the Foundling Hospital that I also had a——" he stopped abruptly, and glanced at the couch. Lady Violet, recovered from her faint, was gazing at him with a peculiar intentness in her great mournful eyes, as though she was trying to find out whether he had mentioned the name of the person who was on the platform with the man with the black beard. A swift exchange of glances passed between them, one of supplication on the woman's part and one of reassurance on the man's.

"Caleb, I will go to my room now," Lady Violet said, forcing a smile to her lips. "I am sorry I made such an exhibition of myself, but I have been taxing my strength rather. I will talk to you about Marcella to-morrow, Mr. Nullius; we must get her away from the Court at all costs," and a slight shudder shook her delicate shoulders. "Good-bye for the present."

She put her hand in his, and as Mr. Johnson went to open the door for her, she whispered softly:

"Don't judge too harshly—I am more sinned against than sinning!"

When she was in the privacy of her own room, Lady Violet turned the key in the lock, then went slowly to her dressing glass, where she gazed feverishly at the haggard-eyed, white-faced creature that looked back at her. None of her world—the world that bowed down to the laws of gaiety and wit—would have recognised in the worn, harassed, middle-aged looking woman of that moment the brilliantly gay and beautiful leader of Society.

"He will know soon," she muttered, "and then I shall stand revealed in my real colours. I shall be equal in iniquity with—that other—my evil genius!" She clasped her hands passionately. "Oh, dear Heaven, grant that I may not lose everything! That I may at least cling to some little bit of driftwood in the wreckage of my life—that at some future period, when the approaching downfall has become a thing of the past, I may yet hide myself with one tender memory!"

Like a butterfly broken on the wheel of Fate, she saw herself being cast from all that the heart of woman holds dear, and having kept her eyes so long closed against the inevitable, the sudden startling awakening—when the scales were being forcibly wrenched from her eyes, she was appalled by the vista that lay before her. As she moved away from the glass she still looked pale, but round the full curves of her mouth was a strangely set smile.

"He threatened that when he fell I should come down with him," she muttered. "So, if I let him know that I no longer dread the ordeal, he will take more pains to avert it for his own sake."

In the meantime Philip was still with the financier in the drawing-room. After Lady Violet had left the room a feeling of constraint had fallen between the two men. Philip saw that Mr. Johnson was trying to ask him a question that came with difficulty to his lips, and fearing that it might be one that for Lady Violet's sake he could not answer, Philip was eager to get away. Suddenly the financier spoke, and at the sound of his voice Philip started. It was abrupt and harsh.

"You have no notion as to either of your parents being alive, I suppose, Mr. Nullius? For Marcella's sake, I think I should like to help you in your quest."

Digitized by Google

(continued.)

Philip flushed. "Thank you, Mr. Johnson," he said gratefully. "No, I am only possessed of the fact that my mother died in a third class cabin on board a liner. I am afraid my father deserted her," he said bitterly.

"Ah!" The financier winced. "But have you considered what you would do if you discovered your father was not dead and eager to befriend you, Mr. Nullius?" He spoke with feverish haste, and Philip, looking at him, was surprised at his interest. It had almost a personal note in it.

"I am afraid that is far from likely, Mr. Johnson," he said wearily. "So many years have passed since then that the man has probably followed my mother to the grave."

"But, for the sake of argument," continued the financier with a half laugh, "suppose he were alive—stranger things have happened, you know—and you found him a man of decent position, able to help you and push you on in the world, and eager to make what atonement he could for the past; would you hold out your hand to him and be known as his son?"

Philip's face grew strangely set and cold. He did not see anything strange in the financier's questions. He thought them prompted by affection for the girl who was his niece by marriage.

"No," he answered curtly. "I would take no money nor patronage from a man who had left my mother to starve for all he cared. I would just satisfy myself that I had the right to an honest name, which I could offer to the woman I love, and then I would forget that the man existed."

The financier turned towards the window and gazed out into the street, and when he spoke again his voice had an odd note in it, as of a man crying out when his fingers are losing their grasp on the last straw that links him with life.

"Are you not hard? There may be extenuating circumstances."

A short laugh burst from the younger man.

"No, Mr. Johnson; no circumstances can be so extenuating that they can forgive a man for sending a woman adrift as my father did my mother. But I must be off now," he said in a different tone; "I have much to do with my time. I hope Lady Violet will be better soon."

Mr. Johnson did not reply, and Philip thought he had not heard him. His face was still turned to the window, and he appeared lost in thought. "Good day, sir," Philip said again.

Without turning round the financier said curtly: "Good day." And feeling himself dismissed, Philip slowly made his way down the long room.

When he reached the door, Mr. Johnson wheeled suddenly round. "Philip!"—and then he pulled himself up with an awkward laugh—"Good-bye, Mr. Nullius—forgive my abstraction. I—I hope you will soon be able to change your name from Nullius, 'the son of no one,' to some other more happy cognomen!"

As the door closed upon the young curate the financier fell with a groan into a chair. His face was ashen, and he looked very old and burdened as with a weight that hung heavy on him.

"Lost!" he muttered hoarsely, "lost to me as though he were dead! But I will make amends—I cannot divulge my secret yet—he would refuse my help, and that must not be. I will make over a deed of gift to him, anonymously, under some other name, and then when the time is more ripe I may win him over to me; once his regard is mine, the rest should be easy. I have never yet tried to win affection in vain—and I must—oh, Heaven!" he burst out passionately, "I must win the love of my son. The want of it has taken the place of all else."

FORTY-FIFTH CHAPTER.

The Breaking of the Storm Cloud.

The following day the financier went into the City to look up his broker. He had neglected his correspondence for a long time, and since he had dismissed his secretary, Edward Day, he had let matters go with a fine indifference. But now he meant to place things on a very different scale. The Ruby Duncoran shares had all been bought up as soon as the public had learnt that the great millionaire had headed the list of directors, and the financier intended to buy other shares in the name of Philip Nullius that would put money at the back of the son who, had he known it, would have repulsed him with scorn and loathing for the sake of the dead mother that stood between them.

Caleb J. Johnson reproached himself for having been too lax in the arrangement of his affairs, and he remembered, with a cynical grin at his own expense, that he had not turned the leaves of a financial paper for quite a long time. In his position of a made man he was invulnerable, and the winds of finance that blew, now hot, now cold, could not stem the course that ran pure gold for him.

When he reached Messrs. Lobb and Rusch, the world-famous brokers, he noticed that mingling with the glances of admiration the clerks usually bestowed upon him there was a new, almost imperceptible, atmosphere of subdued and chastened sorrow.

"Ah, Mr. Johnson!" Lobb, the senior partner, said, greeting him heartily. "I am glad to think that your financial bark is too tough to be turned aside from its course by the first adverse wind that blows."

The financier raised his brows. "What wind is that, Lobb? I must confess that of late weeks I have let you take matters into your hands—I have been too busy to even think of the success of the Ruby Duncoran."

Mr. Lobb looked at him curiously. "Oh, that's going very well," he answered drily. "But do you remember my wiring to you about the South African 'Dancing Girl' mine, just before the slump set in, in fact, when it was threatened? I telephoned to you as well to Park Lane, and to my surprise your secretary, Mr. Day, sent your instructions that I was to stick to them instead of selling out at the price they were then quoted at. I was surprised, I must confess," he went on, "but I was obliged to obey your instructions, and a few days later the mine was flooded, and, of course, you have sustained a monetary loss, Mr. Johnson, that would have taken away the ground from under the feet of any other man than yourself."

"My secretary," Mr. Johnson repeated slowly. "He sent you instructions that you acted upon without further inquiry?"

The broker reddened. "I certainly thought you were there, Mr. Johnson, or, of course, I would have hesitated to act upon any orders but those coming straight from you."

"Oh, yes—yes," the financier interrupted quickly, with a deprecating smile on his large mouth. "I was there all right; Mr. Day acted on my instructions. I was rather hopeful of those shares—even then."

"By-the-way," Mr. Lobb continued, "that Mr. Day has a head on his shoulders, and no mistake! I have just discovered that while he has been your secretary he has been buying and selling shares with remarkable cuteness, but what I can't quite understand," he went on thoughtfully, "is why he should have sold out himself that very day some of the selfsame shares in the 'Dancing Girl' mine, just after I had rung you up on the telephone. It looks to me rather fishy, Mr. Johnson, although if you are satisfied, it's not my place to interfere. But if I were you I would keep my eyes on that secretary. He is a little too smart."

Caleb J. Johnson, the man who had never been "done" in his life, laughed harshly. He remembered the day very well now. It was the one after he had dismissed the secretary from his service, and he had probably returned and, out of revenge, had sent those instructions that had so nearly beggared him—while profiting by the information himself.

Digitized by Google

Yes, certainly Mr. Edward Day had a decided talent for winning the odd trick, and it galled the proud man that the person who had scored off him three times running had been a beginner in life's race instead of an old veteran. Yes, Edward Day was very smart, and a smouldering rage rose up in the financier's heart as he realised that the outcast he had befriended was not only a liar and a forger, but that he had made a very decent income in a moment's hazard while trying to beggar the man who had dealt leniently by him in the first place. Then the financier thought of the plans he had made for his own son, Philip Nullius, and he reviled savagely under his breath the cunning of the ex-secretary who had outwitted him.

When he left the brokers he realised that he had gone down a degree in the estimation of his former admirers. But that was not the only blow the financier was to receive. Two days later he dropped another small fortune, and again on inquiry he found that his ex-secretary had been before him, and while doing his best to ruin the man who had let him off easily, had laid the foundation of a fortune for himself. It was a few days after the second blow to his vanity as a company promoter and man of business, that Mr. Johnson met Edward Day coming out of the doors of one of the most important brokers in the City. The older man would have cut him, but with an insolent laugh Edward Day stood in front of him and said:

"Hallo, Johnson, old man! You seem to have had a change of luck since we parted. Don't you think you had better get hold of a smart secretary who can keep you on the lines—you are losing your head, you know—you won't be able to stand many more such losses! And once your credit goes in the City, the end will soon follow, and then think how awful it will be for Lady Violet!"

"Confound you!" burst from the financier savagely. He was thunderstruck by the unutterable insolence of the smiling, youthful face that mocked him by its assumption of pitying superiority. "Get out of my way, you young hound, or I'll kick you out."

The other man laughed. "Oh, come, Johnson—all's fair in love and war, you know," he sneered gaily. "I want to have your congratulations on both events in my life—I have won in warfare in the City, and also in Love in the country."

"What do you mean?" and the quick, suspicious eyes of the financier flashed into the smiling blue ones of the latest man of finance.

"I mean that I am engaged to the most beautiful and the most fair of ladies, Marcella Rust to wit," was the reply that sent the financier staggering against the wall in amazement.

"You infernal young liar!"

Edward Day laughed amusedly.

"I have just come from the Court, and return there again when I have attended to some little business matters connected with some shares in which I am interested," a mocking note in his voice stung the silent financier. He recognised in it the contempt for the man who had let himself be done by an amateur in the money world. "You must be proud, Johnson," the cutting voice went on, "that my very short stay with you has made me into so good a financier. I have profited by your example."

"Profited by your thefts, you mean," burst from the man suddenly. "You are a born thief, Day, as incapable of understanding the claims of gratitude as you are of loving anyone but yourself! And as for your lying boast about Marcella Rust, let me ask first two questions that may concern you."

Edward Day raised his brows superciliously. "What are they? Look sharp, anyway; I have an engagement."

"Has Mr. Philip Nullius been acquainted with the fact of your engagement to Miss Rust?" the financier began slowly; "and also where is the girl with whom you were always about before coming to me as my secretary? Does Marcella know about her? I shall immediately inform her of it and do all I can to stop this rumour."

Edward's fair, effeminate face grew livid, and a patchy, grey-like shadow showed round his mouth.

(Continued overleaf.)

Wesley's Theory of Earthquakes.

"The cause of earthquakes," said John Wesley, "is sin." How he reasoned it out is not easy for the average sinner to see. The idea of such a tremendous physical convulsion as an earthquake resulting from the violation of moral law is nonsense in the eyes of modern science. The reverse is more often true. "The cause of a deal of sin," said Hannah More, "is bile." That we can see through. Bile poisons the brain, and the brain is the organ of the mind. It is certain that all the earthquakes that ever shook this wicked world never did half the damage that is done every year by sleepy stomachs and lazy livers. Generals have lost battles, statesmen have been beaten in diplomacy, workmen have been thrown out of jobs, clergymen have preached poor sermons, and husbands and wives have quarrelled for no reason under the sun but a "touch of liver complaint." The crust of society can never lie quiet with such a force as biliousness under it.

Writing of a time five years ago, a lady asserts that she had not strength to work. She suffered acutely with a sharp stabbing pain down the right side and between the shoulder-blades. Her appetite failed, of course, for Nature never calls for food when she is not in a condition to use it. Still, a trifle of sustenance must be taken. The lady took it, digested a bit of it, and suffered great distress from the presence of the rest in the torpid stomach, when indeed, it was not vomited, as was often the case. We need scarcely add that her sleep was disturbed and failed to refresh her. To quote her own words, "I arose in the morning with a splitting headache and a feeling of utter weakness and prostration. My tongue was furred, I was tired, lacked energy, became irritable and bad tempered, and could have quarrelled with my best friend."

Now, what sort of a life is this to lead? What is anybody good for while in such a state as that? What would you wager on your own success in business if you had to pit yourself against other people's sharpness, while you had to fight with a poison-soaked head and a stomach that refused its breakfast? Not a crooked sixpence.

Our correspondent continued: "The doctor told me I was suffering from an enlarged liver, but his medicines gave me no relief, and I began to give up all hope of ever getting better, when I was advised by a friend to try Mother Seigel's Syrup. Before I had finished the first bottle my health improved. As I continued taking the syrup my health was gradually restored, and I have had no recurrence of my complaint since. If ever I feel run down I take a dose or two of the Syrup, and it seems to put new life into me. Signed, Agnes Gatley, 3 Boundary Terrace, Moss Nook, Nr. Cheadle. Ches."

The success of Seigel's Syrup in curing this malady is due to the fact that it goes straight as an arrow to the very root and source of it, the paralysed digestion.

Whatever may be the true theory of Earthquakes, we may be sure of one thing anyway—namely, that bile in the blood, arising from an arrest of the digestive function, is the hot-bed of more sorrow, pain, and death than all the powers at the interior of the earth ever scattered over its surface.

An Old Fallacy.

People sometimes talk of being happy as a king, yet to serve as the target for the revolver practice of every crank who nurses a grievance is not quite the life a wise man would choose. The man who enjoys good health, if not already happy, is certainly on the high road to happiness. Whoever lacks health lacks everything. "Some years ago my life was rendered miserable by indigestion and biliousness," says Mr. Harris, of Market Hotel, Birstall, near Leeds. "I was always low and weak—too ill to work well, not ill enough to lay up. Whatever I ate caused me pain, though my appetite was very small and my food carefully chosen. After other treatment had failed, Mother Seigel's Syrup cured me—made a new man of me. I know of no medicine equal to it."

Digitized by Google

"I don't know what you are talking about," he began blusteringly, when a man coming out of a bank close by stopped suddenly and looked at him with a curiously mocking expression in his big, humorous-looking eyes, and the sight of the stranger froze the words on Edward's lips. He turned his back abruptly, and before the financier had any idea that he was going, he had hailed a passing hansom. As he sprang into it, Mr. Johnson, who had not observed the mutual glance of recognition between the two men, drew back sharply into the shadow. A man was standing on the footboard of the hansom that his ex-secretary had entered.

"Why," he murmured, "that's Rayne. I'll bet a thousand pounds to one! What does he want with Day, I wonder? I'm glad he did not see me, but I suppose he has gone after that young blackguard for information. Yet how could he know that I had changed my mind. I sent him the money I 'borrowed' so long ago, and now owe him nothing."

He strolled on, then a flash of light illumined the dark corners of his brain, and he remembered what had so puzzled him. "Why the young cur's forgeries were made payable to a man called Rayne! By Jove! that's it. Rayne has the unscrupulous young thief in his power, and it's a case of the blackmailer blackmailed." He laughed grimly, and one or two acquaintances passing him, thought that they had never seen the face of the well known "gold king" look so savage and haggard. They attributed it to his inexplicable losses in two great deals, and remembered that the name of Caleb J. Johnson did not stand so high in the City as that of younger and more daring men. Like all great "stars" his place in the financial firmament was being usurped by a man whose young brain was showing remarkable gifts of finance worthy of watching.

In the meantime the man on the footboard of the hansom had signed to the driver to stop; then he leant forward to the white, angry-faced man leaning back against the padded leather and laughed softly: "So—wanted to slip off, eh? Afraid to meet the man who, by lifting one finger, could put you in a cell. That's not wise, Mr. Edward—Day! Ah," as the sullen face flushed suddenly, "you did not know that I should find out your real name, did you, although you signed that of the financier, Caleb J. Johnson, on the cheques you gave me! You seem to cultivate as many crimes as you can, Mr. Day. Now, perhaps, since you are making such a pile, you will kindly let me have five thousand."

"Confound you!" Edward muttered, between his teeth; "I shall do nothing of the kind. Get off!"

The other raised his hand. "I shall call the nearest policeman and give you in charge, then. Choose!"

Day bit his lip and gazed at the ever-recurring traffic without speaking. After a pause he said slowly: "Very well, then. I'll give you a cheque of my own this time. Wait a moment. What's that?"

As the man turned his head in the direction Edward had indicated, the latter leant forward, and one swift movement sent the man off his uncertain footing into the road, just as a motor-car was approaching.

Edward flung up the flap of the hansom. "Quick—Paddington—I've a train to catch! Five pounds if you get there in time. Stop for no one!"

FORTY-SIXTH CHAPTER.
The Listening Woman.

"It amounts to this, Rust; we must get the girl away and hide her before any attempt is made to take her from us. Lady Violet and Johnson, to say nothing of that cleric, Nullius, will not be put off much longer, and once Marcella is in their hands, good-bye to her marrying me!"

Sir Cyprian Rust smiled slightly. Edward Day had just arrived from London, and the baronet was not ill-pleased to see him back. He had been strangely unlike himself for some time, and even his devoted servants had wondered at his nervous irritability; the old buoyant expression had left his blue eyes, and the slamming of a door made him jump like a cat

"Is that so?" he said, quietly eyeing the flushed face of the man he had taken into a sort of partnership regarding his enmity towards Philip Nullius, the lover of his daughter, who still lay ill upstairs. "I don't fancy that they will succeed, but we will arrange something by which we may give them a little trouble."

"Take her nurse with you," Edward suggested, "in case they buy her over, and the sooner we go, the sooner we shall succeed in outwitting them. Then I can marry Marcella, while you give her away. Get her down to that place where you say the curate was, and when once Marcella is my wife I can laugh at them all!"

Sir Cyprian smiled amusedly. There was something in the unscrupulous young man before him that reminded him of his own youth. Like he had been, he was a free-lance, an Ishmael with every man's hand against him, and Sir Cyprian had a certain respect for a man who could, through sheer force of will, rise superior to the lot Fate had cast for him; whether the means by which he rose were honest or otherwise, it mattered not to him. And there was the sense of dealing a hard blow to the pride of Lady Violet in forcing Marcella into marrying the man they both hated most, and at the same time cheating Philip Nullius—the man whom he feared and hated above all others—of the girl he loved.

"Are you sure the nurse is reliable?" Edward asked again.

Sir Cyprian laughed. "Very—I hold a certain secret of hers that would make it awkward were she anything else than faithful."

Day raised his brows. The secrets of a nurse did not interest him in the least. He had too many of his own.

"I am making a good position for myself 'on 'Change' now," he said arrogantly, "and can afford to give Marcella a decent home. Remember, Rust, if she is well enough, we must get away to-day."

"All will be arranged," was the quiet reply. "Marcella shall be your wife within twenty-four hours, Day!"

The window was half open, and the blinds were drawn, so neither men saw a white, fair face, with an ugly scar on the delicate temple, pressed against the open venetians, listening to each word that came to her wafted on the mild Spring air. As they talked the woman's face grew hard, and the scarlet line that marked her mouth parted in a slow smile of scornful hate.

"In twenty-four hours Marcella shall be his wife!" she murmured; then raising her eyes she looked at a light that shone from one of the bedrooms. "Dear," and the whisper sounded like a sob on the night air, "I shall save you from that; at least, I can spare you that shame!"

And inside the room the two men discussed their plans, which, unknown to them, had a listener in the woman outside.

Presently she stole away, and, entering the Court, crept to the door that communicated with the forbidden corridor. Under the guise of friendship, which she knew so well how to assume, she had won the confidence of Deacon, who, now that the young mistress was confined to her room, was not so careful as of old with the keys. Lottie found the door locked, but a search under the rug placed her in possession of the key. She entered the wing, and then locked the door on the inside. Feeling her way softly, she came presently to the room where Marcella had twice seen the pitiful woman whose once bright mind was like a glass on a misty day, blurred and indistinct. She entered, and the woman, whose white face was more frail-looking than when Marcella had once seen it, rose timidly at her approach and looked at her with tear-dimmed eyes.

"I have come from her," Lottie said, speaking as one would to a child, "and she says if you do all I tell you, and make no noise, you will get away from here to where people will be good to you."

"The pretty lady says that," and the wan face smiled faintly. "I will do all she says, because I want to get away from here. I want to see the fields again, and show 'Dolly' the flowers," and as she spoke Lottie noticed the large wax doll in her arms.

(Another grand instalment of this serial next week.)

Digitized by Google

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST

FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN.

Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.

CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of
£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 8 0 „ 15/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/8 „
9 10 0 „ 17/6 „
JUNO Motor Cycles £32, or 12 Payments of 60 each.
JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.

Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ltd., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

To Asthma Sufferers.

Instant relief is gained in all cases of Asthma, Bronchitis, Croup, and Whooping Cough, by the use of POTTER'S ASTHMA CURE. Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists in Tins at 1/-. Test it free of charge. Send post-card to POTTER & CLARKE, Wholesale Druggists, Artillery Lane, London, E., for Free Sample Kindly mention this paper.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

Of all Chemists, or Post Free for P.O. only for 1/3, 2/10, and 4/7 from the Sole Proprietors:

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Mfging. Chemists, NOTTS.

Chilblains

Icilma Natural Water Soap prevents and cures Chilblains, Chaps, and Gouty Irritations of the Skin. Rose-scented. Price 10d. Send 2d. stamps for Samples of Soap and of Icilma Fluor Cream, perfect for the complexion against cold winds.—ICILMA (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

TEN DAYS' FREE TRIAL

Allowed on every cycle bought of us. Your Money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory.

Highest grade fully warranted

BRITISH MADE CYCLES

LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6

New Departure Free Wheel and Hub Brake, BEST MAKES Tyres, and best British-made equipment.

200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, £1 to £2-10 good as new.

Factory clearing sale at half prices.

EARN A CYCLE by taking orders from our sample machine furnished by us. Active Agents wanted in each district. Large profits easily made. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer. Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phones half prices.

MEAD CYCLE CO.*, Dept. 44E,
85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool,
19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

Good health to you is the definite promise contained in every box of

Page Woodcock's Pills

They go a long way towards making life worth living; giving folks the appetite to enjoy food, and the ability to digest it. No fear of Wind on the Stomach, Indigestion, Bile and other Stomach and Liver troubles in the family who rely on this famous remedy. Sold by all Medicine Vendors at 1/1½ and 2/9, or post free for price from PAGE WOODCOCK Ltd., 14 & 16, Euston Bldgs, London, N.W. (Late of Lincoln.)

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted. Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich.

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S

(The most nutritious)

COCOA

And take no other.

FREEMAN'S

TRADE MARK

THE ORIGINAL & ONLY TRUE

CHLORODYNE

Best Remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 6s., or postage free by the INVENTOR, R. FREEMAN, 70 KENNINGTON PARK ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

RECOMMENDED BY MEDICAL MEN.

N.B.—Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Justices James and Mellish, decided in favour of Freeman's Original Chlorodyne, and against Browne & Davenport, compelling them to pay all costs.
—"Times," 24-7-73.

A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle at ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.
"CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," "SINGERS," &c.
Their names guarantee their quality.

FROM 8/- MONTHLY.

A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6
On approval. Two Years' Warranty.
Write for Lists (Free).
EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. 53).
World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

Secrets of Youth.

How to have a beautiful face and figure. How to have beautiful eyes and hair. How to curl the hair naturally without curling pins or tongs. Little people can be made tall. Noses that are red or ugly shape can be cured, and looks greatly improved.

This Pretty Book will be sent FREE. Ask for "BEAUTY'S BOUDOIR." Stamp must be sent for postage. Peralia Perfumery Co. (Dept. 14) 73 Camden Street, North Shields, Eng.

PICTURE 6d.
16 POSTCARDS.

Full size. High-class Views of England and Wales. "S.S." Packet contains 16 different, including Snowdon, Carnarvon Castle, Matlock, Menai Bridges, &c., 6d. Postal Order, post free. 48 different, 1s. 3d. Money back if not satisfied.
ERNEST WOOD & CO.,
Chorlton-Cum-Hardy, Manchester.

TO CURE DRUNKARDS

without their knowledge. Send Stamp for FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of a wonderful remedy that has saved homes. Send no money. Address in confidence: WARD CHEMICAL Co., 51 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

SULPHOLINE LOTION,

For clearing the skin from Spots, Blemishes, Redness, Roughness, giving a Beautiful Complexion and pleasing appearance.

SHILLING BOTTLES.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

A Parent Problem.

"WHAT is to be done?" writes "B. R. T.," "in the following case? I am engaged to a girl, and in a position to marry her. But her people, though they have not been in a position to object to the match, as she is over age, have never invited me to their house, and never expressed a wish to know me. The girl always keeps silent on the matter of her parents. Now, how can I marry her, unless her people alter their attitude towards me?"

* * * * *

They seem to be most curious people. Have they given formal consent to your engagement? If so, surely some kind of understanding has been made as to the date of the ceremony? That being understood, they must be making some arrangements for it to take place. That they have not invited you to the house is mysterious. But that is not altogether unusual in parents. Possibly, it is not you personally they object to, but the idea of the girl getting married at all. I advise you to write formally to the father or mother, telling them that you and the girl wish to fix a date for the wedding. You will then get a reply consenting or otherwise. Upon that reply you must base your conduct. If it is cordial, then I should certainly endeavour to pay them a visit; if otherwise, then evidently they do not wish for any social relations with you. You must put up with that as best you can, contenting yourself with such visits as are necessary just before the wedding.

Six Years and no Proposal.

"I HAVE been keeping company with a young lady for six years," writes "SEYMOUR," "but not being in a position to ask her to marry, I did not propose to her. Some time ago she failed to answer my letters, and I later on discovered that she was walking out with another young man. I am very much in love with her, and although my love has been returned, I am not certain she cares for me now. Perhaps she has grown tired of waiting."

* * * * *

I should think so indeed! Six years, and you have never said a word in the nature of a proposal? Now, if she loved you ever so much, don't you think any girl would expect a man to say something on the delicate subject of marriage before that time? I am not surprised that she is going out with another man. Now, don't suppose that I am harsh on you. No doubt, as you say, you have not been in a position to propose marriage, which shows that you have wished to deal straightforwardly with the girl. But when you ask me to sympathise with you, I fear I cannot. A girl can claim her freedom if a young man, after six years of courtship, says no word about marriage. It would be expecting too much from her to bind her to you, unless you can give some pledge. Write and tell her your exact prospects in the future. If you see a chance of making her a proposal in a year's time, ask her if she will trust you till then.

Young Married Man and Old Friends.

THE position of the young married man is very difficult. "G. P." asks: "Ought I to give up my old friends altogether. For instance, my old football club, which I gave up on marriage, has occasional 'smokers,' to which I am asked. I have declined many of them, but now and again I think I should like to revive some of my old acquaintances. Yet my wife is always terribly upset if I am away from her in the evenings, even for an hour or so. What is the right thing for me to do?"

* * * * *

It is very hard indeed to say, "G. P." You have taken a girl away from her old home, and for your early married life you are her all-in-all. You represent everything to her. If you are away during your leisure hours she feels slighted and lonely. That being the case, to go to such affairs as you mention may seem unkind to her. That is her view of the case, and you have done well to respect it. But my own opinion is that a man should be allowed a certain amount of freedom. Certainly, he should not drop his old friends. A casual visit to such a "smoker" as you mention would do you good. I should quite kindly tell your wife that you wish to go to the affair, and if possible, arrange for a relation of hers to be with her while you are away. Don't leave her alone. In time, you should accustom her to your being out sometimes, and she will not notice it. Don't be away too often, but it is quite right that you should once in a while have a little enjoyment on your own account.

An Extraordinary Young Man.

"JENNY" has a candid lover, whom, I must say, I rather like. The two are devoted to each other, and have no idea whatever of parting. The other day, however, he came in and told "JENNY" that he had a dreadful secret to tell her. When she asked him what it was he said: "For the moment I am madly in love with another girl." It turned out that he had been paying attentions for awhile to somebody else. "JENNY" was amazed at first, but the young man next said, "But it will be all over in a fortnight at the outside. I don't think I am really in love with her, but for the present she is everything to me." "JENNY" asks me what I have to say to such extraordinary conduct.

* * * * *

It is not impossible, "JENNY," for a man's affections to be really given to one girl, and yet for awhile to have a passion for another. As your love seems to be of the sensible kind, it seems most likely that this might occur in your lover's case. As he has been candid enough to tell you the whole affair, don't you think you might trust him? Such an affair as his courtship of the other girl may be nothing more nor less than a huge joke. In the fortnight he may be thoroughly ashamed of himself for having been so foolish, and will come back to you repentant. I wouldn't advise every girl to be so tolerant towards a faithless lover, but in your case, he seems such a frank sort of person, that I really should believe what he says as to its only being a passing fancy, and let matters run their natural course.

Young Men who Stare.

DON'T worry about the young men who stare at you, "R. E. P." You say you are pretty. Well, young men stare at a pretty girl out of mere natural curiosity. It does not mean that they are in love with her, or even wish to make her acquaintance. If one of the staring young men does want to know you, wait until he shows it in a more definite way.

Cynthia.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A GENTLE HINT

to remind you that

No. 2 of

THE RAPID REVIEW

will be on sale

MARCH 12.

A Concise Résumé of

The War.
The Chinese Labour Question.
Army Reform.
The Fiscal Question, &c.

The Month's

Books.
Magazines.
Music.
Art, &c.

ORDER YOUR COPY TO-DAY.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

YOU

may have been born under a lucky star. You may be surrounded by all the omens of a prosperous fate. Should you be well-favoured, happily married or engaged, have troops of friends and plenty of money, you naturally conclude such must be the case. It is indeed a glorious thing to be a favourite of Fortune. But make too sure about it. The fickle goddess plays some strange tricks at times, without the slightest apparent regard to our merits or abilities. She laughs at our elaborate schemes for harnessing her to our own chariot, and, there is not one of us who may not become the victim of her fatal neglect, or the sport of an unlooked-for destiny. To the right thing to do when the tide turns, or the storm breaks, or the ship of life's happiness seems in danger, is the best proof of wisdom in man or woman. But whatever happens, you can neither enjoy good nor conquer evil fortune if you fail to keep your bodily and mental forces up to the mark. Happily health is a matter very largely under your own control. A congested liver, a disordered stomach, clogged inactive kidneys, headache, sleeplessness—these are evils you can effectively dispose of by adopting BEECHAM'S PILLS as a remedy; and if by the present reminder you are led to try this valuable medicine, you may certainly regard it as a piece of splendid good LUCK!

NEVER

KNOW

YOUR

BEECHAM'S PILLS

are prepared only by the Proprietor—

THOMAS BEECHAM, ST. HELENS, LANCASHIRE, and Sold Everywhere.

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 794. Week Ending March 19, 1904. Price One Penny.

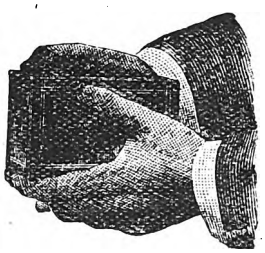
The fate of both brave men depended on her answer. Whom would she choose?

(A Dramatic Incident from the Powerful Story "The Geisha's Choice." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

BROWNIE KODAKS

For BOYS and GIRLS.



THE No. 1 BROWNIE

giving Photographs 2½in. x 2½in.
Price 5s. only.

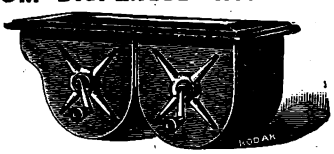
THE No. 2 BROWNIE

giving Photographs 3¼in. x 3¼in.
Price 10s. only.

For Ladies, Cyclists, &c.
The FOLDING POCKET KODAKS
from £2 2s. to £3 12s. 6d.

THE DARK ROOM DISPENSED WITH!

KODAK Daylight Developing Machine.



Develops Films in Daylight—Gaslight—Any Light—Anywhere.

10s. to 45s.

Marvellously Simple and Efficient.

Of all Photographic Dealers, or of

KODAK LTD., Dept. 35, 41-43 Clerkenwell Rd., London, E.C.

J. G. GRAVES'

THE NEW

'ELEGANT' PARCEL, 35/-

CONTAINS:

Twill Vicuna Costume (Coat and Skirt), made in the latest style, as illustrated; Colours: Black, Navy, Brown, and Green.
Stylish Blouse of Fine Quality Figured Sateen with New Yoke and Sleeves.
Frilled Underskirt of Mercerised Sateen, Check or Stripe.
Pair French Kid Gloves, black or tan.
Pair Model Corsets, splendidly shaped.

Sent on receipt of Order enclosing 5/- and your promise to complete the purchase by monthly payments of 5/-. If not perfectly satisfied return the parcel and deposit will be refunded in full.

Important. When ordering give (1) Bust Measure. (2) Length of Sleeve inside. (3) Length of Skirt in Front. (4) Size of Corsets. (5) Size of Gloves. (6) Colours.

Illustrated Catalogue of Fashionable Costumes and Patterns Free.

AGENTS WANTED. Good Pay. No Responsibility. Write for Terms.

J. G. GRAVES, 169 DIVISION STREET, SHEFFIELD

SONGS COPIED

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page.

Mrs. CONYERS,
Chagford, R.S.O., Devon.

Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

SAPON

THE IDEAL CLEANSER

A harmless vegetable compound which dissolves grease so wonderfully that the dirt "drops out" without rubbing and the clothes last longer.

Dissolve the Sapon thoroughly in water; put the clothes into the solution and

SOAK,
SQUEEZE,
RINSE,
WRING. (That's all.)

Send a post-card to SAPON LTD. (Dept. 65), St. Swithin's Chambers, London, for a FREE TRIAL PACKET.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Headache,
Neuralgia & all Nerve Pains

One dose of Kaputine, costing 1d., cures in ten minutes the most violent nerve pain,—every time.

Kaputine is not an aperient, and causes no inconvenience, but is for one purpose only—to cure Nerve Pains.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—and gives immediate relief.

Kaputine, unlike the dangerous white headache powders consisting of one crude drug, is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical Profession.

Kaputine is sold by all Medicine Dealers, Packets of 18 doses, 1/-. Samples 1d. each.

Write now for samples free and post paid to
G. G. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 794.] WEEK ENDING MARCH 19TH, 1904. [ONE PENNY.

The Geisha's Choice.

Telling How a Japanese Girl Had to Choose Between a British Sailor and a Japanese Soldier, and How She Sent One Lover on a Terrible Journey.

Containing the Incident Depicted on the Cover.

"WHAT is the matter with you, my dear fellow?"

The question was asked in perfect English and with but the slightest trace of a foreign accent, yet the inquirer was unmistakably Japanese. His name was Hosaki. He was a man of forty, of striking features, dressed in European costume.

He addressed a younger man than himself. This was Lieutenant Ralph Thornton, of His Britannic Majesty's Navy; he was not more than twenty-five, with frankness and courage written on every part of a handsome face. A captivating face, as Hosaki admitted to himself; an attractive man altogether. It did one's heart good to have a grip of that hand, which could be as soft as silk when touching that of a lady, and yet could grip a man's with a force that made one wonder if one's fingers were intact after the ordeal. Ralph Thornton was staring vacantly in front, with knitted brows, and his partly-smoked cigar had gone out. He aroused himself with a start as Hosaki's words fell upon his ears.

"Eh? Er—I really didn't hear what you said!" he remarked in confusion.

"You appear to be in dreamland, my friend!" returned Hosaki, smiling gravely. "You were as lively when you came to Tokyo as you were when I knew you in your own great country; but during the last few days you have been dreaming. Are you worrying lest your country should be drawn into the war which little Japan is about to make against the northern trespasser, Russia?"

Ralph Thornton's lip curled scornfully. "Why worrying?" he asked. "Have we not shown that we can play our part, friend Hosaki?"

"Yes!" The word came emphatically, yet quietly. "Ah!" continued Hosaki, his eyes kindling. "One day—one day the glorious little Land of the Rising Sun will be as great as Britain has made herself! But enough! To speak plainly, something is troubling you, Thornton. What is it?"

"Oh, I think not!" cried Ralph; but his face flushed a little.

Hosaki's keen eyes were fixed full on the Lieutenant's face; a gleam of understanding came over the countenance of the Jap.

"I think I can guess, and I am not surprised, although I think you are foolish, my friend!" he said slowly. "You have been thus since you saw Ashkita! The geisha has captivated you!"

All rights reserved.]

"And what if she has?" inquired Thornton defiantly. His secret was discovered, and he faced his interrogator boldly.

"I think you are foolish!" came quietly from Hosaki's lips.

"Have you anything to say against her?" asked Ralph haughtily.

"Nothing!" was the emphatic rejoinder. "She is lovely, accomplished, pure; she is of noble descent, a granddaughter of one of the feudal lords who gave up his lands in the Revolution and died poor. Ashkita has to earn a living, and she does it well and honestly by singing and playing. She would make a good wife, but are you serious in thinking that you would wed one of the women of my race?"

Ralph Thornton reflected. It had hardly occurred to him to think of aught but of his love for the lovely girl whom he had seen for the first time nearly a week previously in a house in the southern Ku district, and whom he had seen every evening since, although Hosaki did not know this last fact.

"Yes, I would!" he said with deliberation. "I confess that I love her; it is no infatuation, for I have had time to think. I am not imbued with the prejudice of many Europeans against your race, Hosaki; your people have proved themselves to be great! Moreover, Ashkita is not a mere automaton, as some of your women are—I mean no offence, but you recognise the truth of my remarks, for you have not allowed all your women to have fair play. Ashkita is a woman whom anyone, unless he had no heart or possessed one of stone, could not help loving. She is a descendant of a Daimyo, and in our Society at home she would take a prominent place."

"I believe all that!" assented Hosaki gravely. "Yet I question the wisdom of your choice. Think well before you decide. Remember the ordeal to which she would be subjected if you placed her in English Society. You must reflect before you break her heart!"

"Hosaki, I have seen her every day since that evening!" said Thornton, rising and placing his hand on his friend's shoulder. "Whenever I go abroad in the streets of your busy capital, which resembles a European rather than an Eastern city, I look for her. In the glorious five-mile avenue which you call Mukojima, in the jinrickshas and the modern trams and omnibuses, on the banks of the Sumida, everywhere. The Spring is coming, and I may not be here when the cherry-trees bloom and you hold your pretty festival in honour of the blossom, but I shall picture Ashkita and the cherry-blossom together, a fitting pair. That is," he added quickly, and with a sharp inhalation of his breath, "if I cannot persuade her to come with me when I go!"

Hosaki smoked his strange little Japanese pipe; his imperturbable face betrayed nothing of the workings of his mind.

Digitized by Google

"So be it!" he said suddenly. "I have told you! You will remember, also, that she is not of your religion; that she is of the old religion, which you would call heathen! Let us go out."

They left the house and made their way to the Government quarter of the city. It was a quaint scene, for Tokyo still has much of the ancient, in dress and manners, among the modernity which has taken possession of it. In the course of their stroll a jinricksha passed them, and they saw Ashkita in the curious two-wheeled carriage with its human draught animal. She waved a salutation to them and was gone.

"Is she not lovely, divine?" demanded Ralph Thornton enthusiastically.

His companion assented; there was no gainsaying the beauty of the girl, for she was little more. It would have been difficult not to agree with Ralph's assertion that Ashkita would become a queen of Society if the opportunity were given to her.

"I must see her again, see her where I can speak to her!" declared Ralph Thornton decisively. "Can you help me, Hosaki?"

"Yes. I will conduct you to where you will see her," said Hosaki, with his usual gravity. "But," he added, not without a sign of hesitation, "suppose that there is another who loves her, and suppose that she——"

"You know my motto!" cried the Lieutenant, with true sailorly spirit. "I will not go round the corner to meet troubles, and I trust to my own resources to get through them when they do come. Whoever he is, if he exists, I shall pit myself against him."

Nevertheless, like a true lover, he could not prevent a feeling of uneasiness during the rest of the day, and that feeling was increased when, on seeing Ashkita in the evening, he intuitively detected his rival in Captain Nakamurah Iyayogo, a dashing military officer of a crack Japanese regiment. The revelation was none the less disagreeable from the fact that Iyayogo was an old friend, whom he had also met in England. It is some satisfaction to a lover when his rival is a stranger, because he feels fully at liberty to hate the fellow.

There was a large party, and several accomplished ladies were entertaining the guests. Ashkita was in a secluded corner when Thornton interrupted the quiet conversation between Captain Iyayogo and the geisha.

"You have come again!" said Ashkita, her face lighting up, as Thornton placed himself by her side, after having exchanged a hearty greeting with his old military acquaintance. "And have you any news of this terrible Russian Bear? Captain Iyayogo tells me that war is about to begin."

"What is she worrying herself about him for?" thought the sailor in vexation. "I suppose she thinks he will get killed! He is a good fellow, and a splendid soldier, I should say, but I don't want him here!" Aloud, he answered: "I have no news. I do not desire any, for an outbreak of war would mean that I must leave here, and——"

He did not finish, but a look more eloquent than spoken message caused Ashkita to drop her eyes and Iyayogo to knit his brows.

"War would take me away also," said the last mentioned. "Would that grieve you?"

A quick uplifting of the geisha's eyes to meet his, and then Ashkita laughed to hide her agitation.

"I should be sorry to lose you both, you are my good friends!" she smiled, speaking in Japanese, but so distinctly that the young sailor had no difficulty in understanding.

As she dropped her eyes again the two men shot angry glances at one another, but the geisha noticed this and made a move towards another part of the immense room.

"Let us go with the others, sir!" she said in pretty English to Ralph. And she turned to Iyayogo without observing that her attractive style of pronouncing his mother tongue had heaped a little more fuel on the flames of love.

Lieutenant Thornton, with the alertness of a British sailor, watched for his opportunity, saw it, and seized it. Before Captain Iyayogo realised it, Ashkita was being guided to another corner by his rival, and he himself found that he was button-holed by a comrade in arms.

"Ashkita!" cried Ralph ardently. "Why do you look so vexed at the thought of Captain Iyayogo going away? He surely does not love you as I do! Listen to me!" he cried, in an impetuous undertone. "You have taken my heart from me; can you give me yours? Will you be my wife, will you come with me to England, the friend of your country, where you would be a very queen of beauty among women? I can give you wealth and position, but I know you do not want these."

Ashkita was unable to follow all the words of this passionate appeal, but the tone of voice and the look in the Lieutenant's face supplied the deficiency. Her bosom heaved, and she hid her face for a moment or two in her hands.

"You do not mean what you say, I fear you do not!" she cried appealingly. "Why do you torment me with insincere words?"

She looked boldly at him now, hope and fear mingling in that gaze.

"I mean it, every word!" vowed Ralph warmly. "I have been in love with you since the first day I saw you. Will you come with me, Ashkita?"

He bent forward eagerly, pressing for a reply. Ashkita sighed heavily.

"I cannot believe that you would care for me, that you would like to stand by my side in your English Society! And I am sad of heart for another reason! But you cannot understand! No, leave me and forget me!"

"Never!" he whispered almost fiercely in his love for this beautiful Eastern girl. "I would face anyone, anything for you, Ashkita! I would die for you!"

She interrupted him with a gesture.

Leave me now!" she intreated. "I do not know, I cannot think! It is too difficult!"

Hosaki and Captain Iyayogo were approaching. The latter wore a smile on his face, and he tried to hide his annoyance at Ralph's having had a private talk with Ashkita.

"Let us be going, friend!" said Hosaki, taking Ralph by the arm. "Come!" he whispered, as the sailor would have resisted; "we must be going, and you will have to leave Japan, as you are still in the British service, for war is as good as declared!"

"Is it really so?" queried Lieutenant Thornton sadly. "Then I wish indeed that I were in the service of Britain's ally, for I cannot bear to think of leaving Ashkita!"

Hosaki led him gently away, and Ralph had the annoyance in his turn, of seeing his rival in full possession of the field.

"Why do you encourage him?" demanded Captain Iyayogo, almost angrily. "Ashkita, whom do you love? Is it possible that you can prefer a man from the West to one of your own race? Ashkita," he went on, in a soft, caressing tone, "Ashkita, is my love for you all in vain? Listen to me, let me plead with you!"

"Nakamurah," said the girl, placing a delicate finger on his arm, the mere touch of which sent a thrill through his entire frame, "he is brave, he is devoted to me! He says he would die for me, if I called upon him to do so! How can I help admiring him? He comes of a great race and he would take me to live among the highest in his own land! Here I am only Ashkita. Yes, I admire him, and admiration, like pity, is near to love!"

"It cannot be, it shall not be so!" he burst forth passionately. "I care not if you are only Ashkita! But you are of noble birth, and I am just as able to give you position as he, and that position will be with your own people! Ah, I see that you waver! Which of us do you really love?"

"I cannot say, I will not say!" she cried in anguish of spirit. "War is declared; I caught Hosaki's words! And I am troubled! Our country is fighting for its freedom; if it loses this fight, where will it be? Tell me!" she added impulsively, "would you be willing to risk your life for me?"

"Yes!" he said simply, but decisively. There was no bravado about it, but there was no mistaking the intensity of the tone in which it was uttered. "What will life be without you?"

Digitized by Google

"Then come to me to-morrow! I have something on my mind. You know where! And bring the Englishman with you. Nay, be not angry! You are friends, and you are both good men and true. Come together!"

Captain Iyayogo bowed and left her. His heart throbbed at the thought of war, because for nine years it had been expected, and now Japan had the chance of driving the aggressor backwards! But his fierce joy was tempered by his love for Ashkita; he was troubled, he had a rival who was likely to be successful! For a moment he felt that he could hate the handsome Britisher, but his sterling better nature prevailed immediately.

"He is brave and honourable! I like him!" he murmured. "We will fight the battle of love fairly and the defeated one will take his defeat gallantly. I know him, and I can emulate the spirit of the British!"

Ashkita was sad and wept several times during the ensuing twenty-four hours; after the manner of her own religion, she prayed, and turned her face in the direction of the sacred volcanic mountain that towered into the clouds and from which the war-god, the first of the sacred line of the Mikados, came to rule Nippon. She started in fear and turned to fly when, at the appointed hour, the two friends and rivals paid the visit which she had asked for.

"Can I face them? What am I about to do?" she moaned. "Yet it must be done!"

She nerved herself for what was to follow, and met them with a gracious smile that had something wan about it, in spite of herself; she welcomed them, and then addressed them in a firm voice:

"War is declared. I feel that it will be a great struggle, and one in which our land will require all the help it can obtain! I am of the old religion; both Westerns and my own modernised compatriots may laugh at me, but I firmly believe in the things which were taught me! I believe that the gods will listen to one who will go to the top of one of the sacred mountains which still burns with the holy fire.

"I know that you Europeans call them volcanoes, but they are more than that! You do not understand! To him who will go to the top of such a mountain, of which we have yet many, and who will descend into the hollow and offer up the prayer which I will teach him, to that one will come a certain death, but his action will bring an answer to that prayer! My prayer is that Japan shall win! Alas, I am not strong enough to climb, and I turn to one of you and ask that he will do this for me, that I may save the country I love because it gave me birth! Which of you loves me well enough to die for me?"

Iyayogo understood the awful significance of her request immediately, but Thornton had to reflect ere it dawned upon him. Poor child of superstition! How he would teach her that such beliefs were nonsense, gently, tenderly, as he would a little child! How sweet would life be with her, training her simple nature to a knowledge of what was real!

Ashkita waited, anxiously, breathlessly, for a sign from either. The two men looked at one another with understanding glances; it was the crucial test! Each had sworn that he would die for her, if need be, and she was calling for a fulfilment of that vow! It was death on the volcanic mountain, or life with Ashkita!

"Do you wish me to go?" asked both men simultaneously.

Ashkita wrung her hands in despair.

"We are both ready!" said Thornton calmly. "Choose between us! Send to his doom the one you love less, and let the other enjoy bliss with you! It is for you to choose! The one whom you do not love well enough to marry had better die, for life would be worse than death without you, and he will at least be doing you a last service."

Nakamurah Iyayogo bowed his head in agreement with Thornton's words.

"Choose!" he said simply. "We are ready! It will prove our love!"

It was a terrible dilemma for Ashkita; in her extremity she could not decide, for it seemed to her that she loved both! Yet she must propitiate the gods—it was necessary! The fate of both brave men depended on her answer. Whom would she choose?

Both men watched her with that awful mingling of hope and anxiety that fills the heart of men who are waiting to hear a verdict that will send them to death or release them to live a life of happiness; yet there was a sentiment of rivalry even to be sent on a fatal errand, and an observer might have been inclined to think, from the attitude of the men, that they were about to fight for the privilege!

Ashkita seemed for a moment to lean towards Thornton, and the men listened for her words; was it to ask him to go or stay?

"It is hard for me to decide!" she cried. "Yet," she placed her hand on Thornton's arm, "I must send Nakamurah!"

Iyayogo started in spite of himself; he had expected, from her last movement, that she was about to send Thornton gently to his death and give herself up to the love of her own countryman; and now——

"Be it so!" he said, resigning himself with a great effort and presenting a stoical demeanour. Even although he had lost faith in the old superstition, yet he loved this girl so deeply that he would die for her, as he had said. "I will go! Success to Japan, and happiness to you both!"

Thornton involuntarily stretched out his hand, and the two men exchanged a firm grip. Then Captain Nakamurah Iyayogo turned on his heel, and with a low bow to Ashkita, went forth to meet his fate!

"I have sent him to his death!" she cried, bursting into tears. And she sank into the arms of Ralph Thornton!

Ralph caressed her and tried to soothe her, but it was quite two hours later when he was able to leave her; Ashkita's eyes were red with weeping, and her face appeared to have assumed a fixed cast of melancholy.

He was in a whirl as he returned to his own lodgings in the house of Hosaki. It was weird, terribly weird! It was foolish superstition and a man had been sent to his doom to gratify it! Yet it was hardly that; it was that a man had gone willingly to his death to prove his love for a woman!

"It requires more pluck to do that than to win the V.C. in the excitement of battle!" muttered Thornton. "And, by Jove, I envy him the chance of showing his grit!"

Three days passed, and Thornton could not see Ashkita; he wished to ask her to accompany him, for he was leaving Japan, and to be his wife in fulfilment of her promise, but it appeared like gloating over his friend's untimely end. And then there came reluctantly into his mind the thought that Ashkita was sorry for her choice! That uncontrollable fit of weeping! Had she, like other women, discovered the real state of her feelings by the revealing agency of loss?

He gained admission to her this time, and the red eyes, indicative of recent weeping, confirmed his suspicions. His heart seemed to turn to stone. She loved Iyayogo, and he was dead.

"Ashkita," he said tenderly, "you loved him better than me; you were mistaken?"

"Yes!" she cried. "And I killed him!"

"I wish I could take his place," said Thornton, and he meant it. "Perhaps he can be saved!" he cried, a moment later. "I will use every effort!"

She shook her head sadly, but he hurried from the room and into the street. Hosaki would help! He hastened to his lodgings and burst unceremoniously into the apartment where Hosaki was talking. Hosaki and his visitor turned as he entered, and Thornton uttered a cry. It was Iyayogo!

Safe! He had accomplished the strange mission and had escaped as by a miracle!

"She wants you!" said Thornton, seizing his hand and pushing him to the door. "Go to her and make her happy. I am so glad!"—and, as Iyayogo left the house with all speed, the sailor said, with a curious lump in his throat—"And I am so sorry!"

He left Tokyo the next day, and joined his ship on the China station, but his fellow-officers wondered what had happened to the light-hearted Ralph Thornton. Geo. Day.

Digitized by Google

LIGHT OUT OF DARKNESS.

Being the Love Story of Owen Merritt.

"By-the-way, Maria, I met Owen Merritt in the street to-day. It's the first time I've seen him since he got back from the Continent. I invited him down for a week or two," said Mr. Frank Mallory to his wife, one evening in early September.

"Ah! I'm glad you did," was the quick response.

The same thought seemed to be present in the minds of both husband and wife as their eyes met. Mr. Mallory was the first to give it utterance.

"Merritt's a fine fellow," he said; "rich, too, and got a splendid practice besides. Louise couldn't do better."

"Did he say he would come?"

"Yes; he will come home with me to dinner. Now, Maria, you must do your level best to bring about a match between him and Louise."

"Trust me for that," replied the lady, laughing. "You say I am a born matchmaker. But"—she added curiously—"why are you so anxious about it?"

"Oh, I've reasons. Never mind just now; I'll tell you some other time. I must be off."

Mr. Frank Mallory was a prosperous merchant—so people said—doing business in the City, and living for eight or nine months of the year in a beautiful country seat in Norfolk The balance of the twelve was usually spent in London in a fashionable hotel, where his wife and daughter were free to indulge in all the gaieties of town which lie within the possibilities of the purses of prosperous men.

Meantime the estate in Norfolk was left in the care of the servants, who were presided over by a niece of the gentleman, who had "generously" taken her into his family on the death of her father, when she was but eight years old, and given her a home.

But wherein the generosity consisted it would have been hard to tell, as she was really only an upper servant and nursery governess to his little deformed son, whose affliction was the great disappointment of his life. It might have been in the privilege of sharing Louise's lessons, including music, French, and German, which they were in a measure necessitated to allow her, since Louise resolutely declined to study alone; and equally, perhaps, in the privilege of wearing that young lady's cast-off clothes, the two girls being nearly of an age and size.

Louise Mallory was quite a belle in the circle in which she moved. Rather above the medium height, with a well-rounded, graceful figure, an abundance of glossy black hair, which she wore according to the latest vagaries of fashion—each new style seeming more becoming than the last had been—a clear, olive complexion, touched with a brilliant crimson in cheeks and lips, and a pair of flashing black eyes with long, curling lashes, completed the list of her personal charms.

In conversation she was bright and witty, quick at repartee, and generally the life of any circle in which she chanced to find herself. It is not wonderful, therefore, that the possessor of so many charms should have many admirers, but somehow or other it happened that she had passed her twentieth birthday without having her beautiful hand ornamented by an engagement ring, much to the vexation of her scheming mamma.

"I don't see how it is," observed that lady to her husband in a provoked tone one day; "I thought Louise had De Barry at her feet, and here invitations are out for his wedding with that Laura Stone! She isn't to be named in the same day with Louise. He's worth a million, too, they say. I declare, it's too bad!"

"Louise will overstay her market if she isn't careful," remarked Mr. Mallory sententiously.

"She's had plenty of offers. Harris, Longcope, Milliman, and that young Smythe have all proposed. But they're all too poor. Louise has got too much sense to fall in love with a poor man. I really think, though, that she had a fancy for Smythe; but I nipped that in the bud."

"I don't think you did a nice thing, then. Smythe is a rising man, and will some day come out on top in his profession, just mark my words," said Mr. Mallory warmly.

"That may be, I don't dispute it," replied his wife coolly; "but he's poor now, and I prefer Louise should marry a man who has a fortune in hand rather than one in the bush."

This conversation had taken place just previous to their flitting back to their country home, which they always did at the beginning of Lent, thus balancing the account of their gay, worldly life by a strict, religious observance of the forty days of fasting.

Shortly before this flitting a new star had arisen on their social horizon in the person of Owen Merritt, a young and wealthy lawyer, who had opened an office in the City.

Mrs. Mallory hailed the advent of this new "catch" with secret delight, and immediately set to work to weave about her unwary prey a silken web, which she meant should prove strong enough to bring him a willing captive to her daughter's feet.

Before much headway could be made in this direction, however, the time for their return to their country home had arrived. But she did not allow this rather unfortunate circumstance to interfere with her plans, and enlisting her husband in a good work, contrived to carry on the campaign, though, naturally, at a considerable disadvantage.

During the early summer, garden-parties, picnics, and fishing parties innumerable had been arranged, to all of which Mr. Merritt had received pressing invitations, some of which he had accepted, and had, as she fondly hoped, been quite impressed with Louise's many attractions.

Digitized by Google

But in the latter part of July he rather unceremoniously dashed cold water upon her hopes by suddenly and unexpectedly running off to the Continent. However, he was now safely back, and with renewed vigour she prepared to resume the siege.

Louise, herself, to her mother's great displeasure, seemed quite indifferent, and declined to put forth any effort to secure the prize held up before her in such a tempting light, which her mother actually feared was owing to a lingering attachment for "that young Smythe," and she forthwith set herself to eradicate it, root and branch.

Louise, however, had taken the surest way, intentionally or otherwise, to attract Owen Merritt. He had had more than one young lady "throw herself at his head," and had become quite accustomed to the arts of designing mammas.

He saw through Mrs. Mallory's clever little ruses to get him and Louise together with a feeling of amusement, but that young lady's air of cool indifference piqued his vanity, and when he accepted the invitation for a fortnight's visit he mentally resolved to captivate Louise.

In this he had no wicked design, for Owen Merritt was not in any sense of the word a flirt. He honestly admired Louise Mallory's beauty and wit, and was in that susceptible state when admiration might easily develop into love, and might as easily, also, be turned into disgust and loathing. He was no greenhorn, either, and having reached the mature age of thirty years, concluded that if ever he meant to settle down in life, now was a very good time.

"Ring the bell for Mary, Louise."

Two, three minutes passed, and the summons was still unanswered.

A frown, black and ominous, gathered on Mrs. Mallory's brow, but remembering that a lady should always maintain her composure, no matter what domestic complications may arise, she merely motioned to Louise to repeat the signal, which that young lady did with considerably more energy than she had used the first time. A moment after a young girl hastily entered the room.

"I beg your pardon, aunt. I heard the bell the first time, but Ernie had accidentally set fire to some paper on the carpet, and I had to stop to put it out."

Mr. Merritt, who was engaged in conversation with his host, looked up in surprise, just in time to catch an angry glance at the speaker from Louise's superb eyes, while a deep flush rose to Mrs. Mallory's sallow cheeks.

"Explanations are not necessary," she said coldly. "Attend to your duties."

Tears sprang to the girl's eyes at the tone, and Mr. Merritt, who could not forbear a second glance, saw that only a resolute will was keeping them in check, as she quickly and deftly performed the duties for which she had been summoned.

He had never seen the girl before, and would not have done so to-day, had it not been for the sudden indisposition of the servant whose place she was required to take, for it was part o Mrs. Mallory's tactics to keep her entirely in the background not wishing her guests to know of the existence of a "poor relation" in her elegantly-appointed establishment.

As he looked up, she had paused for a moment behind Louise's chair, and he could not help being struck by the contrast between them.

They were apparently about the same age and size, but Mary's figure had a lithe suppleness about it that Louise's lacked, and her carriage was perfectly natural and graceful.

Her features were rather large and irregular, but she had a clear, white complexion, large, dark, hazel-grey eyes, with long, curling lashes, and a magnificent mass of rich, dark, auburn hair, which was drawn as plainly back as its wavy nature would allow from the low, broad forehead, and wound in a loose coil at the back of her shapely head.

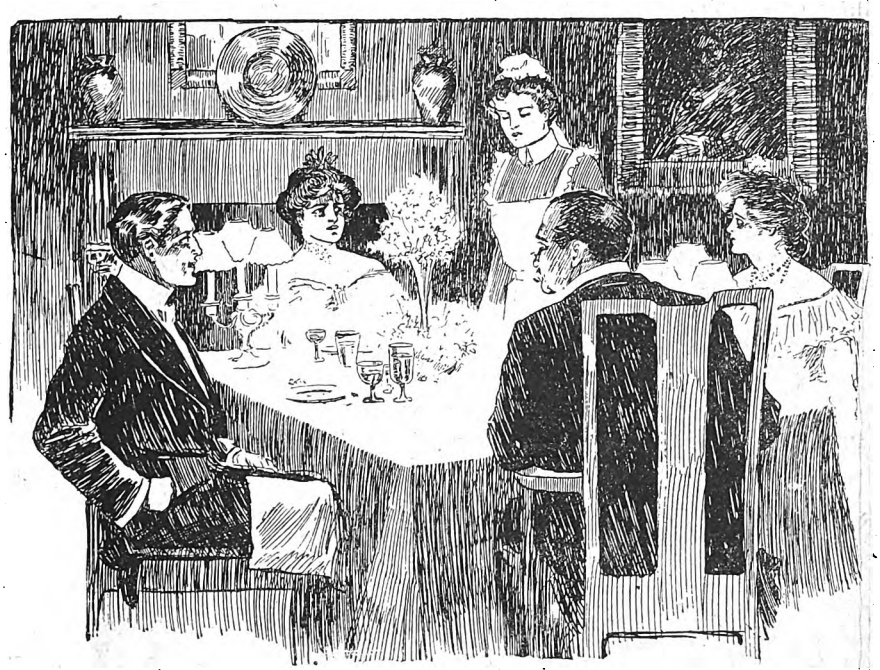
The contrast in their dress was equally striking.

Louise was attired in a robe of cream white cashmere, the low corsage filled in with rare old lace, while diamonds sparkled in her ears, and on her hands and arms. Mary, on the contrary, wore a neatly-fitting plain dress and white apron, with a simple linen collar fastened by a small gold pin, her only ornament. As she deftly plied the crumb-brush, he noticed that her hands were small and well shaped, and her wrists were as white and as beautifully rounded as Louise's own.

She did not once look at him, and although her brightened colour showed that she deeply felt the humiliation of being reminded of her inferior position in the presence of a stranger, she performed her menial duties with a quiet dignity that excited his admiration.

After dinner was over, and they had returned to the drawing-room, Mrs. Mallory seized the first opportunity which presented itself to make an explanation.

"Mr. Merritt," she said, "you must have been surprised to hear one of the servants address me so familiarly. The truth is we took her when she was a child, and brought her up in our family, and I very foolishly allowed her to call me



Owen Merritt looked up just in time to see Louise flash an angry glance at the maid.

Digitized by Google

'aunt.' I have told her that she must not do it now, for it is rather embarrassing to be addressed as aunt by one's servant."

Mr. Merritt made some light reply, and Mrs. Mallory, seeing a shade of displeasure on her husband's face, hastened to change the conversation, and proposed a stroll along the river. The others assenting, she and her husband led the way, but pretty soon she pleaded fatigue and turned back, and as Mr. Mallory could do no less than accompany her, Mr. Merritt and Louise were left to continue the walk by themselves.

"They must 'make hay while the sun shines,'" Mrs. Mallory said, as soon as they were out of hearing of the young people. "Next week the Ewings will be here, and then there will be an end to tête-à-tête walks. I want to get in as much of that kind of work as I can—I have to manage it all myself," she added grumblingly. "Louise seems perfectly indifferent, and won't help me a bit."

"It's the best plan she could take with a fellow like Merritt," observed her husband. "Let her alone and she'll make better headway than you will with all your planning and contriving. If he should see that she was aiming to catch him, he'd be off like a shot."

Somewhat comforted by this view of the situation, his wife went in search of Mary, to whom she proposed to read a lecture. She found her in the nursery singing Ernie to sleep. The poor little cripple, who was ten years old, though he did not look more than five, clung to Mary with a tenacity of affection pitiful to see, for it spoke eloquently of neglect on the part of the father and mother, who should naturally have had the first place in his heart.

Waiting out of sight of the child, until she saw the white eyelids close over the large blue eyes, Mrs. Mallory motioned to Mary to step into the next room, and then seating herself in state, while Mary stood like a culprit before her, began severely:

"I was astonished and mortified at dinner to-day, that you should forget what I have so often told you, that you must not address me as 'aunt' in the presence of visitors. As it seems that you cannot remember, it will be better for you to drop the title altogether. So, after this you will simply address me as Mrs. Mallory."

For a minute or two Mary could not speak. Then she said with what calmness she could command:

"I wish you would tell me, aunt—Mrs. Mallory—why there has always been such a difference made between us. My mother was Uncle Frank's own sister, and of course Louise and Ernie are my own cousins, yet I am made to occupy the place of a servant in the family where I should be an equal."

For some minutes Mrs. Mallory sat speechless with indignation, then recovering the use of her tongue, she exclaimed:

"You ungrateful minx! Haven't we given you a home all these years—and an education? You want to live like a lady, do you, while your uncle supports you?"

"I do not find any fault with the work I have to do," replied Mary quietly; "it is not difficult, and I would rather earn what I get under your roof, but I am not willing to be treated as if I were inferior to my cousins, when my blood is as good as theirs."

"You don't know what you are talking about!" cried the lady excitedly. "If you are not satisfied here you will have to find some other home. I shall tell your uncle of this!" she added, and she swept angrily from the room, leaving poor Mary almost broken-hearted; for in spite of the many hardships she had to undergo it was her home, and she could not bear to think of being obliged to leave it; for that they would send her away she had no doubt.

The week had nearly passed; it was now Friday, and Mrs. Mallory could not see that any headway had been made towards the fulfilment of her cherished plans. Louise appeared to be as nonchalant as ever, and she could not discover that Mr. Merritt was any more lover-like than he had been at first. He was an enthusiastic sportsman, and the greater part of the days had been spent in roaming over the adjacent fields and meadows with his host in search of game, and they were usually successful in bringing home full bags.

She had contrived that the young people should spend the evenings together in rides or drives or rows upon the river.

Next week the house would be full of company—among them several young men—and Louise, as hostess, could not, of course, bestow her company exclusively upon any one of her guests. If the desired result could not be brought about before then, it was not likely it would be at all, and she was beginning to feel quite disheartened. If she could have looked beneath the surface into the two young hearts she would have taken courage.

Mr. Merritt, who had been gradually becoming more and more captivated by Louise's beauty and wit, had quite made up his mind that the time had come for him to speak, and had determined to do so that very evening.

Not that he was very deeply in love. Indeed, he had come to fancy that he was past the age to feel "a lover's sweet pangs," and that the most ardent feeling he should probably ever have for any woman was calm appreciation.

He admired Louise intensely. She was beautiful, accomplished, witty, and for aught he had seen to the contrary, amiable in disposition; while in point of wealth and social station she was fully his equal. He could see no reason, therefore, why they should not be happy together, in that friendly, matter-of-fact sort of way that seemed to characterise the relations between most of the married people of his acquaintance.

Her careless, indifferent manner did not trouble him in the least now that he had become better acquainted with her. It was her way, and—well, he did not care for honey and sugar; too much of either was sickening. He liked her better so than if she had been more demonstrative.

As to Louise, she hardly knew what her feelings on the subject were. Whatever it was in her moral anatomy that took the place of a heart belonged to Mr. Smythe; but Mr. Smythe was poor. He would have to fight his way in the world, and although she did not doubt that he would ultimately win both wealth and fame, she did not feel inclined to help him fight; her nature was too ease-loving.

Mr. Merritt, on the contrary, had both wealth and station to place at her command; and her mother had so ceaselessly dinned into her ears the advantages of such an alliance, that she had at last resolved to say "Yes," whenever he should ask her to become his wife, which of course he would do sooner or later, for Miss Louise had been taught to believe that her charms were irresistible.

So it happened that the thoughts—hopeful or otherwise—of the whole quartette were turned towards that fateful Friday evening, when the young people were to go out for a row upon the river after the moon had risen.

At eight o'clock that evening Owen Merritt sat alone upon the balcony waiting for Louise, who had gone indoors for her wraps. The moon was just rising above the tree-tops on the opposite side of the river, and throwing her silvery beams athwart the rippling water. The day had been rather sultry, which made the cool, balmy evening breeze seem very refreshing. The long French windows stood open to admit as much of it as possible to the heated air within the house.

Close to one of these windows Mr. Merritt sat, swinging slowly backwards and forwards in a low rocking-chair and thinking earnestly. The seriousness of the step he was about to take impressed him deeply, involving as it did the weal or woe of himself and Louise for the remainder of their lives, when his reverie was suddenly and abruptly broken in upon by voices almost in his ear.

It was Mr. and Mrs. Mallory, and they appeared to be continuing a conversation begun elsewhere, for the first sentence from Mr. Mallory was:

"Well, if they don't, there'll be a pretty kettle of fish. Mary will be of age in less than three months, and then that fellow, Gibbs, will insist on settling up the estate, of course, as he is joint trustee with me of her property. If it wasn't for him she need never know anything about it, for she was too young when her father died to know that he left her any money."

Digitized by Google

Not wishing to play the part of an eavesdropper, Mr. Merritt was about to make his presence known, when the next sentence transfixed him. It was from Mrs. Mallory, and was spoken irritably. "I don't see," she said, "what that has to do with Louise and Merritt."

"Well, you will see presently. The arrangement was that, I being her uncle, Mary was to be brought up with my children, and I was to have the use of her money, paying interest for it, of course. Well, the fact of it is that I speculated with it and lost every penny, and to-day I'm virtually a bankrupt. Now, Merritt's got pots of money, and, if he marries Louise, he would rather help me out than have the scandal it would occasion if it were known. I can manage to keep myself afloat till then, and meantime I shall have to throw myself on Mary's mercy, and get her to satisfy Gibbs, or he'll prosecute me as sure as can be."

"Well, do leave the interesting dénouement until we get Louise off our hands," said his wife irritably. "No doubt that ungrateful minx will want to turn us out of house and home!"

"It's precious little she has to be grateful for!" said Mr. Mallory, rather bitterly. "I tell you, Maria, you have carried things with too high a hand in that matter. I don't see what you were thinking of. My conscience pricks me that I've allowed it to be done!" he added in a lower tone.

Owen Merritt had heard enough of these miserable confidences, and, rising quietly, he stepped away noiselessly, feeling utterly disgusted and indignant, yet thankful, though, that he had escaped, though so narrowly, being made the tool of a knave, and having his bright, fair name tarnished by such an alliance.

Presently Louise, with a soft, white wrapper thrown over her hair, and a shawl over her arm, came to the door.

"Is Mr. Merritt here?" she asked, for they had not yet rung for lights, and the room was in shadow.

"Why, I thought you'd gone long ago!" exclaimed her mother. "Merritt!" said her father in a startled tone, and stepping hastily to the window, adding immediately in a tone of relief, "Oh, there he is, in the rose walk!"

He stood watching them till they disappeared from his view, and then, stepping on to the balcony, paced thoughtfully up and down its length.

Louise could not understand her companion at all that evening. The revulsion of feeling had been so great that it was utterly impossible for him to keep up the light, bantering conversation such as he had been wont to indulge in when in her company, more for the sake of hearing her bright, quick repartees, than because he considered her incapable of more profound trains of thought, and he was so very distrait, that finally she became silent, and the walk from which both had anticipated such pleasing results, ended with a feeling of coolness and constraint for which Louise, at least, was utterly at a loss to account.

When they reached the house after an almost entirely silent walk, Mr. Merritt informed her that he had quite unexpectedly discovered that it was imperatively necessary for him to return to town by the early morning train, which being the case, he would leave his apologies for his hasty departure with her, and would now bid her adieu, as he should probably be gone before they were up, whereupon adieux were coldly exchanged, and each retired to their respective rooms, though not to sleep.

Louise immediately extinguished her light and sat down by the open window, through which the glorious moon was pouring her beams. Scarcely had she done so when there came a knock at her door, and without waiting for an answer her mother entered. She had been awaiting their return with almost feverish anxiety, hoping to hear that her fond expectations were at last realised, and had been considerably surprised and mystified by their early separation, for it was not much after ten o'clock.

Louise looked up coldly and inquiringly as her mother came and stood beside her, not daring to ask what she so much wanted to know.

"Haven't you anything to tell me?" she asked at length.

"Nothing in particular—why do you ask?" replied Louise, indifferently.

Poor Mrs. Mallory! Her high hopes were dashed in an instant.

"Where's Mr. Merritt?" she asked despairingly.

"In his room, I suppose. He said he must retire early, as he is obliged to take the early train to town, and you know that leaves at a quarter past five o'clock."

"Is he coming back to-morrow evening?" almost gasped her mother, awaiting the answer breathlessly.

"No. He said that unforeseen circumstances obliged him to cut his visit shorter than he intended, and he left his apologies to you for going so unceremoniously."

"And he has not asked you to be his wife?"

"Mother!" said Louise, suddenly facing round and confronting her mother with flashing eyes and flaming cheeks; "you have made a perfect fool of yourself—and me! I am sure that Mr. Merritt must have seen what you were plotting—you have made it plain enough. Now I give you fair warning that after this I shall manage my own love affairs without your assistance."

Mrs. Mallory broke down utterly at this, and sinking down upon the carpet at her daughter's feet, hid her face in her hands, too miserable to weep.

"You don't know what you are talking about," she said, in a dull, muffled voice.

"What do you mean?" asked Louise, startled and somewhat frightened at her mother's manner.

"I mean this," said Mrs. Mallory, removing her hands from her face, and speaking in deep, tragic tones; "I wanted to bring about your marriage with Mr. Merritt to save us all from disgrace and poverty!

"Disgrace and poverty!" repeated Louise, bewildered.

"Yes. Do you know that we are beggars? Your father has speculated and lost everything—everything; and worse than all, he has lost Mary's money, too; and in a few weeks she will be twenty-one, and he will be called upon to settle up his accounts with Mr. Gibbs, the other trustee, and then it will all have to come out."

For some minutes Louise sat aghast. "I never knew that Mary had any money," she said at length.

"Yes, she had. Her father left her a large sum, and your father was appointed her guardian and joint trustee with Mr. Gibbs of the estate. This house belongs to her—or did. Of course we can't expect any mercy from her. She will be too glad of the opportunity of paying us out for making a servant of her in her own house; and there is nothing before us but ruin and disgrace." With this Mrs. Mallory got up and left the room.

For a long time Louise sat as if stupefied. The magnitude of the misfortune that had overtaken them seemed to crush out all power of thought. At length when the gong of the hall clock struck the hour of two, she rose, and, chilled and shivering, crept miserably into bed without undressing.

Digitized by Google

When Mrs. Mallory returned to her own room after her visit to Louise, her husband started feverishly up and uttered the single monosyllable: "Well?"

"We built our castles in the air," was the expressive reply.

With a groan he sank back upon his pillow, and uttered not another word.

* * * * *

The weeks passed on, slowly to some, but to others, who were trembling with "a certain looking for of judgment," they seemed to flash by with lightning speed. One morning, in the latter part of October, the social and business circles of London were shocked by the following announcement in large head-lines in the daily morning newspapers:

DISAPPEARANCE AND SUICIDE.

Three days ago the beautiful daughter of one of our wealthiest and best known merchants, Mr. Frank Mallory, suddenly and mysteriously disappeared from her home, leaving no clue to her whereabouts. Yesterday morning the body of her father was found by one of the servants lying on the floor of the library in his beautiful country residence in Norfolk, with the blood oozing from an ugly hole near his left temple, while one hand tightly grasped a small revolver. He was breathing faintly when found, but died before a physician could be summoned. It is supposed that grief over the disappearance of his daughter, who was well known and much admired for her beauty and wit in social circles, was the cause of the rash act. His wife is prostrated with grief over her double bereavement, and is lying dangerously ill at her residence.

Of the hundreds who read this paragraph, one only understood its real significance. Owen Merritt's cheek blanched, and his blood curdled with horror as he perused it. "He could face death easier than disgrace," he muttered to himself. "Poor Louise! the sins of her parents have no doubt driven her to destruction. What has become of the poor girl, I wonder?"

Two weeks later the announcement of Mrs. Mallory's death followed. There was the usual nine days' talk, and then the waves of oblivion rolled over them. "Their dear friends," pausing to utter a sigh of pity, rushed on as madly as before in the pursuit of the butterfly of pleasure.

It was a cold, blustering day in November Owen Merritt was sitting at his desk in his private office, busily engaged in preparing briefs for a case which he was to plead the next day in court, when a knock was heard at the door, and a clerk put his head in with the announcement:

"There's a lady here to see you, sir, in answer to your advertisement."

"Show her in here," said the busy lawyer, without raising his head. "Take a seat, madam; I'll be at liberty in a moment," he said as she entered, still busily scratching away.

Several moments passed. Then he laid down his pen, sat back in his chair and looked at his visitor. As he did so he was very nearly guilty of the rudeness of uttering a prolonged whistle.

The lady before him was attired in deep mourning, which showed to advantage the clear, white complexion without a trace of colour except in the lips, which were full and red, but the lovely, rich auburn hair quite supplied that lack, and its glittering waves made a beautiful framework for a face the principal charm of which was a pair of dark grey eyes, which were now looking straight into his with an almost pleading expression in their steady gaze.

He recognised her instantly, but as it was evident that she did not know him, he suppressed any sign of recognition, and, assuming his usual business tone, he said:

"You called in answer to my advertisement for a typine?"

"Yes, sir," she replied with dignified simplicity and straightforwardness; "I would like to have the employment, as I need it very much."

"I have no doubt you will suit me," he said with rather reckless haste, which caused her to look at him in some surprise.

"Have you ever done this kind of work?" he asked, more because he saw that some formalities were expected of him, than because he cared to know, for he had decided that she should have the place, competent or not.

"Only occasionally—for my uncle," she replied rather hesitatingly.

"Ah!—was your uncle a lawyer?"

"No, sir, he was a merchant." A painful flush flamed into the white cheeks at these questions, and Mr. Merritt did not pursue his investigations any further, but muttering to himself, "The villain!" proceeded to arrange the details of their business relations, naming a sum as compensation for her services which was considerably above the usual rates, and was rewarded for his generosity by a look of gratitude from the beautiful dark eyes, that caused a warm spot to glow in his heart, when he thought of it, for hours afterwards.

"Oh," he said with sudden recollection, as he was about to bow her out, and smiling at the omission, "I have forgotten to ask your name."

The young lady laughed, a low musical laugh which quite charmed Mr. Merritt, who was rather fastidious on that point, and who would not have admired the veriest beauty if she had had a coarse voice and been guilty of the heinousness of a loud laugh.

"Stanley—Mary Stanley," was the answer.

"Your hours will be from ten to four," he said as he held the door open for her to pass out, "and I would like you to come to-morrow if possible."

"Certainly, I will come," she said, and with a graceful bow took her departure.

"Did you get it, Mary?" said a weak, childish voice as she entered a rather small back room in a dingy house in a still dingier back street.

"Yes, Ernie, dear," said the girl, quickly crossing over to a couch where, propped up with pillows and cushions, sat a small childish figure, and bending down she smoothed back the soft hair from the high, pale brow of the little deformed cousin, and kissed him tenderly. "Yes," she repeated brightly, "and I am to get enough money every week to keep us comfortably."

The boy laughed merrily, though it was a weak, pitiful little laugh. "That will be fine," he said.

"Yes. And, Ernie, do you know what I think we can do? You remember, don't you, dear, those two nice little rooms I told you about, that I saw when I was out 'house hunting,' but I could not afford to pay the rent, you know? Now, if you don't mind staying alone a little longer, I will go out and see if they are still to let; it's not very far from here."

"Of course I'll not mind, you dear good Mary," said the boy impulsively, throwing his arms round her neck and giving her an affectionate hug. "What would I do without you? You're both papa and mamma to me."

"Well, then, I'll go," said the girl, returning the hug; "and if I get them we'll move this afternoon, for I have to go to work to-morrow."

"I hope you can, it will be much nicer to have two rooms; for then, you see, when you're away, and I get tired of one, I can get on my crutches and go into the other, and it won't seem so long."

With a great throb of loving pity welling up in her heart for the poor little unfortunate, Mary settled his cushions more comfortably, kissed him very tenderly, and left him.

Six months passed rapidly away, and Mary Stanley still occupied a desk in the office of Owen Merritt. The shapely head, with its beautiful crown of auburn hair, seemed like a ray of sunlight in the rather dingy room, and was always the first thing that gentleman's eyes rested upon when he entered it. How much he would have missed it, if some morning he had come and found it absent, he never stopped to inquire. They had grown to be great friends; and yet he would no more have thought of using any familiarity towards her than if she had been the grandest lady of his acquaintance, so perfectly was she hedged about with maidenly dignity and reserve.

As Spring advanced, and the coming Summer sent in now and again an advance-guard to warn the denizens of the busy city of hot weather close at hand, he began to notice, with some anxiety, a careworn, troubled expression gradually creeping into the fair, sweet face, until at last it seemed to have taken possession, and he racked his brains to devise some means of finding out what was troubling her.

Digitized by Google

"Why do I care so much?" he suddenly asked himself one day when he had been rendered really miserable by seeing, while surreptitiously watching her as she bent over her writing, two large tears splash down upon the page before her, over which she hastily laid a blotter in a frightened sort of way. There was but one answer which he could give to this question, for in an instant a veil seemed to be snatched away from before his mental vision, and he knew that he loved this girl with a pure, deep love, such as he never could possibly have felt for Louise Mallory.

His visitor was Mary Stanley.

Mary herself at last volunteered the information he was so anxious to gain. One afternoon, after putting her desk in order, which he noticed that she seemed to be doing in a lingering, pre-occupied sort of way, she approached his table.

"Mr. Merritt," she began, in a hesitating way, "do you think you can fill my place here by next week?"

She did not look at him—or she would have seen that he turned very pale—but pulled nervously at some pieces of paper she held in her hand, and scattered them in little bits on the floor, in a manner quite at variance with her usual quiet self-possession and neat ways.

"Are you going to leave me?" he asked, trying hard not to let the pain in his heart show itself in his voice.

"I shall be obliged to," she replied, speaking rapidly, feeling that she must get through quickly or she should break down. "The doctor says that Ernie must not remain in the City during the hot months, and that I had better take him to the seashore."

"Who is Ernie?" he asked, with some constraint in his tone.

"I forgot that you did not know him. He is my little crippled cousin. His father and mother are dead, and he has no one but me to care for him."

"Is he your uncle Mallory's son?" Mr. Merritt asked, in surprise.

It was Mary's turn to be surprised, and she raised her eyes for the first time and looked at him.

"How did you know?" she asked.

He was vexed at his own incautiousness, but thought it best to make an explanation. "I recognised you instantly," he added. Mary dropped her eyes again, and a faint colour stole into her cheeks.

"And you have been supporting the son of the man who robbed you, and allowed you to be so shamefully treated!" he exclaimed, with a thrill which she might have understood if she had but looked up, for all his heart was in the tender, admiring gaze he bent upon her.

"It was not Ernie's fault," she answered softly, "and he is all I have in the world."

If Owen Merritt could have followed the dictates of his own heart at that moment, he would have taken her in his arms and assured her that she was all the world to him, and that without her it would be a waste, howling wilderness, without a ray of sunlight.

"What are your plans for taking him to the seaside?" he asked, in a controlled, business tone.

"My landlady has a sister who keeps a large boarding-house at Bournemouth. She says she can get me a position to take charge of the linen-room, where I can have Ernie with me."

"Miss Stanley," said Mr. Merritt, after a few moments' silence, during which he had been considering the best way to approach what was beginning to seem a very delicate and difficult subject, "may I call upon you this evening? I would like to see your cousin. I had a little brother who was a cripple from infancy, but died when he was eight years old."

Mary could not withhold the desired permission, and promptly at the hour agreed upon Owen Merritt stood in her little "drawing-room," as she and Ernie playfully called it. The furniture was most of it old and faded, but a few handsome pieces, which she had saved from the wreck of her home, and a stand of choice plants with a bird-cage above it, gave it an air of elegance and refinement.

This call paved the way for another, and then another, in which he told Mary of his love, in a manly, straightforward manner, and asked her to be his wife, upon which, with some tears and many blushes, she confessed that her heart had been in his keeping for months, and that she had gladly availed herself of the excuse the doctor's advice in regard to Ernie offered, in the fear that she might, in some moment of weakness, betray her secret.

They were married quietly, and then they gave Ernie the benefit of a sea voyage, and took him to a German Spa.

Only after her marriage did Mary confide to her husband a secret known to but a few, the fate of poor Louise.

"A few days after her father's death her body had been found in a small cove, where the pleasure boats were moored. At first foul play was suspected, but there were no marks of violence, and I have no doubt she chose death rather than face the contempt of Society. Poor aunt was very ill, and I sent immediately for Mr. Gibbs. With great difficulty we succeeded in keeping an account of it out of the papers."

"Out of misery is happiness born," said her husband, drawing her fondly to him. "It was a sad, a terribly sad affair, but it has brought me the great happiness of my life."

George Barnes.

Digitized by Google

Exciting Series.

A Striking Series of Astonishing Revelations.

Told by the Decoy Herself.

OF WHOM YOU READ.

Vivienne D'Alton, the decoy. She, an innocent girl, unwittingly leads young gentlemen of good social standing to their ruin at the hands of the man she believes to be her father.

Beverley D'Alton, who poses as a millionaire who has made his money by judicious speculation. He assumes to lavish great affection on Vivienne.

Mrs. Sherwood. A florid person, who is introduced to Vivienne by her father as a great friend of her dead mother. She lives with the D'Altons, and requests Vivienne to call her "Aunt Flora," which the young girl reluctantly does.

Annchen. A lady's maid, whom Vivienne greatly detests. She seems to be on very familiar terms with Mrs. Sherwood and Mr. D'Alton.

ELEVENTH EPISODE.

A Friend in Need.

So strange an effect did Dr. Farnie's influence have upon me that I actually began to think that I must have been dreaming, and I was altogether in such a state of mental and physical collapse that I hardly remembered reaching home again.

In fact, I was ill. So ill that I had neither strength nor brains to do anything but lie down on my couch, and yield myself to the ministrations of Mrs. Sherwood and Annchen, who both quoted Dr. Farnie's orders.

I tried hard to collect my thoughts, so as to understand what had really happened. Was it true that my father had accused me of intending to elope? If so, how was it that he happened to know that I was in the seed shop? It was all very strange, and I felt so faint that I had willingly partaken of a restorative which Annchen solicitously pressed upon me.

But, somehow, the so-called restorative lacked the power to stimulate my brain into its wonted activity. On the contrary, I felt sleepy after it. And I also began to feel so tranquil that I made no effort to keep awake, for it was a delicious kind of drowsiness which possessed me, and under its influence every shadow of trouble seemed to vanish into the misty regions of the past.

"How is she doing?"

The question was uttered in a faint whisper by somebody within the room, and I knew that it referred to me. But my bodily powers were so held in thrall that not even the fluttering of an eyelid betrayed the fact that my senses were already recovering sufficiently to enable them to grasp the present again.

"She'll do beautifully. I've worked the oracle, and another dose will stop her meddling for ever."

It was Mrs. Sherwood who now spoke, almost in as low a whisper as the questioner, who was no other than my father.

"That's right. Whoever expected that she would turn out to be such a meddlesome little cat, and almost ruin everything by her peeping and prying?"

"Who expected? I expected. I've told you over and over again that she was not the right sort to hoodwink long."

"Well, I only intended it to last till we had got the settlements out of the Prince. They could both have gone the way of all flesh then."

"Well, you'll have to let the Prince slide. It's too risky to keep this game on. And, even if it wasn't, I'd stand it no longer. I was a fool to agree to play second fiddle to a chit of a girl. You could easily have pretended that you had married twice, and that I was the girl's step-mother. That would have saved me some of her insolence. But there is one thing to be thankful for—she'll give me no more of it."

"No. But I can't help thinking that it is a great pity. Why, she might have raked in millions for us, if she hadn't inherited the stupid prejudices of the D'Altons."

"Oh, well, it's no use crying over spilt milk. We may thank our stars that we have stopped her tongue in time, and that Kaspar had the sense to let you know that he was being shadowed by Lord Broomville."

"Yes, that was what saved the whole situation. I was only just in time with my bogus policemen, and nobody thought of interfering when they produced the sham warrant. Broomville has been a tough customer, but I think he won't trouble us again."

"He hadn't need! Fancy him discovering that Kaspar and Annchen Krause are both related to me, and that——"

"My patient. How is she?"

It was Dr. Farnie who thus broke in upon a conversation that filled me with nameless horror, which was all the greater because I was still utterly incapable of making a movement.

Clearly, my death was intended! And, this being so, I no longer tried to believe that Beverley D'Alton was my father. For, if he had been, how could he have plotted with my enemies against me? Besides, was not the father of my recollection a very different man? And had I not been greatly disappointed at the alteration in his appearance?

Digitized by Google

In this manner my reasoning faculties were trying to keep pace with the conversation that was being carried on in my room, when Dr. Farnie inquired after me.

"She has fallen into a pleasant sleep now," was Mrs. Sherwood's gently spoken reply. "I hope, when she wakes again, she will behave more like a sane person."

"Your influence doesn't go for much," sneered my father. "You told me that you could hypnotise the girl into doing anything that I wanted her to do."

"And I induced her to consent to marry the Prince, whom you were so desirous of securing for a son-in-law."

"But you failed to keep her thoughts in the groove I wished them to be kept in, or she would not have been so ready to elope with the fellow who calls himself Viscount Broomville. And as you have not fulfilled your part of the contract, I shall mulct you in half the honorarium I promised you."

"I hardly think that you will do that, sir, for it would not conduce to your popularity if I were compelled to have recourse to the law to make you keep your promises. But why take it for granted that I am unable to recover lost ground? Let me try my powers again, and I will either succeed absolutely, or I will forfeit every farthing of my promised honorarium. Surely, that is a fair offer, sir?"

There was a moment's silence, broken at last by Mrs. Sherwood, who put in a protest against the hypnotist.

"I think we had better drop that nonsense altogether," she said firmly. "I won't allow dear Vivienne to be tampered with any more, for the sake of pandering either to your greed or her father's ambition. I shall take her to visit some friends of mine in Holland. They will soon restore her to bodily vigour, and with the return of health, she will begin to see that we have only her welfare at heart."

These words could not have sounded kinder if they had come from my dearest friend. But they filled me with more acute anguish of mind than ever, for only too well did I foretell the treatment which her friends in Holland would accord to me. Of course—at least, so I thought—she was alluding to Herr and Madame Althaus, whom I no longer hesitated to connect with the tragic death of poor Mr. Graysworthy.

Therefore, strange though it may seem, I was desperately anxious to be given over to the tender mercies of the hypnotist, rather than to be abandoned to the boasted solicitude of Mrs. Sherwood.

My father seemed to be thinking deeply. But when he spoke again, I was so wildly thankful, that I felt my hands twitch convulsively beneath the embroidered satin eiderdown which had been thrown over me, and this brought me face to face with a new discovery. The enthralment of my physical powers was waning, and I could now move if I liked. But it was all-important to me to appear as limp as I was believed to be, and I prayed wildly for the power to foil my enemies.

My success must have been almost as great as the mental effort which produced it, for not a muscle of my face moved, even though the next words I heard indicated a respite from the fate which Mrs. Sherwood had planned for me.

"Vivienne will be happiest if she lives to be a princess," said my father. "So there is no reason why her ultimate happiness should not be our chief consideration. I tell you what, Dr. Farnie, I'll accept your challenge. But I shall rely on your honour not to allow my daughter to hold communion with anybody else, or to leave this house except as the willing bride of Prince Gorouki."

"Very well, Mr. D'Alton; I give you my word of honour that Miss D'Alton will comply with her father's wishes in every respect. She shall not leave this house again without my permission, and I guarantee that she will go to the altar a willing and a happy bride. If I fail in any item of these promises, I absolve you entirely from your part of the contract, and you will easily understand, that I, being a poor man, will not forfeit ten thousand pounds if I can help it."

"Then it is a bargain, and we will leave you to your task."

"One moment, Mr. D'Alton. The fewer people there are about Miss D'Alton the better, until I have moulded her mind to the desired shape. I have noticed two maids are often in attendance upon her. Which of them does she like best?"

"Annchen is the most suitable maid for her, under the circumstances," answered Mrs. Sherwood. But the doctor insisted upon his question being carefully considered from his point of view.

"Certainly," was his bland response. "We will have Annchen if she is Miss D'Alton's favourite. If she is not, we must have the other, for I have too much at stake to risk losing the game by having disturbing influences to contend with."

"Then you shall have Susan here," decided my father, in spite of renewed protest by his accomplice, and all three left me for a while.

No sooner was I alone than I tried to piece into coherent form all that I had learnt. Dr. Farnie was to have £10,000, if he could hypnotise me into being dutiful enough to marry Prince Gorouki, and both the Prince and I were "to go the way of all flesh" as soon as Mr. D'Alton had secured the huge fortune which was to be settled upon me by my affianced husband.

It seemed to me that in any case I was doomed. For if I resisted all attempts to make me marry the Prince, Mrs. Sherwood's method of extinction would be used on me just the same.

But at present, in spite of the gravity of my situation, my greatest anxiety was on account of Lord Broomville, whose zeal on my behalf had resulted in his capture by the enemy. I trembled to think of the fate in store for him, and, no longer restrained by the necessity of keeping my emotions in check, I yielded to a fit of bitter weeping.

This lasted till I heard myself addressed in a gentle, compassionate voice, which caused me to sit up in the wild hope that it was really a friend who was speaking to me.

* * * * *

Alas! there was nobody here but Dr. Farnie and Susan, and I did not expect them to be of much use to either Lord Broomville or myself. But they were certainly not aggressive, and I could almost have fancied that neither of them was hypocritical.

But I had heard the doctor's compact with the man who might, or might not be, Beverley D'Alton, and I was not inclined to be too trustful.

"Miss D'Alton, pull yourself together and listen to some good news," said the doctor, and once again I felt compelled to acknowledge his power to soothe me into comparative tranquillity.

"Good news?" I queried mournfully. "Do you think that it is good news to know that you intend to make me marry Prince Gorouki?"

"I intend to do no such thing," was the smiling reply, and my voice was as contemptuous as I could make it, as I retorted: "Dr. Farnie, if you think that you can hoodwink me, you are mistaken. I heard every word you and those wicked people said just now."

"Those wicked people? Do you mean your father and your aunt?"

"No. I mean the impostors who pretend to be my father and my aunt."

"By Jove! Pardon me, Miss Vivienne! But I am really so astonished at the extent of your information that I hardly know what to make of it."

"Then you do not deny that they are impostors?"

"On the contrary, I hope to help towards their exposure."

This was such an unexpected answer that I could hardly believe my ears, and I began to put several eager questions, all of which were, however, denied an answer just then.

"You must be fainting for want of nourishment," said the doctor, "so I want you to do justice to a meal which Susan will bring you."

"I'm not a bit hungry. I want neither food nor drink."

"My dear young lady, you cannot live on nothing."

"Neither could I live on the fare Mrs. Sherwood is likely to send me."

Digitized by Google

This answer was significant enough to show the depth of my distrust. But I was soon reassured.

"Susan," said the doctor, "go downstairs and fill a tray for Miss D'Alton. Select the things yourself, and do not, on any account, allow either Mrs. Sherwood or Annchen to come near the tray."

"I'll be very careful, doctor," promised Susan.

"And mind, not a word to betray what I have said to you."

"I'm too fond of Miss Vivienne to bungle. You may trust me to help to save her."

This little conversation almost completed the growing conviction that I had some friends on my side, and while Susan was away, my doubts on the point were entirely set at rest.

"I daresay you are wondering which of my promises are intended to be kept," began the doctor, and I instantly retorted: "I heard you give your solemn word of honour that you would make me comply with Mr. D'Alton's wishes in every respect."

"Not exactly. What I said was this: 'I give you my word of honour that Miss D'Alton will comply with her father's wishes in every respect. She shall not leave this house again without my permission, and I guarantee that she will go to the altar a willing and a happy bride."

"Well?"

"I shall not forfeit my word of honour, I assure you. For, in the first place, the man to whom I pledged it is not your father. In the second place, you already have my permission to leave this house as soon as ever you and I have finished the task which still requires completion. In the third place, I was not thinking of Prince Gorouki as your future husband, but of a dear friend of my own, who lost his heart to you the first moment he saw you, and who is responsible for my presence here. Can you guess whom I mean?"

I felt myself flush scarlet, for I knew that he meant Viscount Broomville, and I should have been wild with joy if the latter had not been in grave danger.

"Oh!" I ejaculated, "he will be killed! He has been arrested. But they were sham policemen, and the warrant was a forged one! Those awful people will never let him escape again!"

"Oh, yes, they will, for they cannot help themselves. This business has been a case of diamond cut diamond all through, and Broomville could not be spirited away without his friends knowing exactly where he was. There has been no money spared, and there are several men constantly watching Broomville. Wherever he is taken, they will follow, and you need not be uneasy on his account, even though I appeared to be working against him."

"And did he ask you to come here?"

"Yes. After several attempts had been made on his life, he determined to obliterate himself for a time, and discover the source of his danger. He saw the man you christened the 'Bird of Evil Omen' talking to your maid Annchen, and he then pursued his investigations so ardently that the whole castle of cards will soon fall round the ears of the so-called Mr. D'Alton and his wife."

"His wife?"

"Yes, she is his wife, and, if possible, she is more wicked than he is."

"She is awful! She has a book on poisons, and she managed to give me a dose. That was how I was so helpless and stupid for awhile. But I heard every word that was said while I was lying here, and I know that she intended to kill me."

"I know that, too, for you were too keen of intellect to be a mere careless tool. The post of decoy should be given to a really wicked woman, who has neither heart nor conscience. Unfortunately for this colossal scheme of swindling, you have both a heart and a conscience."

"Ah! What is that?"

There was a slight rattle at my outer door, and Doctor Farnie smiled reassuringly.

"It is only Susan with your lunch," he said. "I took the precaution of turning the key after her, to guard against surprises."

And there was need of caution, for Susan had surprised Annchen so intent upon trying to listen at the keyhole, that she had not time to get away before she was observed. Happily, we were talking only in whispers, for each knew the desperate need of caution, and we were quite convinced that not a word of what he had said could be overheard.

"Keep a sharp look-out, Susan," enjoined Dr. Farnie. "Neither Annchen nor her mistress must be allowed to enter these rooms. But it will not do to arouse suspicion against me, so if any questions are asked you, you must say that Miss Vivienne is already quiet and cheerful. And tell Mr. D'Alton that everything is going on satisfactorily. He will know what you mean."

When Susan had gone again, I began to eat my lunch, for I felt the need of it, and, while I ate, Dr. Farnie answered more of the questions which I eagerly put to him.

One of these was put with a sudden doubt in my voice.

"After all," I said, "how do I know that you are not hypnotising me this minute into believing whatever you choose to tell me? It is what you are here for."

"I can quite understand your doubts, Miss D'Alton," was the grave reply. "But I swear to you that you are now in an absolutely normal state. I have experimented a good deal in hypnotism. But I am a failure as a perfect hypnotist, for I have been unable to influence you to the total exclusion of your own will. Broomville saw some of my experiments, and that gave him the idea of making me useful here. He thought that some kind of villainy was sure to be brought into play against you, and that it was just as well that one of the villains should be somebody who would really befool Mr. D'Alton into believing his plans to be progressing satisfactorily."

"One moment, Dr. Farnie. Is it quite certain that Mr. D'Alton is not my father?"

"The man who poses as your father is not in the least degree related to you. Nor is his wife."

"Then they had good reason to fear what Miss D'Alton could tell about them! And that is why they robbed the poor old lady of her memory! But we must lose no more time in restoring it. I will leave this house at once. She shall be cured this very day."

My words had a strange effect on Dr. Farnie. He almost gasped for breath, and looked at me in such an anxious way that I thought he must have been taken suddenly ill.

"You say that Miss D'Alton has been deliberately robbed of her memory?" he cried, "and that we must lose no time in restoring it? Are you speaking at random? Or are both statements true?"

"Perfectly true," I answered firmly. "The fiendish stuff which Mrs. Sherwood uses is described in her book of poisons, and I was actually buying the antidote for it when I was forcibly removed from the shop."

"Ah! That explains something I did not understand! But it also opens out such a possibility of joy as you have not yet dreamt of. I know somebody else whose memory is a blank, and if it can be restored, there will be no more mystery in either your life or his."

There was so solemn and significant a tone in Dr. Farnie's voice that a wild thought rushed into my mind.

"This other person whose memory is a blank," I panted—"has he aught to do with me? His name—tell me his name."

"Yes, I will tell you his name," was the triumphantly spoken answer. "His name is Beverley D'Alton, and he is your real father."

(Another instalment of this series will appear next week.)

HANDWRITING DENOTES YOUR CHARACTER.

And if you wish to learn what this is send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope, to RANEE, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. A reliable delineation of your character will be sent in return.

Digitized by Google

The Mistake They Made.

Being the Love Story of Roberta Bond.

Dr. Bond found his eyes weakening, and discovered that he could no longer, even with glasses, place before the printer that fine "copy" for which he was renowned, and as his great work on the Mysteries of Science was not yet half-completed, he advertised for a "secretary," and from the long and seemingly never-ending train of men—young, old, well-dressed, and shabby—who, for two weeks, answered his advertisement—selected one, a delicate young fellow named Burnet, with a pretty rather than a handsome face, a coat that had done service, and boots that needed mending.

The secretary was to live in the house, and partake of the family meals; and Dr. Bond's selection, which was supposed to be based entirely on handwriting, was secretly biassed a little by the harmlessness of this young person.

Dr. Bond had been a widower for three years, and had two daughters, between whom their deceased mother's large fortune was divided equally.

He had desired to engage a foreign-looking professor, with wild hair, moustaches, and a great gift of speech, but bethought him that he would certainly make love to the girls.

A young man, who evidently thought himself like a portrait of Lord Byron, he rejected because he feared Bella might fall in love with him.

As for Roberta, it never occurred to him that she would, as he expressed it, make a fool of herself again. She was thirty years of age, had been "engaged" to somebody once, and they had quarrelled and parted, and Roberta had fallen ill, and it was not at all pleasant. He believed that Roberta would stay with him always, and take comfort in the independence her fortune gave her.

She was a handsome woman, and greatly admired, but it is to be doubted if her father knew it. But, at all events, this small, slim, light-haired secretary, with his retiring manner and solemn, owl-like eyes, would not be a bait for hearts.

So it proved when the secretary appeared at the dinner-table. He was so much alarmed when spoken to that Bella and Roberta, both large women with decided manners, and a strong sense of humour, looked at each other with glittering eyes.

"Oh, isn't he funny?" cried Bella, when once they were alone. "And how we frighten him! I felt like guying him. It's so absurd for a man to be like that. I hope he is not a girl, and will not turn out to have applied for the secretaryship to make love to poor papa, like the pretty pages in the old romances."

"Really, he is like a girl," said Roberta. "But he won't be at all in the way, and I can't think even you will flirt with him—which is a blessing."

However, Roberta was very much more motherly in her emotions than was Bella, and very shortly she began to pet young Burnet, as she might a boy on a visit home from school.

He was very grateful, very amiable, and returned her kindness in a thousand of those little ways that so please a woman. But whatever he did, wherever he was, the young man always seemed to be unhappy. Once or twice, when she came upon him suddenly, she saw tears in his blue eyes. It troubled her; she liked him so much. She longed to ask him what it was that troubled him. Perhaps he missed his home. It seemed strange to her that so gentle and easily-pleased a creature should have any secret woe to brood over. Still she could not guess what it was, until one day chance——But let us see what chance did.

Dr. Bond, like most literary men, hated to have his room "tidied up." Still there were periods when dust accumulated to such a depth on everything that his daughters and their servants raided the place in his absence, and, working in fear and trembling, did all that broom, and duster, and soap-and-water could do to the neglected study, which their father instantly set to work to throw into its old state again.

Such a day came. The rush was made. Bella and Roberta worked with the servants. At last all was fresh, bright, and purified, and Roberta lingered behind the others in the study to arrange some books more prettily on their shelves. Some of these she set on young Burnet's desk for a time, and in doing so her eye rested on the large sheet of blotting-paper that covered it. Certain words were reversed upon it.

Roberta looked, blushed, laughed a little; replaced the paper with a new sheet, and carried the marked one to her own room. There she held it before a mirror, and read these words: "Roberta—Roberta—Roberta," written over and over again. Then: "Oh, my Roberta! If I only dared! If I only dared!" And after this: "Never—never! Oh, poverty!"

Roberta folded the paper away in the recesses of a private drawer, and sat down trembling and excited, to think it all over. So this was the secret: he loved her—and, being poor, dared not tell her. Lovers always did these things. During the brief period of her engagement, did she not write her lover's name—Charles Lawrence—whenever she took a pen in her hand? And so it was this—this—and being this, she could make him happy, drive away his sorrow—she!

Sunk in the cushions of a great chair, she thought it all over until thinking was a pain. Charles Lawrence was the only man she could ever love—but she liked William Burnet. Perhaps she could come to like him well enough to marry him. To be loved, even if one cannot love, is something, and he would never know. She would try. She laughed as she rose to dress her hair and to arrange her costume for the evening; but she repeated—she would try.

She did honestly. And it makes ever so much difference in a true woman's feelings to any man to know that he loves her.

Time passed. Roberta really felt that there was much to like and respect in this young man. She encouraged him to cross the debatable land between friendship and love, but he still lingered on the margin. At last she took the first step.

They were alone one evening. He had come into the drawing-room to get a book, and she had asked him to sit down. His face was so sad, his manner so despondent, that, involuntarily, she drew nearer to him and put her hand on his arm.

"You are in trouble," she said.

He sighed.

"Can I help you?" she asked gently.

"No," he answered. "If I could become a rich man, that would help—nothing else; but I never shall be that. I have no energy, no talent, no physique. I—I wish I were dead."

He almost sobbed.

Digitized by Google

Roberta drew nearer.

"Coward!" she said softly.

"I believe I do deserve the name," he answered.

"You do," said Roberta, smiling. "Why should you fear to tell a woman you love her, because she is rich, and you are poor? You see, I know all."

She looked at him rather as a gallant cavalier might regard a loving maiden than with the gaze a woman gives her lover, and his pale, boyish face flushed, and his eyes filled again.

"I guessed," she said. "And then I saw the name you had written so often. I understood. You should not have been so doubtful of me."

Then William Burnet quite understood.

The instinct of a gentleman taught him what to do. Many a less bashful man would not have known, but he did.

He sank upon his knees at her feet and took her hands.

"You are so good—so kind!" he said. "You quite sympathise with us, I am sure. You are much my superior, and even hers, in every way. Her name is the same as yours—Roberta; and she is only seventeen. Not very pretty, but I love her so! But about being rich, you are mistaken. She is as poor as I—poorer—dependent on a miserable uncle. You know all now. Oh, how good you are! I am so glad you spoke of it to me."

But he knew—he knew, and he kept wondering at it all to himself as he went quietly out of the room, after Roberta had forced herself to say:

"I shall try to help you to find something better, so that you shall be able to marry my little namesake."

Afterwards she went through an awful struggle with self-contempt and shame, and could have beaten herself for her folly. She remained in the firelit room alone, and did not call for a lamp. She paced the floor, and seated herself only to rise again. She had trained herself to love this boyish, weak, helpless man for his sake, that she might be good to him, and out of gratitude for the secret love he felt for her; and here was a dénouement. He had never loved her at all. It was a silly little Roberta, with a foolish mouth and seventeen inexperienced years, for whose sake he bemoaned himself—a penniless girl, with no beauty, and she had almost offered herself to him.

The ringing of the bell startled her from a dark reverie. She fancied her father and sister had returned, and remained where she was; and the door opened, and a servant entered bringing a card, which the low fire-light did not enable her to read.

And someone had followed the girl—a large man with a beard—a presence grand and impressive—that seemed strange, yet familiar.

"Roberta," said a voice.

It came out of the midst of a never-forgotten past.

"Who speaks?" she cried.

Then she knew. It was Charles Lawrence. The servant brought the lamp in and retired.

They looked at each other.

"Roberta," he said, "I have come back again. Are you angry?"

She trembled so that she could not speak.

He took her hand.

"I deserved punishment," he said. "Heaven knows I have had it in this exile from you. Is it not proof enough that, after all these years, I return to ask for pardon? Can you not forgive one who repents so deeply?"

And then he told her the whole truth of a certain story, the warped version of which had parted them, and she blushed for her wrath and for her cruelty, and believed in him once again.

Clasped in his arms, and happy as a woman could be, Roberta remembered the scene of an hour before. What misery had been hers, had she received from William Burnet an avowal of love in reply to her words: "If he had really loved her, or, tempted by the bait of wealth, had said so."

A few days after this Roberta called young Burnet to her and told him, in quite a motherly manner, that the gentleman she should shortly marry could offer him a place which would enable him to marry his little lady-love. She was beaming with happiness as she spoke, and young Burnet was greatly puzzled.

"Of course I was a fool to think such an absurd thing," he often says to himself. "I fancied she thought I loved her, and even liked me, but it could not have been. I am so glad it was not."

He lives happily with his Roberta. The other Roberta thinks herself the most blissful woman under the sun; and all is well that ends well. Stanley Hammond.

A Word of Advice.

The second list of signatures in connection with our new competition appears on page 369, and I should advise all my readers to turn to it immediately and make up their minds to try for one of the splendid cash prizes that are offered. The first coupon was published in our last number, and the others will appear week by week. If you have not got last week's Short Stories, procure it at once, else you may experience some difficulty in getting a copy. It would be wise to tell your newsagent to send you this paper every week—at least, until the competition ceases. In this way you would make quite certain of having all the necessary competition numbers, and I trust that by that time you would have developed such a liking for the literary contents that you would continue to subscribe to it for their sake alone. Try it and see.

A New Serial.

"Dupes of Destiny," the fine serial written by Blanche Eardley, and which has been so popular, will be concluded very shortly. Readers have followed the story with keen interest, and many, no doubt, will be sorry to part with the characters. Still, all good things must have an end, and you have further compensation, insomuch that in its place an exciting new serial, written by Arnold Bennett, the well-known author, will commence. It will be a stirring tale of plot and power, of cunning and crime, of love and loyalty. One of the premier black-and-white artists of the day, Mr. Reginald Cleaver, will illustrate it with profuse sketches. Remember that this new serial will commence in the number of Short Stories dated April 2nd.

"The Heart of Claire Gilchrist."

The above is the title of the Tenth Unsolved Love Problem, which you will find on the opposite page.

I will award a prize of one guinea to the reader who sends in what I consider to be the best solution to the problem. Replies must not exceed one hundred words, and should be written on one side of the paper only. The last day on which I can receive replies will be Friday, March 25th. None arriving after that date will be considered. Address your envelopes to the Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. Mark the top left-hand corner "Tenth Love Problem." Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

UNSOLVED LOVE PROBLEMS.

A Prize of One Guinea is offered to the reader who sends in the most Satisfactory Solution to the Problem. Replies should not exceed one hundred words. See "Your Editor Chats."

No. X.—THE HEART OF CLAIRE GILCHRIST.

THROUGH the half-opened church door came the pealing notes of an organ, and the fair girl who stood without paused, for a few minutes, with her hand on the heavy latch.

She was a perfect Saxon type, such as has decided the type of English beauty for all time; tall and nobly proportioned, her skin exquisitely fair, and her eyes deep blue; while one might be forgiven for imagining that the gold of her hair lighted the gloom of the old porch. It was summer-time, and her dress, simple as it was, showed evidence of both wealth and taste. Her head was bare, for all her walk, except the churchyard path, had been through her father's property. She was Claire Gilchrist, daughter of Sir Mostyn Gilchrist, of Mellor Park.

As she stood listening in the doorway, loth to interrupt the player, the pealing notes were changed to sounds of poignant sweetness, that again melted into a minor key of infinite sadness. The ready tears that started to her eyes showed a nature sensitive to music, and then, as though unable to bear it any longer, she pushed open the door, and hastily twisting her lace scarf over her head, entered and moved swiftly up the aisle.

The church seemed almost in darkness save where the chancel windows flooded the pavement with many-coloured glories, and as she reached the chancel step the light fell upon her, and the player at the organ turned and saw her.

It was a grandly-shaped head that looked at her with deep, dark eyes into which, as they met hers, there leapt a strange flame, and the music changed its character.

Triumphant, passionate chords crashed out till Claire stood transfixed, feeling herself surrounded with a glowing passion of love; then they stopped abruptly, and she shivered at the sudden removal of the heavenly light and warmth that had enveloped her. She moved forward timidly, but at the same moment the organist rose, and, shutting the instrument, came towards her.

Then it was seen that he was lame and stunted in figure. The grand head, with the powerful though irregular features, seemed as if it should belong to another body, for his was thin and insignificant, almost shrunken, while a club foot caused a lameness painful to observe.

"Mr. Rhys," said Claire, "I have a request to make."

"Certainly, Miss Gilchrist, I am at your service; we will go outside," he replied, standing aside to let her pass before him down the quaint little village church.

Not a word was said as he locked the church door, and placed the ponderous key in his pocket. Claire still felt the glamour of the music, but could no more allude to it in spoken words than if it had been a veritable declaration of love, such as it sounded to her heart.

In the churchyard she led the way to a low wall under an old yew tree, and here she seated herself, and motioned to him to do likewise, but he preferred to stand, leaning against the tree, seeming wilfully to display all the disproportionateness of his figure.

Out in the open, away from the impressive gloom of the little old church and without the flood of passionate music or the compelling gaze of the fiery Celtic eyes, Claire was once more the "lady of the Manor," and Owen Rhys was the organist.

Now, however, she turned to him, and said, with the air of one asking a favour.

"It is my birthday next week, and I am going to have a garden-party. Will you come?"

"To play?" he asked.

"No," she replied—"as a guest."

"I never go out," was all his answer.

Claire was evidently accustomed to this abruptness, for she took no offence; she only said:

"Do come!"

He turned on her almost passionately.

"Why do you want to make me come where I know I shall only be out of place? I cannot talk, I am ill at ease away from my music, and I am not the latest London furore that I might fatuously imagine I did these ladies and gentlemen sufficient honour in allowing them to breathe the same air with me. I am only the lame organist of Mellor parish church."

"That is your own choice—you might be anything you chose," she replied, somewhat hastily, and regretted the words almost before she saw the gloom that overspread his expressive countenance.

"Might I—with this misshapen body?" he asked, with a contemptuous gesture.

"Yes," she went on boldly, determined to say out what had long been in her mind. "Who would see the shortcomings of your body when you can draw the very soul out of them with your music? If you had had the courage to face the world as you are, believe me, there would be no one whose fame or riches would exceed yours, no man or woman who would not be proud to receive a word of love from you!"

Here she stopped abruptly, appalled to see whither her pent-up feelings had led her.

His eyes flashed at her words, but he replied in a restrained manner:

"You may call it cowardice, and I have no right to contradict you. I have no wish for riches, and what is fame when there can never be anyone to make glad by it? For never would I wish to trick man or woman by the glamour of my music into a love that they could not otherwise have for me. Owen Rhys, as I am, body and soul. I am and must remain one apart; my life cannot be arranged on the same lines as any other man's."

Digitized by Google

Claire was too much abashed by the thought of the "too much" she had said to him to be able to reply, as she felt she ought:

"This is morbid; your deformity is much less than you, by long contemplation of it, have grown to think."

Besides, she knew that to his beauty-loving artist's soul, any deformity was repulsive and humiliating, so she only stammered:

"I beg your pardon."

Owen bowed; and then, with a return to a more conventional tone, he said:

"Still, Miss Gilchrist, if your father would like me to come and play to his guests, I will do so gladly, for the sake of a talk with so scholarly a gentleman, and so enthusiastic a musician as he is."

"Thank you," said Claire coldly; "I will tell him."

Poor Claire was deeply wounded. "He would not come as my guest and because I asked him, but he will come to oblige father and play. Is it pride, or is it what he really feels?"

A few minutes before, as he played with his glowing, passionate music, she felt as sure as she felt of anything in Heaven or earth, that he loved her, and yet directly after he was his usual impassive self, coldly putting aside her personal wishes, and making her feel that she had laid claim to an intimacy that did not exist when she criticised his plan of life.

And the same thing had happened so often, and the question that she ever asked herself was no nearer being answered than before: "Did he love her, or did he not?"

For imperious Claire Gilchrist, whom half the neighbouring youths had striven in vain to soften, had unreservedly given her heart to this poor, lame, village organist.

It was not, however, a fancy of a moment. For five years he had lived there almost in intimacy with her father, who liked the man and adored his genius. From the first she had seen through his cold manner, and discovered the fiery heart of gold that beat beneath his rugged exterior. With the patience of true love she had penetrated his reserve and found the noble spirit in which there was nothing small, or mean, or selfish. But she found, also, the simple nature that saw only two courses, right and wrong, and the iron determination that would never deviate from a course once decided on as right.

Her birthday came, and though her question was still unanswered, Claire, amongst her flowers and her friends, was apparently the gayest of the gay. In spite of her coldness to suitors, she had many friends amongst her own sex, who loved her perhaps all the better that she did not use her advantages of wealth and beauty to draw all the young men into her train.

She was in the midst of a laughing, chattering group, when her father, Sir Mostyn Gilchrist, approached, and said in a courtly manner that always suggested the elaborate ceremonial of a bygone age:

"Mr. Owen Rhys has done us the honour to consent to play to us, and at his own suggestion he will come into the garden for that purpose. All, therefore, who wish to take advantage of his kind offer will assemble under the large beech tree at five o'clock."

Claire swept him an elaborate courtesy, and replied:

"Good, my lord father—we will attend."

The others laughed at the appropriate reply, and he, calling her "a saucy minx," passed on to make a similar announcement to the other groups.

At five the many-coloured, laughing group under the beech-tree awaited the musician to whom all were prepared to accord admiration and applause, even those who knew nothing of music and cared less, since it was the fashion set by Sir Mostyn Gilchrist.

Claire expected him to sit and play his 'cello as he had so often done before, but what was her surprise when he appeared, limping slowly over the lawn, carrying in his hand a violin. Never had she heard him play that instrument, which must necessarily show to the greatest disadvantage all the defects of his figure.

Silently he took his place before them in the now slanting sunlight, his head bare, and his long, nervous, musician's fingers clutching at his violin. Then, with no other preliminary than a bow, he began to play.

And what music it was!

He first crashed out discords such as made his hearers writhe, and then came a wail of sadness that swelled and grew till it was a passionate cry to Heaven for pity. His dark eyes, looking straight in front of him, encountered Claire's, and she knew that it was to her he was speaking. The discords were his deformity, then came his cry for mercy, but after there followed a soft, tremulous note as of sunshine breaking through storms, melting the clouds, and turning turbid waters to gold with its gleam and promise, and this theme grew till it dominated everything; there was no more darkness or sadness, all was grand, and bright, and beautiful, and she knew that it was love, the beautifier, the illuminator.

Louder and more insistent grew the music till it was Love triumphant, Love, who rendered all things beautiful, even his deformity, and made him in the strength and beauty of his love worthy to mate with wealth and loveliness; but then the brightness and the glory died away, the chords sobbed and moaned under his touch till they suggested the slow recognition of a great grief; then there was a horrible wrench of pain, but at the last, renunciation, resignation, and peace.

As the last notes died away on the quivering air, Claire came to herself, and she felt that Owen's soul had spoken to hers in the music as it never would by words. Surely her question was answered, he loved her, but with a morbid horror of his deformity, he did not think it right to tell her of his love openly, and had therefore put it all into his music, knowing that if she loved him she would understand. She longed to be alone with him that she might say to him, "No need—no need for renunciation. In love all are equal, let the soul and heart be pure, and what matters the shape of the body?"

But then she caught his voice speaking calmly and naturally in reply to her father's congratulations and questions.

"It was only a fantasy I composed for Miss Gilchrist's birthday. I am glad that it has pleased you."

"It is magnificent! Come here, Claire, Mr. Rhys has indeed honoured you; come and thank him."

Claire came forward trembling, but his cool, composed glance fell on her almost like a dash of cold water, all the fire was gone from his eyes, and he received her thanks with the polite pleasure of an everyday acquaintance.

And then her father broke in:

"Yes, yes, I am sure I understand what you mean by it. You should call it 'Life,' the pangs of birth, the tranquil joys of childhood, the passionate loveliness of life in youth, old age approaching the pangs of dissolution, resignation to the will of God. Let me have it published—it will make you famous."

Owen bowed. "You do me too much honour, but, unfortunately, the score got burnt last night."

Sir Mostyn exclaimed in horror:

"But surely you can re-write it?"

"I do not think I could," he replied, and turned to reply to the thanks and compliments that the guests were crowding round to deliver. As soon as he had replied to all their more or less felicitous remarks, he became immersed in a discussion on the music of the masters with Sir Mostyn, and seemed to have already forgotten about his own composition, and Claire.

Claire, her whole spirit in a tumult, could not understand his calmness. That he could pour out his soul in a passion of love and longing and five minutes later there would be no sign of the slightest emotion even in his eyes. Was it all wonderful self-control, or was her father's interpretation the right one, and had she entirely misunderstood the meaning of his music!

If he really loved her, but would not declare his love on account of his poverty and deformity, ought she not to let him know that she loved him, as he had said, "himself, body and soul," and that her only happiness would be with him. But did he love her? Dare she risk it?

L. Hughes.

Digitized by Google

£25 IN CASH PRIZES!

1st Prize, £10. 2nd Prize, £5. 3rd Prize, £2.

And Eight Cash Prizes of £1 each.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find six signatures. Each of these signatures is the ordinary signature of the person to whom it belongs. The writing is not assumed for the occasion; it is just the way in which each of the persons signs his name to letters or to cheques. The first set of signatures appeared last week.

What you have to do is to print in the space opposite each signature the name (initials, Christian name and surname) which you think it to be. Many of the names will be those of well-known people, others will be names of ordinary folk like yourself. No one but the Editor is in possession of the correct names of all the signatures shown. If you are in doubt as to the correct rendering of any signature or signatures ask some of your friends. When you have filled up the coupon to the best of your ability, cut it out and keep it by you, with the other coupons, until you see an announcement in SHORT STORIES telling you to send them in; together with the coupons which will appear in SHORT STORIES.

CONDITIONS.

(1) The name must be clearly printed in ink opposite each signature.
(2) Only one name is allowed in each space.
(3) No alterations are allowed in the words.
(4) When you have filled up your coupon, cut it out and keep it by you, together with the coupons which have appeared and will appear in SHORT STORIES.
(5) Each competitor may send only one set of coupons, but all the members of one household may compete. Each set will be accepted independently.
(6) In all cases the Editor's decision is final, and competitors may only enter on this condition.

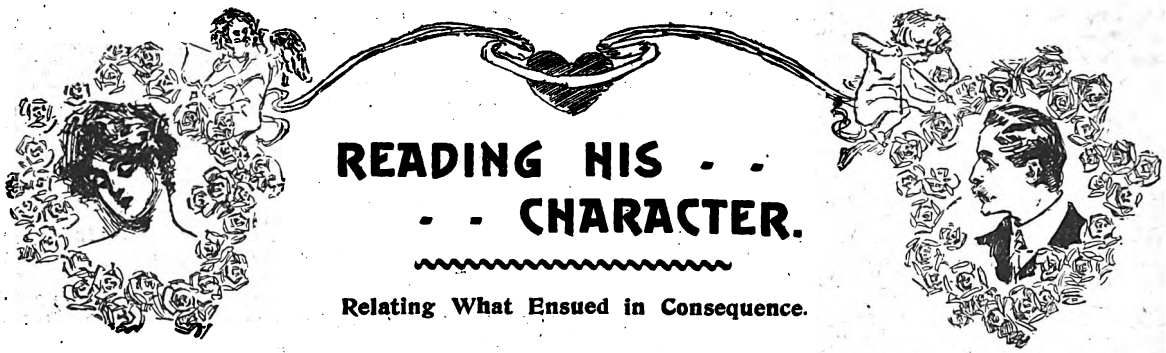
COUPON No. 2.

No. 7.
No. 8.
No. 9.
No. 10.
No. 11.
No. 12.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

Digitized by Google



READING HIS - - - - CHARACTER.

Relating What Ensued in Consequence.

THERE was the usual amount of noise, bustle, dust, and confusion that is always attendant upon the departure of a railway train. Dr. Hartwell's large, portly figure completely blocked up the entrance of the compartment as he stood taking leave of his patient. He had at last accomplished a result for which he had worked hard. No one would suppose, in looking from him to the frail, delicate young girl who, clad in deep mourning, was lounging back among cushions and shawls, that there ever could have been a contest between them. It seemed as if a breath might crush her, she was so very fragile; yet, as she raised her face to his in talking, and one caught a full look at it, the firm, resolute mouth and chin betrayed the undeniable fact that Leslie Graham had a very strong will of her own.

She had been ill with a long, nervous prostration following her father's death, and it had required all the skill of their old, faithful family physician, and the most assiduous care and nursing, to bring her back to life. Now, although it was two years since her father died, and her physical strength had in a great measure returned, she was very sad and morbidly melancholy. In the hope of rallying her, Dr. Hartwell had insisted on her going to the seaside, and had finally prevailed.

Now, when bidding her good-bye at the station, he took out of his pocket a little red morocco note-book, with her initials, L. R. G., stamped upon the outside cover, saying:

"Here is my prescription, and all the medicine I shall give you. I do not want you to read, or sew, or think at all. I want you to lounge about among the rocks, and drink in the sea air, and eat and sleep all you can. This book is for your observations of the people around you Your amusement and your medicine are to consist of studying the characters and the characteristics of your fellow creatures. Write down your first impression of a person, and the ideas you form of that person at sight; then, as your knowledge increases, you can see how far your intuitions were right. Of course, you will make some grand mistakes, but keep on, and your facility in reading character correctly will increase. You must forget yourself entirely, and occupy your mind with all the strange people that I hope to find written out here when you come back."

The guard blew his whistle.

"Good-bye," said the doctor. "Oh, by-the-way, my nephew, of whom you have heard me speak, has returned from Cyprus. He was in town the other day. I wanted to bring him with me, but he couldn't stop. He was in a hurry to join his mother and sister. I am sorry you did not meet him. Perhaps, though, I can interest him sufficiently in your case to induce him later to visit you in my stead."

"Dr. Hartwell, you will do no such thing!" Leslie exclaimed, indignantly. "I will not have a spy sent down to watch me. Your nephew may be the prodigy you think him; but I shall not like him; I have not the slightest desire to see him."

Dr. Hartwell was very much amused. This was quite like the old Leslie, who was always taking strong dislikes to people.

"Well, my dear, you needn't worry about it now. It is likely enough you will meet John some day. I certainly mean you shall, and when you do, you will be surprised to find how well you get on together."

The railway journey was not a very long one, but Leslie grew tired before she reached her destination. The breath of the sea, which occasionally stole in through the windows as they approached the terminus, was very refreshing.

Leslie was perfectly delighted when she found they were to stay at the "Bedford," situated close to the front. When they woke, in the night-time, they could hear nothing but the deep under-tones of the sea, and the splashing of the waves. Really, Dr. Hartwell had been very considerate about her after all.

She was too much fatigued that night to think of her prescription. She was scarcely conscious that there was any one in the large dining-room but her Aunt Harriet, who had accompanied her, and herself; and she drank her tea, and ate a slice of dry toast, oblivious of the many glances bestowed upon them. The slight, graceful figure, and the pale, delicately-moulded face, with large, blue-grey eyes, would have attracted notice anywhere.

There was a party of five seated opposite, a little below them, who seemed to regard Leslie with a great deal of interest Aunt Harriet thought. The group comprised an aged lady, two young ladies, and two gentlemen. One of the young ladies was tall, dark, and very stylish; the other was small, fair, and evidently an invalid, for a crutch rested behind her chair. One of the gentlemen was very brilliant and talkative, the other remained silent, but every time Aunt Harriet looked towards the group, his eyes were either fastened intently upon Leslie, or just turning away. She thought perhaps he knew her; but his face was perfectly inscrutable, and she could not make out whether recognition, admiration, curiosity, or all three, prompted his steady gaze. She told Leslie about them, after tea.

"I think, dear, they are very nice people," she said, after finishing her description of them.

"Well, I hope they are, if we are to sit so near them," Leslie replied. Then, brightening up a little, she continued: "I suppose I can begin my character study with them; they will probably be as interesting, from what you say, as anybody here. I feel very sorry for the young lady who is lame."

Leslie went down to the breakfast-table, the next morning, with her mind ready for its first encounter. She looked over at her neighbours opposite rather timidly, and after a little while, decided to begin with the young man who sat nearest, as his attention was entirely taken up with the lame lady.

He did not notice Leslie in the least, nor show any uneasiness under her close scrutiny. She had nearly finished her observations, and made up her mind in regard to him, when he suddenly turned and looked straight in her face, with an amused, questioning gaze, which said almost as plainly as words:

"Have you finished with me?"

Leslie was mortified and provoked. He had been aware, then, all the time, that she was looking at him, and had purposely kept his attention the other way. This was likely to prove a dangerous amusement, she thought, and one that might lead her into uncomfortable straits. Her face flushed very perceptibly, and in her embarrassment she caught the handle of her coffee-spoon in her sleeve, and overturned her cup. She was thoroughly angry now, but pride came to her rescue. She would not allow this trivial occurrence to discompose her. Surely she had sufficient dignity to sustain her in a moment like this.

Digitized by Google

"What a stupid performance, Aunt Harriet, is it not?" she said.

If it had been the young gentleman who was studying character he would have had a rare opportunity. The metamorphosis was wonderful of that quiet, subdued, sad-faced little girl of the night before. The features seemed to stiffen and grow cold, her eyelids drooped a little, her eyes became quite dark, her lips compressed, and her chin looked as if chiselled out of marble. She seemed "every inch a queen."

Soon after breakfast Leslie went to her room, and entered the following in her note-book—

"July 8th.—Made an attempt this morning, according to the doctor's prescription, to study a gentleman opposite us at table. He has a splendidly-formed head, the forehead jutting over, deep-set eyes—dark-blue, I think—large nose, mouth, and chin, light hair and moustache. He has a way of taking in everything with one glance, and knowing all that is going on in the room; also the power of seeing, apparently, out of the back of his head. His manner is commanding and rather overbearing, though not really ungentle. I should say that he was born with a feeling of superiority. He likes to place people at a disadvantage, and then be magnanimous. He could never stoop to ask a favour, he would ask it as his right instead. He is not quick-tempered. On the contrary, in a quarrel he could be exasperatingly cool, while he would make his opponent's blood boil with rage and fury. Altogether, he is quite disagreeable, and I hope that I shall not have to make his acquaintance. He turned to me with a most provoking look when I finished studying him, as if he knew just what I was doing, when, of course, he could not; to crown all, I upset my coffee. I suppose he thought he had produced quite an impression, to cause so much confusion. He is horribly conceited—not of his looks, but of his power over people. I shall grow to detest him if he stays here long. I wanted to study the nice old lady, and the lame girl, who has a lovely, sweet face; but I shall not dare to molest them while such an ogre mounts guard."

After the disastrous result of her first attempt, Leslie had not the courage to pursue her study any further. She tried not to notice these people at all, but she could not help meeting them on the stairs, in the hall, or out on the pier, and once or twice it seemed as if the lame young lady was about to speak to her.

Leslie found a delightful sheltered little nook, far out on a peninsula of rocks, where she and Aunt Harriet could lounge all the morning. She would spread out her heavy travelling-shawl and lie here for hours, lazily watching the vessels as they passed, till their white sails were lost in the distance.

It was impossible to withstand his pleading looks. One glance into his earnest face disarmed her entirely.

One day, while they were in this favourite haunt, a breeze suddenly wafted into Leslie's lap a dainty light-blue veil. A moment more, and it would have found a watery grave, but Leslie caught it.

She turned to see if the owner were near, and beheld the lame young lady at some little distance higher up on the rocks. The latter nodded, and beckoned with her hand, so there was nothing for Leslie to do, but clamber up the steep ascent and restore the property.

"What a tiresome breeze that was," the young lady began. "I thought I had tied my veil quite securely, when away it went all of a sudden, before I could catch it. Thank you, very much!" Then, in a rather hesitating, timid way, she said, looking up into Leslie's face: "Won't you sit down a little while? I am quite alone. My brother is reading his papers, and I came out with Arthur and Helen; but they saw some friends who were going out for a sail, and wanted to go, so I made them leave me, and told them I did not care if I was alone. But I should like very much to talk to you, if you do not mind."

This was all said so sweetly, that Leslie could not refuse, so she sat down beside her, and Aunt Harriet, seeing them enter into conversation, went up to the hotel, leaving Leslie to her fate.

It does not take two girls very long to become acquainted

Digitized by Google

when one is frank, cordial, and communicative, and the other is a sympathetic, appreciative listener. In little more than half-an-hour, Leslie knew all about Alice Rogers, for that was her name, and almost everything that had ever happened to her. She learnt, too, all about her brother, Dr. Franklin Rogers, the subject of her study, who had been abroad ever so many years, studying medicine, and was very learned. He was Alice's half-brother, as her mother had been a second wife, and he was the son of a former marriage. She also learnt that the dark, stylish young lady was Helen Spencer, one of Alice's intimate friends, and the young man so devoted to her was Arthur Campbell. He was very much in love with Helen; but Alice thought she could not quite make up her mind to have him, although he was wealthy. Helen had had so much attention, and so many offers, that it was hard for her to decide the momentous question.

They were chatting away, when they heard footsteps approaching. Alice turned, and saw her brother close behind them.

"Frank, I want to introduce you to Miss Graham. I have got acquainted with her, and we are already very good friends."

He raised his hat with a courteous bow, and seated himself.

"I am afraid, Alice, you have taken by storm what some persons have to toil years for. I should judge that Miss Graham's friendship is not always easy of acquisition."

And he looked at her inquiringly.

"But you are altogether and entirely wrong, Frank," Alice went on, in her perfectly child-like way. "She was not hard to get acquainted with, and I did not have to do it all, as you said I should."

He laughed at this, but did not seem in the least disconcerted.

"My dear Alice, you should not betray me in this manner. It was very foolish of me to make such a remark, and I beg Miss Graham's pardon most sincerely."

Leslie Graham was a remarkably truthful person. In her heart she knew that his judgment of her was correct. She did not make friends easily, and she was too honest with herself not to acknowledge that he was right. The most provoking part of it was that, notwithstanding his apology, his look into her face seemed forcing her to the confession that he was correct. After a momentary struggle, she said, with a sort of proud defiance:

"You are perfectly right, Dr. Rogers; I do not make acquaintances easily. It is quite wonderful to me, I assure you, the way your sister has succeeded with me in so short a time. I never knew such a thing to happen before."

He received her admission with a satisfied smile, which did not tend to lessen her indignation towards him. They talked a little while longer, and then, gathering up their shawls and wraps, they went back to the hotel. She could not help noticing how carefully he guided his sister over the rough rocks, lifting her in his arms over all the hard places. He was so very careful and tender with her that Leslie was forced to make an amendment in his favour, mentally.

After this, there was no more of quiet solitude for Leslie. She was constantly with some of the Rogers family. She and Alice grew to be very fond of each other. The physical affliction of the one, and the sorrow the other had passed through, drew them closely together, and a secret bond which neither could explain or understand united their hearts.

There was little time for character study outside the Rogers group. She made a few sketches, but did not have opportunities of following them out. Of Helen Spencer and Arthur Campbell she made very correct estimates, changing nothing in her first sketch, as her acquaintance progressed. With Mrs. Rogers, too, and Alice, she thought she did very well, but Doctor Rogers completely puzzled her. One day kind, thoughtful, deferential, and exceedingly entertaining; the next day commanding, tyrannical, quarrelsome, and altogether disagreeable. Sometimes she thought her first judgment had been absurdly harsh and unreasonable, and again she would think it not half severe enough.

He took it upon himself to look out for her, and care for her comfort in manifold little ways, the same as he did for Alice. It was very aggravating to Leslie, just after he had provoked her almost beyond endurance by some of his ironical speeches, to see him perform some unusually kind and thoughtful act for her. As such times she would either receive his attentions haughtily, or reject them entirely. Finally he said, one day, after such an occurrence:

"You do not like to have things done for you—to be waited upon—do you, Miss Graham?"

"No. I prefer always to wait upon myself." Then, thinking this might sound a little rude, she added: "I am quite an independent individual, and have always been used to looking out for myself."

"Yes, I have discovered that. Well, I do not like to be thanked for every trifling service I render, so let us make an agreement. You shall allow me to wait upon you, and care for your health and comfort, as I think the occasion demands, and you shall receive it all as a matter of course, and I will not look for any thanks or expressions of gratitude till the end of the season, when you can render them wholesale."

Leslie glanced up at him quickly. She suspected that he knew it was irksome to her to be under obligations to him, and hence the agreement he had proposed. But he was looking out on the water, and she could tell nothing of the tenor of his thoughts.

Once he was telling her of an adventure he had had in Cyprus, when the thought suddenly occurred to her that perhaps he had met Dr. Hartwell's wonderful nephew, so she asked:

"Did you ever meet a Dr. John Hartwell abroad? He is my doctor's nephew, and I have heard a great deal about him. That is—I presume his name is Hartwell—I don't know why I should, either, for now I think of it, I have never heard him called anything but 'my nephew, John.'"

"Dr. John Hartwell? Let me see," and he kept his head bent down over the stick he was prodding the sand with, his hat shielding the amused look in his eyes. "No. I do not remember meeting anyone of that name. Is he clever?"

"His uncle thinks he is; but I have no doubt his talent is over-estimated. Liking will go a great way towards prejudicing one's mind," Leslie said.

"Yes, that is very true, and so will dislike," and he looked at her significantly as he spoke.

What could he mean? She bit her lip with vexation, and turned away. He was accustomed now to all her changes of moods. He delighted in bringing the angry flush to her cheek, and the darker light to her eyes. He liked to watch the small lips grow stern, and the slight figure draw itself up into cold stateliness. He knew just what turns in the conversation would do all this, and he was proud of his knowledge.

The summer wore away to its close, and Leslie Graham was very much improved. She was really sorry that her stay was nearly at an end, and that she must part with these friends whom she had learnt to like so well.

Yes, she liked them all, not even excepting Dr. Rogers. Her sketch of him had undergone many changes. She had crossed out, rewritten, added to, and taken from, all the characteristics she had at first given him. But now, at the last, she decided that she had been very unjust to him, and that she had treated him with undeserved rudeness many, many times. She knew now that he had been very kind to her, and that he had done a great deal for her comfort and enjoyment. She was too intrinsically noble to let him go away without telling him as much. They might never see each other again, and he would always have the remembrance of her temper and unladylike behaviour.

On the last afternoon Dr. Rogers crossed the hall, looking quite disconsolate, just as Leslie was coming downstairs. He brightened up when he saw her.

"Oh, Miss Graham, you are the very one I want to see. Do come out rowing with me. Alice is taking a nap, and Helen is off somewhere with Arthur. I know you don't like sailing, so we will have a boat, and I will row. This is the last afternoon we shall have, you know," and he waited with an eager, intreating look, for her answer.

Digitized by Google

Yes, she would go. It would be such a good opportunity for her to say what she desired, and apologise for her rude behaviour. They might not be alone again.

When Dr. Rogers had rowed some distance out, Leslie, who had been rather silent all the way, began, with her head half-turned away from him:

"Dr. Rogers, I have something that I must say to you, before you go away; I owe it to you, and to myself also. I want to thank you now for the many kindnesses you have done for me, and for all your care and attention, which, at the time, I received so ungraciously. I was really grateful then, only my pride kept me from acknowledging it, and if you will add your pardon for my rudeness to you, I cannot be too grateful."

She was going on, but he stopped her.

"I am well aware why you did not like me to care for you. I knew it was hard for you to accept favours from me, so I arranged our little agreement. It is all right, and please don't say any more. I have never thought you rude, Miss Graham."

So, then, he would not permit her to apologise.

She was not satisfied with this. She had meant to humble her pride, and if he would not let her do it this way, there yet remained others. She had not understood the full meaning of his remark. Perhaps he did not intend that she should.

"You do not understand me, Dr. Rogers. It was not because I did not like to receive favours, but because I did not like you. I took a great dislike to you, that first morning, at breakfast, when I spilt my coffee—do you remember?"

She was approaching dangerous ground. Since their acquaintance, she had forgotten her feelings on that memorable morning, and her idea that he had suspected she was studying him.

"I do understand you. I knew perfectly well that you hated me, that morning, but I would not stop on that account."

Leslie began to be frightened. Did he know everything under the sun? Did he know of her note-book, safely locked in her drawer at the hotel, and what was inside it? He was the hardest person to accept an apology that she ever knew. She leant over the side of the boat, and dipped one hand in the water; then laid it upon her hot face. She was uncertain what to do now. At last, with a desperate effort, she took a rash step.

"You are right. I hated you thoroughly, that morning. Dr. Hartwell wanted me to study people's faces and characters, and gave me a little book to write down my observations in. I began with you, with what success, you know. My first impressions, after you startled me so, were not very flattering, as you may suppose; but I have since changed my mind," and she gave a nervous little laugh.

Dr. Rogers turned to her a radiant, triumphant face. He had been waiting for this. In a low, trembling voice, he said:

"I knew all that, too, Miss Graham."

Leslie was very angry now. She had meant to ask forgiveness for having wronged him; now she was sure her first judgment was correct. With flashing eyes she said:

"Dr. Rogers, you will turn this boat round and row back, and, when we land, you will please understand that we are to meet as strangers, henceforth, for ever." Her voice was quite tragic, and freezingly cold.

In an instant the reaction came, and she covered her face with her hands, crying bitterly. She felt as if she should like to drop over the side of the boat, and find a hiding-place in the dark waters. She could not think what it all meant, he was so disappointed, so baffled, and perplexed.

Dr. Rogers had become quite pale at her last words; but he laid down the oars, and came and knelt beside her. He took one of her hands away from her face and kissed it many times. She dropped her head on the railing in the stern, hiding her face from him, but did not take her hand away.

"You did not mean those dreadful words you said?" And the love in his voice could be disguised no longer. "How can we meet as strangers, when you are more to me than all the rest of the world? My darling, I know it was dreadful to deceive you so, but look up, and let me tell you all. Please!"

She lifted her head and looked drearily at him through her tears, as if he were a long distance off. It seemed as if nothing whatever that he could say would ever affect her again. She was unconscious that he still held her hand.

"I was sure that you would find me out long before this. I am Dr. Hartwell's detested nephew, but my name is not Hartwell, as you innocently supposed, one day. It amused me so, that I was on the point of letting out my secret. Dr. Hartwell is my own mother's brother, and the only one of the family who calls me John. I met him in town on my way here, and he told me about you, and of his plan respecting the character study. He did not know where to send you, and I suggested this place, and agreed to look out for you a little. He told me you were not over-anxious to meet me, and so together we formed this scheme; but I did not dream but that you would see through it, as soon as we became acquainted. When I first saw you, I repented heartily of the part I had agreed to play. Still, the temptation was very great to make you take some notice of me, aside from my character of Dr. Hartwell's nephew. It was cruel, and I cannot hope for your forgiveness; it is too much to ask; but if you will let my life, my love, my whole heart and soul make atonement, I shall be perfectly happy."

It was impossible to withstand his pleading look. One glance into his earnest, glowing face disarmed her utterly. After all, the one most to blame had been Dr. Hartwell, who wanted her to like his pet nephew, and knew she never would, unless her prejudice were overcome.

Her face softened. Perhaps the best way to gain ascendency over this man, who was kneeling at her feet, would be to accept his love, and be his queen for ever. In her weakness and doubt, this seemed the easiest way out of her difficulty. She was afraid, too, that she was beginning to love him a little; that is, before all this happened—now she did not quite know——

He was very quick to perceive her relenting.

"My own, my own," he cried, in his joy, "you are not going to send me away—you will keep me here for ever, close beside you, and take my whole life and love into your dear hands. You are mine now for ever and ever, and nothing can part us," and he folded her in his arms.

Long before Dr. Rogers had rowed the boat back to the shore, all Leslie's hauteur was gone, and perfect peace reigned between her and her lover. If you had seen the tenderness with which he assisted her to land, and the shy consciousness with which she accepted his aid, you would never have supposed that she started out with the intention of breaking off with him for ever.

Dr. Hartwell was perfectly satisfied with the result of his prescription. He often teases Leslie Rogers about it. But her husband never seconds him, for it came near proving a fatal prescription—to him, at least. Among his choicest treasures, he carefully and tenderly guards his wife's wedding gift, the little red morocco book, which contains the portrait of himself, drawn by her hand.

Ernest Kessler.

Pearson's Fortune Teller.

By Professor P. R. S. Foli.

Crown 8vo, cloth, price 1s. post free 1s. 2d.

ORDER FORM, S.S.

To the Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Pearson's Fortune Teller" for which I inclose the sum of one shilling and twopence.

Name.....

Adress .....

Digitized by Google

Condemning it.

"AFTER all, love and war are the only proper themes for a poet." "Why do you say love and war? Why don't you just say marriage?"

It Was a Match.

HE had lent her his fountain pen to direct an envelope. She: "Why, doesn't it write beautifully? I declare I'm in love with this pen." He: "I'm in love with the holder!" She saw the "point."

Silence is Golden.

WITHERBY: "I made the mistake of my life this morning. I told my wife I didn't like her new gown." Plankington: "Was she angry?" Witherby: "Oh, no, it wasn't that; but she wants another."

Cause for Annoyance.

YOUNG MR. GRASPER (fondly): "You know, darling, that if I were to die all I have would be yours." Young Mrs. G. (poutingly): "What's the good of saying that? You know you're not likely to die yet!"

There were Defalcations.

CASHIER: "I wish to marry your daughter, sir. May I have her?" Proprietor (who has just been examining the books): "Well, I suppose I'd better give my consent. I want to keep the money in the family."

It Was!

"WILLIAM," she said gently, and yet in accents of reproof, "you remember that I gave you several letters to post last week, don't you?" "Y-yes, I remember it." "But this is the first time you have remembered it since I gave them to you, isn't it?"

Her Reason was a Good One.

"YES, George asked me how old I would be on my next birthday." "The impudent fellow! Of course, you said nineteen?" "No; I said twenty-six." "Mercy, girl, you're only twenty-four." "I know, but George is going to give me a cluster ring with a diamond in it for every year."

Why He was Happy.

"HALLO, Charley! What's up? Never saw you looking so jolly and happy!" "My girl has just got married." "Got married? Why, man, is that anything to be gay and festive over? You ought to be in the last stage of melancholy." "That's all right. You see. I'm the fellow she's married."

He was Indeed Sympathetic.

"It's a solemn thing, young man," said the broken-hearted father, "to come into the house of an old man and take away his only daughter, the light of his household and the prop and solace of his declining years. But you have my blessing, and I wish you every joy, and——" "But I won't take her away, sir," interrupted the young man, inexpressibly affected. "We'll both stay here."

A Delightful Compliment.

"Do you ever gamble?" she asked, as they sat together, her hand held in his. He replied: "No; but if I wanted to, now would be my time." "How so?" "Because I hold a beautiful hand." The engagement is announced.

No Cause for Alarm.

SHE: "Mrs. Moffat's such an odd woman! She's fond of meeting clever people, you know, and she never opens her lips, but listens to every word they say, and puts it all down in a diary after!" The Chump: "Haw—by Jove! I shall take precious good care what I say before her!"

Then He Understood.

YOUNG HUSBAND: "Isn't there something peculiar about the taste of these onions, my dear?" Very Young Wife (anxiously): "Oh, I hope not, dear! I took such pains with them. I even sprinkled them with lavender water before I put them to boil, to take away that unpleasant odour."

Time's Work.

YOUNGLOVE: "I suppose I'm foolish, but I can't sleep at nights. I'm so afraid that something unexpected may happen to prevent my approaching marriage." Oldtimer: "Well, after awhile you'll lie awake at nights regretting that it didn't happen."

The Way of Women.

ETHEL: "Why, Maudie, you've been crying!" Maud: "Yes, it's all the fault of Tom." Ethel: "Oh! what has he been doing?" Maud: "Well, we had a little bit of a tiff last night, and I told him he was simply an unendurable brute, and now he hasn't had the decency to send me a letter of apology."

Circumstances Alter Cases.

"WHAT do you want?" asked the servant who answered the ring at the door. "I want to see Mr. Edward Annan." "What for?" "It is in relation to a promissory note." "Mr. Annan went out of town yesterday." "That's too bad. I wanted to pay him the amount I owe him." "But," quickly added the servant, "he returned this morning."

His Last Resource.

HE had put the fateful question to her on the grand stand at the races, and she answered "No." "Is there no chance of you ever loving me?" he pleaded. "The odds are a thousand to one against it," was the pitiless reply. He sighed, then braced himself up. "It's a long shot," he said, at last; "but with nothing else in the field I'll take it."

What the Trouble Was.

FIRST YOUNG MAN: "Why don't you get married?" Second Young Man: "I have made several attempts, but none of them have been successful." "What's the trouble?" "Well, you see, as soon as a girl pleases me well enough to marry her, it is just my luck to meet some other girl who pleases me better. It has been going on that way with me for the last twenty years."

A Great Man.

"DOES your wife ever pay you any compliments?" asked Frederick Jimson of his friend Benderly. "Never," replied Benderly. "Well, mine does. She flatters me." "Often?" "Oh, yes, frequently; particularly in winter," replied Frederick. "Why does she flatter you more in winter?" "Whenever the coal fire needs replenishing she points to the fire-place, and says: 'Frederick, the grate.'"

The Warning Had Its Effect.

"THERE is something about your daughter," Mr. Wanshop began reflectively; "there is something about your daughter——" "Yes," said old Mr. Thistlepod, "there is; I have noticed it myself. It comes every night about eight o'clock, and it doesn't get away usually till about eleven o'clock. And some of these evenings I am going to lift it all the way from the front door to the side gate, and see what there is in it."

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID SERIAL.

Dupes of Destiny

LAST WILL AND TESTAMENT

By Blanche Eardley, Writer of "The Bond Between."

FORTY-SEVENTH CHAPTER.
The Face Behind the Veil.

Lottie's eyes filled slowly with tears. "Yes, yes," she said gently. "You will be able to show Dolly the flowers; only you must be very quiet, for if anyone hears you, you might be prevented from coming with me."

A look of cunning sharpness crept into the big, bright eyes of the mad woman. "Oh, yes, I will be very good!" she answered quickly. "See, I will put something in my bed to make Deacon think I am still there, when he pays his last visit." She hastily rolled some white, filmy garments round the bolster of the bed, and placing it between the sheets, covered it up, then, to the amazement of the waiting girl, she took a pair of scissors and cut off the long mane of dark hair which she so arranged on the pillows as to make it appear that a live woman was sleeping upon them.

Then a few moments later two figures, one clasping a doll in her attenuated arms, crept up the stairs. The key was placed under the mat again, and then they proceeded on their perilous way until a door in another wing was softly opened and bolted immediately afterwards.

* * * * *

Towards midnight Sir Cyprian sent for the nurse and gave her a few curt orders. "You will follow immediately afterwards, you hear. We start at dawn. I shall require you to dress her and send her down here—by herself—you understand? I want no prying glances, and I shall expect you there by the next train. I have my reasons for not wishing you to accompany us. But, as you know, I possess a little secret of yours, Miss Haste, that is better where it is than spread abroad." He smiled coldly. "You may go now; only, remember, at dawn to-morrow morning she must be ready."

"I understand," Lottie answered slowly. "I shall not fail you, Sir Cyprian; all shall be as you desire."

When she had left the room the baronet drew aside the blind and looked out of the window. It was a clear night, and the blue sky was studded with stars. As he stood looking out, a shadow that seemed to rise from the ground approached the window and stared into the room. For a moment the eyes of the two men met in a long, keen glance, then the man outside vanished; and Sir Cyprian fell back with a hoarse cry. The face that had looked in on him was the face of the man who had betrayed his knowledge with the sign of the mysterious spade that night long ago, when he had dined at his sister-in-law's with Marcella, and had met for the first time the financier, Caleb J. Johnson.

"Flash Dick!" he muttered, with trembling lips. "Why has he come back? I thought he had forgotten that incident when he darted from behind the palms. Is this to be a case of the best man wins, I wonder?" Then, feeling in his pocket, he drew out a large silver revolver, and looked at it thoughtfully. "Yes, the best man wins, and the presence of my friend Flash Dick here points to the wisdom of leaving the Court soon."

* * * * *

At daybreak a silent trio left the Court, two men and a woman, heavily cloaked and veiled, whose slender arm was held by the taller of the men, a darkly-visaged person with an abundance of black, greasy-looking hair showing under his broad-brimmed hat, but the rest of his face was clean-shaven, and of an olive hue. A dog-cart took them to the station at a large junction, where less comment would be created by their unusual appearance. The woman was put into a first-class apartment, which was reserved, the two men going into an adjoining smoking apartment, where they conversed in low tones. But the woman remained quite quiet, neither moving nor raising her head from where she had laid it, except once when she touched with thoughtful fingers the low white brow that was covered by a mass of dusky hair. When the journey was over there was another long, silent drive across country until finally the huge gates of a grimly forbidding house, standing behind a dense growth of trees, was reached.

The man with the white face and black hair hastily pulled the slender, timid figure from the trap, and urged her before him as he would have a frightened animal. They took her into a room that was destitute alike of comfort or furniture.

Digitized by Google

Then the elder man turned with a snarling laugh to the one that followed on his heels.

"There, she is safe now, the precious creature! She has caused me more trouble than anything else. Go and prepare her, Day, my boy, for the wedding ceremony!" Then, with a laugh of ironic triumph at the silent figure standing like a statue, he left the room.

Edward Day glanced keenly at the girl whom he had vowed to humble in the dust one day, and whose pride he meant to bring low. Her scorn and loathing of him were so many baits to his vengeance upon her and the other woman who had cast him off like a dismissed servant.

"Marcella!" he said softly. "You are mine now; you remember my vow to win you! I have kept it. Look at me, my proud, beautiful Marcella—we are to be married to-day! We shall leave here man and wife!" He laughed exultantly, and his blue eyes shone with excitement. He had won; yes, in the face of all obstacles he had attained his heart's desire. He had humbled the financier, silenced his blackmailer, shamed his benefactress, and shaken off the millstone that had hung round his neck; and, lastly, had won the woman he wanted.

He went nearer to her. Her silence irritated him. He would have preferred tears, scorn, anything, but this baffling silence. "Come, kiss me, my bride!" he whispered, drawing her to him.

Then with one quick gesture she flung back her thick veil and stood face to face with him.

"You!" he gasped, falling back a step, his evil, sneering face growing livid with fear and horror, as his eyes, instead of seeing those of the dark, imperious woman he had plotted to win, met instead the mocking blue ones of the woman whom he had thought dead, and for whom, oh, bitterness! he had been afterwards tempted to forgery!

He had been duped by the clever rogue who had twisted him round his finger to the tune of several thousands, and who also had made his life hideous with threats.

Now the woman herself, the incubus whom he had hoped, yet feared, was lying at the bottom of the river that told no tales, had in her turn outwitted him in his moment of supreme triumph!

From the waters that had sucked her down in their close embrace she had risen to confront him—not only as the woman whose death he had sought to bring about, but as a would-be bigamist.

"You!" he said again, moistening his trembling lips. "What fate dragged you from the place where I last saw you?"

"You mean surely the grave where you flung me like the coward that you are!" she said, in a low, intense voice; "your wish would have been accomplished had not another man, with as black a soul as your own in some respects, had sufficient humanity in him to pull me out. So you see I have conquered this time, my dear husband. I have watched your plans and stepped in between them."

The white, cruel face of Edward Day took unto it a sinister look of hatred and spite, as he said slowly:

"So another scoundrel pulled you out, eh? I think I have had the honour of meeting that gentleman, and the occasion of our last interview was not a very pleasant one for him." Then he added with a snarl: "Are you aware that you have done a very foolish thing in flinging yourself across my path again? You forget that I am still capable of wiping you out of my way!"

Lottie Haste laughed bitterly. "Yes, I know that I am here, and that you are capable of any villainy even in my father's house! Ah!" as he started, "you did not know that Water Grange was my home? You thought of marrying Marcella Rust with the 'Vicar' as officiating clergyman; but, thank God, I have prevented you from committing that crime. She is where neither you nor her worthy father can harm her."

"Where's that?" he said sharply. "I shall find her wherever you have hidden her—you need not imagine that I shall allow anything to stand in the way. If you wish to get away from here alive, you will reveal the whereabouts of my cousin, Marcella Rust, otherwise"—he shrugged his shoulders—"you will be sorry that the other man saved you from the river."

"Your cousin!" she repeated, looking at him with fearless eyes. "Why do you lie like that now? You know perfectly well that Marcella Rust is no relation of yours. You were adopted and then cast off by Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox. You see I know all your history from the time that you were a foundling on board a ship."

He flushed dully, and the light of hate gleamed in his eyes. He saw that the cold, contemptuous woman was not the tender, yielding girl he had so easily removed from his path before.

"What do I care what you know?" he snarled between his teeth. "It's nothing to me whether all the world knows that I was born in a third-class bunk on an Australian liner. I shall shortly prove my right to a better title, which I shall take jolly good care will not be shared by you."

He had raised his voice unconsciously, and the last sentence rang out sharply and reached the ears of a man who was strolling to and fro in the hall outside: "It's nothing to me whether all the world knows that I was born in a third-class bunk on an Australian liner. I shall shortly prove my right to a better title."

Sir Cyprian Rust caught his breath quickly. Those words conjured up in his mind the words of a dying woman, whose end he had hastened, and had forgotten as unworthy of note. She had said that the stewardess had told her of two children born to the runaway wife of the adventurer Jerningham, and he had imagined it to be the fancy of a disordered mind.

Then he had found out the truth about Philip Nullius, and no thought about that other claim had occurred to him. He had been too concerned as to putting the curate out of the way to even attach any importance to the suggestion that there might be another rival to the riches he held.

But now, as Edward Day's clear, scornful voice fell upon his ears, it all came back in a rush of memory. He recollected how he had paid no attention to the rumours he had heard from time to time that the handsome young secretary was of humble origin, and it was with a curious tightening of his mouth that he suddenly realised that the man he wished to tie Marcella to in a loveless marriage was joint heir with that other, and that after all he had been outwitted by Fate.

Instead of bringing the pride of the sister-in-law, whom he hated, down in the dust by marrying Marcella to a "nobody," he was precipitating her into the arms of one of his unconscious enemies. He was helping to raise her to a position above his own head, instead of levelling her into the gutter.

Since the day when she had made her will in his favour, his hatred had increased by slow degrees, and all the frustrated attempts to gain by that will had intensified that bitterness of hate. He hesitated outside the door, as all these thoughts flooded his brain, then he decided upon a bold move.

He pushed open the

Digitized by Google

door and walked in. Lottie had quickly turned her back on his entrance, but Edward Day faced him with a sarcastic grin.

FORTY-EIGHTH CHAPTER.
Laying the Trap.

Sir Cyprian gazed from one to the other. "I thought I heard you speaking rather loudly—er—Day," he said slowly. "Has Marcella refused to listen to you, or does she, like a sensible girl, agree to forget the curate, Philip Nullius?"

Edward laughed vindictively. Although he was cheated himself he did not object to seeing the suave baronet also made a fool of by Marcella and the woman he had hoped dead.

"I'm afraid, sir," he said harshly, "that we counted our chickens before they were hatched. Turn, 'Marcella'!" he laughed again, "and show your sweet self to your adoring parent. He will be almost as overjoyed as I was to see your face."

With a sudden movement Lottie wheeled round, and as Sir Cyprian saw the face of the woman whom he had imagined was an obedient tool, he reeled against the wall with a muttered imprecation.

"So," he said thickly, "you have betrayed me after all, have you, you spying little kitchen cat. I suspected you at first, then thought your previous experience would have taught you a lesson. Where is she? Do you hear?" he snarled savagely; "you had better not try to lie to me, or you will regret it."

Lottie flung back her head, and her blue eyes flashed triumphantly into those of the two desperate men whom her sharp wit had baffled.

All thought of her own danger in being there, in that lonely house, at the mercy of such unscrupulous blackguards, never, for one second, occurred to her.

She was glad that she had fought them, and won in the contest of wits, and to the consequences that would result from her action she was both indifferent and callous. It was enough that she was mistress of the situation—that, for the nonce, she held the ribbons in her own strong, young hands.

"Where is she?" and her voice was low and yet firm.

"To which particular 'she' do you refer, Sir Cyprian?"

The baronet started, and looked at her searchingly.

"I refer to my daughter, Marcella Rust," he said deliberately. "You have hidden her, I suppose—but admirable as your plans may have been, I fancy, dear Miss Haste, they are bound to create merely a postponement of my first intention. Now you understand what you are requested to tell me at once, or my little threat concerning a little attempt at suicide on your part will be the means of an unpleasant inquiry."

A short, scornful laugh broke from the girl's lips, and she flashed a mocking glance at the sullen, white face of Edward Day, who stood aside, biting the ends of his moustache with ill-concealed irritability.

"And I conclude, my dear Sir Cyprian, that you will go into the witness-box on my account? Surely that would be rather unwise just now! I will tell you with pleasure where Marcella is," she added, as the baronet winced suddenly under her words.

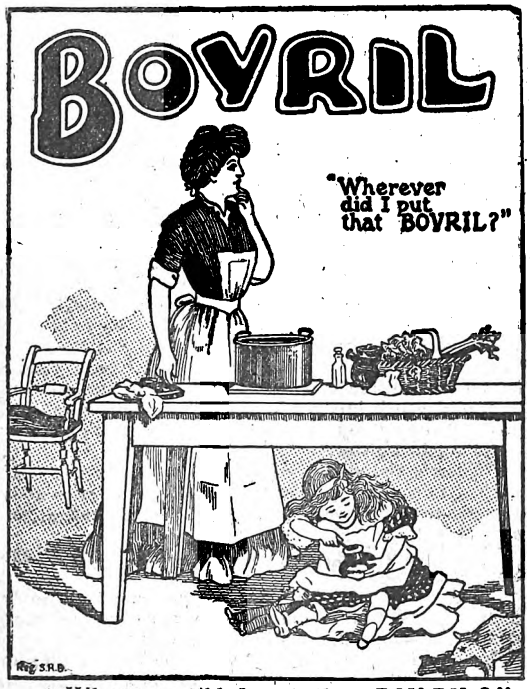
"By this time I hope she is safe where your cruelty cannot touch her, nor that"—pointing to the other man—"unspeakable cad can dare attempt to add bigamy to the list of his crimes. You are a charming couple, but at any rate you have lost what you have plotted to win, and I thank God that I have been instrumental in stopping your villainy."

Sir Cyprian's lips parted in a hideous grin, and his eyes glittered angrily.

"I presume you allude to Mr. Day," he said, in a quiet tone. "May I inquire why he should be so honoured by your attentions?"

"Because he is my husband!" was the steady reply. "Because he is a would-be murderer!"

Sir Cyprian drew in his breath with a sibilant sound. He



"Wherever did I put that BOVRIL?"

A spoonful of

BOVRIL

doubles the quantity of gravy, and makes it much more delicious.

"Tell the Cook."

Digitized by Google

had not expected that Edward Day would have made such a fool of himself as to marry. He had credited him with more brain and perhaps more villainy. This girl, then, held him in her power—in fact both of them, so far, but he knew the art of wriggling out of tight corners, and the excitement lent a zest to his blood.

It reminded him of the days of his youth when, before stepping into his uncle's shoes, he had been living by his wits—a free lance of the law—and he had always come out on top; and it would amuse him to let this slip of a white-faced, defiant girl hurl her puny strength against his. He would know how to crush her, when she bored him!

He laughed softly, and said:

"Ah, indeed! I think you will have a little difficulty in establishing your claim, and, also, you may find it awkward to get away from here."

Lottie looked at him, the ghost of a smile on her lips, and lurking in the depths of her tired, blue eyes.

"You cannot frighten me, and I have insured myself from harm in a way you don't know of. Both yourself and my most affectionate husband will be disagreeably surprised should you attempt to silence me after the methods dear to ur hyoearts. Marcella is safe with her aunt by this time—so you may give up that game and look after yourselves. You will need it—soon!"

Edward sprang forward, an evil look in his eyes.

"You little cat!" he snarled, grasping the girl's arm tightly. "So you have sent her there, have you? You have dared to play into the enemy's hands, and to twit us with it!" He raised his clenched hand and struck her savagely across the mouth, raising a deep scarlet weal that stood out like a flame against the background of the white face.

She reeled with a little cry, and fell heavily to the ground. As the enraged man was about to repeat his blow, his arm was caught by the Baronet.

"Come, Edward," he said quietly, "it is hardly worth while you continuing that sort of thing. It is apt to become awkward, you know."

The girl on the ground raised herself on her elbow, and glanced up at them, a smile of agony distorting the expression of her mouth. "Yes, it will be very awkward, Sir Cyprian," she said slowly. "Marcella did not leave the Court alone; she went with——"

A curious change crept over the Baronet's face. It aged suddenly. "With whom?" he said hoarsely.

Moving her lips with difficulty, she answered:

"With the woman whom you kept in the hidden wing!"

"Ah!" the word was breathed deeply between the Baronet's firmly-closed teeth, as though he had been stung, and when he turned towards Edward Day his face was grey, and a steely light flickered in his eyes.

"I will leave you to have a chat with your wife, my dear Edward," he said softly, "only don't be long. I have some important news for you. And remember—no violence."

He left the room, and closed the door softly behind him, with a gentle smile.

An hour later he was talking in a low, cautious tone to the younger man, who listened to him with exultation and suppressed excitement.

"I know," Sir Cyprian was saying, "that that curate is scoring off you in more ways than one. He has Marcella, and, unless you fight him with strategy, he will gain your inheritance as well. Your birthright will go—he will have everything!"

"What do you mean?" Edward said sharply. "How do you know about that? I thought I alone was aware of my mysterious birth!"

The Baronet smiled. "Philip Nullius also is of ambiguous birth. Supposing I knew that he was the eldest born, and all the gain was to him, with but a mere pittance to you as the younger son? You would win no position that you desired, even though you gain money in other ways. Philip Nullius, who knows nothing of this fortune waiting for him—once out of the way of ever learning of it—would clear the way for you."

"What do you mean?" Edward said hoarsely. "He is with the Frayne-Lennox set now. It is too late to see him; Marcella is there also, according to that wretched spoil-sport in the other room. I'm afraid we are too late for anything."

"No. I have received information that Philip Nullius returns to his curacy this week," replied Sir Cyprian slowly. "A wire telling him that Marcella wants him will place him at our mercy—we will arrange where afterwards. That will do as a bait—and then——" he paused.

Their eyes met in one significant glance.

"And then!" Edward Day muttered with a grim smile.

FORTY-NINTH CHAPTER.

The Two Women.

Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox, as she still was called, in spite of that marriage ceremony with the financier, Mr. Caleb J. Johnson, paced the floor of her drawing-room with quick, impatient steps.

She had been for several days too unwell to leave the house, but had been in daily correspondence with the man whose wife she had become in name only. He had been very thoughtful and considerate for her, and in spite of his great wrong in marrying her through a fraud, she could not rid herself of a feeling of dependence upon his strength.

It was some days after the sudden disappearance of Philip Nullius, and she had not seen Mr. Johnson since that date either. But she had that morning dispatched a message to the financier, asking him to call round, and now it wanted but a few moments to his arrival.

She was distraught at the idea of what might have taken place at the Court, the place where Marcella lay ill, and which she dared not enter for fear of bringing down upon her head an avalanche of shame and fear.

As she aimlessly wandered from one end of the large, handsomely furnished room to the other, she paused abruptly. The bell had rung, and her unerring instinct told her that it was Caleb J. Johnson—the man whose name had been bestowed upon her while her first husband was still alive, and yet, in spite of her horror and amazement, she could not feel other than dependent upon him.

The door opened and the financier entered.

"Well, Caleb!" she said feverishly. "What news?—tell me quickly."

He looked at her without speaking, and it struck her, even in the midst of her personal fear and anxiety, that he seemed strangely unlike himself, and there was in his face the look of one who had staggered beneath a crushing blow.

"What—what is it?" she murmured, putting out one trembling white hand and touching his arm. "Caleb, what has happened? Tell me."

A grim smile twisted the lips of the man before her.

"Only the inevitable, Violet—the inevitable reckoning that Fate withholds for perhaps years, or only days, but which in the end is just as crushing and distasteful to meet. Defeat, Violet, has met me at last! I have turned all the corners in my life with almost unnatural success, and now, at the eleventh hour, I have been floored—humbled in the dust—and by a boy not more than half my age!"

He laughed bitterly.

"There's the sting—an ignorant boy has pitted his skill against mine, and by the free use of an unscrupulous brain and cunning, has won over my head, and beaten me at my own game!"

"You mean that you have lost money, Caleb?" she questioned gently.

"Lost money!" He laughed again. "Not only is it money I have lost, Violet, but my name in the City! The fortune I built up so proudly has gone, and with it my power; to-morrow I shall be known as a failure, and a man who could not meet his liabilities. Then will follow the bankruptcy of the Gold King."

(Continued on page 381.)

Digitized by Google

The most effective, convenient and the cheapest article for scouring, cleaning and polishing purposes.

SPARKLA

MAKES TIN LIKE SILVER, COPPER LIKE GOLD.

Cleans and Brightens Copper, Tin, Pewter, Brass, and all metal ware. For washing dishes, kitchen utensils, and for all general household cleanings. Removes rust, stains, tarnish. Cleans gas and cooking stoves, machinery, bicycles, dairy utensils. For the house, shop or factory.

Sold by all Grocers, Ironmongers, Oilmen, Stores, &c.

ONE PENNY PER TABLET.

GIGANTIC PRIZE SCHEME

120,419 PRIZES VALUE £25,969.

Cash Prizes up to £100 each. Great numbers of Watches, Cycles, Sewing Machines, Timepieces, Dress Lengths, and thousands of other costly and useful articles.

Collect the Wrappers of SPARKLA and send them to the address below. Wrappers of WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER and WATSON'S NUBOLIC SOAP may also be used by competitors.

Full particulars with each tablet of any of the three articles.

Every Competitor in our last Prize Scheme received a Prize.

JOSEPH WATSON & SONS LTD., Whitehall Soap Works, LEEDS.

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

THE DAILY EXPRESS 1D. 1/2

GIVEN AWAY

with this week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 531)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

BOY'S SUIT.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

If you wish to SLEEP WELL

—TAKE—

BEECHAM'S PILLS

You will SLEEP WELL,

because BEECHAM'S PILLS gently calm irritation of the Nervous system, while by their stimulative and cleansing action upon the Liver and Kidneys, Digestion proceeds with normal regularity, so that at night the tranquillised mind and body are prepared for "Nature's sweet restorer"— peaceful slumber. Should one feel restless after an exciting or convivial evening a dose of BEECHAM'S PILLS will quickly induce refreshing sleep.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills), and 2/9 (168 Pills).

Digitized by Google

ALL FAT PEOPLE

Can be CURED by taking

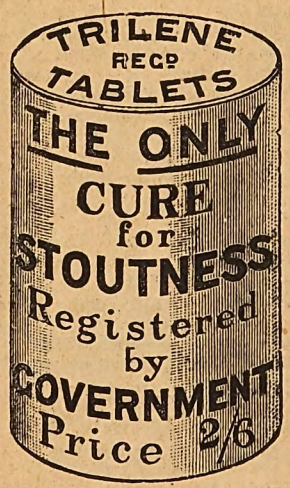
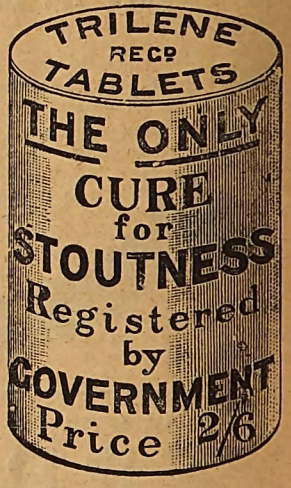
TRILENE TABLETS Regd.



For a few weeks. They will safely REDUCE WEIGHT and CURE CORPULENCY PERMANENTLY, whether Abdominal or General. They are small, agreeable, harmless, sent privately, and never fail to Improve both HEALTH and FIGURE without change of Diet.

An English Countess writes: "Your Trilene Tablets act admirably."

Send 2s. 6d. to Mr. T. Wells, THE TRILENE CO., 66 Finsbury Pavement, London, E.C.



SAMPLES OF TESTIMONIALS.

"87 Alexandra Road, Norwich, October 19th, 1896.
Gentlemen,—In reference to Trilene Tablets, I may say that my wife found the greatest possible benefit from the use of them; their action was rapid, and exceeded our utmost expectations, as they were also most beneficial to the respiratory organs. My wife was many years growing so stout, but although the disease was, I consider chronic, the Tablets soon reduced the same completely.
"Yours faithfully, J. R. CANHAM."

COUNTESS SECKENDORFF, of Berlin, writes: "The Tablets greatly benefited me personally, and I am recommending them to friends."

MISS CHATTERTON, 7 Salisbury Villas, Banstead, Surrey, says: "I weighed 12st. 8lb., but am now 11st., and getting much better."

Nurse CROUCHER, at Mrs. Bennett's, 14 Buckleigh Road, Streatham, says: "I lost 9lb. from the box I took."

Mrs. D. BURTON, of Silverleigh, Tunbridge, writes: "I am very pleased with difference in size, my friends all telling me how much thinner I am getting."

Miss NORTHLEDGE, The Laurels, Riseholm Road, Lincoln, says: "The Tablets reduced me 1st., so that I am cured."
"West Cornforth, Ferryhill.

Mr. WM. USHER says: "A sister of mine, who was 17st., was greatly reduced by your Tablets to 15st."

Extract from The Lady, September 3rd, 1896: "Many stout persons have suffered untold agonies in unavailing efforts to reduce their bulk, either by means of severe dieting, or by taking more or less deleterious drugs; but all these pains would have been saved if they had only invested in a box of the wonderful Trilene Tablets, which are quite harmless, containing neither mercury, arsenic, nor any other mineral poison, and which are an unfailing cure for obesity."

MRS. T. BOSTON, Cambridge Villas, Clifford Street, South Wigston, says: "I congratulate you on your wonderful Tablets. My weight at first starting them was 11st. 7lb., and I now weigh 9st. 11lb."

Mr. MCLEOD, 44 Calside, Paisley, writes: "I have been cured. If you want to know my weight now, it is 10st.; reduced 1st. 8lb., and I am quite content."

COUNT EHRENWAUD, of Liatorp, Sweden, writes, 9th Oct., 1899: "The person who took Tablets lost 18lb. during the cure."

Mr. GIBBS, 147 Richmond Park, Kimberworth, Rotherham, says: "Since I began with them they have reduced me 2st. 3lb., and I am pleased to say I am a great deal better in health and in every way."

Mrs. FENTON, 11 Wood Street, Tyldesley, writes: "Been fat all my life, but now your Tablets tell a tale. I have lost 17lb. already and am delighted."

Mrs. MARY WILLIAMS, of Old Yard, near Redol, Bagillt, Wales, writes Nov. 22nd, 1898: "Your Tablets reduced me 2st., and have benefited me greatly."

A. M. PRATT, of Ongar House, Ongar, says: "My weight is so much reduced it is unnecessary to take more. The reduction of weight was from 12st. 6lb. to 10st. 4lb."

Mrs. H. COX, 28 Watnall Road, Hucknall Torkard, writes: "The box of Tablets has reduced my weight 1½ stones."

Mrs. PEARCE, Armstrong Road, Benwell: "Reduced from 12st. to 9½st. and do not get any heavier."

Col.-Sergt. WHITTLE, of East Lancashire Regt., Burnley, Lancs., says "A man in our regiment in 1891 lost several stone from taking your Tablets."

Mrs. ROLLITT, of North Farm, Letwell, says: "Tablets have done a world good—reduced 14lb. already without altering diet."

Mrs. W. A. RADFORD, of High Street, New Brinsley, Eastwood, writes: "Before taking Tablets I was 46 inches round waist, now I am 32 inches. I hope soon to be 23. I could hardly move or get up, now I get about easily. Please use this as you wish."

Countess FURSTENBERG, of Germany, writes: "They act speedily and well."

The Princess LIECHTENSTEIN writes from Landsberg, Austria: "Pray send me your excellent Tablets."

Mrs. WEAVER, of Greenpits Villa, Ross, Hereford, writes: "I am reduced from 13st. 8lb. to 11st. You may use this if you like."

Mrs. CROSSLEY, of Rose Hill, Torver, nr. Coniston, says: "There is a very decided diminution of fat. I am delighted, and cannot speak too highly in praise of Tablets. My heart is better, and I can breathe so much easier. You may refer to me as often as you like."

Lady C. CONRAD writes from Wiesbaden: "I am very pleased with your Tablets."

Miss JANE CARTER of Forthampton House, Tewkesbury, says: "The Tablets are of the greatest value. I am reduced many stone, and shall be pleased to recommend them."

Mr. THOS BLAKELY, of 37 The Grove, Bedford, writes: "I have lost a little over 42lb. since taking your Tablets, and my case causes much local interest."

Miss F. L. BALL, 47 Chesterfield Road, St. Andrews, Bristol, writes: "I am quite cured through your Tablets. They improve the figure, and greatly relieve shortness of breath."

Miss PATIENT, of Woodberry, Theydon Bois: "Feel great benefit from Tablets. I have lost 2st., and am sufficiently reduced."

THE TRILENE COMPANY, 66 FINSBURY PAVEMENT, LONDON.

Digitized by Google

"Ruined!" she murmured. "How awful for you, Caleb. I am so sorry." She placed her hand again on his arm, and looked up at him regretfully. "Believe me, I feel for you more than I can say."

He looked at her dark, wistful face, that in spite of being careworn and somewhat haggard, was yet lovely enough to send a thrill of pain through him. "Yes, ruined!" he repeated bitterly. "It is as well that you are not really my wife, Violet—like the rest, you can leave the sinking ship to go down alone."

A slight flush stained her pale face. "Though there is that wrong on your conscience, Caleb," she said gently, "I do not reproach you with it—now—you may at least count me as a friend—and you know," she went on timidly, "that if what I have is of any use to you, it is at your service."

His face softened. "I have not sunk so low that I would take your money, Violet. I—I——" he stopped abruptly; the most bitter drop in his cup of humiliation was the know-knowledge that he could not help the son he had discovered.

As a rich man and a power in the City, he could have loaded that struggling son of his first wife with money and influence; but instead he had only a heritage of poverty to hand over to him.

To appear at the eleventh hour before his son as a bankrupt father was not the rôle he had marked out for himself. He had imagined, with a curious thrill of joy, revealing himself to that son as the parent who could make smooth the hard way of penury, and put before him the golden vista of speedily claiming Marcella as his wife.

But now that was all changed. In place of the influential father, holding out position and name to his son, he, Caleb J. Johnson, was a man cast from his high position in financial circles, and no more a byword for envy and adulation; rather a butt for scorn and ridicule.

He would not reveal himself now—what was the use? As a wealthy father, Philip Nullius might have overlooked his shortcomings, but a disgraced bankrupt was no acquisition to own as a parent.

"You mentioned something about a boy not half your own age. Who is it?" Lady Violet said suddenly, "and how has he beaten you?"

"Who is it?" he repeated slowly. "That arch liar and unscrupulous young scoundrel whom I took as my secretary at your own recommendation, Violet. That is the only bad turn you did me."

"Edward Day!" she winced, and her hand fell from his arm. "I do not understand! How could he have ruined you?"

"Like this." He laughed cynically. "I took an interest in him on account of the glowing letter of introduction you sent with him, and then let him have the control of my correspondence when I went—into the country. He forged cheques in my name, then when I charged him with it on my return, he blackmailed me with the knowledge of how I married you—which secret he gleaned from my private correspondence!"

He shut his teeth with a savage click, at the memory of how he had been outwitted by the cunning young secretary, whose brain had taken him up the scale, while he had traded on the knowledge of the financier's business secrets to betray him.

"If the letter of introduction you received with Edward Day was eulogistic in tone, then all I can say is that it was also a forgery," Lady Violet said slowly. "I might have known that he was bad enough to doctor a letter, but I am deeply regretful that he should have had the chance of hurting you still further."

The ex-Gold King smiled grimly. "Yes, he holds the winning card—at present, but when we meet I think that I shall get back a little of my own again." Afterwards he remembered his words with a thrill of horror, for it was murder that was in his heart when he spoke.

"Ah, Caleb, don't think of revenge now," she said suddenly. "Tell me instead what news you have of Marcella. I have written to—to my brother-in-law and sent two telegrams, but have received no answer. I fear," she shuddered, "God knows what I fear, but I can't wait much longer in suspense. I had hoped that Philip Nullius would have come to-day with news, but he has not."

"Is he in London still?"—the financier spoke sharply. He longed, yet feared, to meet the son he dared not own, and who, in spite of his father's fall from the ranks of the wealthy, was entitled to the position of a titled man on his mother's side. The fact that he could never owe anything to himself was gall and wormwood to the bitter man.

Lady Violet did not reply to his question. Her eyes were fixed on the door with a curiously listening look, and the pallor of her face was intensified.

"There is someone coming upstairs," she said in a low tone. "Oh, Caleb, can it be news of Marcella, do you think?"

"Perhaps," he answered reassuringly; "on the other hand it may be a message for me. I left word that I should be here in case an urgent caller arrived. They are, at last, really getting track of that mysterious man in the black beard."

"You mean—you mean——" she stammered; then, just as she was about to reply, the door was flung suddenly open and a tall figure swayed on the threshold, while, behind, another stood wrapped in gloom.

"Aunt Violet—oh, dear Aunt Violet!" and then before the stupefied woman, or the man by her side could utter a word. Marcella had run forward into the room with a little cry, and flung herself into the arms of Lady Violet.

"Marcella! Child!" the elder woman cried. "Oh, thank God! you are here—safe and—yes, and well!"—after a swift glance into the white face that rested on her shoulder. "How did you get here, my darling?" she went on; "I was just speaking to Mr. Johnson about you."

Marcella raised her face and glanced at the man who had taken a few steps away from her and her aunt.

"How did I get here?" she repeated in a low, vibrating tone. "Through the courage and devotion of a good woman who has suffered even more than I have! She sent me here while she took my place and went away with those men who wished to hide me from you."

Lady Violet's arms tightened round the girl's slender figure. "Thank God, my darling, that you are here—safe and well," she murmured brokenly; "but, but who is your friend? Bring her into the room, Caleb," she said, turning to the financier, who had remained a silent spectator of the meeting between aunt and niece.

"No—no—I will bring her to you myself," Marcella said quickly. And before the ex-millionaire could interfere, she had reached the side of the shrinking figure in the black cloak and heavy veil that concealed her face, and, taking her by the hand, led her forward into the room.

"Aunt Violet, be kind to her for my sake," she said in a low trembling voice. "She has only me now to look to. I dare not let her go back into his hands—I am afraid of him; he would be cruel to her—even more than before."

"Who is she?" Lady Violet said slowly, placing her white hand on the girl's shoulder. "Anyone of whom you are fond is sure to find a home with me."

"She is my—mother," Marcella answered, and, not hearing the sharp cry that came from her aunt, she flung back the thick veil that covered the woman's face. "See—Aunt Violet," she whispered, "the light has gone from her eyes—the windows of her soul are no longer clear, but I am all she has now. I cannot leave her—she is my mother!"

"Look at Dolly!" the woman said suddenly, her pale, wondering face breaking into a soft smile. "They said that Dolly died, but she didn't—oh, no, Dolly didn't die."

"She is thinking of my little sister who died years ago," Marcella murmured brokenly.

Lady Violet did not seem to hear her. Her large brown eyes were fixed with a look of amazement and stupefied joy in their depths upon the face of the woman who clung so childishly to the hand of Marcella.

"Laura—Laura!" she said in a hoarse whisper, "not dead—not dead! Then he lied in that as in all else; oh, my dear, my dear!" She took the frail figure in her arms and pressed her lips to the white brow, great tears standing in her eyes the while.

Digitized by Google

"Violet, is that poor creature Sir Cyprian's wife?" the voice of the one-time Gold King spoke sharply. He had followed with unerring perception the tragedy underlying the meeting of the women.

She nodded silently; somehow tears were choking the words that she would speak. She could only press her lips again and again to the brow of the woman in her arms. Even Marcella was forgotten for the moment.

Marcella turned to Mr. Johnson. "I am so glad you are here," she said simply, reaching out her hand to him. "I can never go back to my father, Sir Cyprian; he has been cruel to me, and to my poor mother. He told me that he had hidden her for years at the Court because she was an escaped—criminal—lunatic. My mother to be that!" she broke out passionately. "And my father——" she shuddered, and, burying her face in her hands, burst into a storm of piteous tears.

The woman in Lady Violet's arms raised her head at the sound of the girl's weeping, and, with one of those swift flashes of intuition that often are the peculiarity of the mad, said suddenly: "The man with the black beard frightens us and Dolly; in the room of beautiful things he often stays, and I play with them and look at all the pictures."

Lady Violet suddenly drew back from the clinging, babbling creature, and, placing her in a chair some distance apart, said in a low tone of intreaty: "Marcella, where is Philip Nullius? Is he with you? I must speak to him."

"With me?" Marcella shook her head in surprise. Then her face flushed warmly as she went on. "But in future, Aunt Violet, Philip can be nothing to me—think what I am and who my poor mother is! I have no right to let him marry me."

A low cry rose to Lady Violet's lips, and she swayed towards the girl with outstretched hands. To the silent man looking on at the scene, it seemed that she was inspired by the spirit of sacrifice.

"Marcella, I cannot let you live in another moment's ignorance of the truth. You can, with a free conscience, be the wife of any man, for neither that poor soul hugging the waxen image of a child, nor Sir Cyprian, are your parents; you have been deceived, my darling, and I—God forgive me—have been forced into countenancing the deception."

Mr. Johnson, as he listened to the firm speech that came from the desperate woman's lips, forgot that he himself held a secret—not indeed one, but many. He was amazed that it could be possible for the lovely Society woman to also have a skeleton within her cupboard, of which he was not cognisant.

He began, with the wisdom of understanding, to perceive the drift of her confession—much that had puzzled him in the past was now being made clear. He seemed to have been forgotten by the two women who faced each other with wide eyes and white faces.

"Not my parents!" Marcella pushed back the heavy hair from her brow, and repeated the words mechanically. "Not my parents! I don't understand; then who am I, Aunt Violet? Who is my mother?"

There was a pause in which the ticking of an ormolu clock was the only sound in the room; then, low and distinct, came the answer for which the girl waited:

"I am your mother, Marcella!"

The ex-City magnate gripped the back of a chair with unconscious force. At last he knew the secret that had eaten the woman's heart out as a canker in a rose. Then he remembered the face of the man he had paid to get away from England. The man who had consented to bribery was Marcella's father!

"You—my mother!" a little laugh fluttered to the girl's lips. "I don't understand."

"Listen, dear one, let me tell you," the elder woman pleaded; "don't judge me until you have heard. When you were a little baby I was left suddenly without any money; my husband—your father—was a bad man; he deserted me. Then the man who married my only sister, Sir Cyprian Rust, offered me a yearly income on the condition that I let him bring you up as his daughter in the place of his own who had died, as I believed, with the gentle creature in that chair whose bright mind he blighted with a fearful shock."

She paused, as though to take breath, and her eyes, so like those of the white-faced girl opposite her, shone with a strange light.

"Child, my child, Marcella, can you forgive your mother?" she whispered. "Think of my loneliness all these years that you have been growing up, and I was denied the precious name of mother from your dear lips! Think of what I have suffered when, as each year passed by, I saw that that man was trying to put barriers between our meeting each other—holding over my head the price that he had paid for you! Oh, my dear, my dear! It is the way of the young to judge hardly the faults of others, but be gentle with me, for I am your mother—and I love you."

She sank on her knees at the feet of the girl whose face had ever and anon quivered as a note was struck within her by that low, vibrating voice.

The action of the figure at her feet roused her from her lethargy.

Mr. Johnson had slipped from the room a moment since, and the woman on the chair still played with the doll in her arms.

Marcella touched the shoulder of the kneeling suppliant for her love. "Mother! Mother!" she whispered, "don't kneel to me, dearest. It hurts me to see you—there. It is not fit; I want you, mother, to kiss me as your child."

With a glad little cry Lady Violet rose, and the next moment the arms of mother and child were clasped round each other in an embrace that said more than all the words and phrases in the world.

A few moments later Mr. Johnson re-entered the room. Lady Violet held out her hand. He took it, and pressed it gently to his lips. "I understand," he answered gently. Then he turned to Marcella gravely:

"Child, I have a telegram for you. It has just come with one for myself, concerning the imminent arrest of the man with the black beard at last. Open it and see what news it contains."

Paling with a sudden thought, Marcella drew closer to the side of her new-found mother. What could that telegram mean but news of the man she loved? Mr. Johnson, watching her, also grew nervous. Some instinct told him that the telegram was about Philip Nullius.

"Philip Nullius—treachery—go Danger Point—urgent."

The telegram fluttered from the girl's fingers. "Philip is in danger," she cried; "treachery is luring him on to Danger Point. I know it. I was nearly killed myself there."

"Courage, darling," Lady Violet murmured; "he will be saved," and her eyes met Mr. Johnson's in a significant glance.

He smiled grimly and moved to the door. His small blue eyes flickered with a steely light, and his brow was suddenly moist.

"Where are you going?" Marcella cried eagerly.

He turned slowly.

"To the rescue of Philip Nullius!"

(Another long instalment of this serial will appear next week.)

She: "Should you call Tom's wife pretty?" He: "Well not unless I happened to be talking to Tom."

Miss Huggins: "My father is very good at reading faces." Mr. Kissam: "Then I had better not print any kisses here."

When a man has difficulty in finding an opportunity to propose he can make up his mind that the girl doesn't want him.

He: "Oh, that you would give me permission to lay my burning heart at your feet!" She: "You may; they are very cold."

Husband: "I thought you said you were going to get a cheap hat?" Wife: "I did. It's the trimmings that are expensive."

Digitized by Google

TOOTH-ACHE

CURED INSTANTLY BY

BUNTER'S Prevents Decay, Saves Extraction. Sleepless Nights Prevented. NERVINE

Neuralgic Headaches and all Nerve Pains removed by BUNTER'S NERVINE. All Stores, 1s. 1½d.

"As a specific for Toothache it has no equal. I have used it successfully for years."—Prof. W. WILSON, M.D.

2 PENCE DAILY

Any respectable person, male or female, can obtain a warranted cycle on easy payments of 1 shilling or more weekly. No guarantors required. Mutual trust between our patrons and ourselves. Catalogue Free. Symonds' London Stores, 124-128, City Rd., London, E.C.

TO CURE DRUNKARDS

without their knowledge. Send Stamp for FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of a wonderful remedy that has saved homes. Send no money. Address in confidence: WARD CHEMICAL Co., 51 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

RIDER AGENTS WANTED

One in each district to ride and exhibit a sample 1904 Cycle.

Highest grade fully warranted

BRITISH MADE CYCLES

LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6

New Departure Coaster Hubs, Best Makes Tyres, and best British made equipment throughout.

200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, good as new, £1 to £2-10

Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. We send on approval and allow Ten Days' Free Trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded without question if you are not satisfied.

EARN A CYCLE taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Our agents are making large profits. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer. Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos., half prices.

MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 44e, 85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool, 19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle at ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.

"CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," "SINGERS," &c.

Their names guarantee their quality.

FROM 8/- MONTHLY.

A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6

On approval. Two Years' Warranty. Write for Lists (Free).

EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. S3), World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

FREEMAN'S

TRADE MARK

THE ORIGINAL & ONLY TRUE

CHLORODYNE

Best Remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 6s., or postage free by the INVENTOR, R. FREEMAN, 70 KENNINGTON PARK ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

RECOMMENDED BY MEDICAL MEN.

N.B.—Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Justices James and Mellish, decided in favour of Freeman's Original Chlorodyne, and against Browne & Davenport, compelling them to pay all costs.
—"Times," 24·7·73.

£8 10

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted

Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

Secrets of Youth.

How to have a beautiful face and figure. How to have beautiful eyes and hair. How to curl the hair naturally without curling pins or tongs. Little people can be made tall. Noses that are red or ugly shape can be cured, and looks greatly improved.

This Pretty Book will be sent FREE. Ask for "BEAUTY'S BOUDOIR." Stamp must be sent for postage. Peralia Perfumery Co. (Dept. 14) 73 Camden Street, North Shields, Eng.

FREE TO YOU.

To advertise S.L.S. Records we are giving away our noted Phonographs for a limited time. Absolutely not a penny to pay for one. Write, giving full address and nearest railway station; enclose stamp. Mention this paper.

SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128 CITY ROAD, LONDON

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST.

FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN.

Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.

12 MONTHLY CASH OR PAYMENTS of

£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 8 0 „ 15/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/8 „
9 10 0 „ 17/6 „

JUNO Motor Cycles, £32 or 12 Payments of 60/- each.

JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles, £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.

Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ltd., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM (Clotted).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; 4lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. Conyers, Chagford, R.S.O., Devon.

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa.

"Strongest and Best."
—Health.

Half a teaspoonful is sufficient to make a cup of most delicious Cocoa.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Love Not Always Passionate.

"WILLIE'S" young lady is of the unemotional kind. She says she is very fond of "WILLIE," but when he writes her passionate love-letters, she only laughs, and he cannot make love to her in a proper way, for the reason that she seems to take nothing seriously. "WILLIE'S" question is: "Does this mean that she does not care for me? Surely a girl really in love would not laugh at her lover?"

* * * * *

I have no doubt she is as fond of you as she says she is. Perhaps, in reality, she loves you as much as she could love anybody. It is not always well to be too passionate. Passionate lovers often prove to be the most fickle, and soonest tired of their sweethearts, while such girls as yours when they really have allowed themselves to get fond of a man, very often remain constant to him always.

The Age for Marriage.

"I AM twenty-five, and not in love," writes "HERBERT." "I have decided not to marry, or get entangled with any girl, until I am thirty, when my position should be secured. Am I wise in this decision, or do you think I should seek a sweetheart now?"

* * * * *

I think you are wise. If you have not fallen in love by now you cannot be of a very susceptible nature. Marriage without love is not to be advised, so I should just wait until the young lady of your heart appears, and marry her right away. Thirty is quite a good age for a man to marry, but you must remember that the girls are not so easily attracted as a man gets older, so you may be losing opportunities.

Non-Dancers at Dances.

"W. I." likes girls, but doesn't know where to meet them. "Should I," he asks, "go to dances? I don't dance, and don't care for dancing, but I should like to meet the girls. Do men who don't dance go to dances, and, if so, how do they get on with the ladies? I ask for information, as I know nothing about the matter."

* * * * *

I should not recommend a non-dancer to go to dances. Of all the figures not to be envied, I think the male wall-flower is the worst. If the girls take any notice of him at all, it is always with a touch of pity and patronage, for a man who dances badly, or not at all, is regarded as lacking in a great accomplishment. So I do not recommend you to go to dances, if your wish is to make the favourable acquaintance of some nice girls. Try some other method.

The Despondent Lover.

"MY lover gets despondent often," writes "PAULA." "There has been insanity in his family. Do you think I ought to break off an engagement?" "PAULA" should not do so unless she has good ground for believing the despondency to be caused by mental disorder. It may be due to liver, or natural character. It would not be a bad idea for her to arrange somehow that he should meet a doctor friend of hers, or, at any rate, somebody able to form a good judgment about the young man's state of mind, and take their opinion on the subject.

* * * * *

It would be quite wrong for "PAULA" to jump to the conclusion that mere fits of despondency are caused by insanity. A man may have insanity in his family, and be none the worse for it.

A Jealous Lover.

"E. R. T." is troubled with a lover who is too jealous. The other day she met a young man friend, and in parting, shook hands with him. Her lover witnessed this, and when she rejoined him, he said: "What do you mean by letting that fellow hold your hand, and look into your eyes like that?" "E. R. T." was most annoyed, and they parted in a tiff. Some days have elapsed, and he has not called to see her. She is very fond of him, but asks me if I do not advise her to break off with so jealous an admirer.

* * * * *

I shouldn't break it off. Let him come and apologise. As you are sure in your own mind that you did not pass the bounds of ordinary social courtesy with the other young man, you are quite right in taking up the attitude you have. If your admirer cannot trust you to shake hands with a man friend, he must indeed be foolish. I hope he will repent of his absurdity.

A Girl Who Must Walk Out.

"I HAVE known a postman for about twelve months," writes "WILD ROSE"; "he is about nineteen or twenty. I like him very much indeed, and am miserable if I don't see him nearly every day. But I have never walked out with him, and don't know whether he likes me or not, but I think he does. One day last week, he asked me to see him after he was done at the office, but he didn't take me for a walk as I expected, but simply stood talking for quite an hour. He did not take me home. I should like to know what his feelings are towards me?"

* * * * *

I should think his feelings are quite what you want them to be. Why on earth a young man should be compelled to take a girl for a walk to show his love, I do not know. It seems to me that true love can be expressed as well standing still as walking about. "WILD ROSE" should try to judge his feelings towards her by what he says, and the way he says it, and not attach so much importance to whether he stood still and said it, or walked about. From your description of the young man, I imagine he is quite as drawn to you as you are to him, but perhaps his duties prevent his devoting too much time to you. Besides, a postman gets tired of walking.

An Uninvited Lover.

"ADA," writes: "Some people have asked me to stay with them in the Spring. They know that I am engaged, and also know my fiancé, but they have not even hinted that he should accompany me during the stay, or visit me while I am there. Would you accept the invitation, as my lover is not included?"

* * * * *

I think they have made an oversight in not asking your young man to visit them. They need not necessarily have asked him to stay the whole time you are there, but a short visit, or even an invitation to spend a day, would have been quite usual. Perhaps it has only been a slip, and not intentional. I should not refuse the invitation, but when you are on your visit, hint that you would very much like your sweetheart to visit you.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

A GENTLE HINT

to remind you that

No. 2 of

The RAPID REVIEW

IS NOW ON SALE.

A Concise Résumé of—

The War.
The Chinese Labour Question.
Army Reform.
The Fiscal Question, &c.

The Month's

Books.
Magazines.
Music.
Art, &c.

GET A COPY TO-DAY.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Digitized by Google

£25 OFFERED ON PAGE 389.

SHORT STORIES

No. 795. Week Ending March 26, 1904. Price One Penny.

"WILL YOU SELL YOUR SECRET FOR £50,000?"

(A Dramatic Episode from the Splendid Story, "A Society Secret." See inside.)

Digitized by Google

GLASS-PLATE CAMERAS

at last made perfect.

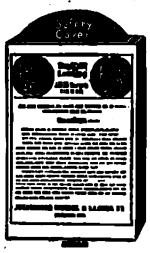
This is the season to get your camera into the best working order by means of

.. The ..

Premo Film Pack.

12 Daylight Loading Orthochromatic Flat Films in one small pack all ready for immediate use.

For 5/- the Film Pack Holder can be made to fit your camera without impairing its use for Plates.



THE FILM PACK.

The Simplest, quickest, most efficient changing ever devised for flat films. The Lightest, most compact and portable attachment for glass-plate cameras. Flat Films loaded and unloaded in day light. Rapidity in making consecutive exposures. Cut films one-fifth the weight of glass. Each exposure focussed separately if desired. Films and plates used interchangeably.

May be obtained from all Dealers, or from the distributing agents for the Rochester Optical and Camera Co.,

KODAK Ltd., 41-43 Clerkenwell Road, LONDON, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold St., Liverpool; and 72-74 Buchanan St., Glasgow.

Retail Branches:
59 Brompton Rd., S.W.; 60 Cheapside, E.C.; 115 Oxford St., W.; 171-173 Regent St., W.; and 40 Strand, London, W.C.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Headache,

Neuralgia & all Nerve Pains

One dose of Kaputine, costing 1d., cures in ten minutes the most violent nerve pain, every time.

Kaputine is not an aperient, and causes no inconvenience, but is for one purpose only—to cure Nerve Pains.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—and gives immediate relief.

Kaputine, unlike the dangerous white headache powders consisting of one crude drug, is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical Profession.

Kaputine is sold by all Medicine Dealers, Packets of 18 doses, 1/-. Samples 1d. each.

Write now for samples free and post paid to

O. G. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY!

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of "Short Stories," 26/3/904 On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, we will forward, Direct from our Looms to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in 20 different patterns and art colourings, to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for our goods below the actual cost of product on. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the purchasers all middle profits.

OVER 200,000 SOLD DURING THE PAST 12 MONTHS.

GIVEN AWAY! GIVEN AWAY!

With every Carpet we shall Absolutely Give Away a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs for 9/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials Received.

Illustrated Bargain Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Table Linen, Curtains, &c., post free.

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants.

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Sale Price: 3/6 Postage 4d. extra.

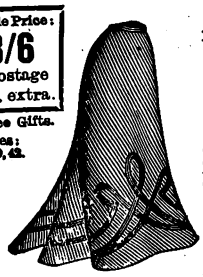
Free Gifts.

Sizes: 38, 40, 42.



F. HODGSON & SONS, City of Leeds will Present Free to every reader of Short Stories, 26/3/1904.

carriage paid, on receipt of postal order for 3/6, with stamps 4d. extra, for postage, for one of our Ladies' Beautiful Tailor Made Cloth Serge Dress Costume Skirts, in Black or Navy, richly trimmed with mercerised silkette strappings, and fitted with good linenette pockets. We shall include FREE with each Skirt a Massive 12-ct. Gold Pattern Curb Brace et, with Heart Pendant, mounted with Pearls and Turquoise, and scented with Forget-me-Nots. Cased with Pure Gold.

Money willingly returned if not approved. Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Curtains, &c., post free.

Address: F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.), Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

TO AVOID INDIGESTION.

That distressed feeling is simply a poorly-working stomach—it needs a little help—but no matter how bad it may be, a dose of will speedily give relief. Take Beecham's Pills for a few days, and the trouble will disappear.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 795.] [ONE PENNY.

For the Week Ending March 26th, 1904.

A SOCIETY SECRET.

Relating How a Girl Resisted a Great Temptation, and What Resulted.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

LADY HARROW was dying. The great physician had looked into the bright, restless eyes and his face had grown very grave. He was gone now—gone to tell Lord Harrow of what was impending. His lordship's son was there, too—the only one in all that great house who bore his name. He had always been a spoilt son, yet everyone liked him and excused his faults. For Archie would be heir some day.

A sudden quiet stupor settled upon the sufferer. The eyes closed wearily, and a long-drawn sigh escaped the dry, parched lips. With noiseless feet, the nurses drew near the bed and waited. Among them stood a young girl, a friend of Lady Harrow's, who had devoted herself to the dying woman from the first moment of her illness.

The girl was very beautiful, with large, deep, grey eyes and a mass of fair, wavy hair that made her irresistibly attractive. There were times when the sick woman would let no one remain with her, save this beautiful girl, between whom and herself, despite the great disparity of their years, existed a strong and deep affection.

Once more the eyes opened and wandered from one to another of the group. Finally they rested on the fair face of Gladys Harcourt and a smile stole about the sufferer's mouth. With a gesture of the hand she waved the nurses aside, and beckoned to Gladys to stoop and listen to what she had to say. Gladys understood, and the ripe young lips quivered as she bent her head to listen.

"My dear child, I must tell you something before I die. Don't be frightened. I know I must die. Listen. I don't know how it is, dear, but I have always loved you as though you had been my own daughter. It seems now, as I lie here waiting for what is soon to come, that you are bound to me by some mysterious tie. It is to you, therefore, that I turn in this hour—to you that I make my final appeal. Gladys, my child, I have a sacred trust to leave behind me—a secret I must communicate before I go to another world. I will not burden you with the knowledge of that secret. It is too sad, too terrible, to lay upon so fair a head as thine. But I am afraid—afraid that justice may not be done where justice is due, afraid of the issue in the battle between conscience and expediency. Will you undertake to hold this trust for—for my sake?"

All rights reserved.]

Gladys bent her head till her warm, fresh lips rested upon those of the sufferer.

"If it will make you happy," she said in a low, musical voice.

"Oh, it will, it will! I cannot trust it to anyone but you!"

The patient's thin hand wandered beneath the pillows. When it reappeared, Gladys saw that it held a little sealed packet.

"Look!" whispered Lady Harrow. "I want you to take this—to keep it as you would your own honour. It means everything—everything to me. Can you read what I have written on the cover?"

Gladys took the little packet in her hand and read aloud the inscription thereon:

"I, Margaret, Lady Harrow, commit this packet to the care of Gladys Harcourt, who is only to open it in the event of Lord Harrow's sudden death, or whenever my son, Archibald, shall inherit the title and estates of my husband. If Archibald becomes Lord Harrow during the lifetime of Gladys Harcourt, I hereby enjoin upon her the solemn duty of reading what is here inclosed and of taking whatsoever steps her conscience may dictate."

The young voice ceased.

"Will you promise to fulfil this obligation, my child?"

"Yes."

"Thank you. And may God, in His great mercy, keep all such dark and anxious secrets out of your own life. Kiss me once more, Gladys."

Again the lips of the two women met. A deep sigh came from the sufferer as she dropped her burning head upon the pillows. The flushed cheeks grew suddenly pallid, and Gladys, turning swiftly, beckoned the nurses to approach. But their skill was of no use now. Lady Harrow was dead.

And then, for the first time, Gladys became aware that Archibald Harrow was in the room. When he had entered it she did not know, but he had probably listened to the delivering of that last solemn trust so lately committed to her. He paid no heed to her, however, and stepped quietly up to the bed. Then, going to the door, he summoned his father. Gladys slipped noiselessly from the room and down the broad oak staircase to the deserted drawing-room. Her heart was full to overflowing, and she wanted to be alone. For she had loved the stately lady, who now lay in her last long sleep in the room upstairs, with a love as tender and strong as it had been strange and rare. She pressed the little sealed packet to her lips.

Digitized by Google

"Yes," she murmured, "I will keep the trust committed to me."

* * * * *

It was a year later, and Gladys Harcourt was seated in her daintily-furnished sitting-room, a copy of the Times in her hand. Suddenly she gave a start, while a little involuntary exclamation escaped her lips. The paragraph responsible for this agitation was of the briefest description, and ran as follows:—

"While dining at the Carlton last evening, Lord Harrow was taken suddenly ill. He was conveyed with all speed to his own residence, where medical aid was summoned. Dr. Harvey Tremaine found his lordship to be the victim of a serious epileptic seizure, to which the sufferer succumbed in less than an hour after his return home. Lady Harrow, it will be remembered, died a year ago. His lordship's only son, Archibald, will now succeed to the title and estates of his father."

That was all. Yet what did the news involve? Gladys had not forgotten the packet which Lady Harrow had committed to her care. Had the time come for her to participate in that dark secret at which the dying woman had hinted? Going to her writing-case, she took the packet from a little secret compartment and again read its mysterious inscription.

"In the event of Lord Harrow's sudden death!"

Had some unaccountable premonition warned Lady Harrow of what was to befall her husband?

"Or whenever my son, Archibald, shall inherit the title and estates of my husband."

Gladys laid the packet down and began seriously to reflect upon what she should do. One of the conditions had already been fulfilled. The other would no doubt follow in the course of the next few days, and Archibald would be publicly recognised as Lord Harrow. Yes, there could no longer be any reason for her to remain in ignorance of this mysterious secret. To do so would be to violate the trust which Lady Harrow had reposed in her. Once more she took up the packet, and, this time, she broke the seal.

For upwards of two hours Gladys remained in her sitting-room. No one interrupted her, for the door of the room was locked. Her face was very white, her hands were trembling, and the traces of tears were in her deep, grey eyes. For the first time in all her life Gladys Harcourt knew that she stood on the brink of a great crisis. A secret not mysterious now, but fraught with many important and serious possibilities, was in her keeping. And these possibilities depended upon her. Honour, justice, truth—all three were at stake. And it was she who must cast the die. Yet was this the wish of Lady Harrow? Once more she took up the brief little note, written by Lady Harrow to herself, and which had been inclosed with the documents contained in the packet. But it contained no more than was expressed in the last six words of that faded inscription:—

"Whatsoever steps her conscience may dictate."

Her conscience? Then, cost what it might, she must speak out! She must repair the wrong that had been done—must give to the world the secret that was now hers, and hers alone. She rose resolutely to her feet. It was evening, and she remembered a promise to dine at Lady Seymour's. Summoning her maid, she went to her dressing-room, where she attired herself for dinner. Then, wrapping a soft opera-cloak about her white shoulders, she descended the stairs to the carriage. On the steps she was accosted by a messenger, who placed in her hand a letter directed to herself. She opened it under the light in the wide hall, and read the following request:—

"Selgrove Gardens, S.W.

"Dear Madam,—I have a communication to make to you which is of the gravest importance. Can you call here this evening and as early as possible? I will not detain you for more than a few minutes. Perhaps it may influence you somewhat if I hint that my business with you to-night is connected with the recent death of Lord Harrow.—Yours faithfully,

"Geoffrey Barton."

Geoffrey Barton! Where had she heard that name before? Gladys considered as she refolded the note and returned it to its envelope. Enlightenment was not long in coming. All the world knew that Archibald, now Lord Harrow, was engaged to pretty, piquante Madeline Barton, the belle of the season. The Bartons were fabulously rich, though their lineage and descent were neither so ancient nor yet so unimpeachable as their more aristocratic neighbours could have wished. But when the sun is golden, the sun-spots are not observed, so the Bartons were regarded as very fine people indeed.

Without further reflection, Gladys entered the carriage.

"Drive to Selgrove Gardens," she said to the footman. "I suppose you know Mr. Barton's house?"

The man touched his hat, and, in a few minutes, Gladys was bowling along in the direction of the Bartons'. The carriage drew up before a large house, the door of which flew open as Gladys alighted.

It was evident she had been expected. Without a moment's delay she was conducted to a small study on the first floor, where she found Geoffrey Barton awaiting her. He was a gentlemanly-looking man of fifty or thereabouts, and he looked up as she entered with a curious alertness of expression that made the girl stand still before him. He got up and placed a chair for her. But she declined it with a wave of her hand, and he again sat down.

"Miss Harcourt," he began, "let me first of all thank you for responding so promptly to my appeal. It would be foolish to waste time in useless preliminaries. Let me, therefore, come to the point without delay. Lady Harrow's last act in this world was to intrust to your care some papers which nearly affected the name and fortunes of her family. We—I say we, since I am now acting with the full concurrence of the present Lord Harrow—we have good reasons the belief that these documents contained information of a very grave nature—a—a secret, in fact, which ought, or ought not, to remain a secret until the end of time.

"We are ignorant as yet of the precise nature of this secret. The present Lord Harrow overheard his late mother commit it to your keeping, and from her manner upon that occasion I infer that the secret, whatever it is, is one that should be well kept. I say I think this. Archibald is inclined to attribute his mother's earnestness to the mere fancies of a disordered brain. But I am a man of the world, Miss Harcourt, and have seen many strange things brought to light that need never have been known. So when Archibald casually mentioned the circumstances to me I made a few inquiries, and these inquiries, though amounting to very little, have led me to the present step. Do you follow me?"

His eyes fixed themselves on the girl's pale face. She could not speak, and merely nodded in reply.

"That is well," resumed Geoffrey Barton coolly. "Well, my first conclusion is this: For the sake of all concerned the secret, whatever it is, should be buried so deep that it can never again be resurrected. And, to this end, the documents now in your possession should be handed over to the present Lord Harrow."

Gladys started back as she heard the words.

"Never!" she cried. "He is the last man who should have them! He would destroy them!"

Geoffrey Barton's eyes were watching her.

"Ah!" he said. "It is as I suspected, then! So you have acquired the secret yourself, Miss Harcourt?"

"Oh, yes, yes! I heard only to-day of the late Lord Harrow's death, and this was one of the conditions of my opening the packet. Oh, I wish Lady Harrow had not left the secret with me!"

"Precisely." Geoffrey Barton's tone was well measured. His lynx-like eyes were still upon her face. "I am now strengthened in the opinion I lately expressed. The papers in question should be in the hands of the present Lord Harrow. Pray don't interrupt. Now let me touch, as delicately as possible, on a more private matter. I am given to understand, Miss Harcourt, that you have engaged yourself to a gentleman whose position is not yet assured. I believe you have endured some opposition on account of this circumstance. Personally, I regret I have not had the pleasure of meeting Mr. de Chirer. But from what I have been fortunate enough to glean as to his character and abilities, I may venture the opinion that his unquestionable genius as an artist will bring him the success his talents and perseverance merit. But success is a long ladder. Don't you think, Miss Harcourt, that the way might be paved for him were he the possessor of say, a nice, snug little competency ?"

Digitized by Google

Gladys' cheeks were burning now. He was tempting her.

"What do you mean ?" she gasped.

Geoffrey Barton laid one hand on her arm.

"Will you sell your secret for fifty thousand pounds ?" he asked in a cool, level voice.

Gladys started back as she heard the words.

"Oh, no, no, no!" she gasped. "I dare not! You know I dare not! Oh, let me go!"

She moved swiftly towards the door as Geoffrey Barton rose.

"Well," he said, "think it over. If you alter your mind come here in two days' time, and you shall have a cheque. It would be a good thing for Mr. de Chirer, you know. Good-bye."

* * * *

It was the afternoon of the second day when Gladys Harcourt alighted from a hansom at the door of Mr. de Chirer's studio in Kensington. She was admitted at once, and in a few minutes was in the presence of the artist himself. In spite of his name, Gordon de Chirer looked every inch an Englishman. Tall, well knit, with frank, open face and honest blue eyes, he made by far the best picture in that well-lit studio.

"Well, this is an honour I little expected!" he exclaimed, as his eye fell on Gladys. "Couldn't have timed it better, either. I've been at it all day, and was just wishing my presence at your father's residence was not regarded as so very undesirable a thing."

He laughed as he wheeled a chair for Gladys up to the glowing fire. But she made him no reply, and, when she was seated, he bent over her and tenderly smoothed the rich, clustering hair upon her fair head.

"What is it, darling ?" he asked. "Is it something I can help in ?"

She lifted her face to his.

"You are quick to understand, dear," she said, as she put her lips up to be kissed. "Yes, it is something in which you may help. I cannot tell you all, Gordon, for it is a secret, and the secret is not mine, but another's. But I can tell you sufficient to make you comprehend my difficulty, and help you to counsel me as to what it is my duty to do."

Gordon nodded, and drew a chair for himself beside her own.

"A year ago," went on Gladys, "a certain lady of title died. She and I were much attached, and before she died she committed to me a great family secret. This secret I was not to know unless her husband were to die suddenly, or until her son should inherit the title and estates of his father. Two days ago the fulfilment of one of these conditions compelled me to acquaint myself with the family secret. It was indeed a very grave and serious one, involving more than I can tell you. The same evening I received a note from a certain gentleman, requesting me to call upon him. I went, and was astonished to find that, though he knew little as to the nature of the secret itself, he was quite aware of its existence, and even of its importance. Finally he urged me to place the documents connected with the secret in the hands of the present head of the family, and offered me a cheque for fifty thousand pounds as an inducement to do this. He gave me two days in which to consider, and that time has now expired. Of course, I am not thinking of the money, Gordon. Nor do I think I ought to part with those papers to any but a respectable firm of solicitors, who would do what they thought right and just in so weighty a matter. But I felt I must come first to you and see if your view of the case coincides with my own."

She stopped. Gordon de Chirer had risen, and was now standing by the window, with his back turned towards her. It seemed quite a long time ere he made any reply. Presently, however, he moved back to the chair he had vacated. There was a far-away light in his blue eyes as he put the question:

"You must tell me one thing, Gladys. What was the name of the lady who died a year ago ? Was it Harrow ?"

Gladys started.

"Yes," she said. "How did you guess it, Gordon ?"

But Gordon passed the question by. Once more he rose from his seat, and this time began to pace the floor restlessly. Gladys watched him, wondering greatly as she did so. But she wisely forbore to question him further, and merely waited for him to speak. Presently he stopped before her.

"Gladys," he said, "did I understand you rightly ? Did you not say that two days had now elapsed ?"

"Yes."

"Will you do as I bid you ? Can you trust me—implicitly ?"

Gladys was on her feet in an instant.

"Trust you!" she exclaimed. "Of course I can trust you!"

"Yes, I know, darling. But can you trust me in this ? Can you trust me so far that you will do whatever I ask you to do, without question or hesitation of any kind ?"

Gladys looked into his face. She had never before seen him quite like this. He was usually so gay and full of wit and merriment. Now he seemed suddenly sobered. There was a gravity, a dignity, in the frank, fearless face that was new to it, and Gladys marvelled as to what this might portend. But there was no hesitancy in the answer she gave him. Putting her two hands trustingly in his, she looked full into his blue eyes.

"I will do as you bid me," she said.

Once more Gordon de Chirer stooped and kissed the girl's red lips. Then he asked:

"Have you the papers on you ?"

"No."

"Then we must drive to your home first. I will wait for you, and we will then go together to the gentleman who made you the offer of fifty thousand pounds for the secret."

A momentary doubt shot through the girl's brain.

"Gordon," she whispered faintly, "you do not want me to—to sell the papers ?"

But Gordon only smiled.

"Come," he said. "I want to see this thing through, once and for all."

In a few minutes they were bowling over the smooth, asphalted streets. Near Gladys' house the hansom drew up, and Gordon waited until she returned with the papers. Then on again till they reached Selgrove Gardens, and the hansom drew up before Geoffrey Barton's house.

Geoffrey Barton was in his library. He seemed a trifle disconcerted at the inclusion of Gordon de Chirer into the business in hand. His lifted eyebrows implied a question, which Gladys promptly answered.

Digitized by Google

"I had better explain," she said, "that, but for Mr. de Chirer, I should not have returned to you at all. I went to him this afternoon for the purpose of seeking his advice on this matter, and, acting upon that advice, I have accompanied him here."

"How much or how little does Mr. de Chirer know of this business, Miss Harcourt?"

Gladys was about to reply when Gordon saved her the necessity.

"Miss Harcourt has informed me," he explained, "that she is in possession of a secret for which you have offered her the sum of fifty thousand pounds. I have also elicited from her the additional information that this secret is connected with the family of the late Lord Harrow. Beyond this she has told me nothing, nor have I sought to compel her confidence in any way."

A shade of relief passed over Geoffrey Barton's face.

"And your object in accompanying Miss Harcourt?" he inquired suavely.

"That will appear presently," responded Gordon. "First of all, I wish to ask you one question. Is the fifty thousand pounds you are prepared to pay for this secret to come out of the estate of the present Lord Harrow?"

"That is, or appears to be, rather immaterial. But, since you ask, I will admit that Lord Harrow has notified me of his willingness to pay that amount out of the estate."

"Thank you. Will you be so good then as to draw up a document explaining the particulars of this transaction and append your signature to the same? I suppose Lord Harrow is wise enough to keep his name out of the affair?"

Geoffrey Barton coloured.

"Well, yes," he admitted lamely. "Lord Harrow does not wish to appear in the matter. I am prepared to draw a cheque for the amount on my own bankers, and he will pay me later. But I scarcely see the necessity of putting the transaction down in black and white. You see, it's not a—a regular business proposal, and it would not look altogether—er—businesslike——"

"Or honourable," suggested Gordon. "Nevertheless, I insist upon it. I will draw up a receipt for Miss Harcourt, and shall affix my own name as a witness to the transaction. You will please to make out the cheque. But, in doing so, allow me to request you to leave out the name of the person to whom the money is to be paid."

Geoffrey Barton was becoming more and more embarrassed. He was no more able to divine the drift of these preparations than Gladys herself. He had never met this Gordon de Chirer before, but he felt himself irresistibly compelled to carry out his directions to the very letter. For a few moments nothing more was heard save the scratching of pens as they moved rapidly over the paper. Then the two men looked up. Gordon had just finished a blank receipt, to which he had affixed his name as witness. The name was covered by a sheet of blotting-paper when Geoffrey Barton lifted his head. Up to this time Gladys had offered no protest. But she could no longer restrain her uneasiness.

"Oh, Gordon," she exclaimed, "think what you are doing. It is wrong—worse than wrong—it is wicked!"

But Gordon only smiled.

"Give Mr. Barton the papers," he said.

But Gladys shook her head and drew away from the table.

"Trust me."

The words fell on her ear, and she looked helplessly into the face of her lover. It was a strong face—a noble face—and she obeyed. Geoffrey Barton snatched greedily at the papers and Gordon lifted the blotting-paper from the blank receipt.

"Sign it," he said, as he pushed it towards her.

Gladys took the pen from his hand and prepared to write. All at once a smothered exclamation burst from her lips. Her eyes dilated and fixed themselves on the paper before her. Observing her agitation, the eyes of Geoffrey Barton followed hers and rested on the name that Gordon de Chirer had inscribed thereon. For it was not Gordon de Chirer, but Gordon Harrow! For some time no one spoke. Then Gladys took up the receipt and tore it into fragments.

"I will never sign away your inheritance," she cried. "Oh, why did you force me to give up those papers—the sole remaining proofs of your identity?"

Gordon laid a soothing hand on her shoulder. Then turning to the petrified Geoffrey Barton, he commanded him to fill in his own name on the cheque. When this was done, he wrote a second receipt, handed it across the table, and put the cheque in his pocket.

"Now, Mr. Barton," he said, when he had finished, "I will make you an explanation. Thirty years ago my father, Lord Harrow, married my mother and took her for a long honeymoon trip on the Continent. While there circumstances made it expedient that they should retire for a time to a little sequestered hamlet in the vicinity of Lombardy, where they dropped their identity. In due time I was born into the world, and, not long after, my father and mother returned to Society once more, leaving me in the care of an excellent nurse.

"My father insisted that my birth should be kept secret. There was no stint of money, and I received an education quite in keeping with my real station in life. But I was brought up in complete ignorance with regard to my parentage, and it was not until I was eighteen years of age that my father wrote to me. He told me then of the miserable circumstances attending my birth, together with a great deal more, into which I need not now enter.

"He admitted that I was his actual heir, though the world had no idea of my existence. Finally he left it to me to do as I thought fit. My mother had prayed for my return and recognition, notwithstanding all that such a step would involve. And he left the issue to me. The week that followed was the bitterest I have ever spent. And in the end I ran away."

He paused, and then went on:

"I determined never to return. I had never known a mother's love. Yet I felt for that mother, all unknown as she was to me, and I vowed never to let my own selfish inclinations tempt me into forgetting that she was my mother. So I travelled up and down the Continent under my present name, and finally established myself here as an artist. Now you know my story.

"Here is the letter my father sent me. Take it, and, with it, the only remaining proof that I, and not my brother Archibald, am Lord Harrow. Let him keep the title, and all that appertains thereunto, in quietness of mind. I shall not trouble him. His cheque for fifty thousand pounds I shall take. He owes me something for my willingness to sacrifice so much. Yet it is not for him that I do it, but for the fair, sweet name of my dead mother—the mother I never knew."

He rose as he finished speaking. Gladys rose too, and drew near him. There were tears in her deep, grey eyes as they met his. Unmindful of the presence of Geoffrey Barton, Gordon drew her towards him.

"Are you content?" he asked tenderly.

"More than content. I am happy."

Presently she lifted her head.

"Why did you choose the name of de Chirer?" she asked.

"It is only French for Harrow," he replied. "I wonder you did not see through it before."

"Shall you keep it?"

"Yes—if you will share it. Will you?"

"Oh, you know I will!"

Walter J. Mowbray.

NEXT WEEK SPLENDID NEW SERIAL STARTS

"Phantom Shadows,"

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

Digitized by Google

£25 IN CASH PRIZES!

1st Prize, £10. 2nd Prize, £5. 3rd Prize, £2.

And Eight Cash Prizes of £1 each.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find six signatures. Each of these signatures is the ordinary signature of the person to whom it belongs. The writing is not assumed for the occasion; it is just the way in which each of the persons signs his name to letters or to cheques. The first and second sets of signatures have already appeared, and the numbers containing them can be had from any newsvendor, or from this office for 1½d. each post free.

What you have to do is to print in the space opposite each signature the name (initials, Christian name and surname) which you think it to be. No one but the Editor possesses the correct names of all the signatures shown. If you are in doubt as to the correct rendering of any signature or signatures ask some of your friends. When you have filled up the coupon to the best of your ability, cut it out and keep it by you, with the other coupons, until you see an announcement in SHORT STORIES telling you to send them in, together with the coupons which will appear in SHORT STORIES.

CONDITIONS.

(1) The name must be clearly printed in ink opposite each signature.
(2) Only one name is allowed in each space.
(3) No alterations are allowed in the words.
(4) When you have filled up your coupon, cut it out and keep it by you, together with the coupons which have appeared and will appear in SHORT STORIES.
(5) Each competitor may send only one set of coupons, but all the members of one household may compete. Each set will be accepted independently.
(6) In all cases the Editor's decision is final, and competitors may only enter on this condition.

COUPON No. 3.

No. 13.
No. 14.
No. 15.
No. 16.
No. 17.
No. 18.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

Digitized by Google

The Wage-Robber.

A TALE OF LAKE WINDERMERE.

"Well," said the ironmaster after a long pause, "we will afford you every opportunity of practically demonstrating your idea. You shall have a private room fitted up, with a pulley and shaft from the main engine. In this you will be able to carry out the work, free both from interruption and the prying eyes of curious and, I think, not over-sympathetic engineers."

The ironmaster paused and looked meaningly into the face of Hume Meredith. But the glance he met was grim and determined.

"I am not blind to the antagonism I shall have to endure," was the quiet reply. "It is not easy to convince men such as those with whom I work. They think and live for the hour, and a policy of eternal benefit at the cost of six months' half-pay is one they will fight, and fight hard. Still, I will take the risk." And he smiled his quiet, determined smile and looked straight into the strong face of the great ironmaster.

"Well," said the latter, as he looked once more at the tracings on his desk, "the more I consider the scheme, the more I anticipate the success which you predict. I am not usually so optimistic in new ideas, but I must admit that this one of yours is a revelation. If it can be demonstrated, the trade will be revolutionised, and the patentees will secure the whole of the Government contracts. Indeed, they will hold the monopoly, and Britain will take from Germany all that she has lost, and more." He paused, and then added drily: "But the biggest task of all will be to convince the five hundred men who work in the shops of the value of this invention to them. The machine, if it does anything, will minimise labour to one-fifth of the present rate, and even the gospel of ultimate good will have no amelioration for this circumstance. They will put their nose against it from the outset, and we shall have to fight. As you have yourself hinted, they live as they are paid—by the hour."

Hume Meredith was still smiling. He was not the man to be lightly daunted.

"Well," he said, "we are not children to be frightened by bogies or goblins. We are men, and though we differ widely in station—you, an ironmaster, and I, a mere mechanic—the instincts of the man exist equally in both. And—I am determined."

The ironmaster rose.

"Well," he said, "you shall have my assistance and, if necessary, my protection. And, if the scheme succeeds, your reward will be a big one."

For the first time in his life, the great ironmaster offered his hand to an employée. Hume Meredith took it and returned the grasp which he received. For once in his life, the famous ironmaster realised that, under the dark blue tunic of one of his engineers beat a heart as brave as that of a lion. And—far more even than that—the man was a genius.

The men were at work in the great engineering shop of the Windermere ironmaster. The whirr of wheels, the clank of cogs, the lap-lap of link belts, and, far down to the end of the long shop, the deep rumble of the main engine and the groaning of its great fly-wheel. All was bustle and activity. Men with grimy faces and dark blue suits stooped over lathe and boring-machine, guiding the sharp steel tools that ground into the iron so tightly bolted to the moving machines. Drills spun round and round and cut their way through huge plates, while the hot twisted filings dropped on to the floor below. Fitters stood at their vices along the great bench, and the rasp of their files grated on the ear. Every man was at work, but, somehow, they were thinking of other things. Something ominous was in the air, and the ironmaster, entering the workshop, observed it in an instant. But he paid no heed to it, for he understood its cause. A scowl was on every man's face, and muttered threats were beginning to be heard. Across the yard was a small wooden shed, with galvanised iron roof, and, as the men glanced momentarily through the windows of the workshop to where it stood, their faces darkened and their scowls deepened. The ironmaster went out and crossed the yard.

"The brute!" growled Ambrose Drew, as he straightened himself above his boring-machine. "He means to take the bread out of our mouths and the mouths of our wives and children. And the firm encourages him in his infernal invention. He was too proud to mix with us when he worked here, and now——" He ground his teeth and was silent.

Leonard Steele moved stealthily over to his side.

"There are five hundred of us," he whispered hoarsely, "and we're all of one mind. Are we going to submit to it without a protest?"

"What's the use of a protest?" growled Ambrose angrily.

Leonard Steele laughed softly.

"I didn't mean that kind of a protest," he said meaningly. "But it isn't always safe to use ugly words when others will do, though the meaning may be the same." And his eye gleamed with a sinister significance.

Ambrose Drew stooped again over his machine. When he next lifted his head, he looked full into Steele's dark face.

"Spread it among such of the men as we can trust," he whispered. "Tell 'em we'll meet to discuss what is to be done at eleven o'clock to-night in the grove by the lake. He's taken to sleeping in his shed now, for fear his precious invention should be tampered with. I heard him tell the chief to-day that the machine would be finished in three days."

Leonard Steele smiled significantly.

"There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip," he said. "I think we shall be able to move the men to our way of thinking. We must stop him. And if he won't stop——" He passed his hand across his mouth and shot a quick glance into his companion's face.

Ambrose Drew nodded and the two men returned to their work. But all that day there were ominous whisperings among the men of the great workshop, and a secret understanding seemed to grow up between them that boded ill for the young inventor in the shed hard by.

It was eight o'clock when Hume Meredith, locking the door of his little workshop behind him, went out of the great gate and down the road to the lake. It was now dark, for the season was autumn, but a soft stillness reigned with the night, which the contrast of the day served but to intensify. It was not often now that Hume Meredith left his workshop, for he well knew what was the prevailing feeling against both himself and the invention upon which he was engaged. But there are other things in life than genius and ambition, and, of these, love is not the least.

Digitized by Google

Lake Windermere looked very calm and peaceful as he stood by its brink and watched the moonlight silvering its waters. He took off his cap and let the cool night air play among his thick crisp hair. There was a soft step behind him and he turned abruptly.

"Ah, Nora," he said, taking her hand in his, "so it's you, dear. It is only three days since we last met, yet it seems an age. I think the continual toil in the workshop and my inability to leave it even at night make the time seem longer than it is. Well, how have you been getting on?"

Nora Langham smiled up into her lover's face.

"Oh, all right," she said. "And you? Is the work nearly done?"

Hume Meredith lifted his head proudly.

"Three days more, at most," he said triumphantly.

"And the end?" she asked eagerly.

"The farther I go," was the glad reply, "the more certain do I become that the invention will be an unqualified success."

There was a short pause, and then Nora said in a low voice:

"Hume, you must be on your guard. I have heard dark hints among the men that almost frighten me. Oh, why can't they see that the invention, while it lessens labour, will ultimately bring the demand up so high that they will not be able to cope with it? They seem so short-sighted, and they will not hearken even though one tells them all that it means. They look askance even at me, for they know we love each other, and hate me because of you."

Hume Meredith looked earnestly into the girl's blue eyes.

"So to love me is to suffer," he said, with a tender light in his.

Nora looked up quickly. Then she put up her face to be kissed.

"Then I hope I may always suffer," she said, as she returned his kiss. "Nay, dear Hume, it is not of myself I think. The only thought their attitude to me awakens is one of apprehension for you and for the success of your work."

Again Hume Meredith kissed the ripe lips. The spot was very lonely, and the trees that overhung the lake screened them from observation.

"My darling," he said tenderly, "I am not ignorant of the opposition I have to face. So far I have met it and overcome it—not by aggressiveness, but by sheer force of will. I have ignored every insult that has been levelled against me. I have shown them that no power on earth is strong enough to move my purpose or deter me from successfully carrying out this work. And this I am going to continue to the end. Obstacles there may be—even danger—but the end will be the same."

Slowly they walked along the margin of the moonlit lake, and, when love had made them happy and hopeful, they separated, and Hume Meredith returned to his little wooden workshop.

* * * * *

It was eleven o'clock. The tall trees of the grove stood up silent and spectral, and the pale light of the moon filtered through the foliage and made lacework-patterns on the green sward beneath. Figures, as silent as the trees, but movable, flitted from cover to cover, as though to avoid notice, and made their way to a little copse on the borders of the lake. The few became a group, and the group swelled to a crowd. Each man's face wore a dark scowl, and pity seemed a thing unknown. For a time, scarcely a whisper was to be heard, and then, in clear but low tones, the voice of Leonard Steele broke the silence, and every man listened to his words.

"Men," he said, "our first duty is towards the helpless women and children for whom we have to provide. There is no man here who would be less than a man more thoroughly in the eyes of us all than by neglecting to do that. Our wives, our mothers, our little ones—all compel us to strive for the continuance of that labour by which we are able to support them. Is it not so?"

There was a subdued murmur among his hearers, and the hands that grasped sticks grasped them more firmly.

"Just so," Steele went on. "I see you all agree with me on that score. Well, a traitor—a black-hearted, favour-seeking traitor—has crept in among us, and is working, day and night, to accomplish that by which four-fifths of you will be rendered penniless, homeless ruined!" His voice rose as he spoke the words. "You will be driven out like sheep—worse than sheep, for they but go to unconscious death, while you will go to conscious misery, conscious hunger, and the women and children whom you love will droop and die and call to you for bread."

Again he paused. There were cries of "Lynch him!" "Lynch him!" from several of the group, and the muttered imprecations increased each instant. Then the voice of Ambrose Drew rose above the rest, and there was silence again.

"Men," he said, "there is only one course left to us. We must force him to desist. Listen! I am no lover of violence if other means will do. Let us send him a note, commanding him to cease this work, and let us earn our bread as before. Give him four-and-twenty hours to decide, and then——" He stopped. The murmurs around him encouraged him to proceed. "Well," he said, in a lower voice, "if he will not heed us, make him!"

Once more the murmurs broke out, and fierce discussions took place among the crowd. At last Leonard Steele spoke again:

"Well," he said, "are you agreed?"

"We are!" came from a hundred throats.

"Bravely said, my men. For in this you have shown us you be indeed men—men who will fight for right and justice. Four-and-twenty hours, then. If, then, he does not desist, we will show this—— What shall we call him, lads?"

Ambrose Drew was the first to speak.

"The Wage-Robber!" he said.

There was a fierce cry from the angry crowd. In an instant they took up the word and repeated it in fierce, suppressed whispers.

"The Wage-Robber! The Wage-Robber!"

Without further parley, Ambrose Drew wrote a short note to Hume Meredith, giving him four-and-twenty hours to desist from the completion of his new invention, which he gave to one of the men with orders to slip it beneath a door of the little workshop. And then the crowd dispersed and went each man to his own home.

* * *

Another night had fallen on the broad, calm lake, whose waters bore scarcely a ripple on their unbroken surface. Once more the silver moon rode high in the purple sky, and the trees, as the night before, now swayed gently in the soft breeze. It was midnight and a deep silence lay upon the scene. Suddenly the wind brought the murmur of many voices, and shadowy outlines moved among the trees that fringed the shore of the lake. Nearer and nearer they came—a furious, frenzied crowd, and their voices, suppressed as they were, told of the passion that had roused them. They were dragging someone along—someone who fought desperately with his captors, but who was powerless to free himself from their grasp.

Digitized by Google

"Cowards!" he said. "How well ye merit the name when ye come out, a hundred strong, to fight one man!"

But they paid him no heed and dragged him on to the edge of the lake. There they pinioned him with strong cords, and Ambrose Drew stepped before him.

"Well, Hume Meredith," he said grimly, "we gave you fair and timely warning, and you have not heeded it. I will give you one more chance. Will you swear to relinquish the work upon which you are now engaged?"

The captive looked him full and fearlessly in the face.

"No!" he said resolutely. "A thousand times no! You may do your worst, but you cannot alter my determination."

There was an execration from the crowd.

"We may not be able to alter it," said Leonard Steele significantly, "but we can put an end to it."

"How?" Hume laughed.

Leonard Steele laughed.

"Dead people aren't very determined," he said.

"I'll take my chance," was the reply. "But I won't yield."

There was an angry oath from the crowd.

"Bring up the boat!" said Steele. "We'll damp his ardour a bit and see if that makes any impression. I guess his machine will need an inventor by to-morrow morning!"

A dozen men ran to a boat-house hard by, and drew therefrom a small rowing-boat, which they dragged to the spot where their captive stood.

Ambrose Drew took out a brace and bit, and with it bored a hole in the bottom of the boat. A score of hands hoisted the pinioned man into the boat, where they drew him, feet foremost, beneath the seats, to which they bound him securely. Then, in response to a whispered order from Steele, four men hurried off in the direction of the foundry, and presently returned, bearing two huge bars of pig-iron. Both of these they laid beside the unfortunate man, in order to weigh down the boat. Then, with a suppressed shout and many oaths, they ran the boat down into the water, wading out waist-deep in order to push it far out into the lake.

Slowly but surely it moved out into deeper water, and the men scrambled back to the shore. Then, for the first time, the voice of Hume Meredith called for help, and the men remembered that, in their excitement, they had forgotten to gag him. But they could not reach him now, and they slunk back to their homes.

"Fifteen minutes will do it," murmured Leonard Steele to himself, as he moved away. "No help can reach him in that time. Good-bye, brave Wage-Robber, and a pleasant journey to you!" And he disappeared into the night.

* * * * *

Nora Langham was lying awake in her own room not a mile from the spot where her lover was in danger of his life, bound hand and foot, in a boat that was ready to sink and carry him to a watery grave. She was restless and uneasy. Vague fears came to trouble her and to rob her of her rest.

Presently she heard stealthy footsteps pass her window, then another, and again another. Fearful of she knew not what, she went to the window and peered out.

A man was passing, and he glanced up as he went by. It was Ambrose Drew.

In an instant, she realised that something was afoot which threatened her lover. Hastily dressing, she stole out of the house in the direction he had taken. There were others in the street, all making their way in the same direction, and she followed, being careful, however, to avoid notice.

Soon she entered the grove that led down to the lake. Here she found a number of men already assembled, and she hid herself behind one of the trees where she might stand in shadow and watch what was going forward. There was a sound of disturbance a little way off, and, a few moments later, she saw, to her horror, the form of her lover dragged down to the margin of the lake.

Almost stupefied, she watched the horrible proceedings of the men, and saw Hume Meredith and his leaky craft launched upon the lake. And then the men slunk away, and she only remained. Paralysed almost beyond action, she stood there stupidly, knowing not what to do. And then that voice—his voice—calling for help, smote upon her ear and recalled her to herself.

Two or three minutes she waited, to make sure all the men had left the spot, and then she leapt from her concealment and bounded down to the brink of the lake. Quick as thought, she had resolved upon what to do. Tying her garments about her as well as she could, so as not to impede her movements in the water, she dashed into the lake and swam vigorously out to the boat. She was a good swimmer, but the boat was a long way off. Again that cry for help, and, even as it was uttered, she reached the boat.

"Hume," she said, "it is I—Nora! Have you got your knife?"

"Yes," he replied, "it is in my pocket—the one on your side."

"Thank God!" she said fervently, and, reaching over the boat, she felt for it and drew it out. The water was in the boat now, almost to the man's mouth, and a great fear came into the girl's heart as she felt the boat sinking lower and lower and the water swallowing up her lover.

With a supreme effort, she mastered her hysterical weakness and slashed at the cords that bound him. One by one they snapped, and, when at last one hand was free, Hume took the knife and severed the remaining ropes. He held his breath now, for the water was over his face, and each effort drove him almost to madness. But at last the cords were all severed, and slowly and carefully, for he feared the too sudden foundering of the little craft, he drew himself out from beneath the seats where he had been bound and dropped into the lake beside Nora.

Almost as he did so, the boat, weighted with the bars of pig-iron, disappeared beneath the surface. With a great effort, they avoided the eddy thus caused, and swam silently to shore. And then, her task accomplished, her lover saved,

Digitized by Google

Nora Langham sank down on the bank and burst into tears. Hume bent over her and kissed her.

"You have saved my life, darling," he said. "Thank God you were in time!" And, lifting her tenderly up, he led her home.

* * * * * *

Once more Hume Meredith sat in the private office of the great ironmaster. A solicitor was also seated at an adjoining desk.

"Well," said the ironmaster, "we have won, after all. The men are beginning to see the benefit which this invention of yours is to themselves as well as to us. But it was a near thing for you. Had it not been for that plucky little sweetheart of yours, I'm afraid the firm would have lost a prospective partner."

Hume Meredith started. His handsome face flushed. What was he meant to infer? The ironmaster noticed his start of surprise and smiled.

"Yes," he said, "I want a partner to help me in the work. If you will consent to put your head into the business, I shall be satisfied. You have a patent and no capital, and I have capital and a very prosperous business. How much of that prosperity would decline were you to fight me with your patent I am not prepared to admit. But I hope you will not do that. Have the patent rights made out in the name of Outram and Meredith, and I will make over to you an equal share in this business, present and future. What do you say?"

Hume Meredith rose, and this time it was he who offered his hand.

"You are more than generous," he said. The ironmaster shook his head.

"Not a bit of it," he said. "In five years' time you will realise that you are benefiting me, not I you. This is the very biggest thing that has ever happened to the trade. Already the German contracts are being thrown out, and we—we were the gainers."

For nearly an hour they sat thus, the solicitor taking legal instructions meanwhile.

When at last Hume Meredith rose, the ironmaster took a decanter from the sideboard and poured out three glasses of wine.

"To the new firm," he said. "It is an old one—as old as this wine—but to-day is the best and most profitable day in all its history."

Hume Meredith bowed.

"And I," he said, "having experienced the pleasure of working for a clear-sighted ironmaster who has encouraged me in all the labours I have undertaken, am now more highly honoured than in the wildest dreams I have ever anticipated. If the little genius for invention I possess is valued so highly as to place me upon a pinnacle I had never even hoped to reach, I will at least couple it with an integrity and energy towards the still further advancement of the business of which I am now a member, that shall prove a generous deed to be a deed politic."

"Well said!" the ironmaster replied. "Now, I shall expect you to-night at dinner. And my wife desired me particularly to ask you to bring with you the young lady, but for whose bravery, in the face of so many foes, we should all have been losers."

So Hume promised. And, for the first time in her life, Nora Langham sat down to dinner in the ironmaster's great house, and enjoyed a foretaste of that wealth and prosperity that were to follow her all the days of her life.

For the firm of Outram and Meredith has prospered beyond the dreams of avarice, and its partners are the wealthiest ironmasters in the land.

Nora saw a number of hands hoist her lover into the leaky boat, where they bound him securely.

And what of the men who so nearly robbed Hume of his life? They soon understood the huge advantages of the new invention, and became ashamed of their cowardice on that eventful night. Leonard Steele and Ambrose Drew, the ringleaders, publicly apologised, and the most prized of all the wedding-gifts that fell to the lot of Mr. and Mrs. Hume Meredith was the present from the employés to their master and erstwhile companion, whom they learnt to love and trust so well.

J. M. W.

"Don't you dare kiss me!" she cried warningly. "Why, I wasn't thinking of such a thing," he said. "Well, I was," she replied firmly.

Minnie: "Did you sing for Mr. Goodcatch last night, dear?" Winnie: "Yes, love, for nearly an hour." Minnie: "Oh, I'm so glad, darling; I always detested that man."

She was very angry, and he as cool as a cucumber. She: "Sir, I will give you a piece of my mind——" He: "For Heaven's sake, my love, don't think of it; the last time you did that you left yourself only a small fragment. Please don't rashly run yourself into mental bankruptcy."

Digitized by Google

DECOYED.

A STRIKING SERIES OF SOCIETY REVELATIONS.

TOLD BY THE DECOY HERSELF.

TWELFTH EPISODE.

A Daring Scheme.

My real father alive! It seemed incredible! Yet there were actually tears of excitement in Dr. Farnie's eyes, and there was no doubting the eagerness in his voice when he gave me the news.

"Let me go to him at once!" I pleaded. "Wherever he is, he must be sorely in need of the love I can give him. I have never been able to feel a daughter's affection for the man who sent word to Bochum for me to join him, for I felt repelled at first sight of him. But my own dear father—why, I know exactly what he must be like! Oh, let me go to him now!"

"I ought not to have told you this yet," was the doctor's troubled response. "You are so excited that you will ruin everything."

On the instant I curbed both excitement and outward impatience. If either one or the other was calculated to work harm, it should be seen that I knew how to avoid doing that, and it was a comparatively calm girl who listened to the directions now given her.

"As you value your own welfare and that of your unfortunate father," he said, "you will avoid betraying any knowledge you have gained from me. At all hazards I must pass another night under this roof, for I have still some work uncompleted which is very important indeed. Certain papers have to be secured, and if I can gain possession of them, your father will in future enjoy the income which is his by right, but of which he has for years been robbed. I have located the papers, and hope to have them in my possession before morning. All will then be ready for our departure. But if you quit the house I shall be deprived of my opportunity, and your father will be ruined."

Dr. Farnie's manner impressed me so much by its naturalness and its anxious tone that I believed every word he said, and readily promised to obey all his injunctions.

"Very well," he said. "I will go downstairs and will tell Mr. D'Alton——"

"Why call him 'D'Alton' when that isn't his name?" I asked, but was met with the grave response:

"It is better so. The time will soon come when his real name will be disclosed. Meanwhile, it is wisest not to encourage any possible slips of the tongue. As I was saying, I will tell Mr. D'Alton that you have been hypnotised into absolute docility, and that you are not merely willing, but anxious to enter the bonds of matrimony as soon as everything can be settled. You play your part properly until to-morrow, and you shall then be freed for ever from all association with this gang—that is, if I succeed in stealing your father's deeds and securities from the man who stole them from him."

"But what about my father—and Miss D'Alton—and Lord Broomville? And poor Alan Melrose? Are they all to be left at the mercy of murderers and thieves?"

I had unconsciously raised my voice at the last words, and Dr. Farnie hastily stepped to the door, unlocked it again, and flung it wide open.

"Miss D'Alton," he said sternly, "you are indiscreet, in spite of my warning! Have I not told you how much depends upon caution? Yet if that spy had been at the key-hole again, she could have heard what you said."

"Forgive me! My anxiety is to blame!" I whispered. "But I will make no more mistakes, believe me."

"Very well; I will trust you. And it may comfort you to know that all the people you have mentioned are being guarded. H'sh! Here comes somebody!"

The door was now nearly closed, but the doctor's sharp ears had detected the sound of a creeping footstep, and, giving me a warning glance, he addressed me in a voice which could be easily heard by a diligent eavesdropper.

"I am glad to hear that you have decided about that," he said. "Shall I tell your father that you like the idea of becoming a princess?"

"Yes—please do," was my obediently-spoken answer. "Tell him that I hope he will let me have a very grand wedding, too. What's the good of marrying a prince if you don't let plenty of people know about it?"

"And you really love the Prince?"

"Oh, yes! I ought to do that, anyway, after he has done me so much honour."

"Certainly. Of course, as Mr. D'Alton's daughter, you have a great position in that section of society that worships money. But there are many exclusive circles in which millions are of much less account than noble blood, and as the Princess Gorouki you will associate with royalty."

"Yes. Won't it be lovely? I wish everything could be arranged at once! I'm dying to make sure that there will be no hindrance."

"My darling child, the Prince is as anxious to expedite matters as you are, so you must go with your aunt to-morrow to buy a trousseau worthy of the occasion."

Both the doctor and I had been aware that the door had been gently pushed open, and that our conversation was being listened to. But we apparently took no notice, and we both feigned pleasurable surprise when my pretended father joined in with the above speech.

"You see," observed the now smiling doctor, "your daughter's indisposition was only temporary."

"And you are quite well again, dear?"

"I should think so," was my gay response. "If you had seen the lunch I ate, you wouldn't think that there was much the matter with me. But, I say, did you ever know such a lucky girl as I am? I can hardly believe it true that the Prince really proposed to me!"

Delight beamed all over the face of the man, who thought that at last all his schemes were turning out to his liking, and he almost overwhelmed me with suggested presents. I might have wondered where the money was to come from that was apparently to be spent so prodigally upon me, if I had not been secretly certain that if I allowed myself to fall into the trap laid for me, I should not be allowed to live to enjoy my promised splendour.

But, knowing all there was at stake, I played my part to perfection, being probably aided by Dr. Farnie, who never took his eyes off my face while the conversation lasted.

"It isn't too late to go out shopping now," I suggested. "Suppose Aunt Flora and I drive to Bond Street and Regent Street to-day?"

But, for some reason, a veto was put upon this plan, and I was enjoined to make myself as pretty as possible before Prince Gorouki arrived. He was, it appeared, ready to sign an already prepared heavy settlement upon me at once, and securities for my dowry of half a million were to be handed over to him as soon as the settlement deed had been made absolutely legal and binding.

Digitized by Google

It seemed rather a strange thing for the settlements to be immediately transferable to me, without waiting for the marriage ceremony to be actually performed. But the Prince was so infatuated that he was ready to agree to anything.

Besides, he had more than their equivalent in value ready to be handed over to him there and then, so he had nothing to lose, even if the wedding did not take place. At least he thought so. But I, for one, knew how fearfully he was mistaken, and when, during the course of the afternoon, he put in an appearance at Park Lane, my heart ached for the man who was showing all the gleefulness of a boy at what he deemed the consummation of his happiness.

I was ashamed, too, of my share in deceiving him. But I saw the absolute necessity of doing so, and I strove hard to avoid unnecessary gush, while at the same time I was careful to obey Dr. Farnie's hints and injunctions implicitly.

We had many callers during the afternoon, but none of them were admitted, though it would only have seemed natural to blazon the news of the engagement to all and sundry, and the Prince himself was in such a state of delight that he was anxious for everybody to know of his supposed good fortune.

I shall never forget that afternoon as long as I live, for I knew, only too well, why the ogres who claimed to be my relations were so determined to let Prince Gorouki speak to nobody outside their own circle until they had finished with him.

He was the head of his house, and could do as he liked both in the way of marriage, and in the disposal of his fortune. So "Mr. D'Alton" knew that the deed of settlement would be duly honoured.

But what about the half million worth of securities? They were not mentioned in the settlement deed. Therefore, if the Prince met with an accident, and was deprived of the securities, there was nothing to prove any liability towards him in the matter of my dowry!

To this end, therefore, if not to a fatal one, were the schemers arranging the whole business, and when the Prince made a move to go to his hotel, to dress for a dinner engagement of some days' standing, I gazed at him in helpless horror, for I knew not what to do—whether to ruin my father's prospects by disclosing everything, or whether to let Prince Gorouki go out to meet the fate which I was sure was mapped out for him.

"They will never let him reach his hotel alive with those securities on him! They will find some means of killing him and robbing him. Then my so-called father will claim the settlement-money in my name, and there will be nothing to show that there is anything due in return! Oh, what shall I do? What shall I do?"

"My dear little girl, I do believe that you are sorry to part from me!" murmured the Prince, kissing my hand gallantly. "But I shall see you again to-night, for I will cut one or two of my engagements. And after our wedding—next week—I shall never let you out of my sight again!"

Poor man! He had mistaken my anxiety of mind for regret at parting from him for an hour or two! And I knew not how to undeceive him! I seemed as if I neither dared let him go, nor warn him against his enemies!

It was Dr. Farnie who came to my relief, with the meaningly-spoken words: "Miss D'Alton is so happy that she seems loth to lose you for awhile. Your Highness is honoured in being the object of her solicitude, but I should think she may trust you to come back to her safe and sound."

Prince Gorouki looked haughtily at the speaker, as if he thought his intervention both impertinent and uncalled-for.

But I knew his words to be an assurance that a watch would be kept upon His Highness' safety, and that the murderous gang would be allowed to commit no more crimes. So I gave a sigh of relief, and banished all anxiety on my temporary fiancé's part.

"You have done splendidly," soon whispered Dr. Farnie, whose face, however, remained grave and mystical, as befitted the part he was playing. "You have done splendidly, and I have been assured that the honorarium will be paid if the wedding takes place."

"Do you think it will?" I asked anxiously, for I had an inward dread lest some form of coercion would be employed on me.

"Certainly not," was the reply. "Ah, Mr. D'Alton, what a proud man you must be to have a daughter lovely enough and good enough to make the grandest match of the season! She has just been asking me if there is any danger of the marriage being postponed or prevented, but I tell her that all her fears are groundless. Everything will be arranged to perfection? Is not that so?"

Mr. D'Alton had joined us, and Dr. Farnie had been clever enough to address him in a way which lulled him into greater security, while at the same time he had said enough to tranquillise me.

* * * * *

It was past midnight, and every nerve in my body throbbed with excitement, for success or failure hinged on what was being done now. Dr. Farnie had employed his eyes and his wits to some purpose while he had been here, and to-night was to see the culmination of all his efforts on behalf of his friends.

He had located the resting-place of the papers he wanted to secure, and had determined to obtain possession of them by using the gift which was to have been exercised balefully upon me. In other words, if caution and strategy were insufficient for his purpose, he meant to try hypnotism. Mr. D'Alton had forgotten that if the gift could be exercised at will on one person, it was likely to be no less potent when directed towards another, and he had never entertained the idea of being victimised himself.

Yet such was Dr. Farnie's intention, and Mrs. Sherwood had unconsciously swallowed a few drops of an opiate which would effectually keep her out of the way for a few hours.

It had been arranged between the doctor and myself that I should keep in readiness for the signal which would tell me whether my co-operation was needed or not.

It came at last in the form of a faint tap at my boudoir door, and I instantly obeyed it.

I was fully dressed, but I wore noiseless bedroom slippers, and had carefully avoided keeping on any article of attire that gave the slightest rustle, for I was as yet quite in the dark as to what I might have to do in the present crisis, except that I must be cautious not to make a sound that would betray my presence.

I carried in my hand a small bag which contained sundry letters and keepsakes which I had brought from Bochum with me, or had received from the few real friends I had made since I came to London.

All the costly jewellery with which my hateful office of decoy had been made attractive had now been left severely alone, for now that so many of my suspicions were at last shaping themselves into frightful realities, I would have nothing which had been given to me by the murderous gang from whose power I hoped to escape this very night.

Going swiftly downstairs I hid the bag where I could easily pick it up on my way out of the house. Then I looked around me, and saw just what I expected—a light shining under the door of the study, which was sacred to the use of the master of the house.

I entered the room without ceremony, and noiselessly ensconced myself behind a tall draught-screen near the window, which already hid a black brief-bag, placed there in readiness by the doctor.

Then I waited for developments.

But how the time seemed to drag! I dared not move for fear of making a noise just when somebody might be near enough to hear me, and my limbs were stiff and cramped when at last I heard the sound for which I was waiting.

Footsteps echoed softly on the thick stair-carpet, and I could tell that two persons were descending. At the foot of the stairs they stepped on to the tesselated hall, and it was easy to judge that they were approaching the study.

Digitized by Google

A moment later the door was thrown wide open.

Then Dr. Farnie and "Mr. D'Alton" came within my range of vision, and, as they walked towards the fireplace, I could see that the former was keeping his eyes firmly fixed upon the face of the latter, whose movements were precisely like those of a helpless automaton.

I knew exactly what had happened. The hypnotist had exerted his gift to some purpose, and had subjugated "Mr. D'Alton" to such an extent that he would probably do whatever he was told to do.

Sit down at this table," commanded the operator, and the "subject" slowly obeyed him.

"Empty your pockets, and describe the uses of the various keys you carry."

Without even the shadow of resistance, the subject began to place a number of articles upon the table, and I could easily see what they were. For his back was turned towards me, and in accordance with previous instructions, I had cautiously crept near enough to be able to note what had transpired.

Dr. Farnie had been doubtful of his power to keep "Mr. D'Alton" long enough in subjection if it became necessary to relax his commanding gaze even for a second, hence the necessity for my presence.

The bunch of keys lay on the table, and "Mr. D'Alton" fingered them one by one as he, in obedience to the doctor's mandate, began to speak slowly.

"This is the key of the bureau in this room, and this smaller one unlocks the sliding well in which I keep all the D'Alton papers. This next key opens the top right hand drawer. In that drawer are the records and proceeds of the New Barbary Land Development Company. This last key opens the safe which is built into the recess, and in which I stored the Graysworthy and O'Connor plunder. Prince Gorouki will help to fill that safe again soon."

My blood ran cold at these words, for they were conclusive proof that this wicked man had really committed the crimes of which I had suspected him. I wondered if he would make any more terrible disclosures. But Dr. Farnie was apparently afraid of exercising his power too long, and he interposed, in a hard, firm, staccato voice: "You will leave those keys on the table and return to your own room."

To my intense relief these orders were complied with. The hypnotised man, caught in his own trap, let the keys drop from his fingers, rose to his feet obediently, and, drawn by the doctor's magnetic gaze, walked quietly out of the room.

Now was the chance that the doctor had planned for me!

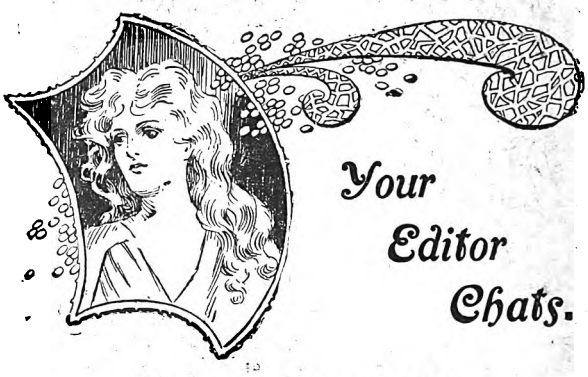
I was alone, within reach of the papers which were to restore to my unfortunate father the competence of which he had been robbed! In two seconds I had seized the bunch of keys, and had opened the sliding well in which the D'Alton papers were kept. Having secured all these, I hurriedly packed them in the brief bag, and, working like lightning, but without making any noise, I also possessed myself of the papers dealing with the New Barbary Development Land Co.

But I could not touch the safe which held that for which men had been murdered, and, putting the keys into the bag which already contained the papers, I left further investigation for other hands to perform.

The bag was now quite heavy. But I carried it into the great marble hall, and put it down beside the door while I reached my own modest property. Happily the switching on and off of the electric light was only the matter of a finger pressure and involved no noise. Neither did the opening of the door, for Dr. Farnie had already seen to that.

So, taking one last look at the Fairy fountain whose beauty had been bought by greed and crime, I gently turned the great door handle, lifted both bags, and, with my heart palpitating with dread of what might still be before me, I stepped out into the black, cheerless night.

(To be concluded.)



Our Great Easter Number.

All of you will be interested to hear that our next issue will be our Splendid Easter Holiday Number. It will, in addition to the usual features, contain the opening chapter of "Phantom Shadows," the admirable new serial story from the pen of Arnold Bennett, who is, as most of you are probably aware, one of the foremost novelists of the day. "Phantom Shadows" is a grand story. Every word of it is well worth reading, for the plot is most original, incident follows incident in rapid succession, and the characters are, as they always should be in good literature, absolutely true to Nature. "Excellent!" will be the verdict of every single reader of "Phantom Shadows," I am sure. A great charm will be lent to the story by the illustrations of Reginald Cleaver. On page 399 will be found a reduced facsimile of the picture which will be printed in colours on the cover of next week's Short Stories.

Do Unto Others.

If you have any friends to whom you think of introducing this paper, which has become so universally popular, you could not choose a better time than the present. Here we have a unique competition, the novelty of which no one can fail to appreciate, just begun, and a fine serial story starts next week. The final instalment of "Decoyed" will appear in the same issue, and will shortly be replaced by a series which everyone will read with delight. Just glance around your acquaintances, and note those who are not regular subscribers to S. S. Introduce the paper to them, and act the Good Samaritan, for you will please, first, those to whose attention you draw S. S.; secondly, yourself, by seeing their satisfaction and receiving their thanks; and, thirdly, myself and my staff, who are striving so hard to earn the hearty congratulations of the thousands of persons who can discriminate between that which is good and clever literature and that which is the reverse.

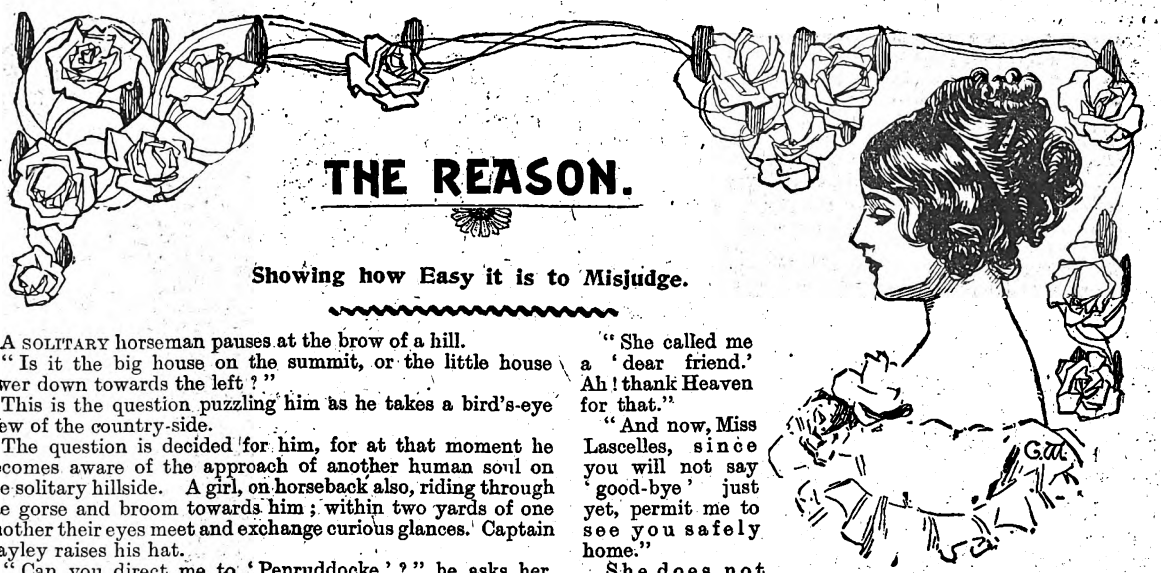
A Successful Competitor.

I consider that the most just solution to the Ninth Unsolved Love Problem, entitled "The Ordeal of David Hume," was sent in by Mrs. Tom Horne, 11 Greville Road, Kilburn, London, N.W., and I therefore award that lady the prize of one guinea I offered.

If you have not already done so, there is just time for you to make an attempt to win the guinea I offered for a solution to the problem entitled "The Heart of Claire Gilchrist," which appeared last week. All you have to do is to write down in a few words your advice to the girl under the circumstances related. All replies must reach this office not later than Friday, March 25th.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google



THE REASON.

Showing how Easy it is to Misjudge.

A SOLITARY horseman pauses at the brow of a hill.

"Is it the big house on the summit, or the little house lower down towards the left?"

This is the question puzzling him as he takes a bird's-eye view of the country-side.

The question is decided for him, for at that moment he becomes aware of the approach of another human soul on the solitary hillside. A girl, on horseback also, riding through the gorse and broom towards him; within two yards of one another their eyes meet and exchange curious glances. Captain Bayley raises his hat.

"Can you direct me to 'Penruddocke'?" he asks her, and his question solves the mystery of his presence to her.

"You are——"

"Captain Bayley."

She rides close up to him, extending a frank and friendly hand of greeting.

"I am Miss Lascelles," she informs him.

He takes her proffered hand, looking at her with an air of injured concern.

"Then my business is with you. Somehow I had pictured Miss Lascelles quite a middle-aged lady."

The shadow of a smile flits past the girl's soft eyes, leaving them all the softer for its fleeting presence.

"It is of no consequence," she says, waiving the subject at her own proud pleasure. "I had expected you; your sister wrote and told me that you would come to me as soon as possible—and I saw that the Serapis had come into dock last month."

"The end of last month. It is now only the fourteenth," he interposes hastily.

"Exactly," she says, looking past him across the broom while the sunshine slants between them.

"My sister said go to 'Penruddocke,' ask for Miss Lascelles, and into her own hands deliver this."

The girl makes a hasty gesture with her hand as though she would stay his movements. He does not observe it, and from the breast-pocket of his coat, which he had unbuttoned, he brings forth a packet which he holds towards her.

"Here it is! I am a faithful steward."

A change has crept over her face during these last few seconds—an expression of pain and fear had replaced its habitual one of imperious power. She extends her hand, it is trembling. "Thank you," she whispers brokenly, under her breath. He has averted his eyes from her; he cannot bear to witness her distress—shame—which is it?

"I have fulfilled my trust, for the sake of which forgive my previous blunders. I am glad to have met you, even so, good-bye," he says.

She is gazing at the packet he had given her with an absorbing interest. Captain Bayley lingers, loth to leave her alone. Just then he repeats "good-bye." She looks up at last.

"No—not yet—so soon—I have not thanked you; I—I—you have been very good in taking so much trouble for a stranger."

"Not quite a stranger, for you are a friend of my sister's, a 'dear friend,' she told me," smiling kindly at her.

Miss Lascelles' face lights up with a positive glow of tenderness.

"She called me a 'dear friend.' Ah! thank Heaven for that."

"And now, Miss Lascelles, since you will not say 'good-bye' just yet, permit me to see you safely home."

She does not answer in the affirmative, but turns her horse's head in the direction of "Penruddocke." "It was the little house after all," is the captain's reflection.

"Come in, I will give you some tea, and introduce you to Jack," she says, and the face she turns towards him is restored to its usual proud serenity.

The temptation thus set forth is too strong for him to resist; he accepts it.

"Jack" is her brother—a giant stripling, with eyes as blue as a girl's and the shadow of down on his upper lip, which Nature had curled imperiously like his sister's. He is very hearty in his welcome of Captain Bayley. He remembered the captain's sister, Mrs. Bob Beattie; what a jolly woman she was! Fox-hunting season nearly at its finish, lambs are early this year, and so on, and so on. By tacit consent the real object of Bayley's visit is not broached.

"You are staying in the neighbourhood, are you? Then you'll look us up again?" young Lascelles cries heartily when they are parting.

Miss Lascelles walks with them to the open door.

"Yes, come," she says. And then "good-bye."

Captain Bayley trots briskly down the hill.

"And that is Mina's friend, Marion Lascelles; she lives alone at 'Penruddocke' with that boy. Sweet soul! Poor soul!"

* * * * *

"But I liked you better,
Marion—Marion—I liked you better, Marion,
Riding through the broom."

Captain Bayley hums the words of the song lightly under his breath. Miss Lascelles looks up into his face with an indefinable expression—a flash—and it is gone.

"Why should you have liked her better then?"

"Because it was our first meeting, and I had her all to myself—just she and I alone among the broom."

"Ah! that was it," carelessly toying with a flower in the posy she is holding in her hand. "And, Marion, do you think she liked you better then, or now in twentieth century evening dress?"

"Shall I ask her?" with the ghost of a smile in his eyes.

"Perhaps you had better not. She, too, may have preferred you on first acquaintance; your vanity might possibly be hurt by such an admission on her part."

"It would not, pretty Marion. Come, there is the next waltz striking up, and it is ours."

They pass through the conservatory on their way to the ball-room in single file; and the women admire the set of

Digitized by Google

Miss Lascelles' flowing skirts, the men her white shoulders, and Captain Bayley the top of her head, on which he is looking down, five auburn curls placed zigzag, and a fluffy fringe. They had seen a good deal of one another during the past ten days. First, there was that meeting on the hill, then a formal call which ended in a sociable meal, then a day spent pottering with the foxhounds, another call, and to-night the ball.

"Look at Bayley! That's his third dance running with Marion Lascelles—seems a case, eh?" drawls Carnegy to Mrs. Wylie, who is their mutual hostess.

"I hope not," testily; "Marion Lascelles is a flirt."

"And Bayley as jealous as the grave——"

"It would never do."

If they could have followed the "unsuitable couple" into the conservatory during the supper hour, and seen and heard what took place there! Miss Lascelles can never remember how it came about, only her astonishment that this man, above all others, should express sentiments of love to her.

"You love me?" she exclaims, and then changing the emphasis to "you love me?"

"Yes; why not?" a sudden gloom possessing him as he begins to realise that this may not prove a happy wooing for him.

"Why? Oh, you know very little of me——"

"It is not knowledge, it is instinct which prompts love," Laurence Bayley declares with an impatience that will brook no delay. He will have his answer. "I love you—do you care for me?"

Marion touches him with an imperative gesture.

"If you know, you have been unwise in your choice of time; if you do not know, there can be nothing between us."

"You are speaking in riddles," he returns coldly. "I know you sufficiently well to believe that you are necessary to my happiness. I do not love lightly, and for me there can be no cure, that is, if you refuse me. But you will not?" breaking off into sharp intreaty.

Her brows are knit in pain, she does not answer him.

"You will—you do. I was a fool to imagine that you might care for me, and yet you have encouraged me, drawn me on in a thousand different ways. Well, it was a dream, and short-lived," and he turns from her.

"Laurence, do not go. I love you, I love you." She has flung her scruples, her prudence, to the winds just in this one moment of passion, and is clinging to him. "You were quite right; I drew you on; I wanted you to care for me; I did not stop to consider. Can you ever forgive me?"

"For loving me?" with the brightest smile he had ever given her.

"No, no, no," wrenching herself from his arms, "I have been mad—wicked—dreaming; we must not—you must not do that. Turn your face away; do not look at me. I am not what I appear to be. You can never marry me!"

"Marion!"

"It is true. I swear it. You are a good man, a stern man. I have gauged your character—I know its strength and its weakness. You could not overlook my fault. We must part."

Captain Bayley is stunned. He stands staring helplessly at her.

"We must part," she repeats, and looks for him to say "No."

But he does not.

She leaves him standing there to search for her brother, and induce him to forsake the festivities with her.

There is something glittering on the tesselated floor at Captain Bayley's feet. He stoops to pick it up—it is a fine, gold chain, slipped through a wedding-ring.

He can understand now why she cannot marry him, and the knowledge makes his heart bitter.

* * * * *

Jack watches his sister suspiciously as she opens a note which has been awaiting her. It is addressed in Captain Bayley's hand-writing; there is a regimental crest on the envelope. Marion had come in from her morning ride, pale and listless still, but her face brightened, and her step regained some of its old elasticity as she perceived the note lying on the table. Jack turns his back for a moment, and takes one, two, three puffs at his cigarette; then something which is not merely vulgar curiosity moves him to look towards her again. She has fallen forward in her chair with her face resting upon the table.

"Marion, what is it?" springing to her side. She lifts her face, white as ashes, towards him.

"It is this!" she says, and holds up a fine gold chain which is passed through a wedding-ring.

* * * * *

His Majesty's troopship Euphrates is lying in Portsmouth harbour. On the morrow she will slip her moorings and set sail for Bombay.

Captain Bayley is staying at the "Queen's Hotel," Southsea; he is thinking of the morrow—with little regret, though, for all places are alike to him. He has dined, and is now smoking a course of cigarettes on the balcony, looking out over the sea which is washing the shores with a gentle splash, monotonous in its sound.

Somebody below is feebly drumming on the piano, singing songs at intervals. Captain Bayley is a patient listener to "Home, Sweet Home," with variations, "Good Old Jeff" song, more "Home, Sweet Home," and variations, "The Wearing of the Green" song, "Rule Britannia," played, that is thumped, with spirit, and then—"Confound it!"

This ejaculation is wrung from him, for that musical soul below had struck up "Marion."

"I liked you better—
I—liked—you—better—Marion,
Riding through the broom."

"Confound it!" and, swinging round, he finds a civil waiter at his elbow.

"A gentleman, sir, to see you. He is following me up, sir."

Captain Bayley stalks into his private sitting-room on the balcony, and finds there awaiting him—Jack Lascelles.

It is his first impulse to rush forward with outstretched hand of welcome, but a stern expression on the boyish face of his visitor deters him. He says instead: "Good evening," coldly, too.

"I have no doubt you are surprised to see me," commences the lad; and with his lip curled so, he reminds Laurence forcibly of his sister; "I saw your name down as sailing in the vessel which goes out to-morrow, and I felt that this was my last and only opportunity of seeing you. I went to your club, and they told me that I should find you here to-night, so I came."

"Yes," inquiringly, shutting his ears to that tune, "Marion," which is haunting him. "Can I do anything for you? What is it?"

The boyish blue eyes darken. "You can do nothing for me. I have taken considerable trouble for the purpose of enlightening you regarding a portion of my sister's history. It is right that you should know it. I tell you, striking his clenched fist against the palm of his hand excitedly, it is right and fair and just to her. God knows what you think, how you have misjudged her—you shall do so no longer. I am determined that you shall hear the truth to-night, when it is too late for you to make your peace with her, even if you felt so disposed."

The elder man bows his head; he is prepared to listen.

"Marion married when she was at school at the age of sixteen," he commences abruptly. "Hers was a runaway match, contracted without the knowledge or sanction of our father, who was then alive. The man was a worthless villain, and deserted the girl who had risked so much for his sake a few days after their marriage. Marion returned to her father's protection on one stipulation—that she should assist him in concealing her story from the rest of the world. There seemed no necessity to blazon it abroad, and so she was known still as Miss Lascelles. About a year ago chance led to the discovery of the whereabouts of Marion's husband. He was at Bangalow, and we learnt that there he subsequently met with an accident at polo, which ended fatally. Letters Marion had written him fell into your sister's possession, and so she knew the truth. This was the packet she intrusted you with. If you doubt the authenticity of my story, she can corroborate it. Now I have finished, I will neither excuse nor explain further."

Digitized by Google

"Stay! stay!" calls Bayley imperiously. Jack turns at the door. "It is too late," he reminds him, "too late for you to attempt to win Marion's forgiveness, or I should not have come to you with the history of her wrongs."

"God help me, that is true," groans Laurence. "And yet I thank you for coming. I acted according to my lights, but I loved your sister. Believe this. God bless you!"

And with that blessing ringing in his ears, Jack goes.

On the morrow, H.M.S. Euphrates sails. Jack goes home to his sister, but says not a word of the steps he had taken to vindicate her lost reputation in the eyes of the man who should have believed in her more completely — trusted her more fully. For the next few weeks he watches her carefully, noting the returning elasticity to her step, the colour to her cheeks, with brotherly tenderness. She will get over this new sorrow. Poor Marion, she was very young when she first learnt to suffer!

"There are not many brothers in the world like you, Jack," she remarks inadvertently one day.

Lascelles breaks off in the midst of a tune he is whistling to return her compliment.

Gradually Miss Lascelles drops out from the old circles in which she had been courted and admired; the pair live more quietly than ever, seemingly content in each other's society. Then a day falls when "Penruddocke" is given up, and the Lascelles quit the country-side.

* * * *

It is Chance which fashions and changes our lives; Chance—Heaven-sent, or otherwise. Captain Bayley is inclined to vote for the former, when a turning in Piccadilly brings him face to face with Jack Lascelles one sultry afternoon in July. The younger man would have passed on with the barest possible recognition, but Bayley stands still in the road before him, and holds out his hand. "You would not pass me, Lascelles, if you did but know how anxiously I have looked for such a meeting. It is three years since we met—an eternity of time! And how has the world been faring with you? They told me you had sold 'Penruddocke'—I have just been staying in those parts."

Lascelles' generous heart relents within him: he cannot resist this hollow-eyed, haggard man, who just resembles the haughty, handsome Bayley of three years back—besides, at times, he is inclined towards the belief that Marion's is a wasted life. She loved Bayley better than he deserved—it is the way with women.

"I am sorry to see you looking so seedy, Bayley—sick leave, I suppose."

"Yes; I was wounded in a skirmish about a year ago and have had a baddish time ever since; however, this climate will soon set me up again. Your sister, Lascelles, how is she? Where is she?"

Jack says quietly: "Come and see."

Marion Lascelles—for by that name she is still known—is alone in the drawing-room of their little house in Mayfair—when Captain Bayley walks in. "Marion," he says, "I have come back—can you ever forgive my cruelty to you in the past?"

What, think you, was her answer?

Jessie Chalmers.

THIS WILL INTEREST YOU.

This is a reduced facsimile of our next week's cover. The picture shows Mr. Theodore Racksole, the American millionaire, and his daughter Nella, in the dining-room at a great London hotel. He orders Jules the waiter (who is involved in a villainous scheme to kidnap a reigning prince) to bring him a steak and a bottle of Bass. Jules refuses to carry out this strange request, and it costs Racksole £400,000 to have his own way. The endless complications that ensue are related with thrilling intensity in "Phantom Shadows," the splendid new serial that starts in next week's SHORT STORIES.

Digitized by Google

BY STRENGTH OF WILL.

Relating the Story of a Flirtation and its Results.

There is a pool a little more than a mile from the town of Windham, in one of the loveliest bits of landscape in the country. From its great depth and stagnation, its waters are intensely black, and the clouds by day and the stars by night are reflected in it as in an ebony mirror.

It has an ill-repute in the neighbourhood, and is little frequented, in spite of the beauty in which it is set. The wild flowers on its banks die unplucked, and the frogs that live on its borders croak through the long evenings in undisturbed contentment. On one side a rock, some twenty feet in height and crowned with a clump of short trees, rises perpendicularly out of the water.

Upon this rock, one evening late in August, sat a man and woman, who had evidently chosen the spot for its absolute seclusion.

The man was a fine-looking fellow of thirty, tall and strongly built, with a light beard, curling yellow hair, and large, full-lidded, hazel eyes.

His own opinion of himself was pretty evident in his careless expression of self-satisfaction and confident air. Not bad at heart, an observer of men might have said, but utterly weak and spoilt.

His companion sat watching him intently with an expression of mingled anxiety and impatience. She could have been no more than eighteen, but there was a firmness and energy in her face which gave her an older air than belonged to her years.

She was not beautiful after any type; her features were too pale and irregular. But her bright brown eyes, shadowed by heavy, arching eyebrows, her sensitive mouth, and evident refinement and intelligence, would have been extremely attractive to a man less in love with himself than the person beside her.

Her chief charm, however, was in her figure, slim and luxuriant, full of soft curves, and graceful in a certain leopard-like way which had something very characteristic in it.

She was the first to speak.

"You are going away to-morrow, then," she said, with an undertone of agitation in her voice.

"Yes," responded the other. "Thanks to you, I have spent a charming holiday. Do you know, I shall quite regret it."

"Indeed!" said the girl, with an accent of sarcasm. "Not the least pleasure of your retrospect will doubtless be that you have succeeded in making unhappy an unsophisticated country girl."

"Now, my dear Helen," exclaimed her companion, "why will you take that tone with me? I explained my position fully. I told you that I was going back in the autumn to be married. That should satisfy you. A fellow can't break a promise, you know."

"But he can break every unwritten law of honour," returned the girl fiercely. "He can live a lie; he can delude and desert the innocent for a little amusement. He can prove himself to be utterly heartless and utterly selfish. All this it seems he can do, without lowering himself in his own opinion.

"You say you explained. When did you explain? Not until our intercourse had lasted for three months; not until you had won my love and asked me to be your wife—when you had made an utter fool of me, involved my reputation, and connected our names together throughout the village. Then you explain that you never intended to make me your wife—that it was all a flirtation, and that you were engaged to another woman, whom you intended to marry."

"You are becoming tragic, Helen," said the young man, uneasily. "Why can't you be sensible and make the best of it?"

"You really believe that I shall submit without a murmur?" she asked, in a low, harsh tone. "You are sure that this is the last of it?"

"I can't really see what can be done about it," said the other, with a yawn. "If you were so foolish as to take my talk seriously, and form any expectations upon it, why, you are to blame—not I. You had better be philosophical, shake hands, forget and forgive all, and find some other fellow who will appreciate your incontestable attractions better than I do."

"Now listen to me," cried the girl, springing to her feet. "I tell you, Jarvis Darnley, this is not the end of it. The love of a woman like me does not die; it becomes hate—hate as intense as the love you do not deserve. A will like mine does not submit to insult and wrong; it revenges itself. This is to be no folly of a summer to be laughed over and forgotten. There will be a sequel."

"What do you mean to do?" asked Darnley, rising in turn and looking at her in some alarm. "I hope you are not going to be rash."

"I am going to make you repent every hour of this summer!" answered the girl wildly. "You shall bitterly regret every lie you have told me, every treacherous kiss, every false look. Henceforth it shall be the business of my life to do justice between us. Remember my words in the time to come, when your wife caresses you, when your children gather at your knee."

Her voice, which had been pitched in a sharp, high key, suddenly sank into a low, trembling sob.

At this sign of womanly weakness all of Darnley's confidence returned. He broke into a loud laugh.

"Well done!" he cried. "Some day Helen Fielding will be known to the world as a superb tragic actress. Come, now, pay me for my flattering prophecy. Kiss me and forget this rubbish."

He stepped towards her as he spoke with his arms extended; but she shrank back with a visible shudder.

"Do not touch me!" she exclaimed. "Your words are an insult."

But he continued to advance, and she to recede, motioning him off with a gesture of disgust.

In the gathering darkness neither of them saw how near they had approached the edge of the rock. A frail hedge of briars screened the sheer brink of the precipice, and already Helen stood pressed close against it.

Another backward step and her foot slipped. She struggled desperately and silently for a second to recover her balance; then, with a shrill cry, dashed through the bushes, tearing her garments and savagely wounding her face and hands, and plunged into the pool with a heavy, horrible splash.

Digitized by Google

For an instant Darnley stood dumb and terror-stricken. A few shreds of the unfortunate girl's clothing floated from the bushes; the thorns were stained with her blood, invisible in the darkness. Below he could hear a faint sobbing, a frenzied splashing, then all was silent.

Darnley was not bad at heart. A sense of awful pity for the poor girl seized upon him. He looked wildly round for the means of rescuing her.

He was a good swimmer, but to have plunged after the drowning girl off the cliff would have been to risk striking some concealed rock, even if the fall from such a height did not stun him.

He ran rapidly down the rock towards a point where the shore of the pool shelved into the water. When he reached the spot the surface of the pool was blank; the girl's figure had disappeared.

An uneasy ripple upon the water, a gentle waving of the reeds growing in the shallows, alone told of the terrible tragedy which had just occurred. Utterly unnerved, Darnley sat down and buried his face in his hands.

Although the poor girl's death had been an accident, he felt like a murderer. She had died with reproaches upon her lips, and he began to wonder if, after all, he had not been responsible for her destruction.

For the first time in his life the little manly feeling of which he was possessed rose and smote him with a sense of shame and remorse.

What had seemed before only the amusement of an idle hour now assumed the proportions of a crime. The drama of folly had ended in death.

Hot tears of sorrow and terror trickled through his fingers; like the weakling that he was, he wept over the consequences of his own selfish heartlessness, more in pity for his own misery than for the wrong he had done.

Presently he rose, and, after searching accessible parts of the shore, shuddering at every floating leaf, fearing to see in it an upturned, accusing face, he turned his steps towards the town.

He reported the circumstances of the disaster to the police, reserving only the events which led up to it.

As he was commonly supposed to be the girl's lover, no suspicion rested upon him.

The pool was dredged, but nothing was found. The dim, watery caverns had swallowed their prey and would not disgorge it.

After the necessary legal forms had been complied with, Darnley left the town in mad haste.

Whether in her wild threats the girl had had a prevision of her sudden death, he could not know, but it was none the less certain that the memory of her haunted him like an accusing spectre for many long months. Already, as she had foretold, he bitterly regretted the folly of that summer, and would have willingly given ten years of his frivolous life if it had never occurred.

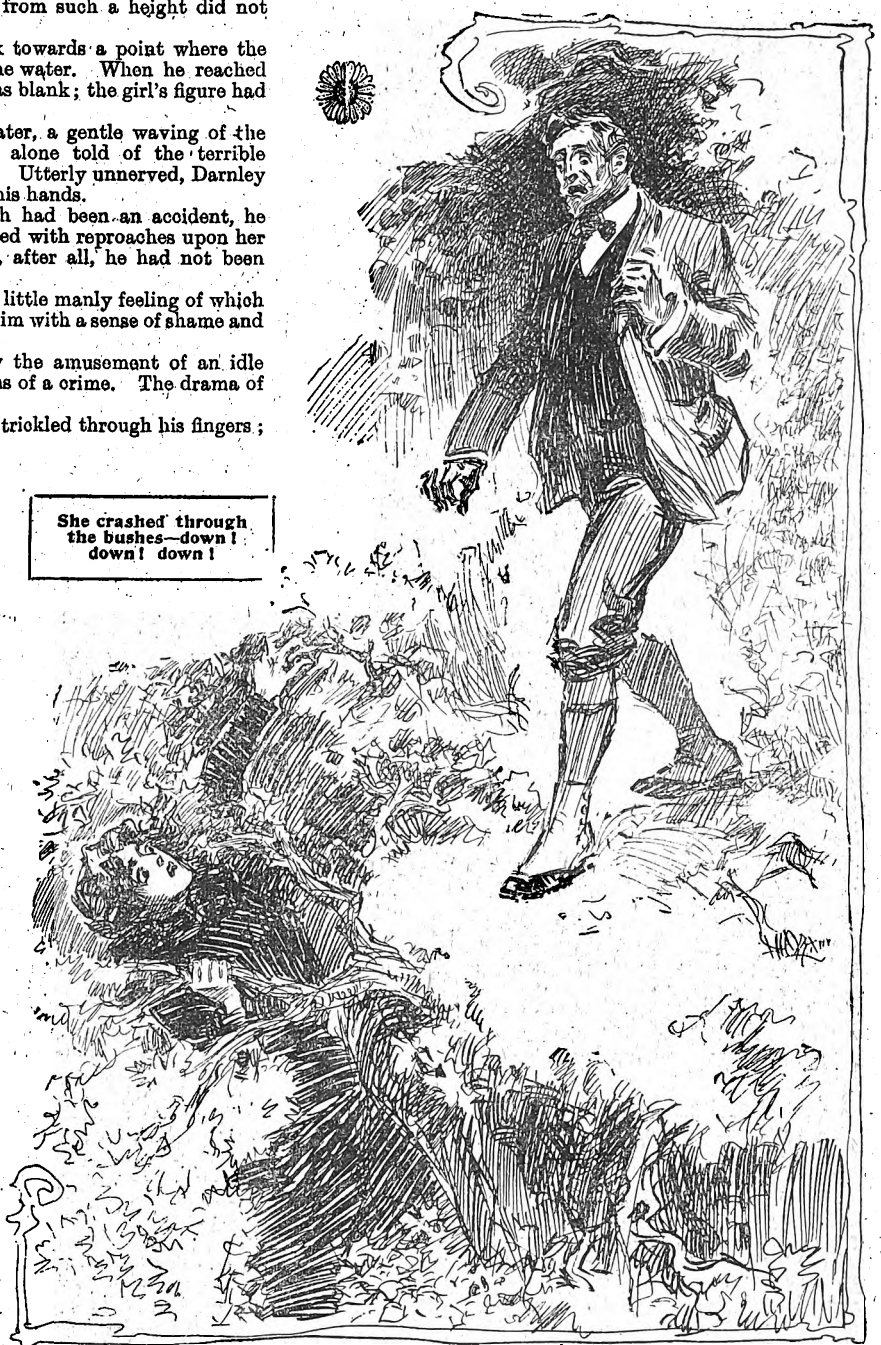
On such men as Darnley even the most painful experiences can make no lasting impression.

In the course of time the events at Windham faded away into an unpleasant shadow.

If there were moments when Helen Fielding, her unfortunate love and miserable death, returned to his mind, he had not much difficulty in banishing them again.

He married a meek little light-haired woman, the exact contrast of Helen, who admired and feared him to his heart's content.

He had never told her the particulars of his connection with Helen Fielding's death, and she had never annoyed



She crashed through the bushes—down! down! down!

Digitized by Google

him by referring to that unfortunate event when she found how distasteful it was to him.

To all appearances, then, Helen Fielding's menaces had proved as vain as her love, and Darnley was not likely to pay for his folly and cruelty as heavily as they deserved.

* * * * *

Six years after their marriage, Mrs. Darnley's health, never of the best, became entirely broken. She was confined to her room, a hopeless invalid. She had meantime presented her husband with two children—little girls—upon whom the whole power of his weak nature became concentrated. They constituted his sole pleasure and care, and his love for them was such that he often declared that if any evil should happen to either of them, it would kill him.

Their mother's illness prevented her from taking charge of them, and a friend of Mrs. Darnley's recommended to her a young woman, whose education and refinement made her at once a suitable governess for the children and a companion for the invalid.

Her name was Ellen Meadows, and she had suffered from some accident in her early youth which had terribly marred her features.

When Jarvis Darnley first beheld the new governess, he was conscious of a strange repugnance towards the unfortunate woman. She was still young, but there were traces of grey in her dark hair.

Her face was wretchedly scarred, so dreadfully indeed that its whole appearance must have been changed. Her deep brown eyes alone retained their beauty, and when Darnley met their quiet glance fixed upon him he had a dim and annoying sense of recognition. Yet from the woman's history it was plain that he could never have met her before.

His unaccountable dislike for Miss Meadows was so intense that he suggested her dismissal to his wife. But the invalid woman had taken a strong liking for her new companion, and insisted upon retaining her. Moreover, she had completely gained the affection of the two children; so, in spite of himself, Darnley was compelled to submit to her presence.

She proved herself to be a quiet, efficient person, rarely appearing in the lower parts of the house, and more rarely speaking in Darnley's presence.

But more than once he detected her eyes fixed upon him with a strange look, that, though he could not divine its meaning, sent a cold thrill to his heart.

In spite of his dislike, however, she soon gained a certain influence over him, as she had already done over the rest of the household. It was like a fascination. He found himself inquiring after her on his arrival home. He listened eagerly to the tone of her low voice when she spoke. She had but to suggest a wish, and he eagerly fulfilled it.

Yet it was nothing like affection that he felt for her; his old distrust and dislike clung to him through all. He sometimes wondered if she had not bewitched him. And the worst of it was that when she was near, no matter what might be going on, that terrible night on the cliff, Helen Fielding's menaces and her dreadful death, came back so vividly as to terrify him. He could not account for this, and very soon ceased to try.

As if the angel of misfortune had entered his home along with the governess, a series of disasters began to afflict the household. Mrs. Darnley's illness took an alarming turn, and the physicians declared that nothing more could be done for her.

Miss Meadows nursed her through all as if the invalid had been her sister. Often Darnley would see her through the open door of the sick-room leaning over the invalid until far in the night.

To Darnley the governess' attitude at such times seemed sinister—as if she were rather watching for the approach of death than endeavouring to ward it off.

But what could he do? At best his suspicions were those of a man half-crazed; and, besides, he was powerless to have banished the woman—as powerless as a bird is supposed to be under the eyes of a snake.

Finally, the long-expected death of Mrs. Darnley occurred.

On the day after her burial there was a gentle rap upon the door of the room in which the stricken widower had secluded himself, and Miss Meadows entered, leading his two children by the hand. The governess began the interview by saying:

"I have come to know what change, if any, you propose to make in your household. Is it your wish that I remain in charge of your children, or go?"

The two children clung to her with a cry of dismay. The elder, turning her eyes boldly upon her father, said:

"She shall not go, papa. If she goes, I will go with her."

Darnley looked at his child with a startled glance.

"Do you love Miss Meadows more than you do me?" he said, with a painful effort at pleasantry.

The child seemed puzzled; a strange, wondering expression came into her face.

"I don't know," she replied slowly. "I don't think I love her. I can't tell what it is. Only she must stay. She shall be my new mamma."

Her father rose and began pacing the room with agitated steps. Now, if ever, was the time to assert himself—to free his life from the strange bondage this woman had thrown upon him. He resolved that, cost what it might, she should go. He turned towards her and opened his lips to give her a polite but firm dismissal, and encountered her gaze fastened upon him. Something in the bright, steadfast depths of her eyes seemed to paralyse his will. He stammered, hesitated, and was silent. Then, drawing a long breath, like a man in a dream, he muttered:

"Stay and be a mother to my children.!"

The governess bowed silently and left the room with the children, while Darnley sank down in his chair in a paroxysm of absolute terror. What was the secret of this woman's control over him? He disliked her—feared her, too, for that matter—and yet he was utterly powerless in her presence.

It seemed that the mysterious influence of evil which had fallen upon his house was not yet satisfied. His younger child fell dangerously ill. Again the governess was the indefatigable nurse. Again the wretched father saw her brooding over his child's crib through the silent hours of the night, and again the superstitious terror seized upon him.

In his extremity he made the family physician his confidant. He revealed all his distrust and alarm, and was told in as many words that it was his own mind that was wrong, disordered by his grief and anxiety. The child was suffering from a very common complaint, and the governess was doing all that lay in her power for its welfare.

Nevertheless, Darnley's mysterious forebodings proved only too true. The child died, as its mother had died, in the arms of Miss Meadows.

The governess brought the news to him, standing impassibly near the door, while she spoke in a slow, measured tone. Darnley started up with a cry.

"Oh, what have I done to deserve this?" he said.

"There are those who tell us that each sorrow is the punishment of a crime," said the governess coldly. "Are there no passages in your life to which this suffering is a sequel? Have you worked no misery to others equal to that which you feel now?"

Darnley turned about and glared at her. Something in her words or her voice had seemed like a recognition.

"Who are you, in Heaven's name?" he cried.

"Ellen Meadows, your governess," she answered calmly.

Darnley sat down and covered his eyes with his hand; when he looked up again, he was alone.

He had not yet finished with misfortune. His elder daughter, his favourite, had contracted the disease of which her sister had perished, and rapidly grew dangerously ill.

Once more the governess hung over her like a mother, living at her bedside, nursing her with such skill and care as won the hearty commendation of the physician.

Darnley, in the midst of his grief, was tortured with his former terrors. He walked the house like a maniac, neither sleeping nor eating. He stealthily watched every movement of the governess, but could discover nothing tangibly wrong in her actions. He saw that she was indeed what she seemed, a tireless and affectionate nurse.

Digitized by Google

Nevertheless, there was something terrible in the persistence with which she clung to the bedside. Her black-robed figure, crouching over the child, her eyes fixed with an intense, immovable gaze upon the sleeper's face, reminded him of the old stories of vampires which he had read in his youth. Yet, when he reasoned with himself calmly and collectedly, he could see how wild and irrational his doubts of the governess were.

The end which he had foreseen came at last. One night as he was watching the sickroom, through the half-open door, the governess made a sudden movement, then rose and held the candle over the child.

By its light Darnley could see the woman's face, and its expression terrified him.

A strange, almost agonised smile passed over her lips; a look of mingled sorrow and triumph shone in her eyes. She murmured a few undistinguishable words and set the candle upon the table again. Darnley burst into the room with a frenzied gesture.

"She is dead!" he cried.

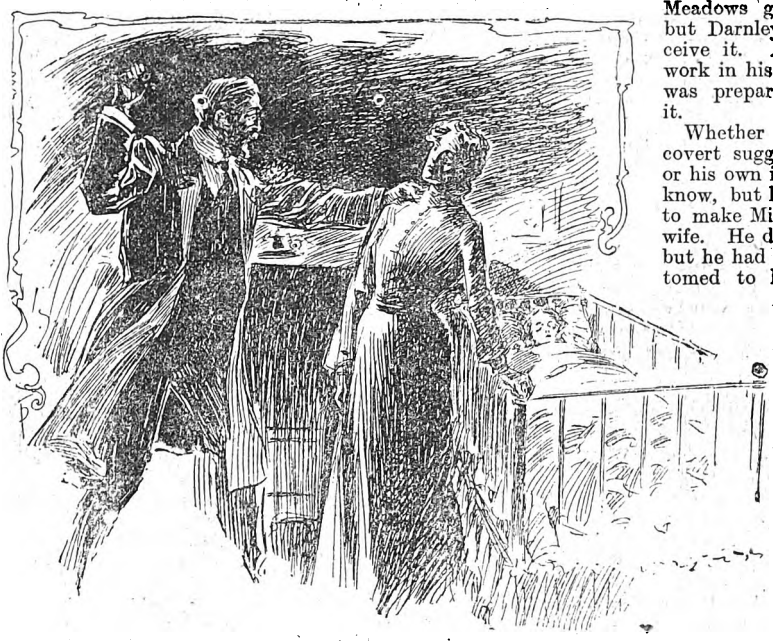
The woman turned quietly and looked at him.

"Yes," she said. "I expected it."

"You hoped it!" shouted Darnley. "Murderess, I saw your face before I entered the room. You have killed my child."

She made no reply, as if she disdained his accusations as the ravings of a maniac.

"Do you hear me, woman?" he cried. "You have murdered her as you did her sister and her mother. How, I do not know. But ever since you have entered this house evil has fallen upon me. Tell me what you have done; confess, or, by Heaven, I will do justice on you with my own hands!"



"Murderess! You have killed my child!"

He had seized her fiercely by the shoulder, and glared into her face with a threatening look. She neither moved, nor resisted, but returned his glance with cold, defying eyes.

"Strike," she said, in a low, deep voice. "You who have seen a woman drown before your eyes need not hesitate to kill another."

Where had he heard that voice before? Where had he seen that look? And, above all, who was it that recalled that terrible night on the rock to him again at the deathbed of his child? He relinquished his hold upon her and staggered back.

"Who are you?" he asked, repeating the question he had asked her before.

"Ellen Meadows," she replied, as she had replied before.

He turned away, and, reaching his own room, he knew not how, fell upon the floor in a deep swoon.

A fortnight passed in the dreary hallucinations of brain fever before he opened his eyes to sunlight and reason again, a strangely altered man.

The first object that met his gaze was the governess, sitting near the bed quietly sewing.

A mental revolution had taken place in him during his illness. He no longer regarded her with abhorrence. He forgot that he had accused, and more than half-suspected, her of having destroyed his wife and children.

All that had merged into a dream, a part, it seemed, of his delirium. He was glad to see her there. He was pleased to think that she had nursed him through his illness. He did not puzzle himself over the change in his feelings. It satisfied him that it should be so.

Her constant devotion at the bedsides of his children and himself had broken the governess' health. She was plainly very ill, too ill to leave his house when he was able to be about again.

It was a part of his strange mental change that he should now devote himself to her. He came to think of little else than her welfare, moving about with a weak, dazed air that was now habitual to him. He obeyed her slightest wish.

As time went by, Miss Meadows grew no better, but Darnley did not perceive it. An idea was at work in his mind, and he was preparing to execute it.

Whether it was some covert suggestion of hers, or his own idea, he did not know, but he had resolved to make Miss Meadows his wife. He did not love her, but he had become accustomed to her; moreover, he said to himself that he ought to make her some sort of reparation for his former injustice to her.

He did not see the strange gleam of triumph in the governess' eyes when he proposed to her. He merely saw that she seemed to be pleased, and that she would make no objection to his wishes.

He insisted that there should be no delay, and she did not remonstrate. With a terrible effort of her will, she conquered her increasing weakness and deceived him with hopes of her speedy recovery.

The wedding took place quietly, and with none but the necessary witnesses; when it was over, she seemed feverishly anxious to be left alone with her husband.

When they were together, she turned suddenly towards him and said:

"Do you know that I shall not outlast the day?"

He stared at her in speechless dismay.

"Oh, no!" he cried. "You are needlessly alarming yourself and me."

"I speak the truth," she said. "I know very well that my end is approaching, and before I die I must reveal my secret." She feebly rose and stood before him. "Do you remember, Jarvis Darnley, a certain night, seven years ago, when you sat with a woman upon a ledge of rocks beside a pool near a little country town? Do you remember that that was the last scene in what to you had been a pleasant Summer comedy, and to her a deep and sorrowful tragedy? You had deluded her and broken her heart for a little amusement. She had trusted you, and you had laughed at her faith in you. Do you recall how she met her death?"

Digitized by Google

"Why speak of that now?" said Darnley anxiously. "It was all over years ago. There was no reparation to be made."

"She told you," continued his wife hoarsely, "that she would exact justice from you to the full—that she would repay you every pang you had ever cost her. Jarvis Darnley, she has kept her word. I am Helen Fielding!"

Darnley made no reply. The weak mind of the poor wretch was absolutely paralysed. He could only stare and groan.

"I was not drowned that night. I fell into the water so near the shore that, by the aid of some bushes, I succeeded in crawling out, numbed, dazed, and cruelly wounded. These scars are the seals of that night's work. Knowing you would search for me, I hid until you were gone.

"I could no longer face my friends after what had happened; besides, for all my purposes, it was better that I should be thought dead. Therefore, I left the place secretly that night. You are the only living being who knows that my bones are not lying at the bottom of that pool. I came to this town and hired a lodging near you, where I could keep you under my eye.

"At the proper time I entered your family. You did not recognise me; I was too cruelly changed. Then my vengeance began. Jarvis Darnley, there is such a power as Will—a power stronger than material weapons, and, supported by such wrongs as mine, it was invincible. I did not destroy your wife and children by material means, but I willed that they should die. I concentrated my whole energy into the hope and wish, and I succeeded. I willed that you should be under my influence and that you should marry me. I have accomplished all.

"The wrong you did me seven years ago has been bitterly expiated. For every pain I suffered you have been repaid. The justice you were too heartless to do me then you have done me to-day. I am satisfied."

As she finished, her voice failed and her face whitened out to the colour of marble. With a low sigh, she fell back and died, with a strange, sad smile upon her lips.

When the servants entered the room, they found Jarvis Darnley sitting upon the floor, playing with his fingers and laughing inanely to himself.

The weak remains of his mind had gone. Bitterly had he expiated his folly and sin. But by what occult means the strange woman had justified herself—by what mysterious force or mental power—must be left to the better science of a future day to discover.

Charles L. Hildreth.

The son of the clergyman who performed the marriage ceremony told me this story.

On the evening of a dark and lowering day in late autumn a closed carriage was driven to the door of an inn in a manufacturing town of Derbyshire, from which alighted a woman closely cloaked and veiled. She seemed to know that the landlord was a kind-hearted man, and one to be trusted. She called him aside, and said, without raising her veil but in a voice of rare sweetness, and evidently that of a young person:

"I must trust you, good sir, with more, perhaps, than life. I wish you to serve me without asking a question. I can give you my word, in the outset, that no harm can come to you on my account in any legal way. I must be married. I must be a wife within this hour; and you must find me a husband. I only ask that you will find a man who can legally take a wife; a man, not a rascal; and a man who will take three hundred pounds and give his solemn pledge never to seek me, nor to speak to me after the final word of the marriage ceremony shall have been pronounced. If you can find such a man, and bring him hither, and then bring a willing clergyman, you will do me a great favour."

"But the license, madam."

"I am provided. I have a special licence, wanting only the name of the bridegroom."

It took the host some little time to make up his mind that the lady was in earnest, and that all else was right so far as the law was concerned. When he was satisfied upon these points he nodded and pleasantly smiled. Just the man required was in his employ. He went out into his stables, where he found Mark Conroy at work over a favourite horse. Mark was a splendid specimen of physical and mental manhood. Nearly six feet tall, perfectly proportioned, with features regular and handsome, an eye like a well of light, and a clustering mass of nut-brown curls setting off his shapely head, he was a man such as might win the love and esteem of any woman; and the only reason why he had not married or courted one of the many damsels who sought to attract him was that his love for his beautiful horses engrossed his whole heart.

Mark heard the landlord's story, and went with him into the private apartment where the lady was, determined to have the request from her own lips; and she made it, though, when she had seen him, standing so strong and so proud before her, she faltered considerably. But she got through with it, claiming from him the pledge before-mentioned. While she spoke he tried by every means in his power to gain a glimpse of her face, but in vain. Yet he did not miss her voice. It was very sweet to his ear. He loved music, and he did not think he should ever forget the rich, pure tones of that voice. It was to him an index to her character. Never a coarse woman with such breathing of music.

"My dear lady," he said, with a respectful inclination of the head, "I will accept the money which you offer, because I think I can make a good use of it. Ordinarily I would not listen for a moment, but now three hundred pounds may be the weight in the balance that shall make my whole future; and, added to this, I may serve you. Not for a hundred times three hundred pounds would I lend myself to a plot that could work harm to yourself."

Digitized by Google

"It will save me, sir! Oh, it will save me!'

"Then I am ready."

"And—I have your promise——"

"I have given my word. It has never yet been broken, and I do not think to your harm I shall now make my first false step."

Somehow the lady appeared to be more shy than she was at first, and once or twice she moved away from Mark, as though she were afraid of him, and crouched nearer to the landlord.

Near at hand lived an accommodating rector. He came in, fully understanding the work he was to do, and after a few whispered words with the lady, he signified his readiness to proceed. The name of Mark Conroy was filled into the license, after which the work was quickly done.

"Must I sign the register?" the newly-made wife asked uneasily.

The clergyman insisted upon it. The law required it.

Mark signed his name, in a bold, strong, round hand. Then the lady took the pen, and tremblingly wrote a name, saying:

"That is not the name by which I am known, but I have a sacred right to it."

She had written "Cordelia Temple."

She gave to the rector five pounds—to the host five more; and then she counted out six crisp, new fifty pound notes to her husband. Mark took them, and put them into his pocket, and then he drew from his purse a half-sovereign of gold, and laying it upon the post of a big oaken chair, he placed the edge of his pocket-knife upon it, and with a single blow of a piece of wood he cut it into two equal parts, one of which he handed to his wife.

"Lady," he said, "I need not tell you that this, to me, is, and must ever be while I live, a serious matter. Do not tremble. You have my word! But will you not take this bit of gold, and keep it in remembrance of the man whose name you can wear when you will, and who must henceforth be true to you?"

She caught the piece of gold with a spasmodic clutch and turned away, as though to hide an emotion which she did not dare to have witnessed.

One step, and Mark Conroy was by her side. He took her hand, and raised it to his lips.

"I do this reverently," he said, almost in a whisper. "And now, lady," he added, lifting his head proudly, and stepping back, "know that I shall be true to the vows this night taken upon myself. If, in the time to come, Mark Conroy can in any way serve you, you may command him without fear. He will never intrude, and he will never take advantage of any service he may happily render. Adieu! May God and the good angels watch over you, and bless you always."

And with this he turned away, and was gone. The lady could not have spoken if she would.

"I suppose," said the landlord, as the lady was ready to depart, "that you would have this kept a profound secret?"

"No! No!" she cried vehemently. "If men should be upon my track—if they should trace me to this place—tell them that I am married. Tell them exactly what you have seen; but for his sake—my—my husband's—do not give his name. Will you promise this?"

The good landlord promised, and very shortly afterwards the lady's carriage was whirling rapidly away into the gloom towards Cheshire.

The clock in the tower of the old stone church was striking the hour of nine as the strange woman drove away from the Derbyshire inn. Two hours later—as the same bell-hammer was pealing forth the eleventh hour—another carriage was driven rapidly up, from which alighted two gentlemen—one an elderly man, with a hard, hawk-like face, and the other younger, and evidently a gentleman cad.

Mark Conroy heard the arrival, and came in to see.

The gentlemen were eager and breathless. Had anything been seen of a young lady, appearing as the man described?

Mark contrived to whisper into the host's ear, to direct his questions.

"How old was the lady?" asked the publican.

"Nineteen," answered the old man.

"Was she handsome?"

"She had the name—the shameless vixen—of being the handsomest girl in Staffordshire!"

And then the host told his story—told it as it was, all save that he represented the husband as having gone in pursuit, not to molest the lady, but to protect her into Staffordshire, for he had determined to serve her if he could.

The younger man swore a big oath, and the elder man swore a bigger. Their plans were shattered, and they were crestfallen and chagrined.

Before they went away, the younger man discovered our hero, who had remained respectfully in the background.

"Hallo, Mark, is that yourself?"

And he advanced and extended a hand with perfect freedom of manner.

"Yes, my lord. I am stopping here just now."

"Ah! Say, Mark, did you see this girl we have been talking about?"

"Why, my lord, as for seeing her, I cannot say I did; but I saw the carriage, and saw a woman get into it and whisk away."

"Well, old fellow, there went the most dainty bit of womanhood in the Kingdom. Confound it! I supposed I had her hard and fast. Sir John is her guardian, and had given her to me; but she has given us the slip. Locks, and bolts, and iron bars have been of no use. If she's been honestly married, Sir John's guardianship is at an end. But, say, Mark, I have a magnificent filly, which I wish you to take in hand. She promises tremendous things."

Mark said he would give the filly a try, and shortly afterwards the gentlemen took their leave.

"Who was that?" demanded the host, as they drove away.

"That," replied Mark, "was the Earl of Bentley—Dick Temple."

And they all went their ways in life as seemed to them best.

Mark Conroy from that night became a new man. He borrowed books, and read and studied, and went at French and German. He had said that three hundred pounds might be the making of him, nor did he make a mistake. The owner of a place near Derby—a raiser of thoroughbred stock—was glad to sell him a half-interest, and in a very few years the horses from the stables of Monkton and Conroy stood at the head of the list in England.

The Earl of Bentley let his favourite filly go to pay a betting debt, and Mark bought the animal for twenty guineas. Four years later that filly was known and celebrated under the name of Lightfoot, and Mark sold her to the Earl of Derby for ten thousand pounds, and she won the money back for her noble owner in one season.

This was but one circumstance of many. Mark Conroy had one great aim in life, and in that direction he bent every energy.

At the age of two-and-twenty he sold out all interest in his Derby property, and his funds in the hands of his bankers amounted to more than eighty thousand pounds. He had not made one mistake in all his ventures, and Fortune had literally smiled upon him.

And through it all—by day, when business seemed to entirely engross him, and by night, in the still thoughtful watches, one influence was never absent—the music of that sweet voice he had heard in the old Derbyshire inn. Oh! what should come of it? At all events, the thought held him pure and true, and led him to the station of a manhood that any man might covet, for it was pure and true, and elevated, and intellectual, and, above all else, robust in glowing, glorious health.

Eight years had elapsed since the day on which Mark

Digitized by Google

Conroy was married, and he had grown from four-and-twenty to two-and-thirty, when he took it into his head to go for a tour on the Continent. He went to Paris first, and thence into Germany. From city to city, seeking a pleasure he did not readily find, until at length he found himself in the quaint, old walled city of Ulm, on the Danube.

He was standing in the curiously-constructed hall of a quaintly-constructed inn, with innumerable nooks and corners and dim recesses, when he was attracted by the sound of a familiar voice. It was the voice of the Earl of Bentley, and he was talking with his valet, a dark-visaged, powerful rascal, evidently engaged because of his physical strength and daring.

"She will be alone in her chamber an hour after dark," said the voice of the Earl. "I have bribed her maid. My boat is at the old landing. I must not be seen here. Will you carry the lady to that boat?"

The valet said he would do it. He knew just how to accomplish the task. He would bear the lady to the boat, and she should make no outcry.

"Once she is in my power," went on the Earl, "all else is simple. We will prove her professed marriage all a sham, and she shall marry me, or——" The rest of the sentence was lost.

Conroy's heart beat hard and fast. He knew very well who was the lady alluded to. He inquired of the landlord, however, and was informed that the occupant of the suite he had designated was an English lady, who had been with him several weeks—Lady Isabel Cordelia, of Templeton. She was a beautiful woman, but evidently unhappy.

Mark Conroy found the suite of apartments, and did not lose sight of the entrance. About an hour after dark he saw the maid come out, and saw her speak with a man who was hiding in a recess. Shortly after that, this man was joined by another whom he had called by a low whistle, and the two entered the chamber from which the maid had come. A few moments, during which the watcher's heart beat furiously, and then came the sound of a smothered cry.

With a bound Conroy was in the chamber, where he saw a lady struggling in the grasp of two men. With a blow of his fist that might have felled an ox, he sent the valet to the floor; then with a backward sweep he knocked the other against the wall; and then, winding his left-arm around the lady he held her in safety, while with his right he drew a pistol and levelled it.

"Heavens!" exclaimed the valet, when he had picked himself up and looked upon the man who had knocked him down, "it's the horse-trainer, Conroy!"

"And you will find him something more than that if you do not take yourself out of this. Go, tell your master that Mark Conroy knows all, and that if he is in Ulm to-morrow morning he may suffer for it!"

The two men slunk away, and then Conroy led the lady to a seat, and would have let her go, but she clung to him. He was able to speak with comparative calmness, because he had carefully prepared himself for the meeting.

"Lady, I have not forgotten my promise. I have watched over you when you knew it not. You may command me even yet."

She looked up into his face, still clinging to his strong arm, and a variety of emotions were shadowed upon her surpassingly beautiful face.

"You are Mark Conroy?"

"I am."

"Do you know who I am?"

"I do."

"Do you know that you ever saw me before?"

"I cannot say that I know, but my heart tells me that it is so—it tells me that you have the mate to this."

And he drew from his bosom, where it had hung suspended from a silken cord about his neck, a tiny bag of chamois-skin, from which he took a semi-disc of gold.

A moment she stood irresolute, and then, while a rich glow suffused her cheeks, mounting to her temples and brow, and imparting to the lustrous eyes a living light, she drew from her own bosom, where it had been kept in a velvet pouch, the other half of the golden half-sovereign.

Conroy could contain his great heart no longer. Grasping both the lady's hands, and looking earnestly and frankly into her face, he said:

"Lady, from that hour of the other years—that hour in the old Derbyshire inn—I have kept the faith then pledged. Your voice betrayed to me a pure and worthy woman, and I have held the sweet remembrance in love and true devotion. I dare not, knowing who and what you are, ask you to share my lot; but, oh!—if you——"

She put out her hand and stopped him,

"Mark Conroy, from that same hour I have not lost sight of you. I know how you have lived—how you have thrived and prospered——"

"But," he cried, interrupting her, "you do not know that the one thought of yourself has been the blessed spirit of my uprising."

"But—I have hoped it," she said.

"You—have—hoped?"

"Oh! My husband! If you claim me for your wife, and love me always, I shall be happy!"

And so, after years of waiting, Mark Conroy found his reward; and he was not prouder nor more happy than was the Lady Isabel Cordelia, heiress of the vast estates of the Earl of Templeton. A distant cousin inherited the title, but the wealth was hers.

Lord Bentley, when he learnt the truth, not only gave up his striving and his persecution, but he descended to beg that the story of his fruitless endeavours might not be told in England.

But in England Mark Conroy and his wife lived no more. They found a pleasanter home on the Rhine, where were countrymen enough to make it home-like, and where they were estimated in Society for the grand qualities of head and heart that endeared them to all with whom they came in social contact.

Robert Macdonald.

PEARSON'S DREAM BOOK.

Giving the Interpretation of Dreams by Magic Ciphers, by the Square of Fate, by a Table of Dreams according to Days, etc., etc.

By PROFESSOR P. R. S. FOLI.

Author of "Handwriting as an Index to Character," "The Fortune Teller," etc.

Crown 8vo. Cloth, Price 1s.

Some of the subjects dwelt upon in this interesting book are:

Dreams and their Mystic Reality—They are our Sleeping Thoughts—Distinction Between Real and Idle Dreams—Wonders of Dreamland—Historic Evidence of the Uses and Interpretations of Dreams—Greek, Roman, Gallic, Indian, and Medieval, and Modern Views—Rapidity of Dreams—Doubtful Theories—Inspiring Power of Dreams—Some Dreams are Valuable, some Vain - Predisposing Causes—Dreams within Dreams—Somnambulists—Divisions of Dreams—The Dream Proper—The Oracle—The Warning—Instances of these—The Interpretation of Dreams by Magic Ciphers—The Magic Square of Fate—A Table of Dreams according to their Days—A List of Dreams, Subjects, and what they indicate alphabetically arranged—Omens, etc.

AT ALL BOOKSELLERS.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To Publisher, Short Stories,
17 Henrietta St., London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Pearson's Dream Book," for which I inclose 1s. 2d.

Name.....

Address.....

Digitized by Google

Pink and Grey.

The Tale of a Rectified Misunderstanding.

It was strange, but my cousin Fonda and I looked like twins. We resembled each other a great deal more than we did our own sisters. To be sure, there was nothing striking about either of us, though Fonda was very pretty. We were of medium height, oval faces, dark hair and eyes, and regular features. She had far more bloom and sparkle than I—as well she might have—for she was a rich man's petted daughter, while I was a poor seamstress who earned my living by the day. Fonda went everywhere, had everything. It seemed to me that I had nothing but my work. There was always plenty of that for me.

There was one thing Fonda wasn't allowed to have—that was a lover. Uncle Algernon wouldn't have one of his girls married before they were twenty-five, he said—he had seen enough of the folly of early marriages. So when Wendell Larne commenced paying attention to me, I found that I did have something which my envied cousin Fonda hadn't.

He was the best fellow in the world, was Wende, and made my life much brighter and happier. Not that he could take me to the opera and such places—Wende hadn't much money—but he could always be ready for an evening walk in the park with me, and I felt quite proud when I went to church on Sunday, my arm in his.

That Spring, Aunt Fannie—Cousin Fonda's mother—died, and they sent for me to come to Thornhill and make up mourning for the girls.

Thornhill was Uncle Algernon's country-house, about four miles out of the city. It was a lovely place, and they kept a carriage, in which the girls drove into town nearly every day.

They sent for me, and when I arrived I was shocked to see what a change grief had made in Fonda. She had wept her cheeks as white as a sheet. The other girls didn't realise their loss so much, being younger, only twelve and fourteen years old.

"Oh, Cousin Annie, it's dreadful to have your mother die—your own dear mother!" she said to me.

"I know it, Fonda, and you'll miss her more and more as the years go on!" I said.

I had.

And now that she was an orphan, too, my cousin seemed to take to me as she never had done before. Not that she had ever been unkind or slighted me when our paths came together—she was always cordial and kind—but she seemed to find my quiet ways more congenial than when she had been gay.

She looked very pretty in her mourning dresses.

"See," she said, one day, leading the way into her dressing-room, "here is my last new dress. Poor mamma had just ordered it for me. I am sure I never can bear to wear anything so gay now!"

"I don't think it is gay, Fonda. I think it is lovely!" I said.

It was pink and grey—two delicate tints of the same quality of silk combined. "And here are the hat, gloves, and parasol—the hat of the same material as the dress, the gloves beautifully matched—aren't they?—the parasol the same shade of grey lined with pink. I wore the dress once—only once!"

Fonda stood lost in reverie.

"I wish I hadn't gone that time. I wouldn't if I'd known my mother wasn't going to live!" she broke out, and then turned away to a window.

"Where, Fonda? What do you mean?"

"Oh, never mind, Annie. Do you know, I can't bear the sight of this dress now? I am going to give it to you, if you will accept it."

"To me?"

"Yes; hat, gloves, parasol—everything. Take them, Annie. The dress will fit you as well as if it was made for you."

"Oh, no, dear Fonda, I couldn't think of taking this exquisite silk! By-and-bye you will want to wear it yourself."

"No, I never shall. I give it to you, Annie. It is yours."

"I can't take it, Fonda."

But she motioned the dress towards me, and went out of the room.

I was quite nervous, and my hands trembled as I took up the exquisite, fragrant gloves. It seemed as if I ought not to take such an expensive present as that beautiful costume from anyone. I opened and shut the parasol, and then opened it again as I caught my reflection in the dressing-glass, and saw that it was very becoming.

Just as I put the things down and went to my sewing, a maid brought me a note.

"Just come, and the boy said he would wait for an answer, Miss Belton."

It was from Wende:

"My Own Dear Annie,—My father, mother, and sister are here from the country to spend a few days. I have told them about my little lady, and they are very anxious to see you. I will call for you to-morrow (Sunday), at ten o'clock, to dine with us.

"Wende."

A moment's tumultuous emotion filled me. That little note had so much signification for me—for Wende and I were not, exactly speaking, engaged. It was tacitly understood that we liked each other, that some time, perhaps, we might be married; but now that he wanted to introduce me to his family it was equivalent to announcing our betrothal. So my heart stood still for a moment, then bounded quickly, sending the blood into my pale face.

I wrote in reply, "I will be ready," and dispatched the boy.

When I came back to my work I paused again by the pink and grey dress to look thoughtfully at it. How lovely it would be to wear to-morrow! I had no new Spring things, and my winter ones were shabby—very shabby, it seemed to me, now, thinking of Wende's father and mother, and his sister, who was called the beauty of her native village. I lifted the dainty hat, with its rosebuds and pink feather. I was really pretty in it, and I did so want to wear it.

The next morning Fonda was ill—confined to her room with a sick headache, and could on no account be disturbed. So I did not speak to her about the pink and grey silk confection, for I had concluded to wear it. In the vigils of the night I decided that my brown velveteen would not do. I had a horror for looking like a shop-girl arrayed in rusty finery.

Wende would think me his "little lady" indeed. I thought, when I was dressed, I looked as beautiful as my Cousin Fonda ever did.

But I was disagreeably conscious of "borrowed plumes," and when I saw Wende's trap rolling up the avenue I shrouded my head in a large drab veil, and wrapped myself up in a long shawl.

Digitized by Google

But when we were half a mile from the house I said the wind was not so cold, after all, and put my veil in my pocket, and let the shawl slip from my shoulders.

"Why, how pretty you look, Anne; haven't you a new dress?" asked Wende.

"Yes, a present from my cousin Fonda. She has gone into mourning."

"It's very pretty. And I suppose she can afford to make you a present if she likes?"

"Oh, yes."

I saw that he was very much gratified with my appearance.

Well, Wende's father and mother were very nice people, and his sister a most lovely girl, and I had a delightful day; but at length night came, and I got into the trap to return.

"Is anything the matter with me, Wende?—anything wrong in my appearance, I mean?" I asked, as I was settling in the carriage.

"No; why?"

"That gentleman over there is staring at me so."

He was a tall, very handsome-looking young man—looking at me very hard indeed; and not with an impertinent gaze of admiration, but with a rather surprised and not very pleasant look.

"Haven't you ever seen him before?" asked Wende.

"No."

"It must be the new dress," said Wende, with a smile, as he turned the horse's head.

As the wheel ground the kerbstone, I saw the gentleman jump into a cab.

As we drove to Thornhill I told Wende I had had a very happy time, and he assured me that his family were delighted with me; and we, then and there, agreed to be married in the autumn.

When the carriage stopped at the side-door of Thornhill it was dusk, yet I distinctly saw the cab with the strange gentleman whirl by me, and I was quite alarmed; but Wende said it was only a coincidence. His way probably lay in our direction.

Well, a day or two passed. When Fonda recovered I did not mention that I had worn the dress; but I thought I would take it now.

And now I discovered that my cousin Fonda looked worse every day; then I learnt that it was something different from her mother's death which was preying upon her.

"I'll tell you Annie, for I know I can trust you," said she. "Last Christmas, one of my friends introduced me to her cousin, Mr. Forsyth Croxwood. He understood that papa and mamma would not receive young gentlemen, and so we have met at Mrs. Appleton's house all the winter and Spring. I like him ever so much, though, since mamma died, I have felt condemned for deceiving her and going to walk with him about a month ago, in that very pink and grey silk I showed you. But there is nothing wrong about it. I think I ought to be allowed to see Mr. Croxwood. Still I have not dared. He wrote me a note just after mamma died, and asked me to let him call; but I had to refuse. But last Monday I saw him going to Ethel's, and I slipped on my hat and went over. But, Annie, he wouldn't speak to me; he was downright rude! Ethel didn't know what to make of it any more than I. And, oh, I have nearly cried myself to death! It seems as if my heart would burst!"

"Do you love him so very much, Fonda?"

"I love him dearly! It is my first, and it will be my last, love!"

Now, I had lately grown very much attached to Fonda, and I secretly thought it a shame that she couldn't have a lover, so, having learnt all about Mr. Croxwood, and finished the mourning-dresses at Thornhill, I went home to the city, and, on that very first evening, called on Mr. Croxwood. It was a rainy evening, and I wore my old velveteen, though Fonda had pressed the pink-and-grey silk upon me, and I had it packed safely away among my possessions.

I called at the Albion Hotel where Mr. Croxwood was staying, and was shown into his private room.

Here I introduced myself, and had no difficulty in asserting my identity, as he assured me that I looked very much like Fonda.

"I have been deeply attached to your beautiful cousin, Miss Belton," he said, when I mentioned her name; "but I have lost faith in her. I have much desired to visit her at her home, but she has always refused me. Judge, then, of my indignation when I saw her driving, last Sunday a week ago, with a young gentleman who was freely admitted to Thornhill in the evening. She is duping me, and I will not be a plaything for any woman."

"Sunday—driving—oh!—oh!" I stammered. At length my wits returned. "Mr. Croxwood," said I, "you would like to be friends again with my cousin Fonda, would you not?"

"If it were possible; but I do not believe it is. I can never forgive deception."

"If you will come to my house to-morrow evening I will promise you information which will relieve you of this misunderstanding."

"Misunderstanding?" He shook his head.

But he promised to come.

I made my simple rooms fresh with country roses which Wende's sister had promised me, and which I had been looking for, and sent a note to Fonda to come in the evening, as I had news of Mr. Croxwood which would cheer her, I said. Of course she came.

I had been dressed an hour in the pink and grey silk, and Wende was there when the Thornhill carriage stopped at the door, and Fonda came up.

Of course she could expect no explanation before Wende, though she looked expectant, and seemed uneasy, but at last the bell rang, and Mr. Croxwood was shown in.

He stopped at the entrance, and looked from Fonda to me. Evidently he did not know which was which.

"Do not be deceived again by appearances, Mr. Croxwood," said I. "This is Miss Annie Belton; opposite is my cousin Fonda."

He advanced, looking at Fonda, pale, in her black dress, and I saw his keen eyes soften with tears.

"And this young gentleman, Mr. Wendell Larne, is the one with whom I drove a week ago last Sunday," I added, and Wende rose and bowed—with a smile.

That set the matter all right. He found a seat instantly by Fonda, and, though she was very much bewildered, she looked very happy. Wende and I managed to leave them alone a little while, soon, and then I managed to see Fonda a moment alone, and explain how I had worn the pink and grey dress.

I don't know whether his wife's death softened Uncle Algernon's heart, or Mr. Croxwood won his way somehow, but my Cousin Fonda was married that summer, and I was as happily married in the autumn.

Esther Serle Kenneth.

NEW ISSUES OF

Pearson's Sixpenny Series of Famous Novels.

THE AYRES OF STUDLEIGH,

By Annie S. Swan.

"A refreshing story of love and war."—Woman.

A HOLE AND CORNER MARRIAGE.

By Florence Warden.

"Dramatic and exciting."—Bookman.

MUSUME, The Story of an Anglo-Japanese Marriage.

By Clive Holland (Author of "My Japanese Wife.")

"Very charming."—Vanity Fair.

To be had at all Booksellers and Railway Bookstalls.

Digitized by Google

The Don't Worry Club.

And the Mission it Fulfilled.

"For Heaven's sake, Myra, stop worrying! What good does it do? Take things easy!"

"And if I did, John, I'd like to know what would become of you! Somebody has to do the worrying, and as you won't, I must. You would have been bankrupt long ago if it hadn't been for me. We can't both spend money like water! Here you come home with a new suit of clothes and overcoat when you could have worn your others another winter as well as not. I need a new dress dreadfully and now I can't have it, because you spend all the money on your precious self!"

"I declare, I never saw such a woman in my life! If there isn't any real thing to worry about, you have the faculty of hatching up one. Who said you couldn't have your frock? Go and get it, don't worry about the money; I'll attend to that. You don't see me fretting and stewing over every little thing!"

"No, because I have always done it for you. I save and save, watching the pennies while you spend the pounds."

Tears were imminent, so Mr. Miller said soothingly: "Well, there, there, ducky, don't do it any more, it doesn't pay," giving her the affectionate kiss and the pat which usually ended their little squabbles.

The next day Mrs. Miller received a message from her husband that he would not be home that night to dinner as he was invited to dine with some friends at the club.

Approaching his home about midnight, he was surprised to see the house lighted from garret to cellar instead of a dim light in the hall as on many (alas! too many) previous occasions. He wondered what was going on, and inserted his latch-key rather impatiently. Entering the sitting-room he found it deserted, but hearing gay voices in the dining-room, proceeded to investigate.

There he found his wife entertaining company.

"Why, what's all this?" said John, beaming cordially upon the merry company, but with a sinking heart at thought of the amount of gas burning all over the house.

"This is the first meeting of the 'Don't Worry' Club," gaily explained his wife. "I invited the ladies to dinner and we organised the club this evening. The gentlemen came later to accompany them home.

When the last guest had departed Mrs. Miller kissed her husband affectionately, saying:

"I'm so glad you thought of it, John; it's going to be lovely! I feel better already, and in future will take things easy; let them come as they will. If the house tumbles about our heads, I'm never going to worry any more. After receiving your message to-day, knowing that I should be alone to-night, I thought it a good time to organise, so went and invited them all to dinner. We had a lovely little dinner; everything passed off beautifully."

John was busy thinking and did not reply.

"Oh, I ordered my new dress to-day!" she rattled on. "It's going to be beautiful! I went to Perry's. Might as well have it right while I'm about it, if it does cost more. They let me have it for ten guineas. Of course I needed a hat to go with it and selected a perfect love. It's just too sweet! Oh, I feel so much better and free from care, and so glad we ormed the club!"

Mr. Miller did not sleep much that night, for figures were dancing a lively jig in his head, and he kept wishing he had not bought his new clothes. The next night when he came home to dinner his wife was absent, having left word that if she did not return he was to call for her about ten o'clock at Mrs. Brown's, as she might possibly dine there.

Mr. Miller ate his dinner alone, but everything had lost flavour, and his appetite was not up to the mark. When he had gone through the form of eating he smoked a cigar and read his paper; then becoming restless and lonely, lay down on the couch and slept, waking just in time to go Mrs. Miller at the appointed hour. "I've had a lovely time!" said she, on their way home. "I'm never going to stay alone again in the evenings after this. When you stay at the club, I'm going out too."

"But I was at home this evening."

"I know it, but I thought you could stand it once, when I have been alone many, many times."

"Well, hereafter, Myra, when you go out to dinner do not order a seven-pound joint for me to eat alone. It would be better to have a small steak and not have so much left over."

"I didn't order it. I told Sarah to get something nice for you if I didn't return, and I knew she'd do it."

"But, my dear, think of the expense!"

"Oh, I'm not worrying about that! Time enough when it comes. Don't forget that I am president of the 'Don't Worry Club,' John."

And John thought about it a great deal.

On Saturday morning the "president" said: "Well, I suppose you won't be home to dinner as it's your regular club night, and I'll go over to Mrs. Fraser's."

"Yes, I will be home. Dinners at the club cost money, and our bills will be so heavy this month with your new dress and hat, and so much company, and——"

"Your new suit and overcoat," put in his wife. "Yes, I see, but there is no use thinking of such things beforehand. Undoubtedly something will turn up to help you out."

"What, I'd like to know, but my salary?"

"But you may get a rise, or your uncle John might send you a cheque, or——"

"Did he ever send one?"

"No, but he might—you have to look on the bright side. I tell you, John, you should join a 'Don't Worry' Club, then you'd feel as happy and light-hearted as I do!"

"One member in the family is enough. I'll be home to dinner to-night. Good-bye."

"Very well, then, I'll not go to Mrs. Fraser's, for I'd rather spend the evening with you," kissing him affectionately.

That evening while he smoked she sat on the arm of his chair and smoothed the wrinkles on his forehead, which she knew were caused by the change in the state of affairs. Being tender-hearted, she really felt sorry for him.

"I tell you, dearie, let us form a club all by ourselves and call it the 'We'll-worry-all-we-want-to' Club. You do your share and I'll do mine, and we'll carry the worries together. It's too much for one, both must help. I carried the burden so long that my strength gave out, and I determined to shift the load to your shoulders for awhile. Let's have our enjoyments together, too, it isn't half so expensive."

"You are right, little woman, I'll do my part in the future."

"My dress is only to cost three guineas, John; I stretched the price a bit to frighten you, and my new hat is an old one done up. The other night when I thought it was time for you to be coming home, I sent Katie upstairs to turn on the gas and it had only been burning a short time. Now, you see, I'm not such a bad little wife, after all, am I?"

John caught her in his arms, exclaiming:

"You're a perfect treasure!" Herbert Malcolm.

Digitized by Google

And They Struck.

Papa (from the next room): "Ethel, aren't you going to light the gas in there?" Ethel: "Yes, papa; we were just speaking of—er—striking a match."

An Industrious Youth.

"Claudia, is the young man industrious to whom you are engaged?" "Industrious? Why, papa, he said he intended to propose to me a month ago, but was too busy."

Rivals in Love.

Dolly: "Jack said that he had a business engagement to-night." Dasherly: "Yes, he mentioned something to me about asking old Millyuns for his daughter's hand."

A Gentle Hint.

"Can you tie a real lover's knot, my dear?" inquired Bertie. "No," replied Masie, hiding her blushes with her fan; "but our new clergyman can do it very nicely."

No Responsibility.

"Why is it," they asked, "that you let your husband have his own way in everything?" "Because," she replied, "I like to have someone to blame when things go wrong."

She Paid Him Back.

Horrified Parent: "And you dare to tell me that you kissed that young Hankinson last evening!" Weeping Daughter: "Yes; but the—mean thing k-kissed me first!"

Demonstration.

"Clara," said her mother severely, "did I see Mr. Spoodle holding your hand last night?" "Yes; but he was showing me how he saw some people walking along the other night."

He Knows Now—Worse Luck!

He: "Tell me, confidentially, how much did that hat cost you?" She: "George, there is but one way in which you can obtain the right to inspect my millinery bills." He popped.

Good Advice.

He: "Ah, if I were rich and lovely as you are I know what I would do." She: "Marry a count, I suppose." He: "No, not at all." She: "What then?" He: "If I were you I'd marry me."

Disillusioned!

"Do you reside in this city?" asked a masked man of a masked lady at a masked ball the other evening. He felt awful when she said to him in a low voice: "Don't be so silly, John; I know you by the mole on your thumb." It was his wife.

Why Was He so Particular?

"Frank," she said, softly, "I have concluded to do without a new hat and send for mother with the money. It won't take much to pay her expenses here." "My dear," he cried, excitedly, "the idea of your wearing that old hat another day is too horrible for me to endure, and I'll never enter this house again till you get a new one."

Made Good Progress.

Miss Passe: "Mamma tells me that I did not begin talking until I was nearly four years old." Miss Young: "How remarkable! But you have caught up since then, haven't you?"

Spiteful Creature.

Rosie: "I wonder is it true that one's likely to catch something from being kissed." Maud: "Of course not. You've been kissed enough, but you haven't caught anything yet, have you?"

Distinctly Inadvisable.

Minnie: "Don't you wish we women were strong enough to defend ourselves like men?" Muriel: "No. We should lose the satisfaction of telling those hateful men just what we should like to do to them."

How Silly of Her.

Lily (earnestly): "I want to ask you a question, Bob." Bob (also earnestly): "What is it, dearest?" Lily (still earnestly): "If you had never met me, would you have loved me just the same?"

Why He Grumbled.

"I married for money," said the gloomy man. "Wasn't there a woman attached to it?" asked the cynic. "Of course there was," with increased gloom; "so much attached to it that she has never parted with a penny!"

Would She?

"Ernest," said Estelle, with a shy smile, "your glove is split. You ought to have someone to keep you in repair, and sew buttons on your coats." "You wouldn't like to—to—to be a sister to me, would you, Estelle?" said Ernest.

The Hardships of Flat Life.

"He's a pretty collie," said Miss Kennelworth, "but it's a funny thing that he wags his tail up and down, instead of sideways." "The poor thing," said Mrs. Parke, "has always lived with us in our flat, and that's the only way he could wag it."

Audacity Won.

"So you would not take me to be twenty?" said a young lady to her partner, whilst they were looking over some music together one evening. "What would you take me for, then?" "For better, for worse," replied he, and he was accepted.

Practising Time.

Ponsonby (somewhat boastfully): "I may say, Miss Blitlerwick, that I am quite an adept at athletics. I can row, ride—either horse or bike—swim, spar, jump, and run." Miss Blitlerwick (sweetly): "Here comes papa. Do let me see you jump and run."

Denied the Accusation.

He: "This is a nice state of things, and we have been married only four months. I'm almost crazy at seeing you flirting with all these fellows. You recollect what you promised at the altar?" She: "Indeed I don't, dear. I was so nervous that I don't remember the least thing."

How He Proposed.

He: "I suppose it isn't too much to say that you and I have always led the fashion in our set, Miss Mabel?" She: "So people appear to think." "And it wouldn't do for me to be the last to adopt a new idea, would it?" "No, indeed!" "Well, have you noticed that everybody seems to be getting married lately?"

Gallantly Said!

Jones is nothing if not gallant. Mrs. Brown is exactly the same age as her husband, but she will not admit it. "My husband is forty," she said to some friends the other day; "you wouldn't believe it, but there's actually ten years' difference in our ages." "Impossible, dear madam!" hastily interposed Jones, anxious to say something agreeable; "I'm sure you look every day as young as he does."

Digitized by Google

Dupes of Destiny.

By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

Writer of "The Bond Between."

FIFTIETH CHAPTER.

A Meeting on Danger Point.

When Marcella and her timid, half-dazed companion had clung together in a frightened silence during the journey to London, there had, all unconscious of their close proximity to each other, passed by in another train the man to whom Marcella was going, for whom her poor, loving heart was crying. Had Philip Nullius but guessed that when the telegram calling him to his constant little sweetheart's assistance was delivered at his London address—where he was making unceasing efforts to trace that unknown baby brother who had shared with him the love of the dead mother—that instead of being in the least danger, Marcella was fleeing to a haven of refuge, he would not have obeyed so blindly the imperious wording of the telegram that ran: "Come to Marcella. Danger Point."

Without a moment's hesitation he had left his rooms and his train had barely steamed out of Paddington Station, than it was passed by the one bringing Marcella and her childish charge to London. It had been a long, anxious time for Philip, that fruitless search for those of his own blood, yearning to clasp the hand of one who had perhaps buffeted with the world's blows even as himself, and who may also have longed to gaze into the face of a kinsman; for, however humble of origin, blood was still thicker than water. Then there was that other dreadful knowledge he had obtained in so strange a way, and which he could not use, yet neither was he able to forget, and mingling with all his anxiety and personal uneasiness, there was ever the haunting thought of Marcella being exposed to all sorts of horrible dangers at the Court. He had, on receipt of the hasty summons from London, decided that, birth or no birth, he would not leave Crawley unless he took with him the woman he loved.

As he leant back in the train his thoughts wandered from his own private troubles to those of Lady Violet. He remembered having always been attracted to her by her intense love for Marcella, and yet he knew that between the aristocrat and the mysterious man with the black beard was a link of some sort. He could not think it one of crime; for his dear love's sake he would harbour no unkind thought of the beautiful aunt she loved, but a too keen instinct had warned him that Lady Violet knew more than she had dared to say.

Arriving at Crawley, he left the train and proceeded on foot towards the village. As he was passing through the barrier the porter recognised him and touched his cap civilly.

"Good day, sir. It's a long time since you came to Crawley, sir."

Philip smiled. He was very popular with the parishioners of the straggling village, and it had been a matter of regret that Fate should have stepped in between him and his work. Aloud he said pleasantly:

"Yes, Grig—my holiday has been a long one, protracted on account of business rather than pleasure." Then he added abruptly:

"I am going to see Miss Rust at the Court; I suppose things are much the same there? Quiet and—and happy?" He could hardly explain why he had asked the last question. It had been torn from him.

"'Appy, you said, sir?" And the weather-beaten face of the old man underwent a curious change—a shadow seemed to rest on it. "Well, I shouldn't like to say as things ain't well up at the Court, but of late there's been strange talk in the village as 'ow a cloud is restin' over it. Women steal about, sir, veiled very closely. And there's been strange men about as well, sir—comin' and goin', too, as though they was spies." He shook his old head wisely. "Aye, there's a cloud for certain hangin' over the Court."

Philip started. The garrulous old man's tongue had aroused his anxiety concerning Marcella. She had, then, he thought, wired for him to meet her on Danger Point, because she dared not ask him to the Court! He murmured a few kindly remarks to the old porter, and moved away. He was eager to be at the side of the girl he loved more intensely than ever, because he had always had to suppress the passion within him.

He hastened his steps involuntarily. It was growing dusk, and he remembered of old the grim character of the lonely rock known locally as Danger Point, and his heart feared for the brave girl who might be waiting so patiently for him, exposed to the numberless dangers that lurked for those who tempted Fate on the bleak surface of Danger Point.

As he hurried from the station and cut across the wooded undergrowth that divided the village into so straggling a community, he stopped suddenly. Coming towards him were two men, so deep in conversation that they did not even notice him. After one swift glance into one of the two faces, he uttered an exclamation and slipped swiftly into the shadow of a tree. Of all people, he would not have met Sir Cyprian Rust just then.

As they approached where he was standing, Sir Cyprian said coldly:

"So you threaten me, do you, Mr. Dick? Don't you think that rather an awkward attitude to take? What can your threats do to me?"

His companion laughed. And Philip noticed that he was a tall, flashy-looking man, with a careless, devil-may-care face and vivid blue eyes.

"Do to you? Why, queer your pitch for a very long time, my dear Sir Cyprian," was the laughing retort. "I wonder are you aware that the net is drawing very close, that probably unless some unforeseen accident happens, Scotland Yard will score a grand success in the capture of a very much 'wanted' aristocrat whose life has so long been a dual one?"

"Confound you!" was the quick reply that came softly from the baronet's lips. "You are playing your own game, I see! I suppose you have a price unless you are already bought?"

"I am not bought yet—but I don't mind telling you that I mean to make a good deal over this," was the cool reply.

"Suppose you have no chance of betraying me?" Sir Cyprian retorted slowly

Digitized by Google

The other shrugged his shoulders. "It has taken me a long time to find you. Since that night when I saw you at the house of Lady Violet Frayne-Lennox, much has happened to prevent my looking you up," he laughed suddenly, and Philip wondered vaguely what made him think he had seen the man before. There was an odd resemblance—a tone in the voice—a note in the laugh that sent his thoughts trooping back to the tender story of his love—yet the thought was incredible, a phantasy of his own imagination; his mind was so full of Marcella that he heard her voice even in the tones of another belonging to one whom he guessed instinctively to be a social pariah.

In the meantime, Sir Cyprian drew the man's arm within his own with an assumption of friendliness, though Philip, watching keenly, saw his sapphire-like eyes glint savagely. "Come with me to the Court and you will have your price—I am not foolish enough to jeopardise my liberty in wrangling over terms."

The other laughed triumphantly. "So you have decided not to make an enemy of me, eh? It's just as well. I intend to be fooled by no one! As it is, I only managed to get back into England by a ruse!—my death is popularly supposed to be a thing of the past. But I will go with you to the Court, and we'll discuss terms there, my fine baronet. Jove!" he chuckled grimly, "wouldn't a few people love to see us now—the great chief and an old member!"

Sir Cyprian's mouth twisted in an ugly smile. He seemed to have aged considerably since Philip had last seen him—only his eyes retained their look of youth.

"Yes," he said, with a curious catch in his low voice, "we will come to terms at the Court. We will—settle up then, and you will not find me wanting in generosity either. We will throw in our lots together, Dick! You will not regret coming to the Court."

Then the two men passed on—the rogue and the greater rogue—and as they vanished from his sight, Philip shivered. Something weird and inexplicable seemed to have enveloped the two men. In the far distance the sun had just sunk in a streak of red fire, and it seemed to the watching man that they were vanishing into a sea of blood, that drew them on as with a lurid menace. So Sir Cyprian and his comrade passed from his sight.

The next moment Philip pulled himself together, and broke into a sharp run that quickly brought him out into the country, and in the direction of Danger Point. A brisk walk of twenty minutes brought him to the place where he knew Marcella would be waiting for him. The wind had risen, and the sound of the waves fell upon his ear with a mournful echo. The red had died out of the sky, and only a dull grey was there instead

As he looked round eagerly, his eyes sweeping the bleak headland in search of a well beloved face and figure that had waited for him, he did not notice a silent shape creep from behind a rock and steal towards him.

"Marcella," he called, "I am here, darling. Where are you?"

The sea moaned dismally, but Marcella did not answer, and as he was about to cry out again, a loud, sneering laugh sounded close behind him.

"I am afraid you will be disappointed, Mr. Nullius. I am here as Marcella's substitute, and am glad to meet you—again!"

Philip turned and saw the face of Edward Day.

"You!" he exclaimed sharply. "What does this mean?"

FIFTY-FIRST CHAPTER.

The Shadow that Passed.

The other laughed brutally.

"That instead of Marcella, you are to have a pleasant experience with me, Mr. Nullius! I have long waited for this day; now it has come at last!"

Philip faced him squarely. He realised that he had treachery to meet, and that the fate of Marcella depended upon the way in which he met it.

"What do you mean?"

The other drew nearer. "That you have walked into a nice little trap, Mr. Nullius," he said slowly, "and you will find it difficult to get out of it—that is, if you ever do get out of it!" he added significantly.

Philip looked at him with a sudden appreciation of the villainy that had lured him to such a lonely, isolated spot. Fool that he had been to have imagined that Marcella would have appointed such a place for a meeting! His heart contracted at the thought of what Marcella must be enduring, while he was unable to protect her. Something of what he was thinking flickered in his face, for Edward Day said mockingly:

"Don't fear for Marcella; she is quite well and, I think, happy."

"You have seen her, then, lately?" Philip said quickly.

The other laughed. The curate's question proved that he had had no opportunity of seeing the girl who had escaped his and Sir Cyprian's clutches. "Oh, yes—I have seen her; quite recently. She is resigned to the prospect of becoming my wife," was the sneering reply.

Philip's face flushed angrily. "I understand—that telegram was sent by you. You got me here by a lie—for what purpose?"

"For the purpose of getting back a little of what I owe you, Mr. Nullius!" was the fierce retort. "The chalking up has been a long time on my slate, but I intend to wipe it clean of the debt now—you understand? If you want to fight—I'll give you a chance—but only one of us shall leave the 'Point' alive!" and he laughed, a low, cunning note that sent the blood ebbing from Philip's face. He could no longer fail to grasp the awfulness of his position. He, a clergyman of the Church of England, was compelled to fight for his life on a bleak, desolate rock, with a man whose hatred for him had reached the height of madness. He made one final effort to argue with the man whose gleaming eyes were lit with the fever of lust, and whose pale face was like unto that of a devil.

"Why should you hate me so, Day? Good God, man, you can't wish to murder me in cold blood!"

"Why do I hate you? Why do I wish you dead more than any other man on earth? Well, I'll tell you. It is because you have scored where I have failed, because without an effort you won the love of the one woman whom I wanted, and—and—you stand in my way as no other man does; money, position and power wait for me behind your back, you—you——"

He stopped abruptly. Philip Nullius was staring at him in amazement, not unmixed with fear.

"Come," the curate said, after a pause, "I don't understand what you mean; but I only realise that I am forced to defend myself from a madman!"

He flung his hat and coat on the hard ground, and faced his enemy. "I am ready," he said briefly, with set lips and steady eyes, and to himself he murmured: "Oh, God! help me, for Marcella's sake!"

The next moment Edward Day had flung himself upon the man whom he had hated so long and secretly, and whom, since he had learnt the secret from Sir Cyprian, he both feared and loathed most bitterly. For were Philip Nullius but dead, he would then be certain of the position that Sir Cyprian had told him he would reveal when he should return—alone, from Danger Point!

"Ah!" he gasped hoarsely. "At last, Philip Nullius; the sun has set for you, and to-morrow it will rise for me!"

Then his strong, wiry arms clasped like a vice round the more athletic figure of the man who was of the same blood as that which ran in his veins, and it was the lust of Cain that suddenly seized Edward Day in its clutches.

Both men fell, the curate for the moment had a brief advantage over his infuriated assailant, then, with a cunning look in his blue eyes, Edward Day sprang at his throat with his strong, hands, and attempted to drag him towards the edge of the cliff. Throwing all his strength into one desperate effort, Philip struck a well-directed blow with his doubled-up fist at the fair, boyish brow so close to his, and with a muffled cry Edward Day released his hold, and fell back, his head striking heavily against a piece of loose stone that had once been a portion of a rock.

Digitized by Google

Philip leant over him anxiously. Little as he understood the motive for the assault upon him, and attaching no significance to the half-maddened words that had dropped from Day's lips, he was still glad that he could feel the heart-beats of the unconscious man, who had intended to kill him.

As he rose from his knees he kicked something bright that was lying on the ground, and had evidently fallen from the other man's pocket when in the heat of their struggle. Though it was almost dusk, he saw that it was a locket, and something in the shape of it aroused his interest. He had another such locket in his possession at that moment. As his fingers touched the spring, he uttered an exclamation, for on one side was the face of a beautiful woman, and on the other, where there was no likeness, he saw by the aid of a match which he struck, the two words in a clear girlish hand—"From 'Cabel'!"

His hand shook, and his brain reeled under the sudden shock of knowledge that came upon him.

"Cabel!" That was the mysterious signature of those letters that had been stolen from him some time ago. Surely, the similarity between the two lockets must be a link in that hidden chain he had so long been trying to piece together. The word "Cabel" was an uncommon one; the writing was like that on the letters! It was more than coincidence—it went deeper than supposition! The man from whose coat the locket had fallen knew something—he——

"Ah!" he groaned in bitterness of spirit as the truth burst upon him. The brother who had lain as a baby with himself in that unknown mother's arms, and for whom he had prayed, and hoped to find, was one and the same as the treacherous backbiter who had lured him on to Danger Point with the object of killing him, of shedding the blood of the man who was his brother!

For a few moments he stood motionless, then rousing himself he picked up the coat he had flung on the ground, and covered the body of the unconscious man who lay at his feet. Then he turned, and with a white, set face made his way down to the beach.

"I must find someone to take him away! I will risk everything and go to the Court!" he muttered. "Perhaps I shall see Marcella." Just then a shadow darted up from under his feet and disappeared before he noticed more than that it was that of a man. He turned and looked back anxiously, but the shadow had vanished into thin air.

"He will be safe up there," he murmured again, "and I shall not be long—my brother!"

FIFTY-SECOND CHAPTER.

On the Scent.

"Will you come with us, sir? The picture will be there, as no efforts have been made to move it. They are a dangerous gang and we are taking special precautions to see that none of them are likely to escape. Most of them are 'wanted' by the police, and have been difficult to trace, owing to the cleverness of their leader; but now we have practically drawn a cordon round them, and by to-night shall have the whole lot under lock and key."

Mr. Johnson frowned. Had the offer come at any other time he would have hailed it with delight, but it interfered with him just as he was on the point of going to the succour of his son—the son he dared not claim, but whom he meant to see standing in his proper place. He had some time ago read a copy of the late Sir Basil Wingate's will at Somerset House, and saw that his son was not excluded from his inheritance, as at first he had thought was the case. But now that he had decided to go and save Philip from the treachery the anonymous telegram had said was threatening him on Danger Point, he was confronted by the detective from Scotland

A Husband's Good Advice.

It is commonly said, when one complains of indigestion, that "nobody should eat anything which disagrees with him"; but there is little sense in that remark. It is like saying that no man should be allowed to go into the water until he has become an expert swimmer. What one person can digest with ease will often cause in another all the miseries of dyspepsia; and it is not easy to learn who are the lucky and who the unlucky ones except by experiment. Besides, sufferers from indigestion are to be found among the most temperate, self-denying people, who exercise the utmost care in their choice of diet. "At one time I suffered very much from indigestion," says Mrs. Golder, of the Lodge, Barden Park, Barden Road, Tonbridge. "I had almost constant pain at the stomach, and in my back between the shoulders. I was always distressed by wind, while the headaches I endured were simply dreadful. A feeling of depression was constantly upon me, which no effort of my will could overcome. These troubles, and a complete want of appetite, quickly reduced me to a condition of extreme weakness. Then it was that I first proved the great value of Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. I was advised to try that medicine by my husband, who some years before had been cured of dyspepsia by it. The first few doses gave me relief at once, and after a little patience and regularity in its use I was restored to perfect health. At another time I was attacked by pleurisy, when I found that indigestion is not the only complaint that Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup is good for. Using it for the second time, I was entirely relieved of this new trouble; and that, too, after a doctor, who had attended me for a long time, had quite failed to do me any good."

In every land and in all climates people may be found with experience similar to that of Mrs. Golder. Composed of roots, and herbs, with no mineral admixture whatever. Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup is a purely vegetable tonic. It creates fresh, pure blood, and assists food to nourish, thus enabling nature to do its own work in its own way. For thirty-five years it has been the favourite remedy in the sixteen principal countries of the world, and it maintains its proud position amid a host of rivals because of its proved merit. Nothing else is "just as good," nor anything like so good; and the world recognises that fact.

A Way They Had in Egypt

Until comparatively recent times, in Egypt when a man refused to work, or failed to work as fast as his overseer thought proper, they lashed him with whips until he either mended his pace or died. If he died they laid him aside and put another labourer in his place. And so the game went on. It was a simple and effective plan, but the spread of intelligence has made it unpopular. There are times, the liver being sluggish, when even the most industrious of us cannot work. Then it is one should resort to Mother Seigel's Syrup. That feeling of oppression at the chest, and pain between the shoulders after eating; that drowsiness and headache; all proclaim you are unable to digest your food. And until you alter that by taking Seigel's Syrup, it is as useless to expect relief as to try to grow figs on gooseberry bushes. "Mother Seigel's Syrup has done me more good than all the doctors I ever consulted," says Mrs. Lancaster, of 3 Mill Road, Leighton Buzzard. "I suffered for years from chronic indigestion, and gradually became low and depressed. My appetite completely left me, and I suffered much from spasms caused by wind accumulating round my heart. I also suffered severely from constipation, but a few bottles of Mother Seigel's Syrup completely restored me to perfect health."

Digitized by Google

Yard, bound for Leyton, where the police had reason to believe the missing picture was concealed in Water Grange.

"You are quite certain my recognition of the picture will be sufficient?" he asked hastily. "I—I have a most urgent message calling me to Crawley."

The man looked at him for a moment. "Ah! Crawley. That's where Sir Cyprian Rust lives, is it not, sir? Yes, I think your identification of the picture is all we shall require now. You see, the picture is the peg upon which we are hanging a great deal afterwards; once the ring-leader of that gang is collared, hundreds of other charges will come up. My junior has been quietly on the job some days now, and unless I am very much mistaken, or something wonderful happens in the meantime, the 'Spade' will relinquish his disguise for a more public character."

Hastily dispatching a telegram to Lady Violet, informing her of his change of plans for the moment only, and assuring her and Marcella of his devotion, Caleb J. Johnson—the man whose own secret was weighing heavily upon him—made a silent journey in the society of the bluff, cheerful-looking man from Scotland Yard. The news of the financier's fall from the places of the great in City circles had not yet become public property. He had done nothing that put him within the jurisdiction of the law. The companies in which he had always taken the lead had been properly wound up; he had taken good care when the crash came to meet it honourably, and his own money had gone to make good the losses. The hand that had struck at him in the dark was, he knew, that of his ex-secretary, Edward Day, the clever rogue whose forgeries he had been afraid to denounce, and who rose in the financial firmament as he, the older veteran, had gone down.

As they were driving towards Water Grange, he spoke suddenly to the detective. "Why are we going to this place? I thought it was owned by a respectable member of society?" He did not add that he had entertained a very different opinion himself.

The detective laughed. "Every house is respectable, sir, until it is proved otherwise."

Arriving at the house, it looked desolate, and the whole place had an appearance of being uninhabited.

The two men rang and knocked loudly, but no one hurried to obey the peremptory summons of the law.

An old gardener, who had been weeding a piece of waste ground, approached, and said swiftly:

"There has been no sign of anyone about since I came down yesterday. I've watched, and so has Jakes, and it's my belief that they have cleared. Some accomplice got wind of it and tipped them the cue, that's evident."

"Ah!" and a frown ruffled the senior's brow. "At any rate, Huckle, we'll just enter and satisfy ourselves that the place is empty. This gentleman is Mr. Johnson."

An entrance was forced into the desolate house, and in spite of his anxiety concerning the son he loved, the ex-financier experienced a thrill of curiosity as he followed the two men into the hall.

"What's that?" one of them whispered sharply, as they stood at the top of a flight of stairs, after having made an investigation of the top part of the house. "I heard a cry that came from somewhere down those stairs; we have not been into all the rooms yet."

A few moments sufficed for the doors of the basement rooms to be opened by the three men, now keenly alive to the knowledge that there was someone imprisoned. The last door was forced open, and truly enough the cry that had filtered up through the darkness came from the figure on a mattress.

"Why, it's a woman!" burst from them simultaneously.

They bent over the form, and one of the men struck a match and lit a tiny gas jet. At the sight of the face of the almost fainting woman Mr. Johnson uttered a cry of amazement. It was, in spite of the ravages of want, suffering and despair, the face of a woman he had seen somewhere, but he could not locate the time or place.

A little brandy from a flask brought a slight flush to the white face, and the blue eyes opened hazily.

"Who are you, and where are the others?" the detective said sharply.

"The others!" she laughed weakly. "They left me here, with enough bread and water to keep me alive for a few days. They locked me in and for three days I have been alone! Have they gone, then?"

"Yes. I have a warrant for the arrest of a man concerned in the robbery of a valuable picture," was the terse reply. "Can you give me any information concerning the men who lived here, and why you are deserted by them?"

A curious light flickered in her eyes. "They were a set of rogues and vagabonds. I am sorry to say I am the daughter of the man they call the 'Vicar.' I came here in order to save another woman whom they thought they had decoyed"—here Mr. Johnson started and began to follow the thread of the words intently. "When they found that I had outwitted them they were furious, and in revenge left me here; but I have paid them back—cheated them of their prey!"

"What's your name?" the representative of the law said curtly.

"Lottie Haste—no!" she laughed bitterly. "I will tell you my married name. I am Mrs. Edward Day, the wife of the fiend who deserted me, and only failed to murder me because he did his work so clumsily!"

The financier started forward. He remembered the occasion when he had seen that fair, scornful face before. But then it had worn an expression of tenderness and joy. It was when he had passed in a hansom, and had seen her gazing at Edward Day, who was coming out of a house in Guilford Street. And she was the wife of the young ruffian who had dared to make love to Marcella Rust—no—Marcella Frayne-Lennox, as he now knew her name to be.

"Where did this man Day—your husband—go to?" the detective said quickly.

She laughed weakly. "A wife is not supposed to give evidence against her husband, is she? But I can tell you this"—she raised herself and said hurriedly, "he has gone to do harm to one who has never wronged him—on Danger Point, Crawley! I bribed a boy to send a telegram to some one in London, but God knows whether it has done any good! Go! go!" she pleaded wildly. "What you seek I feel sure you will find at Crawley—only make haste; while you wait here perhaps murder is being done. I did my best—I tried to stop it!" then, with a sigh, she fell breathless on to the mattress.

Mr. Johnson moved towards the door. Her words had aroused his fever of anxiety. "Perhaps murder was being done—or had been done!"

"Wait, sir, please!" the detective said quickly. "This woman may be of use to us in identification. We must take her with us; would you mind telling the driver of the carriage to come round to the door while we carry her up?"

When the financier had departed the detective bent over the girl eagerly. "Tell me who the other man was—and who was with him?"

Raising her head, she murmured a few words in his ear. He drew back sharply. "Are you sure?"

"Yes," was the faint reply. "I know positively."

He smiled grimly; then, aided by his junior, carried the girl up the stairs, out to the closed trap where Mr. Johnson sat, deep in thought.

"We are going to Crawley, sir; do you still wish to go there also?"

"I do," was the quiet reply.

"Then we shall travel together, if you have no objection, sir."

"I shall be glad of company," Mr. Johnson answered grimly.

And the throbbing of the engine as the train bore them westwards beat out the refrain in the ex-financier's brain of "Philip! Philip! How shall I find you? Alive or murdered?"

(The conclusion of this serial will appear next week.)

Digitized by Google

A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle at ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.
"CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," "SINGERS," &c.
Their names guarantee their quality.

FROM 8/- MONTHLY.

A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6
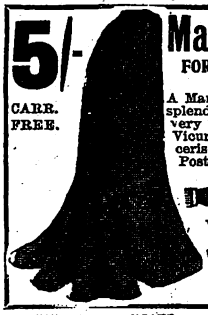
On approval. Two Years' Warranty.
Write for Lists (Free).
EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. S3).
World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

5/- CARR. FREE.



Marvellous Offer
FOR A SHORT TIME ONLY.

A Manufacturer's Stock of these splendid Tailor-Made Skirts, very latest design, in Black Vicuna Cloth, Strapped Mercerised Silkette. Send at once Postal Order for 5/-

With length of front and waist measurement to
WIGAN SKIRT CO.
WIGAN.
Est. 1885

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. pa'd before payment. Agents Wanted
Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

Beauty.

For cleansing the skin, and preserving it from roughness, blotches, hard water, and cold, ICILMA FLUOR CREAM is unique, and alone imparts the Natural rose-white Transparency that needs no powder. Price 1s. 2 samples (different scents), 2d. Icilma (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Rd., Lond., W.C.

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S
(The most nutritious)
COCOA
And take no other.

To Asthma Sufferers.

Instant relief is gained in all cases of Asthma, Bronchitis, Croup, and Whooping Cough, by the use of POTTER'S ASTHMA CURE. Sold by all Chemists and Herbalists in Tins at 1/-. Test it free of charge. Send post-card to POTTER & CLARKE, Wholesale Druggists, Artillery Lane, London, E., for Free Sample Kindly mention this paper.

Page Woodcock's Pills

"AS GOOD AS A FAMILY DOCTOR. For the cure of WIND ON THE STOMACH, INDIGESTION, BILIOUSNESS, HEARTBURN, FLATULENCE, LOSS OF APPETITE, DEPRESSION, HEADACHE, LANGUOR, &c., they have no equal."

Sold by all Medicine Vendors at 1/1½ and 2/9, or post free for price from

PAGE WOODCOCK Ltd.,
14 & 16 Euston Bldgs., London, N.W.
(Late of Lincoln).

1,000 Gold-Cased FOUNTAIN PENS bought Cheap, marked and Listed at 10/6, to be cleared at 2/6 each; 7/6 at 2/- each. Post Free, 1d. stamp extra.—W. WOOTTON, 60 Quarry Bank, Brierley Hill.

GIVEN AWAY
with the Grand Spring Double No. of HOME NOTES
(No. 532)
A PAPER PATTERN of this Charming Blouse.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.
PRICE TWOPENCE.

EARN A BICYCLE

distributing circulars and taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Active Agents wanted in each district. Large profits easily made. Highest grade fully warranted

BRITISH MADE CYCLES
LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6
New Departure Coaster Hubs, Best Makes Tyres, and best British made equipment throughout.

200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, £1 to £2-10 good as new.
Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. We send on approval and allow Ten Days' Free Trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer.
Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos half prices.
MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 44e,
85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool,
19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)
Of all Chemists, or Post Free for P.O. only for 1/3, 2/10, and 4/7 from the Sole Proprietors:
E. T. TOWLE & Co., Mfging. Chemists, NOTTS.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

JUNO CYCLES

ARE THE VERY BEST
FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN
Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.
Rustless Roman Rims & Hubs.

CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of
£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 8 0 „ 15/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/8 „
9 10 0 „ 17/6 „
JUNO Motor Cycles, 3 H.P., £34, or Monthly Payments.
JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.
Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ltd., S.S. Dept.,
75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

FREEMAN'S
TRADE MARK
THE ORIGINAL & ONLY TRUE
CHLORODYNE
Best Remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.
Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 6s., or postage free by the INVENTOR, R. FREEMAN, 70 KENNINGTON PARK ROAD, LONDON, S.E.
RECOMMENDED BY MEDICAL MEN.
N.B.—Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Justices James and Mellish, decided in favour of Freeman's Original Chlorodyne, and against Browne & Davenport, compelling them to pay all costs.
—"Times," 24-7-73.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Should a Man Propose to a Friend?

"SHOULD a man marry a girl who is a mere friend?" This perplexes "ALGY." "I have known a girl for some years," he writes, "and we have seen a great deal of each other. We have been great chums, and like each other, but I have never uttered a word of love to her. At the same time, I believe she has much deeper feelings towards me than I have towards her. In this case, ought I to propose? Could a marriage between chums be a happy one?"

* * * * *

There is always something wrong, "ALGY," about a "chum" marriage. Friendship is not quite a strong enough ground on which to marry, as many and many have found before now. One may like a person ever so much, yet be utterly unmoved in the direction of love. To propose would be a risky experiment. Before doing anything of the kind, I advise you to get to know each other more intimately. If she loves you, as you suspect, perhaps in time you might reciprocate. But don't propose on the ground of mere friendship.

❦❦❦

A Forced Engagement.

"I HAVE been walking out for several Sunday evenings with a girl, whose company I like very much," writes "A. W. N.," "and the way she greets me leads me to think she looks forward to the walk with as much pleasure as I do. But she is engaged to a man out in South Africa. This was brought about by her parents, and the girl wants to be released. Our ages are eighteen and nineteen."

* * * * *

You will have a difficult task. Evidently the girl's parents wish her to marry the gentleman in South Africa, and parents like that are often more powerful than kind. Before you attempt to persuade the girl to break off her engagement, or move in the matter, you must reach a deeper stage in her affections than merely "liking her company." When you and she have reached the point of devotion—if you ever do—and both feel that life without the other would be a misery, then take steps to dissuade the parents from insisting on the other marriage. But at present, not being exactly in love with each other, you have not a very stong case. Besides, if the girl really does not wish to marry the other man, surely she herself has the power to break off the engagement?

❦❦❦

'Twixt Mother and Sweetheart.

"ERIC" writes: "I am twenty years old, and have had a sweetheart for the last four years." (This is beginning young, 'ERIC.") "I have also a parent (mother) and little sister dependent on me. Although I care very much for my sweetheart, I am not at present able to marry. My salary is very small, and I have no particular prospects. Would it be best to break off the engagement, as there is nothing very encouraging for her to look forward to?"

This is a very sensible letter. I am glad that "ERIC," unlike many of my correspondents, has a nice, generous feeling towards his mother and sister, who, after all, have prior claim on his work to any a sweetheart can have. So long as "ERIC" has to support his mother, he should certainly postpone marriage, at any rate until his prospects improve. I do not see he need break off the engagement. Cannot he and his sweetheart come to a sensible understanding? Would she be willing to wait three years? If so, he must make a great effort to improve his position. After all, a young man of his age should never let himself think he has no prospects in life. An intelligent, persevering youth should surely be able to improve his position in that time. If not, then I fear he is not the sort of man to take a wife.

❦❦❦

A Test of Love.

"GERTRUDE" is engaged to a young man, and both truly love each other. She has been engaged a month, and had only known him five months previously. "GERTRUDE" has now learnt that, before making her acquaintance, the young man had compromised himself with another girl, who now threatens him with legal proceedings. Under the circumstances, what is "GERTRUDE'S" duty? Should she break off the engagement? "He is dearer to me than my own life," she says, "and, in any case, ought I to forgive him?"

* * * * *

I do not see that you have anything to forgive. His offence was not against you, as you admit that you did not know him at the time he was paying attentions to the other girl. As you confess your deep love for him, obviously you should prove it by standing up for him should the legal difficulty arise. Most women forgive a lover for any wrong, provided it is not against themselves. Don't call yourself "broken-hearted." You are not the only woman who has had to stand a test of her love for a man.

❦❦❦

Jealous of Fiance's Patients.

"ROSA" is engaged to a doctor. He has many lady patients, but always refuses to say anything about them when questioned by "ROSA." Does this mean that he may have other love affairs? Would it be wise for "ROSA" to continue her engagement?

* * * * *

"ROSA" is too suspicious. Surely she must know that a doctor's professional etiquette prevents him from saying anything at all about his patients, even to his sweetheart or wife, especially his lady patients? Let "ROSA" get this silly idea out of her head, and understand that a doctor bears an entirely different relation towards the opposite sex, and that he has lady patients does not in the least mean that he he will be unfaithful to his betrothed. If all doctors' sweethearts and wives were as suspicious as "ROSA," theirs would be a troublesome existence, and it is worrying enough already.

❦❦❦

A Girl who Gives Presents.

"FORLORN" is very worried because he is acquainted with a girl who is very much attached to him, but for whom he does not care at all. The girl is always giving him presents, and evidently thinks that it is "FORLORN'S" intention to marry her. As this is just what he does not intend to do, he asks my advice as to what course he had better pursue.

* * * * *

I advise "FORLORN" to tell the lady frankly that he does not love her, unpleasant as this task undoubtedly will be. Also acquaint the girl's parents of this fact, and they will probably cease to encourage her in running after him.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

FROM

A Lecture on Cocoa

BY

DR. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

"A Cocoa Bean is a kind of Vegetable Egg, which contains all that is needed to build up a living body . . . . Cocoa is a combination of foods—of true foods in every sense of the term. . . . . But see that you get a really good Cocoa. I should say use

Fry's

PURE CONCENTRATED

Cocoa

which is my Ideal of Perfection.

There is No Better Food.'

Ask for the

"FIVE BOYS" MILK CHOCOLATE

"Unrivalled as a Chocolate Confection."—MEDICAL MAGAZINE.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

Headache

SOMETIMES when things don't go right in certain parts of your body you feel the effect in your head. When you've got headache, it doesn't necessarily mean your head is wrong. Headache is very often only a symptom of disorder elsewhere. Look somewhere else for the mischief, and correct the cause not the symptom.

Is the headache in the forehead, and does it cease if you press it? If so, that's neuralgic headache. Is it in the forehead, or on one side of the head only? If so, it's what doctors call "megrim"; and arises from want of tone in the system. Is it general and accompanied by sickness, foul breath, constipation, &c.? If so, it's a bilious headache, and arises from excessive secretion of the bile. All these headaches are traceable, you see, either to stomach weakness, which lets the system get run down (resulting in neuralgia or megrim), or to liver disorder, which deranges bile secretion and causes bilious headaches. Bile Beans act directly on liver and stomach. That's how they cure headache. They cure headache, which is only a symptom, by correcting the disorders which cause it.

Mrs. Jane Jarman, of Barton-in-the-Clay, Bedfordshire, suffered almost all her lifetime from bilious headache. She has at last found release from this misery, and a representative of the "Luton Reporter" has put her story on record. She says:

"Ever since I can remember, up to the time of being cured by Bile Beans, I had suffered from sick headache. I also had very severe pains in my chest and stomach after eating, and was so overwrought at times by these combined pains that I had to leave my household duties to take care of themselves.

"I had no end of doctors' physic, and tried many means of getting rid of my ailment, but in vain. At last, I began to be curious as to whether Bile Beans would do me good. So I commenced with them, and was only sorry I hadn't found them out years earlier. They improved me from the first, and steadily, yet surely, brought me to a state of good health and freedom from pain. I am now quite cured, and at last know what the blessing of good health is—a blessing I owe entirely to Bile Beans."

Bile Beans for Biliousness are the safest family medicine, and a speedy and permanent cure for Headache, Constipation, Piles, Colds, Liver Chill, Influenza, Rheumatism, Bad Breath, Indigestion, Flatulence, Loss of Appetite Sleeplessness, Dizziness, Buzzing in the Head, Debility, Pimples, Spring Ailments, Blood Impurities, Skin Eruptions, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all Medicine Vendors, or post free from the Bile Bean Co., 4 Red Cross Street, London, E.C., on receipt of price 1/1½, or large family size 2/9 (2/9 size contains three time 1/1½).

Bile Beans FOR Biliousness

Digitized by Google

1D. GRAND EASTER HOLIDAY NUMBER. 1D.

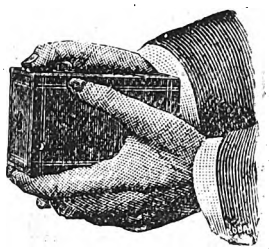
SHORT STORIES

The above picture shows Mr. Theodore Racksole and his daughter Nella in the dining-room of a great London hotel. He orders Jules, the waiter—who is secretly engaged in a villainous scheme to kidnap a reigning prince—to bring him a steak and a bottle of Bass. This is against the rules of the hotel, so Jules refuses. It costs Racksole £400,000 to have his own way. The endless complications that ensue are graphically related in "PHANTOM SHADOWS," the new serial that starts within.

[No. 796. Week Ending April 2nd, 1904.

BROWNIE KODAKS

For BOYS and GIRLS.



THE No. 1 BROWNIE

giving Photographs 2½in. x 2½in.
Price 5s. only.

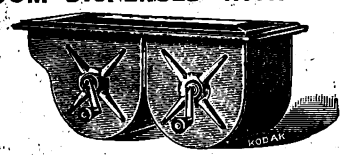
THE No. 2 BROWNIE

giving Photographs 3¼in. x 2½in.
Price 10s. only.

Other
FOLDING POCKET KODAKS
from 26s. to £8.

THE DARK ROOM DISPENSED WITH!

KODAK Daylight Developing Machine.



Develops Films in Daylight—Gaslight—Any Light—Anywhere.

10s. to 45s.

Marvellously Simple and Efficient.

Write for particulars of the GRAND KODAK AMATEUR COMPETITION, £1,000 in Cash Prizes, to Dept. 35.

Of all Photographic Dealers, or of

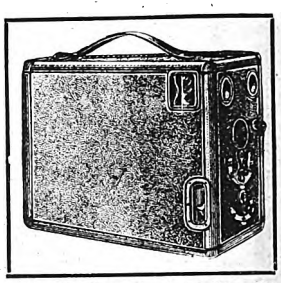
KODAK LTD., 41-43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

J. G. GRAVES' CAMERAS.

The "ASTRAL" Quarter-plate Hand Camera (as illustrated) for 12 plates (or 24 Films) with Indicator. Achromatic Lens, 4 Diaphragms, F11, F16, F22 and F32, 3 Magnifiers for taking Photos at 3 feet, 6 feet, and 9 feet distance, 2 View Finders, Everset Shutter with Speeds adjustable from one second to one-hundredth of a second, also for Time Exposures.

Sent on receipt of 3/- and your promise to complete the purchase by Six more Monthly Payments of 3/-

21/-



Send for Illustrated Catalogue of Photographic Apparatus post free.

AGENTS WANTED. GOOD PAY. NO RESPONSIBILITY. WRITE FOR TERMS

J. G. GRAVES,
169 Division Street, SHEFFIELD.

SAPON

THE IDEAL CLEANSER

A harmless vegetable compound which dissolves grease so wonderfully that the dirt "drops out" without rubbing and the clothes last longer.

Dissolve the Sapon thoroughly in water; put the clothes into the solution and

SOAK,
SQUEEZE,
RINSE,
WRING. (That's all.)

Send a post-card to SAPON LTD. (Dept. 68), St. Swithin's Chambers, London, for a FREE TRIAL PACKET.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Headache,

Neuralgia & all Nerve Pains

One dose of Kaputine, costing 1d., cures in ten minutes the most violent nerve pain, every time.

Kaputine is not an aperient, and causes no inconvenience, but is for one purpose only—to cure Nerve Pains.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—and gives immediate relief.

Kaputine, unlike the dangerous white headache powders consisting of one crude drug, is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical Profession.

Kaputine is sold by all Medicine Dealers, Packets of 18 doses, 1/-. Samples 1d. each.

Write now for samples free and post paid to
C. G. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

OXFORD 30 3 1904 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 796.] Week Ending April 2nd, 1904. [One Penny.

THIS SPLENDID NEW SERIAL STARTS BELOW.

A Story of Love and Crime.

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

FIRST CHAPTER.

The Millionaire and the Waiter.

"Yes, sir?"

Jules, the celebrated head waiter of the Grand Babylon, was bending formally towards the alert, middle-aged man who had just entered the smoking-room and dropped into a basket-chair in the corner by the conservatory. It was 7.45 on a particularly sultry June night, and dinner was about to be served at the Grand Babylon. Men of all sizes, ages, and nationalities, but every one alike arrayed in faultless evening dress, were dotted about the large, dim apartment. A faint odour of flowers came from the conservatory, and the tinkle of a fountain. The waiters, commanded by Jules, moved softly across the thick Oriental rugs, balancing their trays with the dexterity of jugglers, and receiving and executing orders with that air of profound importance of which only really first-class waiters have the secret. The atmosphere was an atmosphere of serenity and repose, characteristic of the Grand Babylon. It seemed impossible that anything could occur to mar the peaceful, aristocratic monotony of existence in that perfectly-managed establishment. Yet on that night was to happen the mightiest upheaval that the Grand Babylon had ever known.

"Yes, sir?" repeated Jules, and this time there was a shade of august disapproval in his voice; it was not usual for him to have to address a customer twice.

All rights reserved.]

"Oh!" said the alert, middle-aged man, looking up at length. Beautifully ignorant of the identity of the great Jules, he allowed his grey eyes to twinkle as he caught sight of the expression on the waiter's face. "Bring me an Angel Kiss."

"Pardon, sir?"

"Bring me an Angel Kiss, and be good enough to lose no time."

"If it's an American drink, I fear we don't keep it, sir." The voice of Jules fell icily distinct, and several men glanced round uneasily, as if to deprecate the slightest disturbance of their calm. The appearance of the person to whom Jules was speaking, however, reassured them somewhat, for he had all the look of that expert, the travelled Englishman, who can differentiate between one hotel and another by instinct, and who knows at once where he may make a fuss with propriety, and where it is advisable to behave exactly as at the club. The Grand Babylon was a hotel in whose smoking-room one behaved as though one was at one's club.

"I didn't suppose you did keep it, but you can mix it, I guess, even in this hotel."

"This isn't an American hotel, sir." The calculated insolence of the words was cleverly masked beneath an accent of humble submission.

The alert, middle-aged man sat up straight, and gazed placidly at Jules, who was pulling his famous red side-whiskers.

"Get a liqueur glass," he said, half curtly and half with good-humoured tolerance, "pour into it equal quantities of maraschino cream and crême de menthe. Don't stir it; don't shake it. Bring it to me. And, I say, tell the bar-tender——"

Digitized by Google

"Bar-tender, sir?"

"Tell the bar-tender to make a note of the recipe, as I shall probably want an Angel Kiss every evening before dinner so long as this weather lasts."

"I will send the drink to you, sir," said Jules distantly. That was his parting shot, by which he indicated that he was not as other waiters are, and that any person who treated him with disrespect did so at his own peril.

A few minutes later, while the alert, middle-aged man was tasting the Angel Kiss, Jules sat in conclave with Miss Spencer, who had charge of the bureau of the Grand Babylon. This bureau was a fairly large chamber, with two sliding glass partitions which overlooked the hall and the smoking-room.

Only quite a small portion of the clerical work of the great hotel was performed there. The place served chiefly as the lair of Miss Spencer, who was as well known and as important as Jules himself. Most modern hotels have a male clerk to superintend the bureau. But the Grand Babylon went its own way. Miss Spencer had been bureau clerk almost since the Grand Babylon had first raised its massive chimneys to Heaven, and she remained in her place despite the vagaries of other hotels. Always admirably dressed in plain black silk, with a small diamond brooch, immaculate wristbands, and frizzled yellow hair, she looked now just as she had looked an indefinite number of years ago. Her age—none knew it, save herself, and perhaps one other.

The gracious and alluring contours of her figure were irreproachable; and in the evenings she was a useful ornament of which any hotel might be innocently proud. Her knowledge of Bradshaw, of steamship services, and the programmes of theatres and music-halls was unrivalled; yet she never travelled, she never went to a theatre or a music-hall. She seemed to spend the whole of her life in that official lair of hers, imparting information to guests, telephoning to the various departments, or engaged in intimate conversations with her special friends on the staff, as at present.

"Who's Number 107?" Jules asked this black-robed lady.

Miss Spencer examined her ledgers.

"Mr. Theodore Racksole, New York."

"I thought he must be a New Yorker," said Jules, after a brief, significant pause, "but he talks as good English as you or me. Says he wants an 'Angel Kiss'—maraschino and cream, if you please—every night. I'll see he doesn't stop here too long."

Miss Spencer smiled grimly in response. The notion of referring to Theodore Racksole as "a New Yorker" appealed to her sense of humour, a sense in which she was not entirely deficient. She knew, of course, and she knew that Jules knew, that this Theodore Racksole must be the unique and only Theodore Racksole, the third richest man in the United States, and therefore probably in the world. Nevertheless, she ranged herself at once on the side of Jules. Just as there was only one Racksole, so there was only one Jules, and Miss Spencer instinctively shared the latter's indignation at the spectacle of any person whatsoever, millionaire or Emperor, presuming to demand an "Angel Kiss," that unrespectable concoction of maraschino and cream, within the precincts of the Grand Babylon.

Next to the proprietor, there were three gods at the Grand Babylon—Jules, the head waiter, Miss Spencer, and, most powerful of all, Rocco, the renowned chef, who earned two thousand a year, and had a chalet on the Lake of Lucerne. All the great hotels in Northumberland Avenue and on the Thames Embankment had tried to get Rocco away from the Grand Babylon, but without success. Rocco was well aware that even he could rise no higher than the maître d'hôtel of the Grand Babylon, which, though it never advertised itself, and didn't belong to a limited company, stood an easy first among the hotels of Europe—first in expensiveness, first in exclusiveness, first in that mysterious quality known as "style."

Situated on the Embankment, the Grand Babylon, despite its noble proportions, was somewhat dwarfed by several colossal neighbours. It had but 350 rooms, whereas there are two hotels within a quarter of a mile with 600 and 400 rooms respectively. On the other hand, the Grand Babylon was the only hotel in London with a genuine separate entrance for Royal visitors constantly in use. The Grand Babylon counted that day wasted on which it did not entertain, at the lowest, a German prince or the Maharajah of some Indian State. When Félix Babylon—after whom, and not with any reference to London's nickname, the hotel was christened—when Félix Babylon founded the hotel in 1869 he had set himself to cater for Royalty, and that was the secret of his triumphant eminence. The son of a rich Swiss hotel proprietor and financier, he had contrived to establish a connection with the officials of several European Courts, and he had not spared money in that respect. Sundry kings and not a few princesses called him Félix, and spoke familiarly of the hotel as "Félix's."

The Grand Babylon was managed accordingly.

The "note" of its policy was discretion, always discretion, and quietude, simplicity, remoteness. The place was like a palace incognito. There was no gold sign over the roof, not even an explanatory word at the entrance. You walked down a small side street off the Strand, you saw a plain brown building in front of you, with two mahogany swing doors, and an official behind each; the doors opened noiselessly; you entered; you were in Félix's. If you meant to be a guest, you, or your courier, gave your card to Miss Spencer. Upon no consideration did you ask for the tariff. It was not good form to mention prices at the Grand Babylon; the prices were enormous, but you never mentioned them. At the conclusion of your stay a bill was presented, brief and void of dry details, and you paid it without a word. You met with a stately civility, that was all. No one had originally asked you to come; no one expressed the hope that you would come again. The Grand Babylon was far above such manœuvres; it defied competition by ignoring it; and consequently was nearly always full during the season.

If there was one thing more than another that annoyed the Grand Babylon—put its back up, so to speak—it was to be compared with, or to be mistaken for, an American hotel. The Grand Babylon was resolutely opposed to American methods of eating, drinking, and lodging—but especially American methods of drinking. The resentment of Jules, on being requested to supply Mr. Theodore Racksole with an Angel Kiss will, therefore, be appreciated.

"Anybody with Mr. Theodore Racksole?" asked Jules, continuing his conversation with Miss Spencer. He put a scornful stress on every syllable of the guest's name.

"Miss Racksole—she's in No. 111."

Jules paused and stroked his left whisker as it lay on his gleaming white collar.

"She's where?" he queried, with a peculiar emphasis.

"No. 111. I couldn't help it. There was no other room with a bath-room and dressing-room on that floor." Miss Spencer's voice had an appealing tone of excuse.

"Why didn't you tell Mr. Theodore Racksole and Miss Racksole that we were unable to accommodate them?"

"Because Babs was within hearing."

Only three people in the wide world ever dreamt of applying to Mr. Félix Babylon the playful but mean abbreviation—Babs; those three were Jules, Miss Spencer, and Rocco. Jules had invented it. No one but he would have had either the wit or the audacity to do so.

"You'd better see that Miss Racksole changes her room to-night," Jules said after another pause. "Leave it to me, I'll fix it. Au revoir! It's three minutes to eight. I shall take charge of the dining-room myself to-night." And Jules departed, rubbing his fine white hands slowly and meditatively. It was a trick of his to rub his hands with a strange, roundabout motion, and the action denoted that some unusual excitement was in the air.

At eight o'clock precisely dinner was served in the immense salle à manger, that chaste yet splendid apartment of white and gold. At a small table near one of the windows a young lady sat alone. Her frock said Paris, but her face unmistakably said New York. It was a self-possessed and bewitching face, the face of a woman thoroughly accustomed to doing exactly what she liked, when she liked, how she liked; the face of a woman who had taught hundreds of gilded young men the true art of fetching and carrying, and who, by twenty years or so of parental spoiling, had come to regard herself as the feminine equivalent of the Tsar of all the Russias. Such women are only made in America, and they only come to their full bloom in Europe, which they imagine to be a continent created by Providence for their diversion.

Digitized by Google

The young lady by the window glanced disapprovingly at the menu card. Then she looked round the dining-room, and, while admiring the diners, decided that the room itself was rather small and plain. Then she gazed through the open window, and told herself that though the Thames by twilight was passable enough, it was by no means level with the Hudson, on whose shores her father had a hundred thousand dollar country cottage. Then she returned to the menu, and with a pursing of lovely lips said that there appeared to be nothing to eat.

"Sorry to keep you waiting, Nella." It was Mr. Racksole, the intrepid millionaire who had dared to order an Angel Kiss in the smoke-room of the Grand Babylon. Nella—her proper name was Helen—smiled at her parent cautiously, reserving to herself the right to scold if she should feel so inclined.

"You always are late, father," she said.

"Only on a holiday," he added. "What is there to eat?"

"Nothing."

"Then let's have it. I'm hungry. I'm never so hungry as when I'm being seriously idle."

"Consommé Britannia," she began to read out from the menu, "Saumon d'Ecosse, Sauce Génoise, Aspics de Homard. Oh, Heavens! Who wants these horrid messes on a night like this?"

"But, Nella, this is the best cooking in Europe," he protested.

"Say, father," she said, with seeming irrelevance, "had you forgotten it's my birthday to-morrow?"

"Have I ever forgotten your birthday, Oh most costly daughter?"

"On the whole you've been a most satisfactory dad," she answered sweetly, "and to reward you I'll be content this year with the cheapest birthday treat you ever gave me. Only I'll have it to-night."

"Well," he said, with the long-suffering patience, the readiness for any surprise, of a parent whom Nella had thoroughly trained, "what is it?"

"It's this. Let's have filleted steak and a bottle of Bass for dinner to-night. It will be simply exquisite. I shall love it."

"But, my dear Nella," he exclaimed, "steak and beer at Félix's! It's impossible! Moreover, young women still under twenty-three cannot be permitted to drink Bass."

"I said steak and Bass, and as for being twenty-three, I shall be going in twenty-four to-morrow."

Miss Racksole set her small, white teeth.

There was a gentle cough. Jules stood over them. It must have been out of a pure spirit of adventure that he had selected this table for his own services. Usually Jules did not personally wait at dinner. He merely hovered observant, like a captain on the bridge during the mate's watch. Regular frequenters of the hotel felt themselves honoured when Jules attached himself to their tables.

Theodore Racksole hesitated one second, and then issued the order with a fine air of carelessness:

"Filleted steak for two, and a bottle of Bass." It was the bravest act of Theodore Racksole's life, and yet at more than one previous crisis a high courage had not been lacking to him.

"It's not in the menu, sir," said Jules the imperturbable.

"Never mind. Get it. We want it."

"Very good, sir."

Jules walked to the service-door, and, merely affecting to look behind, came immediately back again.

"Mr. Rocco's compliments, sir, and he regrets to be unable to serve steak and Bass to-night, sir."

"Mr. Rocco?" questioned Racksole lightly.

"Mr. Rocco," repeated Jules with firmness.

"And who is Mr. Rocco?"

"Mr. Rocco is our chef, sir." Jules had the expression of a man who is asked to explain who Shakespeare was.

The two men looked at each other. It seemed incredible that Theodore Racksole, the ineffable Racksole, who owned a thousand miles of railway, several towns, and sixty votes in Congress, should be defied by a waiter, or even by a whole hotel. Yet so it was. When Europe's effete back is against the wall not a regiment of millionaires can turn its flank. Jules had the calm expression of a strong man sure of victory. His face said: "You beat me once, but not this time, my New York friend!"

"Rocco," said Felix Babylon, "let me introduce Mr. Theodore Racksole, the millionaire, of New York."

As for Nella, knowing her father, she foresaw interesting events, and waited confidently for the steak. She did not feel hungry, and she could afford to wait.

"Excuse me a moment, Nella," said Theodore Racksole quietly, "I shall be back in about two seconds," and he strode out of the salle à manger. No one in the room recognised the millionaire, for he was unknown to London, this being his first visit to Europe for over twenty years. Had anyone done so, and caught the expression on his face, that man might have trembled for an explosion which should have blown the entire Grand Babylon into the Thames. Jules retired strategically to a corner. He had fired; it was the antagonist's turn. A long and varied experience had taught Jules that a guest who embarks on the subjugation of a waiter is almost always lost; the waiter has so many advantages in such a contest.

Digitized by Google

SECOND CHAPTER.

How Mr. Racksole Obtained his Dinner.

Nevertheless, there are men with a confirmed habit of getting their own way, even as guests in an exclusive hotel: and Theodore Racksole had long since fallen into that useful practice—except where his only daughter Helen, motherless but high-spirited girl, chose to think that his way crossed hers, in which case Theodore capitulated and fell back. But when Theodore and his daughter happened to be going one and the same road, which was pretty often, then Heaven alone might help any obstacle that was so ill-advised as to stand in their path. Jules, great and observant man though he was, had not noticed the terrible projecting chins of both father and daughter, otherwise it is possible he would have reconsidered the question of the steak and Bass.

Theodore Racksole went direct to the entrance-hall of the hotel, and entered Miss Spencer's sanctum.

"I want to see Mr. Babylon," he said, "without the delay of an instant."

Miss Spencer leisurely raised her flaxen head.

"I am afraid——" she began the usual formula. It was part of her daily duty to discourage guests who desired to see Mr. Babylon.

"No, no," said Racksole quickly, "I don't want any 'I'm afraids.' This is business. If you had been the ordinary hotel clerk I should have slipped a couple of sovereigns into your hand, and the thing would have been done. As you are not—as you are obviously above bribes—I merely say to you, I must see Mr. Babylon at once on an affair of the utmost urgency. My name is Racksole—Theodore Racksole."

"Of New York?" questioned a voice at the door, with a slight foreign accent.

The millionaire turned sharply, and saw a rather short, French-looking man, with a bald head, a grey beard, a long and perfectly-built frock-coat, eye-glasses attached to a minute silver chain, and blue eyes that seemed to have the transparent innocence of a maid's.

"There is only one," said Theodore Racksole succinctly.

"You wish to see me?" the new-comer suggested.

"You are Mr. Félix Babylon?"

The man bowed.

"At this moment I wish to see you more than anyone else in the world," said Racksole. "I am consumed and burnt up with a desire to see you, Mr. Babylon. I only want a few minutes' quiet chat. I fancy I can settle my business in that time."

With a gesture Mr. Babylon invited the millionaire down a side corridor, at the end of which was Mr. Babylon's private room, a miracle of Louis XV. furniture and tapestry; like most unmarried men with large incomes, Mr. Babylon had "tastes" of a highly expensive sort.

The landlord and his guest sat down opposite each other. Theodore Racksole had met with the usual millionaire's luck in this adventure, for Mr. Babylon made a practice of not allowing himself to be interviewed by his guests, however distinguished, however wealthy, however pertinacious. If he had not chanced to enter Miss Spencer's office at that precise moment, and if he had not been impressed in a somewhat peculiar way by the physiognomy of the millionaire, not all Mr. Racksole's American energy and ingenuity would have availed for a confabulation with the owner of the Grand Babylon Hotel that night. Theodore Racksole, however, was ignorant that a mere accident had served him. He took all the credit to himself.

"I read in the New York papers some months ago," Theodore started, without even a clearing of the throat, "that this hotel of yours, Mr. Babylon, was to be sold to a limited company, but it appears that the sale was not carried out."

"It was not," answered Mr. Babylon frankly, "and the reason was that the middle-men between the proposed company and myself wished to make a large secret profit, and I declined to be a party to such a profit. They were firm; I was firm; and so the affair came to nothing."

"The agreed price was satisfactory?"

"Quite."

"May I ask what the price was?"

"Are you a buyer, Mr. Racksole?"

"Are you a seller, Mr. Babylon?"

"I am," said Babylon, "on terms. The price was four hundred thousand pounds including the leasehold and goodwill. But I sell only on the condition that the buyer does not transfer the property to a limited company at a higher figure."

"I will put one question to you, Mr. Babylon," said the millionaire. "What have your profits averaged during the last four years?"

"Thirty-four thousand pounds per annum."

"I buy," said Theodore Racksole, smiling contentedly; "and we will, if you please, exchange contract-letters on the spot."

"You come quickly to a resolution, Mr. Racksole. But perhaps you have been considering this question for a long time?"

"On the contrary," Racksole looked at his watch—"I have been considering it for just six minutes."

Félix Babylon bowed, as one thoroughly accustomed to every eccentricity of wealth.

"The beauty of being well-known," Racksole continued, "is that you needn't trouble about preliminary explanations. You, Mr. Babylon, probably know all about me. I know a good deal about you. We can take each other for granted without reference. Really, it is as simple to buy a hotel or a railroad as it is to buy a watch, provided one is equal to the transaction."

"Precisely," agreed Mr. Babylon smiling. "Shall we draw up the little informal contract? There are details to be thought of. But it occurs to me that you cannot have dined yet, and might prefer to deal with minor questions after dinner."

"I have not dined," said the millionaire, with emphasis, "and in that connection will you do me a favour? Will you send for Mr. Rocco?"

"You wish to see him, naturally."

"I do," said the millionaire, and added, "about my dinner."

"Rocco is a great man," murmured Mr. Babylon, as he touched the bell, ignoring the last words. "My compliments to Mr. Rocco," he said to the page who answered his summons, "and if it is quite convenient I should be glad to see him here for a moment."

"What do you give Rocco?" Racksole inquired.

"Two thousand a year and the treatment of an Ambassador."

"I shall give him the treatment of an Ambassador and three thousand."

"You will be wise," said Félix Babylon.

At that moment Rocco came into the room, very softly—a man of forty, thin, with long, thin hands, and an inordinately long, brown, silky moustache.

"Rocco," said Félix Babylon, "let me introduce Mr. Theodore Racksole, of New York."

"Sharmed," said Rocco, bowing. "Ze—ze, vat you call it, millionaire?"

"Exactly," Racksole put in, and continued quickly: "Mr. Rocco, I wish to acquaint you before any other person with the fact that I have purchased the Grand Babylon Hotel. If you think well to afford me the privilege of retaining your services I shall be happy to offer you a remuneration of three thousand a year."

"Tree, you said?"

"Three."

Digitized by Google

"Sharmed."

"And now, Mr. Rocco, will you oblige me very much by ordering a plain beefsteak and a bottle of Bass to be served by Jules—I particularly desire Jules—at table No. 17 in the dining-room, in ten minutes from now? And will you do me the honour of lunching with me to-morrow?"

Mr. Rocco gasped, bowed, muttered something in French, and departed.

Five minutes later the buyer and seller of the Grand Babylon Hotel had each signed a curt document, scribbled out on the hotel note-paper. Félix Babylon asked no questions, and it was this heroic absence of curiosity, of surprise on his part, that more than anything else impressed Theodore Racksole. How many hotel proprietors in the world, Racksole asked himself, would have let that beefsteak and Bass go by without a word of comment?

"From what date do you wish the purchase to take effect?" asked Babylon.

"Oh," said Racksole lightly, "it doesn't matter. Shall we say from to-night?"

"As you will. I have long wished to retire. And now that the moment has come—and so dramatically—I am ready. I shall return to Switzerland. One cannot spend much money there, but it is my native land. I shall be the richest man in Switzerland." He smiled with sad amusement.

"I suppose you are fairly well off?" said Racksole, in that easy, familiar style of his, as though the idea had just occurred to him.

"Besides what I shall receive from you, I have half a million invested."

The above picture illustrates a thrilling episode which is related in a future instalment of "Phantom Shadows."

"Then you will be nearly a millionaire?"

Félix Babylon nodded.

"I congratulate you, my dear sir," said Racksole, in the tone of a judge addressing a newly-admitted barrister. "Nine hundred thousand pounds or so expressed in francs will sound very nice—in Switzerland."

"Of course to you, Mr. Racksole, such a sum would be poverty. Now if one might guess at your own wealth?" Félix Babylon was imitating the other's freedom.

"I do not know, to five millions or so, what I am worth," said Racksole, with sincerity, his tone indicating that he would have been glad to give the information if it were in his power.

"You have had anxieties, Mr. Racksole?"

"Still have them. I am now holiday-making in London with my daughter in order to get rid of them for a time."

"Is the purchase of hotels your notion of relaxation, then?"

Racksole shrugged his shoulders. "It is a change from railroads," he laughed.

"Ah, my friend, you little know what you have bought."

"Oh! yes I do," returned Racksole; "I have bought just the first hotel in the world."

"That is true, that is true," Babylon admitted, gazing meditatively at the antique Persian carpet. "There is nothing anywhere like my hotel. But you will regret the purchase, Mr. Racksole. It is no business of mine, of course, but I cannot help repeating that you will regret the purchase."

"I never regret."

"Then you will begin very soon—perhaps to-night."

"Why do you say that?"

"Because the Grand Babylon is the Grand Babylon. You think because you control a railroad, or an ironworks, or a line of steamers, therefore you can control anything. But no—not the Grand Babylon. There is something about the Grand Babylon——" He threw up his hands.

"Servants rob you, of course."

"Of course. I suppose I lose a hundred pounds a week in that way. But it is not that I mean. It is the guests. The guests are too—too distinguished. The great Ambassadors, the great financiers, the great nobles, all the men that move the world, put up under my roof. London is the centre of everything, and my hotel—your hotel—is the centre of London. Once I had a King and a Dowager Empress staying here at the same time. Imagine that!"

"A great honour, Mr. Babylon. But wherein lies the difficulty?"

"Mr. Racksole," was the grim reply, "what has become of your shrewdness—that shrewdness which has made your fortune so immense that even you cannot calculate it? Do you not perceive that the roof which habitually shelters all the force, all the authority of the world, must necessarily also shelter nameless and numberless plotters, schemers, evil-doers, and workers of mischief? The thing is as clear as day—and as dark as night. Mr. Racksole, I never know by whom I am surrounded. I never know what is going forward. Only sometimes I get hints, glimpses of strange acts and strange secrets. You mentioned my servants. They are almost all good servants, skilled, competent. But what are they besides? For anything I know my fourth sub-chef may be an agent of some European Government. For anything I know my invaluable Miss Spencer may be in the pay of a court dressmaker or a Frankfort banker. Even Rocco may be someone else in addition to Rocco."

"That makes it all the more interesting," remarked Theodore Racksole.

* * * * *

"What a long time you have been, father," said Nella, when he returned to table No. 17 in the salle à manger.

"Only twenty minutes, my dove."

"But you said two seconds. There is a difference."

"Well, you see, I had to wait for the steak to cook."

"Did you have much trouble in getting my birthday treat?"

"No trouble. But it didn't come quite as cheap as you said."

"What do you mean, father?"

"Only that I've bought the entire hotel. But don't split."

Digitized by Google

"Father, you were always a delicious parent. Shall you give me the hotel for a birthday present?"

"No. I shall run it—as an amusement. By the way, who is that chair for?" He noticed that a third cover had been laid at the table.

"That is for a friend of mine who came in about five minutes ago. Of course I told him he must share our steak. He'll be here in a moment."

"May I respectfully inquire his name?"

"Dimmock—Christian name Reginald; profession, English companion to Prince Aribert of Posen. I met him when I was in St. Petersburg with cousin Hetty last autumn. Oh, here he is! Mr. Dimmock, this is my dear father. He has succeeded with the steak."

Theodore Racksole found himself confronted by a very young man, with deep black eyes, and a fresh, boyish expression. They began to talk.

Jules approached with the steak. Racksole tried to catch the waiter's eye, but could not. The dinner proceeded.

"Oh, father!" cried Nella, "what a lot of mustard you have taken!"

"Have I?" he said, and then he happened to glance into a mirror on his left hand between two windows. He saw the reflection of Jules, who stood behind his chair, and he saw Jules give a slow, significant, ominous wink to Mr. Dimmock—Christian name Reginald.

He examined his mustard in silence. He thought that perhaps he had helped himself rather plenteously to mustard.

THIRD CHAPTER.
At Three A.M.

Mr. Reginald Dimmock proved himself, despite his extreme youth, to be a man of the world and of experiences, and a practised talker. Conversation between him and Nella Racksole never seemed to flag. They chattered about St. Petersburg, and the ice on the Neva, and the tenor at the opera who had been exiled to Siberia, and the quality of Russian tea, and the sweetness of Russian champagne, and various other aspects of Muscovite existence. Russia exhausted, Nella lightly outlined her own doings since she had met the young man in the Tsar's capital, and this recital brought the topic round to London, where it stayed till the final piece of steak was eaten. Theodore Racksole noticed that Mr. Dimmock gave very meagre information about his own movements, either past or future. He regarded the youth as a typical hanger-on of Courts, and wondered how he had obtained his post of companion to Prince Aribert of Posen, and who Prince Aribert of Posen might be. The millionaire thought he had once heard of Posen, but he wasn't sure; he rather fancied it was one of those small, nondescript German States of which five-sixths of the subjects are Palace officials, and the rest charcoal-burners or innkeepers. Until the meal was nearly over, Racksole said little—perhaps his thoughts were too busy with Jules' wink to Mr. Dimmock; but when ices had been followed by coffee, he decided that it might be as well, in the interests of the hotel, to discover something about his daughter's friend. He never for an instant questioned her right to possess her own friends; he had always left her in the most amazing liberty, relying on her inherited good sense to keep her out of mischief; but, quite apart from the wink, he was struck by Nella's attitude towards Mr. Dimmock, an attitude in which an amiable scorn was blended with an evident desire to propitiate and please.

"Nella tells me, Mr. Dimmock, that you hold a confidential position with Prince Aribert of Posen," said Racksole. "You will pardon an American's ignorance, but is Prince Aribert a reigning Prince—what, I believe, you call in Europe, a Prince Regnant?"

"His Highness is not a reigning Prince, nor ever likely to be," answered Dimmock. "The Grand Ducal Throne of Posen is occupied by his Highness' nephew, the Grand Duke Eugen."

"Nephew?" cried Nella with astonishment.

"Why not, dear lady?"

"But Prince Aribert is surely very young?"

"The Prince, by one of those vagaries of chance which occur sometimes in the history of families, is precisely the same age as the Grand Duke. The late Grand Duke's father was twice married. Hence this youthfulness on the part of an uncle."

"How delicious to be the uncle of someone as old as yourself! But I suppose it is no fun for Prince Aribert. I suppose he has to be frightfully respectful and obedient, and all that, to his nephew?"

"The Grand Duke and my serene master are like brothers. At present, of course, Prince Aribert is nominally heir to the throne, but as no doubt you are aware, the Grand Duke will shortly marry a near relative of the Emperor's, and should there be a family——" Mr. Dimmock stopped and shrugged his straight shoulders. "The Grand Duke," he went on, without finishing the last sentence, "would much prefer Prince Aribert to be his successor. He really doesn't want to marry. Between ourselves, strictly between ourselves, he regards marriage as rather a bore. But, of course, being a German Grand Duke, he is bound to marry. He owes it to his country, to Posen."

"How large is Posen?" asked Racksole bluntly.

"Father," Nella interposed laughing, "you shouldn't ask such inconvenient questions. You ought to have guessed that it isn't etiquette to inquire about the size of a German dukedom."

"I am sure," said Dimmock, with a polite smile, "that the Grand Duke is as much amused as anyone at the size of his territory. I forget the exact acreage, but I remember that once Prince Aribert and myself walked across it and back again in a single day."

"Then the Grand Duke cannot travel very far within his own dominions? You may say that the sun does set on his empire?"

"It does," said Dimmock.

"Unless the weather is cloudy," Nella put in. "Is the Grand Duke content always to stay at home?"

"On the contrary, he is a great traveller, much more so than Prince Aribert. I may tell you what no one knows at present, outside this hotel, that his Royal Highness the Grand Duke, with a small suite, will be here to-morrow"

"In London?" asked Nella.

"Yes."

"In this hotel?"

"Yes."

"Oh, how lovely!"

"That is why your humble servant is here to-night—a sort of advance guard."

"But I understood," Racksole said, "that you were—er—attached to Prince Aribert, the uncle."

"I am. Prince Aribert will also be here. The Grand Duke and the Prince have business about important investments connected with the Grand Duke's marriage settlement. . . In the highest quarters, you understand."

"For so discreet a person," thought Racksole, "you are fairly communicative." Then he said aloud: "Shall we go out on the terrace?"

As they crossed the dining-room Jules stopped Mr. Dimmock and handed him a letter. "Just come, sir, by messenger," said Jules.

Nella dropped behind for a second with her father.

"Leave me alone with this boy a little—there's a dear parent," she whispered in his ear.

"I am a mere cipher, an obedient nobody," Racksole replied, pinching her arm surreptitiously. "Treat me as such. Use me as you like. I will go and look after my hotel." And soon afterwards he disappeared.

Nella and Mr. Dimmock sat together on the terrace sipping iced drinks. They made a handsome couple, bowered amid plants which blossomed at the command of a Chelsea wholesale florist. People who passed by remarked privately that from the look of things there was the beginning of a romance in that conversation. Perhaps there was, but a more intimate acquaintance with the character of Nella Racksole would have been necessary in order to predict what precise form that romance would take.

Digitized by Google

Jules himself served the liquids, and at ten o'clock he brought another note. Intreating a thousand pardons, Reginald Dimmock, after he had glanced at the note, excused himself on the plea of urgent business for his Serene master, uncle of the Grand Duke of Posen. He asked if he might fetch Mr. Racksole, or escort Miss Racksole to her father. But Miss Racksole said gaily that she felt no need of an escort, and should go to bed. She added that her father and herself always endeavoured to be independent of each other.

Just then Theodore Racksole had found his way once more into Mr. Babylon's private room. Before arriving there, however, he had discovered that in some mysterious manner the news of the change of proprietorship had worked its way down to the lowest strata of the hotel's cosmos. The corridors hummed with it, and even underservants were to be seen discussing the thing, just as though it mattered to them.

"Have a cigar, Mr. Racksole," said the urbane Mr. Babylon, "and a mouthful of the oldest cognac in all Europe."

In a few minutes these two were talking eagerly and rapidly. Félix Babylon was astonished at Racksole's capacity for absorbing the details of hotel management. And as for Racksole he soon realised that Félix Babylon must be a prince of hotel managers. It had never occurred to Racksole before that to manage a hotel, even a large hotel, could be a specially interesting affair, or that it could make any excessive demands upon the brains of the manager; but he came to see that he had under-rated the possibilities of a hotel. The business of the Grand Babylon was enormous. It took Racksole, with all his genius for organisation, exactly half an hour to master the details of the hotel laundry-work. And the laundry-work was but one branch of activity amid scores, and not a very large one at that. The machinery of checking supplies, and of establishing a mean ratio between the raw stuff received in the kitchen and the number of meals served in the salle à manger and the private rooms, was very complicated and delicate. When Racksole had grasped it, he at once suggested some improvements, and this led to a long theoretical discussion, and the discussion led to digressions, and then Félix Babylon, in a moment of absent-mindedness, yawned.

Racksole looked at the gilt clock on the high mantelpiece.

"Great Scott!" he said. "It's three o'clock. Mr. Babylon, accept my apologies for having kept you up to such an absurd hour."

"I have not spent so pleasant an evening for many years. You have let me ride my hobby to my heart's content. It is I who should apologise."

Racksole rose.

"I should like to ask you one question," said Babylon. "Have you ever had anything to do with hotels before?"

"Never," said Racksole.

"Then you have missed your vocation. You could have been the greatest of all hotel-managers. You would have been greater than me. and I am unequalled, though I keep only one hotel, and some men have half a dozen. Mr. Racksole, why have you never run a hotel?"

"Heaven knows," he laughed, "but you flatter me, Mr. Babylon."

"I? Flatter? You do not know me. I flatter no one, except, perhaps, now and then an exceptionally distinguished guest. In which case I give suitable instructions as to the bill."

"Speaking of distinguished guests, I am told that a couple of German princes are coming here to-morrow."

"That is so."

"Does one do anything? Does one receive them formally—stand bowing in the entrance-hall, or anything of that sort?"

This picture is a reduced facsimile of next week's cover, which will be printed in colours. It illustrates an exciting struggle between Racksole and Jules, which takes place as the immediate outcome of the events which are recorded in the closing paragraphs of this instalment. Next week's "Phantom Shadows" will be splendid.

Digitized by Google

"Not necessarily. Not unless one wishes. The modern hotel proprietor is not like an inn-keeper of the Middle Ages, and even princes do not expect to see him unless something should happen to go wrong. As a matter of fact, though the Grand Duke of Posen and Prince Aribert have both honoured me by staying here before, I have never even set eyes on them. You will find all arrangements have been made."

They talked a little longer, and then Racksole said good-night.

"Let me see you to your room. The lifts will be closed and the place will be deserted. As for myself, I sleep here," and Mr. Babylon pointed to an inner door.

"No, thanks," said Racksole, "let me explore my own hotel unaccompanied. I believe I can discover my room."

When he got fairly into the passages, Racksole was not so sure that he could discover his own room. The number was 107, but he had forgotten whether it was on the first or second floor. Travelling in a lift, one is unconscious of floors. He passed several lift-doorways, but he could see no glint of a staircase; in all self-respecting hotels staircases have gone out of fashion, and though hotel architects still continue, for old time's sake, to build staircases, they are tucked away in remote corners where their presence is not likely to offend the eye of a spoilt and cosmopolitan public.

The hotel seemed vast, uncanny, deserted. An electric light glowed here and there at long intervals. On the thick carpets, Racksole's thinly-shod feet made no sound, and he wandered at ease to and fro, rather amused, rather struck by the peculiar sense of night and mystery which had suddenly come over him. He fancied he could hear a thousand snores peacefully descending from the upper realms. At length he found a staircase, a very dark and narrow one, and presently he was on the first floor. He soon discovered that the numbers of the rooms on this floor did not get beyond seventy. He encountered another staircase and ascended to the second floor. By the decoration of the walls he recognised this floor as his proper home, and as he strolled through the long corridor he whistled a low, meditative whistle of satisfaction. He thought he heard a step in the transverse corridor, and instinctively he obliterated himself in a recess which held a service-cabinet and a chair. He did hear a step. Peeping cautiously out, he perceived, what he had not perceived previously, that a piece of white ribbon had been tied round the handle of the door of one of the bedrooms. Then a man came round the corner of the transverse corridor, and Racksole drew back. It was Jules—Jules with his hands in his pockets and a slouch hat over his eyes, but in other respects attired as usual.

Racksole, at that instant, remembered with a special vividness what Félix Babylon had said to him at their first interview. He wished he had brought his revolver. He didn't know why he should feel the desirability of a revolver in a London hotel of the most unimpeachable fair fame, but he did feel the desirability of such an instrument of attack and defence. He privately decided that if Jules went past his recess he would take him by the throat and in that attitude put a few plain questions to this highly dubious waiter. But Jules had stopped. The millionaire made another cautious observation. Jules, with infinite gentleness, was turning the handle of the door to which the white ribbon was attached. The door slowly yielded and Jules disappeared within the room. After a brief interval, the night-prowling Jules reappeared, closed the door as softly as he had opened it, removed the ribbon, returned upon his steps, and vanished down the transverse corridor.

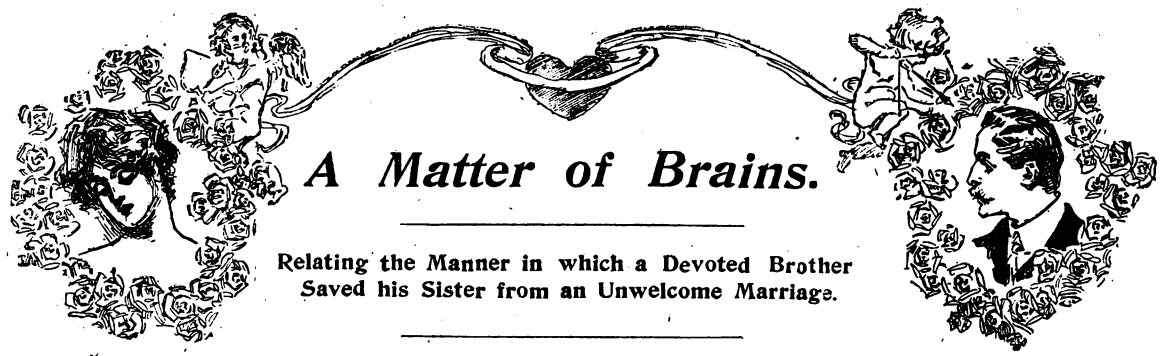
"This is quaint," said Racksole; "quaint to a degree!"

It occurred to him to look at the number of the room, and he stole towards it.

"Well, I'm hanged!" he murmured wonderingly.

The number was 111, his daughter's room! He tried to open it, but the door was locked. Rushing to his own room, No. 107, he seized one of a pair of revolvers (the kind that are made for millionaires) and followed after Jules down the transverse corridor. At the end of this corridor was a window; the window was open, and Jules was innocently gazing out of the window. Ten silent strides, and Theodore Racksole was upon him.

(Another long instalment of this splendid serial next week.)



A Matter of Brains.

Relating the Manner in which a Devoted Brother Saved his Sister from an Unwelcome Marriage.

Dolly glanced unconsciously at the hat-rack as he drew on his left glove. There was something different in its appearance, he thought, but he was for a time quite unable to determine what it was. The fact of the matter was, Dolly was not gifted with a superabundance of intellect. He realised the fact for himself. Perhaps it was because he was so frank in acknowledging his deficiency that his friends seldom referred to it. He was a charming companion—when one wished to rest one's tired brain, and he was the kind of fellow you could always borrow money from on the slightest pretext. Therefore he was tolerated, and managed to find an occasional companion at the club. Therefore he was called "Dolly" by everyone, from the steward of the club up, although he detested the name and much preferred the more dignified, even heroic, appellation, "Adolphus," with which he had been christened.

By the time Dolly had reached the forefinger of his left hand in the careful adjustment of his painfully new-looking gloves, his mentality had been worked up to the pitch of reason. He observed that there was a strange cane in the hat rack, precisely like the cane Jack Hazzard carried. This meant that Hazzard had been in the house recently, at least during the afternoon, and, departing, had left his cane. Dolly was a trifle troubled by this. Not on account of the cane—Hazzard could get that at any time—but why should his old schoolfellow, Jack Hazzard, the very man, although a poor young lawyer, Dolly cared for and admired more than any other man in the world, call at the house and not ask for him? They had been in the same class at college. Jack had graduated with honours—Dolly had graduated, in spite of private tutors and Jack's generous coaching, by the back door. But they had been in the same class and they were bosom friends, and Dolly could not understand the matter at all.

Digitized by Google

Dolly heard a faint sob. He looked up in a frightened manner and listened intently. The sob was repeated, and it was not difficult to tell that it came from the library, and it was less difficult to determine that it was uttered by his sister Laura.

Dolly loved but one woman in the world. The phrase seems trite, inasmuch as it has been repeated by every man to every woman he has made love to. But it was literally true in Dolly's case, as any of the girls who would have contented themselves with his fortunes present and prospective, despite his lack of brains, would have acknowledged. Dolly had no thought for any woman in the world but his sister Laura. Her he worshipped as a superior being to himself.

Dolly walked slowly to the library. There was a horrible fear in his mind that his friend had offended his sister. He could not offer a reasonable explanation for such a state of affairs, so he determined to find out what it was about—and Dolly seldom determined to do anything. He threw open the door of the library and paused. A handsome girl was sitting at a little rosewood desk with her head resting upon her arms. The fugitive end of a lace handkerchief, and an occasional tremor of the slight figure made it very evident to Dolly that he had not been mistaken in supposing that his sister was crying. He walked very gently over to her, and put his ungloved hand on her fluffy golden head. It seemed almost like taking a liberty, for he had never been the romping kind of boy who delights in teasing the other boys of his acquaintance by taking delightful liberties with a pretty sister. He was a little bit afraid, indeed, but he stroked the pretty head once or twice and felt unusually manly.

"By Jove—Lol," he drawled, first adjusting his eyeglass (Dolly could not talk unless his eyeglass was either properly in position or dangling from his hand), "by Jove, I—I——," but Dolly could not think of anything to say. Finally an inspiration came to him.

"I'm awfully sorry, Lol," he drawled again. To his great surprise, far from having the desired effect, this speech precipitated a fresh burst of tears, and the head shook convulsively. Dolly was nonplussed. The only way he knew to please a girl who was offended at anything was to apologise, but Dolly had nothing to apologise for, and could not guess anything. He boldly determined to do something desperate. He knelt down on the floor at her side and put his arm round her. Then he put his mouth close to her shell-like ear, blushing furiously the while, and whispered, still with a drawl:

"Tell a fellah what's the mattah, Lol. We've always been old chums, haven't we, Lol? Tell a fellah—p'waps I can help you, don't you know."

The head shook furiously in the negative. Dolly was discouraged, but he continued:

"I know I am not very smart, and all that—but I'll do all I can—indeed I will, don't you know. Tell me what's the mattah, Lol." In reply to this there was a burst of words, sobs, and little short-drawn breathing from which Dolly managed, by the aid of much and unusual concentration of mind, to gather the fact that his sister considered herself the most miserable girl in the whole world, and that she wished she were dead, and all that sort of thing.

"But you haven't told me why?" continued Dolly.

Laura suddenly sat bolt upright, with an angry look in her eyes, and said, excitedly:

"I don't love him—I don't love him a bit—I detest him, and papa says I must marry him."

Dolly got up and walked slowly back and forth the length of the room. He was a good deal surprised. He liked Jack—he always had. He knew very little about the indications of such things, but it had always seemed to him that Jack was a little sweet on Laura. Perhaps it was because he wished such to be the case that he had thought it. Then, too, Laura had always seemed to be fond of Jack. To be sure, she had never said anything that would indicate anything in particular, but it had always been Dolly's cherished wish that his chum Jack and his sister Laura should some day marry—and when they had settled, Dolly had a secret hope that they would let him come and live with them, the two beings he thought most of in the world, and thought of almost continually. Of course, he would never marry; but they would all have plenty of money, and they would be very happy together. It was too bad. The only dream of Dolly's life had been broken, and he, in turn, felt that he was quite the most miserable man in the world. Of course, he would never wish again that they should marry. If his sister actually detested Jack, he would do all in his power with his father to alter the latter's decision. He would appeal to Jack's own manliness. He was sure he could break if off.

He went over to his sister, who was still sitting, with clenched hands and tearful eyes, where he had left her. He stooped over and kissed her white forehead.

"By Jove! you know," he said, "don't worry, Lol—don't worry, old chum—sister. I'll fix it, don't you know. Jack's always been a good friend of mine, and once he said he'd do anything I evah asked him—it was after I did him a favah, you know. I'm rawther ashamed to speak of it, but I will now—and I'll make him give you up—and I'll make him pwomise nevah to come heah again at all. By Jove, I will!—and I'll take his cane back to him myself. He'll nevah come heah again. He used to be my chum, you know, but Jack Hazzard shall nevah come heah again to bother my deah old chum, my sister."

"But it isn't Jack Hazzard!" It was a very timid voice now. He looked at her quickly. She was blushing, and his heart gave a sudden jump.

"Who is it—who is it?" he said so quickly for him that he noticed it himself.

"The Count de Froissart," answered his sister, almost in a whisper.

'By Jove!" said Dolly, and then he was silent for a few minutes. When he looked at her again she was sitting as he had seen her at first, with her arms on the desk and her head resting on them. But she was not crying. Girls are liable to do anything to hide a blush.

"I don't like him," said Dolly. The head made no answer.

"Do you like him?" he asked. The head shook furiously in the negative.

"Of cawse you don't," said Dolly; "you told me you detested him—but I've just found out something, old sister, and I want you to tell me the truth about it. Dear old Jack Hazzard, poor Jack Hazzard, who hasn't anything but his heart, don't you know, my chum Jack Hazzard—he loves you, sister, and—you—love—him?" The head bent just slightly in the affirmative.

"Thank Heaven!" said Dolly.

Digitized by Google

Dolly spent the afternoon at his club as usual. But he was a very much preoccupied Dolly. Instead of spending the afternoon with the crowd of smart and jolly fellows who tolerated his modest silence for financial reasons, he remained quite alone in a corner of the room. The smart fellows made it a point to go up to him one by one and ask him if it were really true that he was "thinking." But Dolly disarmed them by the gravity of his manner and the look almost of decision that had come to his face. There was one, however, who did not make any allusion to Dolly's thoughtfulness. It was the Count de Froissart, a French nobleman who stayed, so it was whispered, but a short time in one place as a rule, and who intended to marry an heiress. He was not a bogus count. His bankruptcy was too public a matter to leave any doubt about the genuineness of his title. And it was no reflection against him that he wished to marry money. In the matrimonial market the Count was no bankrupt. Are not titles worth more than money?

The Count was more than agreeable to Dolly, and many were the whispered "I told you so's," among the other clubmen as they dined together that evening.

"They say it's all arranged," said Jack Dashing, with a sigh, for Laura Nostrand was not only an heiress but a beautiful girl.

"We're not in it," said Tom Barry gruffly.

"I take it that these French noblemen are cleverer at making love to the fathers and sons than they are to the daughters," said Kerman, who was a journalist who considered himself witty.

"They arrive at their destination just the same," said Dusen.

Eight o'clock arrived, and Dolly and the Count were sitting before their last bottle of wine.

"I think," said the Count, "that I'll stroll up to your house and make a short call on your very beautiful, your exceptionally interesting sister—besides, I have still a few points to discuss with your father. He is a man I was born to admire."

"Of cawse," said Dolly languidly.

"Possibly I may have the pleasure of seeing you later at the club. I have the greatest desire to make your more intimate acquaintance."

"P'waps," drawled Dolly.

"Then I shall return," said the Count, rising to depart.

"By-the-way," continued Dolly, "if you do happen to be back here by nine o'clock, p'waps you wouldn't mind giving me a lesson, don't you know, deah boy, in baccarat—don't know anything about baccarat, you know, and want to learn. Be awfully stupid for you, don't you know, but——"

"Not at all, not at all. I will return promptly at nine o'clock, I pledge you my word of honour. Au revoir." And the Count departed.

"He will not call on the dear old girl-chum to-night," said Dolly to himself. "Eight to nine is hardly time enough, and that man, I'm suah, would prefer to gamble with a man who didn't know how, to calling on his fiancée—at least I hope he would—and if he doesn't call to-night he never will again."

At nine o'clock that evening the Count and Dolly repaired to a private room in the club.

At three o'clock the next morning they emerged from it. The Count looked as fresh as a white-winged yacht when she plunges into her native element. His white teeth glistened and his eyes sparkled with the pleasure of abundant success. As for Dolly he was a sorry sight. His right eye blinked sleepily behind his monocle, and his left seemed closed altogether. His hair was untidy and his collar and necktie were sadly in need of adjusting. There was an unusual flush on his face, too, and his mouth was twitching.

At the door of the club they parted.

"I condole with you, Monsieur," said the Count; "you play a magnificent game of baccarat. You are far my superior at play, I assure you. It was all a matter of luck—all a matter of unfortunate luck."

"No," drawled Dolly, as he turned up the street, "it was a matter of bwains, don't you know—a matter of bwains."

It was quite four o'clock in the morning when Dolly walked feebly into his home. It was the first time in all his life he had been out so late or even late at all, unless his presence somewhere else accounted for his absence. He was not surprised, therefore, to find a light in the library, and to hear the rustle of papers that told that his father was waiting for him. He walked unsteadily into the room, walked up face to face with his father, and sank half-exhausted into a chair.

"Where have you been?" asked the latter sternly.

"Club," said Dolly laconically.

"Doing what, if you please?" continued his father, with an indication of rising anger.

"Gambling," said Dolly, still laconically.

"Fool!" said his father.

"I have heard you call me that befoah, father," drawled Dolly.

For a time the older man was silent. Then he spoke again.

"How much have you lost, Adolphus?" he asked.

"Every penny," said Dolly.

"Every penny?" gasped the old man.

"Every farthing," corrected Dolly.

"But, my son, you had in the bank something like twenty thousand pounds?"

"Gave cheques for all of it," said Dolly.

"But you can stop the cheques——"

"Gave my word of honour that I wouldn't," drawled Dolly again.

"With whom were you playing?" asked his father quickly.

"A professional gambler and a cheat," answered Dolly.

Again the older man was silent for a time. Finally he said:

"Adolphus, when I gave you that money I told you that the income from it was sufficent to support you in as much style as I considered good for your well-being, especially as you had, at no expense, a home and the use of my stable. I did not and do not propose to be treated by my son as most rich men have been treated by theirs. The twenty thousand pounds is a bagatelle. Your action is something far different. When I gave it to you, you will remember that I warned you that if you spent part of it you would have to get along on the income from what remained. If you spent all of it, you would have to go to work and earn your own living. You accepted the conditions. Now, sir, you shall——"

"I will go to work, father, and earn my own living." He walked towards the door and halted a moment irresolutely.

"Father," he said, "I want you to bweak off the match between the Count de Froissart and my dear sister. She loves an honest man and an honest man loves her—besides, the Count de Froissart is the man who won my money—p'waps it won't be necessary to bweak off the match. By Jove, you know, I don't think it will. He did not call on either you or her to-night in order to gamble with me—and he can catch a boat for France to-morrow."

The two men stood looking at each other for a moment or two. And then as though each knew what the other was thinking, and as though each knew what the other meant, they walked silently towards each other and gripped each other by the hand.

* * * * *

Dolly took his usual place at the table of his coterie the next day, and listened to their jokes, most of which were directed at him, and tried hard to understand them. He was delighted with everything all the afternoon, but his delight reached a climax when a generously strong hand was placed on his shoulder. Dolly looked up and ejaculated: "Jack!"

"Dolly," said the latter, "come over here a minute. I have something to tell you." They walked to the further end of the room.

"Dolly," said Jack again, "I'm going to marry your sister. I'm the happiest man in the world."

"No, you are not, don't you know, old chap," answered Dolly; "I am."

Thomas Winthrop Hall.

Digitized by Google

HOW TO START THIS GREAT CONTEST TO-DAY.—The three numbers of Short Stories containing the first coupons may be obtained through any newsagent for threepence, or will be sent post free for 4½d. by the Publisher, Short Stories, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

£25 IN CASH PRIZES!

1st Prize, £10. 2nd Prize, £5. 3rd Prize, £2.

And Eight Cash Prizes of £1 each.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find five signatures. Each of these signatures is the ordinary signature of the person to whom it belongs. The writing is not assumed for the occasion; it is just the way in which each of the persons signs his name to letters or to cheques. The first three sets of signatures have already appeared, and the numbers containing them can be had from any newsvendor, or from this office for 1½d. each post free.

What you have to do is to print in the space opposite each signature the name (initials, Christian name and surname) which you think it to be. No one but the Editor possesses the correct names of all the signatures shown. If you are in doubt as to the correct rendering of any signature or signatures ask some of your friends. When you have filled up the coupon to the best of your ability, cut it out and keep it by you, with the other coupons, until you see an announcement in SHORT STORIES telling you to send them in, together with the coupons which will appear in SHORT STORIES.

CONDITIONS.

(1) The name must be clearly printed in ink opposite each signature.
(2) Only one name is allowed in each space.
(3) No alterations are allowed in the words.
(4) When you have filled up your coupon, cut it out and keep it by you, together with the coupons which have appeared and will appear in SHORT STORIES.
(5) Each competitor may send only one set of coupons, but all the members of one household may compete. Each set will be accepted independently.
(6) In all cases the Editor's decision is final, and competitors may only enter on this condition.

COUPON No. 4.

No. 19.
No. 20.
No. 21.
No. 22.
No. 23.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

Digitized by Google

THIS SERIES CONCLUDES BELOW.

DECOYED!

A Striking Series of Society Revelations. Told by the Decoy herself.

LAST EPISODE.

A Decoy no Longer.

I HAD escaped with my life. But I trembled with fear of what might still await me, for I no sooner closed the door behind me, than I realised how helpless I still was.

Suppose the coast was not quite so clear as I had hoped, and I failed to reach the street before being perhaps seized and choked from behind, so that I could not even make an outcry? Or suppose that there had been some misunderstanding about the arrangements of my friends, and that I had merely escaped from one trap to fall into another?

No wonder that my heart palpitated with fear, and that, hampered by having to carry a bag in each hand, my progress towards the gate seemed to be inordinately slow!

"Turn to the right, walk about twenty yards, and you will find a hansom waiting for you."

The doctor had instructed me to this effect. But when I saw the hansom I paused, panic-stricken, for I remembered that other hansom in which Mr. O'Connell had been driven to his doom, and I was possessed by a sudden fear that, after all, Dr. Farnie was merely taking the easiest way of disposing of me.

As I slowly walked a little nearer to the vehicle, the figure of a man emerged from a gateway which had previously sheltered him from observation, and my fears vanished on the instant, for I recognised him as no other than Lord Broomville.

Now I was safe indeed, and an exclamation of thankfulness escaped me as I was joyfully clasped in the arms of the man who already held my heart in his keeping.

"Forgive me, dearest," he whispered, after pressing a warm kiss on my lips. "Forgive me! I am so overjoyed to know that you are safe, that I couldn't resist claiming a lover's privilege."

"And you!" I whispered back, as he quickly relieved me of my impedimenta. "You are safe too? You have escaped from those terrible bogus policemen? Oh! I am so thankful!"

"You are thankful to know that I am safe?"

"How can I be otherwise? I have suffered torments on your account!"

Lord Broomville seemed to think that this speech required another kiss by way of appreciative answer, for how could I help showing him that his safety was even dearer to me than my own?

"This, darling, means that you will marry me by-and-bye, doesn't it?"

For all answer to this question I put my hand tremulously into my lover's disengaged one, and he was well content with this mute acceptance.

"God willing, Vivienne, you shall never regret converting me into the happiest of men," he murmured rapturously. "But we have much to do, and must make good our departure at once."

With ready obedience I stepped into the waiting hansom, and I cared not then whither I was driven, for was I not being guarded by the man who was dearer than all else in the world to me?

Nevertheless, I did not let the precious brief-bag out of my sight, for it represented the whole future of the real father whom I was longing to meet, and I did not intend to fail in any part of my duty towards him.

It seemed only a few minutes ere the cab stopped at the Palace Hotel. A couple of rooms and a maid were already engaged in readiness for me, and after assuring himself that I was in safe hands, Lord Broomville bade me a brief farewell.

"I have an appointment, even at this unearthly time," he said, "and it is important that I should keep it, so I must tear myself away from you for a few hours."

"You'll be very careful?" I said anxiously. "Don't let those men who acted as policemen get you into their clutches again. You might not escape so easily another time."

A happy laugh emphasised my lover's reply.

"Don't let them worry you again, dear. I assure you, they are absolutely harmless, so far as we are concerned, for it was because they were already in my pay that they sought an opportunity of convincing 'Mr. D'Alton' that they were ready to do anything for money. I could have laughed aloud when they 'arrested' me, if I had not been anxious about you. But I had to keep up the deception awhile longer, until restitution had been made to your father, so I was apparently driven off, to be disposed of at the 'City Office' by Kaspar and Co. But I am still safe and sound, and so are you, my dearest."

Another moment, and my affianced husband had started on his return journey, and I sought a few hours' rest, happy in the firm belief that all was going well with myself and my friends.

* * * * *

At nine o'clock I was dressed again, ready for any further developments that might take place, and I was not at all surprised when Lord Broomville presented himself, for he had promised to drive with me to see my father, directly after breakfast.

"You look as bright as if you had slept all night," he smiled, "and as if you had never had a worry in your life."

"You forget," was my happy answer, "how much I have to compensate me for past worries. But let us make haste. I am dying to know my father."

"And he will be happy when he is able to remember all about you. At present his mind is still clouded, so far as past events are concerned. But I am well fortified with a supply of the antidote you mentioned, and we will soon put everything right."

"Suppose the tulip-juice does not act as we hope it will?"

"If you made no mistake in reading what the book said of it, I feel confident of its efficacy."

"And I am sure I have made no mistake, so we will hope for the best."

Each yard that we drove served to increase my excitement now, for marvellous things were to take place within the hour, and I could hardly restrain my impatience when we actually drove up to a house near Lancaster Gate.

"Does my father live here?" I asked breathlessly, receiving for reply: "He is here now. He has lived in Fulham for many years, earning his living as a clerk. But an old friend of his recognised him lately, and made it his business to work for his re-instatement. Now that he is likely to recover his memory, you will learn much that still puzzles the friend—Mr. Halliday."

Five minutes later I stood in the presence of Mr. and Mrs. Halliday, who both welcomed me with tears of pleasure in their eyes. There was also a Dr. Midhurst there, and a tal man, of aristocratic bearing, who looked at me with a pathetic lack of recognition, but of whose actual personality I had not the slightest doubt.

Digitized by Google

This was indeed my father, and it was heart-breaking to think that even the sight of his only child had no power to re-awaken the memory which had laid dormant for so many cruel years.

"Never mind," was my cheerful reflection. "He will know me directly."

While I was trying to rouse my father's recognition Lord Broomville and Mr. Halliday had been swift of action.

"D'Alton, do you mind drinking this?" asked Mr. Halliday. "We are hoping it will do you good."

"My name is Vincent—Henry Vincent, as I have already explained to you," was the puzzled reply. "But I shall be very thankful if this medicine will benefit me in the way you suggested. Thank you."

With the word "Thank you," my father took the tiny glass held out to him, and drained it on the instant, whilst I, terribly anxious, watched for the slightest sign of dawning recognition.

This, however, was deferred for the present, for, with a wild, inarticulate cry, my father clapped his hands to his head, and swayed about as if he were in agony. Then he dropped like a log, and lay prone on the floor, the picture of death itself, and I shrieked in terror at the sight.

"Take her away, please," was Dr. Midhurst's hurried direction. "We must raise him to a couch, and loosen his collar."

"He is dead! We have killed him!" I sobbed.

"He is not dead yet," was the stern response. "Please make as little trouble as you can."

The doctor was very blunt of speech. But his words had their desired effect, and though it was half-an-hour before I heard any further news, I sat, mute and motionless, until Lord Broomville came and kissed me compassionately.

"Take heart, dearest," he said. "Your father is now lying in a sound, restful sleep, and Dr. Midhurst is confident that when he wakes he will know himself to be Beverley D'Alton."

"Pray Heaven he may be right!" I murmured, and when, an hour later, Mrs. Halliday sought me again, there was a glad light on her face which told me that all was indeed well.

* * * * *

"Your father shows signs of waking, and the doctor thinks that it would be wise for yours to be the first face he sees."

Such was the message brought to me, and, trembling with carefully-suppressed excitement, I followed my kind hostess to the couch on which my father was stirring uneasily, as if dreams were disturbing his still dormant senses.

It was an indescribably solemn moment. The sleeping man. The suspense-racked girl. The watchful doctor. The devoted friends!

All but one were almost breathless with anticipation of what the next five minutes might bring forth. And he—ah! how could I resist an exclamation of joy when he opened his eyes and gazed into my face with astounded rapture!

"Helena!" he cried, springing to his feet with the agility of a boy. "Helena my darling wife! Is it possible that I have been mistaken, and that God has spared you to me after all?"

"Father!" I sobbed, rushing to embrace him. "Father! Oh! how thankful I am that you have recovered."

"Recovered? Why, I have never been ill! And yet—surely I must have been very ill, for I dreamt that you had left me for ever! And now I see you—alive and well! But how different you are! And your dress is odd too!"

My father's face, just now transfigured with joy, grew very troubled. He had at first been misled by my evident resemblance to his girl-wife. But various discrepancies were forcing themselves upon his notice, and he looked helplessly around him, in search of enlightenment.

I fervently thanked God for the great blessing He had vouchsafed me, but my heart still ached for my poor father, and I felt it impossible to tell him that so many years of his life had been stolen from him.

"I don't know this place," he continued slowly. "Helena, what's wrong with me? My eyes must surely be playing me false! Everything is so strange. Tell Bridgeman I want him. He gave me some medicine for my cold, but I can't understand what I am doing here."

Mr. Halliday, who had purposely kept out of sight, now came forward and faced his old friend.

"Beverley," he said, "time has made a big stride since your treacherous valet robbed you of your memory, and turned you adrift to earn your living as best you could——"

"Earn my living! Nonsense! That is a problem I have never had to face in my life!"

Evidently a marvellous thing had happened. The antidote had restored the patient's memory to the moment in which he must have taken the fiendish dose of blighting poison. But it had left his mind a blank concerning subsequent events.

"I am strangely puzzled," he faltered. "My wife is unlike herself. And you—friend Halliday—you look many years older than when I last saw you."

"I am fifteen years older," was the pitying reply. "And so are you, old friend. Those years have been a tragedy. But, please God, your barque is now sailing in smooth waters, and for the rest of your days it will be anchored in the Haven of Happiness."

The words, spoken so solemnly, carried conviction with them.

"Fifteen years!" was the horrified rejoinder. "Do you mean to tell me that my brain has slept for fifteen years?"

For all answer, Mr. Halliday, whose lips were twitching with sympathetic emotion, pointed to a pierglass which surmounted a console table in the room, and we all anxiously watched my unfortunate father as he hastily strode up to it, and looked at the reflection which faced him.

"It is even so!" came from between the white lips. "I am no longer young! I am a modern Rip van Winkle."

"But he came back to find himself unwanted and forgotten, while for you there wait the regard of old friends, and the love of a devoted daughter!"

"A daughter? Ah, now I understand! This is not my Helena! It is Vivienne, my little Vivienne, grown into her mother's likeness!"

"Father!"

"My darling! My dear one!"

Tears flowed from my father's eyes, and my own were blinded with emotion, as I was folded in his loving embrace. But my heart beat high with gratitude to God, for, with His help, I had been able to foil our enemies, and had won a parent whom I could love and honour.

* * * * *

There was a long story of fraud and wickedness to unravel. But Beverley D'Alton could tell us nothing that happened to him after he had been subjected to the malignant experiment which put it beyond his power to betray his enemies. We could only conjecture that they must have insured his return to England from Cologne, where he had been staying for a few days after taking me to Bochum to school. Then his valet appropriated his money and papers, and passed himself off as Beverley D'Alton.

My father's discovery by Mr. Halliday was nothing less than providential. The latter was senior partner of a big banking firm, and when, some months ago, a man calling himself Henry Vincent was engaged as assistant cashier, he was amazed at his marvellous resemblance to his old-time friend, Beverley D'Alton, who had apparently resolved not to live in England again, but of whose great good luck all the financial world was talking.

"Henry Vincent" had not the slightest recollection of anything that had happened to him prior to fifteen years ago. But the actual truth did not occur to Mr. Halliday until he was at a reception at which the supposed Beverley D'Alton and I were present. He had known my mother well before her marriage, and saw my resemblance to her, although he had never seen her since she was taken abroad in search of health.

Digitized by Google

He was, however, puzzling his brains to understand what was meant by the fact that the much-lauded millionaire bore no resemblance to the Beverley D'Alton whom he had known in years gone by, when he was accosted by Viscount Broomville.

"How do you do, Mr. Halliday?" he said. "You seem to be eyeing the D'Altons very curiously. Father and daughter are not much alike, eh?"

"And that is really supposed to be Beverley D'Alton?"

"It is the very individual."

"I have my doubts about that. I knew D'Alton when he was a young man, but that person bears no resemblance to him."

"Hush! Let nobody else hear you say that yet," was Lord Broomville's eager injunction. "What you have said supports my belief that imposture and rascality are in the air."

Of course, Mr. Halliday wanted to know a great deal all at once. But Lord Broomville was cautious, and made an appointment for the next morning, when remarkable disclosures were made on both sides.

It was resolved to work carefully and expeditiously, and Lord Broomville promptly disappeared from his usual haunts, to pursue certain investigations, while Mr. Halliday satisfied himself, by judicious questioning, that "Henry Vincent," who remembered nothing prior to fifteen years ago, must indeed be the real Beverley D'Alton.

Thus, when I was almost distracted by doubts and fears, willing workers were doing their best to solve the mysteries which surrounded me, and bring the gang of criminals to justice.

The incident in the seed shop gave them their first clue about the strange mental condition of "Henry Vincent," and their plans embraced the idea of experimenting upon him while I was there also.

Miss D'Alton was their next object of solicitude, and the ultimate recognition between herself and her nephew was a very affecting one, but joyful in the extreme.

One other victim of Mrs. Sherwood's poisonous concoction was Alan Melrose. But he and his sisters were shadowed on their northward journey by detectives in the pay of Lord Broomville, and the mock specialist, who proved to be no other than the murderous Kaspar Krause, was cleverly caught in his own trap, with the result that his intended victims returned to London in great excitement. Alan was soon as completely restored as my father and Miss D'Alton, and he was able to explain all about the missing £80,000 worth of securities, all of which were eventually returned to him.

The Greathams had not been victimised at all. Claude Greatham received a secret visit from his old friend, Lord Broomville, and was henceforth an indefatigable worker in the cause of justice. Indeed, it was he who introduced Dr. Farnie, whose remarkable powers had been of such signal service to us.

Speaking of Dr. Farnie brings me back to where I left him, after making my escape from the house in Park Lane. His task was a delicate one. He had to try to keep the impostor, who was indeed and in truth no other than my father's former valet, Tallis Bridgeman, in thorough mental subjection until there was no doubt that I had got safely out of the house with the precious papers which had been so useful in helping the ex-valet and his wife to pursue their career of imposture.

In this he was quite successful, but his power failed to last until a posse of detectives arrived on the scene, and his devotion to our cause nearly proved fatal to him, for he was locked in his own room, resisting a determined attempt to murder him, when timely relief arrived, and caused the arch criminal to direct against himself the poisoned dagger which had been intended for the doctor who had befooled him so cleverly.

We none of us wanted a scandal, so the affair was hushed up as much as possible. The public certainly learnt that a faithless valet, his career of treachery being discovered, had evaded justice by committing suicide. But many details were kept quiet, and my father took Aunt Helena and myself abroad for a while, the Park Lane house being closed as a matter of course.

Prince Gorouki had both his diamond ring and his marriage settlement returned to him, and though he no doubt thinks me a very fickle young person, he is ignorant of the peril he ran when he became a suitor for my hand.

Mrs. Sherwood, or, to give her her right name, Mrs. Bridgeman, escaped with her sister-in-law, Annchen Krause, but both women lost their lives in a shipwreck, and many people were thankful to know that no further mischief could emanate from them.

Susan is my maid still, and is greatly excited over my forthcoming marriage with Viscount Broomville. So is Aunt Helena. And so is my former governess, Fräulein Wernher, who has come all the way from Bochum to be present.

As for our many friends, their troubles have ended as happily as mine have, and they all do their best to help me to forget the terrible time when I was brought to England to be a "decoy."

THE END.

Our New Serial—"Phantom Shadows."

Do you like the opening chapters of Arnold Bennett's story, which appear in this number? Do you like the splendid illustrations from Reginald Cleaver's pencil? I am sure you must do. And I am equally as sure that you will like the instalments of "Phantom Shadows" that are to follow. They tell how Theodore Racksole and his daughter Nella fight a grim fight, the issue of which is always in the balance, with Jules, the rascally waiter, and his accomplices. The progress of the schemes and counter-schemes are related in a manner that holds the reader's attention throughout. Not a dull line will be found in the whole story. On page 423 there appears a reduced facsimile of next week's cover. Look out for it on the bookstalls and in the newsagents' racks and windows.

The Signature Competition.

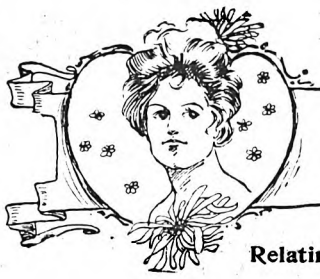
I HOPE you are all entering for our unique competition. The fourth set of signatures appears on page 427. If you have not already started to solve them, remember that you can still get the back numbers containing the first three sets. I should advise you to lose no time in procuring these, else you may find you are too late. Get your friends to enter for the competition as well. There is much amusement to be derived from it, and everybody has an equal opportunity of carrying off a prize.

The Tenth Unsolved Love Problem.

I SHALL announce as soon as I possibly can the name of the winner of the guinea offered in connection with the problem entitled "The Heart of Claire Gilchrist." Another, the final one of this series, which has been so ppular, will appear shortly.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google



Tit for Tat.

Relating how the Reply to a Question was Postponed, and how it was Answered in the End.

"Why won't I marry you? Oh, well, for several reasons; but I will be charitable and give but one—I do not love you."

She spoke in the most careless tone possible — as though a proposal of marriage was just the most everyday occurrence in the world, and he who makes it even more commonplace and so stupid.

He looked the picture of a disappointed lover—why was not he bored with her as she was undoubtedly with him? He sat uncomfortably on an uncomfortable chair, and toyed nervously with the spoon in the cup of tea that she had humanely given him.

She put up her hand to hide a yawn.

"More sugar?" she asked with indifferent sweetness. "You look as if you wanted something."

"So I do—I want you!" he blurted out desperately.

This was so ridiculous that she laughed aloud.

"But you can't have me," she said, her mood waxing more and more flippant as her patience waned, "while you can have sugar. I advise you to take the sweet that is within your reach, and not cry for the moon. Don't you know the fate of the man in the fable who cried for the moon?" she asked innocently. "The moon laughed at him," and she rose and laughed wickedly at this fiction.

He rose, too. She did not expect he would have sense enough to accept her motion to adjourn. He gulped down his tea and placed the cup upon a table near, and pulled himself together a new man—the dose had done him good.

"Will you allow me to finish the fable?" he asked politely. "The moon has two faces, you know; and when the man had levelled a telescope at her and seen all her imperfections, and blessed his stars that he had cried in vain, why, she—but you can guess what the moon did."

And he picked up his hat and, bowing profoundly, left the room.

* * * * *

By an odd coincidence it was at another tea that they met again after many days.

She saw him approaching her through the crowd above which he towered, and their last meeting was brought vividly to mind, and with it a bright blush to her cheek, for though on that occasion she completely routed him, that parting shot of his wounded her vanity, if nothing else; and to-night as she looked upon his handsome face, not seen for so long, she felt a sharp pain in her heart that made her fear that it, too, was wounded. Her one thought was to escape him, and as the crush was too great for her to get out of his way, she turned her back upon him unceremoniously.

Evidently he had no reason to avoid her, for notwithstanding this impolite action on her part the next moment he was addressing her, and she turned to him with a guilty blush.

"How do you do?" he said with nonchalance, just as if they were but slight acquaintances, with no bitter social memories in the past to bind them together with the link of suffering. She wished he felt as keenly as she did. "Were you not cruel enough to me at our last meeting," he continued pleasantly, "that you must needs cut me at this? Perhaps you think I am going to make a fool of myself as I did then!" and the way he laughed brought the tears into her eyes.

"Ah!" she sighed, so low that he had to bend his head to hear her, "it was somebody else who was the fool then—not you!"

"Who?" he asked, with a ring of triumph in his voice.

"I!"

She whispered the little monosyllable in so shamefaced a way that he had to bend still lower to catch it.

The tide of humanity had set towards the rooms where the refreshments were served, and left them standing alone. Perhaps she fondly fancied he would take her in his arms at this confession, but she was sadly disappointed. Instead he drew himself up to his full height, with a smile on his lips that struck terror to her soul, and said coolly:

"Gallantry forbids that I should agree with you, yet I dare not contradict you, so we will let it stand an open question. Perhaps I shall answer it when I return from America—I sail to-morrow. I hope you will wish me success—I have been so unsuccessful in my matrimonial ventures on this side of the water, I am going to try my luck over there."

Was not her humiliation vengeance enough for him, that he should torment her in this way? He had only to look at her face to see that he was tormenting her. For one moment the room swam round her, but the next, by a supreme effort, she conquered her faintness and looked at him unflinchingly.

"I wish you all the success you deserve," she said calmly.

For a moment each looked the other steadily in the face, as if each were trying to measure the other's power of resistance, and then, without another word, they turned away.

They were quits.

* * * * *

They met again at another social function.

"How do you do?" she said. "Where is your wife?"

"My wife? She is in the future. I am sorry to say I am so unfortunate as to be a bachelor still. My quest for a wife was as unsuccessful in America as here, with this difference—here the girl I wanted wouldn't have me, there I wouldn't have the girl whether she wanted me or not. Somehow, foreigners and I don't hit it off very well together."

"That is something of my experience with Count Offenstein," she observed, smiling a little.

"Ah! the Count—I heard something about that. You are engaged to him, are you not?" he asked carelessly.

"I was—until I discovered that he thought I was an heiress, and he discovered his mistake."

"So we are both free—it looks as if we were reserved for each other," he remarked dispassionately. "Perhaps this meeting is a special dispensation of Providence, and we shall call down eternal wrath upon our defenceless heads if we do not accept it as such."

"But I do not see how we can help ourselves," she laughed.

"There is one way—we might be married," he suggested.

"But in that case the remedy would be worse than the disease, don't you think?" she asked.

"Perhaps. But being a doctor, you know, you cannot expect me not to wish you to accept my remedy," he answered.

"True—a doctor is always thinking of his fee!" she exclaimed. "Well—perhaps—I will accept your—remedy if you promise not to make your fee too exorbitant—remember, I am not a heiress."

"Oh! you can pay me in kisses!"

* * * * *

"How about that question you were going to answer when you returned from abroad?" she asked mischievously, after the fee had been paid.

"Well, have I not kept my word? I answered it when I proposed we should get married. I would not want a fool for a wife, would I?"

Mabel E. Baugh.

Digitized by Google

An April Fool.

Showing How a Jealous Girl Unwittingly Helped Her Rival.

The Chester family kept, with suitable festivities, Christmas, New Year's Day, All-Fools' Day, Hallowe'en, and so on, straight through the year.

They were fools once a year, if not oftener, as Will said; and to tell the truth, the first of April was the "maddest, merriest day" of the whole year through for them.

Viewed from this standpoint, therefore, it did not seem quite so impertinently cruel to play a trick upon Eva Atwood.

True, she was a stranger among them, almost, having lived in the Chester family but a few months, and knew nothing or little of their customs; and the only motherless daughter of a wealthy, indulgent gentleman, residing in a great city, would not be apt to know much of these hilarious country pastimes. But as her cousin Belle said contemptuously, she might know, and there was no earthly reason why she should be exempted from a joke unless because she was rich. And Belle curled her lips in scorn.

Belle was discussing her plan with her sister Annie and Cora Webster, her friend.

"The best of it is, Allison Foster's initials are A. F., which stand for April Fool, and then two other young men of our set have the same ones, Albert Follonsby and Arthur French," said Belle, with animation.

"But Eva does not know either of these," said Annie.

"So much the better, goosie; but if she learns of the joke she will have no one to blame but her own stupidity."

"Can you write like Allison Foster?" asked Cora.

"Near enough to deceive her. I have lots of notes of his that I can study."

"No doubt of that," laughed Cora.

"Well, don't chatter, and I will see what I can do."

Belle sat down to her writing-desk and soon produced the following note, which she read to them:

"My Dear Little Eva,—You will, no doubt, be surprised to receive this note, we have known each other so short a time; but since the first evening we met I have loved you.

And you, my darling, do you return this love, the first and only love of my devoted heart? Never answer this if you do not respond to my love, for I could not bear it; but make me happy by wearing a geranium leaf in your hair the next time I come to the house. By this token I shall know that you love me, even as I love you.—Yours devotedly,

"A. F."

April 1.

"Oh! Won't it be funny to see her going about with a geranium leaf stuck in her hair, and he will not know anything about it at all, and only we three in the secret?" said Cora thoughtlessly.

"I think it would be cruel," said Annie indignantly. "I never realised before how mean it would be; and she a stranger among us, and the dearest little soul that ever breathed."

"So you will give the game away?" said Belle angrily.

"No, I won't; but I wash my hands of the whole affair," and Annie walked off, but returned to say significantly:

"Have you thought, Belle, if Eva doesn't wear the geranium leaf, that it is a virtual refusal; and if you consent to wear it (you know what I mean), you accept what she refuses?"

But to this Belle deigned no reply, only to Cora she said, after her sister left the room:

"Pshaw! I know she loves him."

"What shall you do with the letter?"

"Send it by post. Will you drop it in the pillar-box as you go by?"

"Yes, but remember you must let me know when the fun begins. I should be sorry to miss it."

"All right." And the girls separated; Cora to return home by way of the post-office, where she dropped the letter, Belle to join the family downstairs.

A lovely, sweet-faced young girl sat on the sofa, cutting paper dolls for little Isabel. Annie was reading, as was her wont. Mrs. Chester was sewing. Just then in sauntered Will, who was home from college for a few days.

"Well, cousin mine," said he, sitting down beside Eva, "are you looking forward to the first of April?"

"Why, what comes then?" asked she.

"Surprises," said he solemnly; "for instance, if you wished to present me with your cheque for ten thousand pounds, to-morrow would be just the day to do it. I should be surprised at that."

"So should I," said she demurely, with dimples lurking in her cheeks.

"The children are up to all kinds of games the first of April, dear," said Mrs. Chester, smiling. "Don't let them torment you."

By Will's explanation she imagined it to be a day of surprises after the style of Christmas, only with more secrecy, and she thought it a good time to make each of her cousins and her aunt a suitable present.

Her father was very wealthy, and, at her request, only a week before had sent her some gifts which she waited but a suitable opportunity to bestow.

Mr. Atwood had sent his daughter to reside in Wilmot with her aunt, because she was delicate, and he hoped the country air would be of benefit to her. Only on this consideration would he have separated from his only child even for a week. He hoped and expected that his sister's home would be very pleasant, and Mrs. Chester was indeed very kind, as were all the family except Belle, a proud, handsome girl of just Eva's age.

But Belle, from the day of her cousin's arrival, had been secretly envious of Eva, of her wealth, jewels, silks, and laces; of her gentle, ladylike manners, her beauty, everything; for when envy enters the soul it is insatiable, and feeds upon any material it can seize for this purpose. Eva was rich, it is true, but she valued riches only as they enabled her to make others happy; she had jewels, silks, and laces, but she seldom wore them, and dressed far more simply than Belle; her manners ought not to have offended, since they sprang from unselfishness; and her loveliness was of the delicate, unassuming order that was far less effective than the regal beauty of her cousin Belle.

But the latter fancied there was a growing friendship between Eva and Allison Foster, and this fact completed her dislike.

We all understand how objects rise in the estimation when others begin to prize them. It was so with Belle. Allison Foster was undoubtedly good, handsome, and talented, a young physician sure to make his mark, and Belle had encouraged his attentions previous to her cousin's arrival, although she had not fully made up her mind that she would marry him if he should offer himself, for a still more eligible match might intervene. But when she saw her cousin's evident appreciation of his worth and manliness—her cousin, who had seen so many rich and cultured people—she grew jealous of every word or look that passed between them, and she burnt to humiliate her rival.

Digitized by Google

If love is blind, jealousy is doubly so. Eva was not her rival in any sense, for Allison had only a kindly feeling in his heart for the fair young stranger, the glamour of Belle's beauty still being round him. Indeed, although nothing was said to her about the matter, Eva felt sure of his love for Belle; and, though she wondered in her heart that he had not chosen Annie, instead, she never thought of herself in connection with the matter. She did admire him, and liked to have him talk with her, and she thought Belle must be very happy indeed.

The first of April arrived, and the family, suspicious of each other, sat down to the breakfast table.

The eggs were passed round, but no one touched them except Eva and little Isabel. Their temerity was rewarded by finding them all right. (Mrs. Chester had handed them round.)

Encouraged by this, Will and his sisters each took one, but found only the shells cleverly filled with salt.

The coffee was fragrant and excellent, as usual; the cream neither salted nor sour, and the lumps of sugar white and glistening. But no amount of stirring would dissolve them. Extracting his with his spoon, Will rapped it on the table.

"Marble, girls, sure's you're alive," he cried. "Good for you, mother. 'You see, dear," mimicking his mother's tone, turning to his cousin, "'the children are up to all kinds of games,' and mother is as much a child as any of us."

Mrs. Chester laughed and they all enjoyed their jokes immensely. Just then the letters were brought in. There were only two, one for Will and one for Eva. Will looked dismayed at the contents of his, but brightened up almost immediately.

"Own up now; which of you wrote this letter?"

Each one solemnly asserted that they had neither written it nor caused it to be written.

"What is it, dear?" asked his mother anxiously.

"Nothing, only one of our larks must have got out. The head-master want my presence immediately at the college to answer certain charges, and so on. I thought it was an April fraud."

"Oh, Will!" exclaimed his mother.

"Serves him right," said Belle. "College boys are no better than cubs."

"Thank you, sissy," said Will, making her a low bow.

"Hallo, what is this?"—gathering up his text-books and finding a ten pound note in his Greek. "I suppose father sent it, mother?"

"Ask me to-morrow," answered his mother, trying to be merry, but worried at her son's difficulty in college.

"Did you put it there, Eva?"

"Ask me to-morrow," she answered, exactly as his mother had done.

Belle thrust her hand into her pocket and drew forth a lovely bracelet—yes, two of them—and she gave a cry of pleasure. "Oh, who could have put them there?"

"Allison Foster," suggested Will; but he did not believe it.

"Pshaw! you know better," said Belle; but she was pleased with the suggestion.

"Well, then, I should say Eva Atwood. One of those two I'll be bound."

"Don't be so ridiculous," said Belle.

"Then you have found me out. Spare my blushes, my dear sister. I earned the money in my spare time. I burnt the midnight oil that you might shine in the assemblies which your beauty is so well fitted to adorn. Don't thank me, your pleasure is enough," said Will, waving his hand dramatically.

"I won't, never fear," said Belle shortly. "You couldn't keep money in your pocket long enough to buy them. Father must have sent them when he did your ten pound note."

But when Annie found on her table a book she had much desired, she went straight to Eva and hugged her enthusiastically, "I know it's you, and I thank you a thousand times." Mrs. Chester received a silver tea-pot, and Isabel a splendid doll.

Although it is true they all thought of Eva as the possible donor, all but Annie thought it was likely to have been Mr. Chester, who was a commercial traveller, and often sent home valuable presents. But who could have distributed them so cunningly?

Eva came in at last, but she wore no geranium leaf in her hair.

The next day solved the mystery. Meanwhile Will packed up his books and started off.

"Never mind," said he affectionately, patting his mother's face. "Maybe I'll get off with only a reprimand."

But next morning his grinning face was seen at the breakfast table and the family discovered the whole thing to have been a hoax. He had written the letter himself and fooled them most cleverly.

This was the most successful farce ever acted in the Chester family on All Fools' Day.

"But it was cruel, Will," said his mother, frowning and smiling.

"I know it. I almost relented a dozen times," said he.

Digitized by Google

But Eva, quiet little Eva, had read and digested her letter long ere this. It never occurred to her that it was a hoax, for she could not conceive of anyone unkind enough to do such a thing. Still she was not deceived. She did not believe Allison Foster loved her, although he told her so in this letter.

"No, he does not love me, although he thinks he does; if he did——" and a blush covered her face and a tender look stole into her sweet eyes. "No, he does not. I feel something lacking in the letter. I will not wear the geranium leaf, but I will tell him why. I will write to him—that will be best."

So when Mr. Foster called, a shy little figure met him in the hall and put a letter into his hand, and then ran upstairs before anyone saw her.

Completely mystified, his hand closed over the note, and then he entered the sitting-room. Cora, Annie, Will, and Belle were all there, and at once they plunged into a merry chat; but, although Allison joined in it, his thoughts were with Eva and he wished she would enter.

She came in at last, and she wore no geranium leaf in her hair, as the girls saw at a glance. Annie looked significantly at Belle, and Cora rather enjoyed her friend's discomfiture also. Allison saw nothing of this, for he was shaking hands with Eva, holding her hand a little longer than was strictly necessary, it seemed to Belle, while he looked into her face with a new feeling in his own. Eva smiled and dropped her eyes shyly.

Later, when Allison was at home, he tore open the letter and read:

"Dear Mr. Foster,—I was, as you fancied I should be, much surprised at receiving your letter, particularly as you have never before given me any reason to think you loved me. I think you are mistaken now. I have heard that people sometimes deceive themselves by thinking they feel more kindly than they do, and it seems as if you must be thus mistaken in the measure of your regard for me. I am quite sure, dear Mr. Foster, that, if you really loved me, my heart would tell me so. I did not wear the geranium leaf for this reason. Sincerely your friend,

"Eva Atwood."

The sweet girl's secret was plainly told in this letter; also her unerring insight, which would not let her be deceived.

Allison was keen and shrewd. He saw at a glance that some trick had been played on the unsuspecting girl; but whom to mistrust, unless Will Chester, he did not know.

The next day he happened to meet Eva returning from the village alone. A tide of crimson swept over his own face as well as hers.

"Miss Atwood, will you let me see the letter I wrote you?" he asked.

"Certainly," she replied with a surprised look.

Belle had said she wrote nearly enough like Mr. Foster to deceive Eva, but she could not deceive the young man himself. Furthermore, having received several notes from Belle, he knew her writing immediately.

"Is there anything wrong about it?" asked Eva, timidly, seeing his stern look.

"No, except that it was unsuccessful," he replied, determined that she should never know how she had been deceived. He raised his hat and passed on, comparing in his mind the beautiful, guileless face of Eva with the proud look of Belle. His love for the latter was swept to the winds by his knowledge that she had perpetrated this cruel hoax upon her cousin.

"I wonder if I was mistaken," thought Eva, as she walked on. "He looked almost as if he cared."

"She loves me, I feel sure, by her letter," said he to himself, and a glad warmth stole into his heart at the thought.

After this, Mr. Foster's visits plainly were to Eva, and in a few months he asked her to marry him, and this time she did not refuse.

Belle bitterly regretted her folly when she learnt of the engagement, for somehow she felt that her conduct had helped it forward. "I was the April Fool, not Eva," she said; but she bore the disappointment in haughty silence, and Annie and Cora forebore to mention her April joke, and to this day Eva knows nothing about it.

Mary Hatch.

THE NEW - - - - - GOVERNESS.

Telling How Mr. Fred Morrisor Found His Wife.

"Where is Miss Gray?" asked Fred Morrison, as his sister crossed the lawn.

"Miss Gray has her duties to attend to," answered Helena. "She is putting Gerty to bed. Oh, dear, I wish I had never seen her!" Helena added, with an anxious expression.

She was still young, though she had been four years a widow; thirty years of age, in fact, and two years older than Fred, who had arrived from Canada three weeks ago.

He was tall and broad-shouldered, his face being tanned almost as dark as his fair hair and moustache.

"I hope she won't trouble you much longer," he said, as he paced the lawn by Helena's side.

"You are not going to do anything foolish?" she cried, resting a hand on his arm.

"Certainly not."

"You know what I mean, Fred. You are not going to ask Miss Gray to marry you?"

"At the first opportunity," he said, with an air of determination.

"A woman you had not seen until three weeks ago; of whom we know absolutely nothing?"

"You know she lived with Lady Tresserton for two years, anyhow," he retorted.

"Ah," said Helena, "I ought to have gone to see Lady Tresserton. I wish I had not been content with a written reference. Miss Gray certainly led me to believe she knew something about children——"

"Gerty seems immensely fond of her," Fred suggested.

"My friend, Mrs. Vereker, who happens to know a cousin of Lord Tresserton," Helena continued, "declares that Lady Tresserton has no children."

"Well, have you asked Miss Gray to explain?"

"She said she was Lady Tresserton's companion. Lord and Lady Tresserton live very unhappily. Mrs. Vereker told me that. I feel sure there's something in the background——"

"There is Miss Gray!" Fred exclaimed, as he turned at the end of the lawn.

She stepped out into the garden, looking far more like the mistress of the house than Mrs. Marston. Miss Gray was the taller by half a head, her figure was graceful and beautifully modelled, her hair of a dark reddish-brown colour, her face small and rather pale. She had a look of distinction, which caused Helena to hesitate before each order.

"Oh, what a treat to get out of the nursery," she cried

Digitized by Google

Helena stared, and then walked away.

"What induced you to enter it?" asked Fred, coming to her side.

"Beggars can't be—— You know the proverb."

"You might easily have found a more congenial occupation," he suggested.

"I desire nothing different," she said. "I am quite contented; I like your sister, and I am growing quite fond of little Gerty."

"And Gerty's uncle?" he asked, bending over her.

"You were not—you were not in the bill," she retorted.

"Still," he said, "facts have to be faced. I want you to be my wife, Winnie."

She stopped abruptly.

"Don't call me that," she said.

"I want you to give me the right to call you Winnie always. I want you to share my life. Tell me you love me," he urged. "Your eyes have betrayed you already."

"There would be something else to tell you first," she murmured.

"Then tell me, and have done with it."

"Not now," she answered.

"Then let me take you on trust," he persisted. "You admit that you love me?"

"I did not intend to admit it," she said, with a vivid smile.

"Now you have said it," he cried. "Nothing shall keep you from me now. Tell me, at least, that nothing need," he pleaded.

"I—I don't know," she answered. "Some men might think it an obstacle. I cannot tell whether you are one of them." And, turning away quickly, she re-entered the house.

The next day she seemed to avoid him, devoting herself more than usual to Gerty. Fred found no opportunity to speak to her alone.

"Mrs. Vereker called this afternoon, Miss Gray," said Mrs. Marston, in the drawing-room after dinner. "Did you know that Lady Tresserton had left her husband? It must have been very soon after you left Armestead Square. Lord Tresserton is employing detectives to find her."

"I don't imagine they are very likely to succeed," answered Miss Gray. And, rising abruptly, she bade Helena and Fred good night.

* * * * *

The following afternoon Gerty was playing with her dolls on the lawn beneath the walnut-tree, and Miss Gray was sewing as she leant back in a garden-chair.

"Am I disturbing you?" asked Fred, coming to her side.

"It is pleasant out here," she said. "Won't you sit down?"

"When will you enter upon this unnecessary explanation?"

"It is by no means unnecessary——"

"I am impatient to tell Helena you have promised to be my wife," said Fred.

"I haven't promised to be your wife," she expostulated.

"You know," he muttered, "you rather test one's patience."

"Perhaps you shall have your reward at last," she answered, "if you really wish for it."

As she spoke, a servant came from a side door.

"Please, Miss, Mrs. Marston wants you in the drawing-room," she said.

Rising, Miss Gray accompanied the girl indoors.

Gerty began to engross Fred's attention, until about ten minutes later Helena entered the garden.

"I can't understand it," she said. "I sent Harriet for Miss Gray. On her way to the house the girl told her a man was waiting to see her. Miss Gray asked what he was like and, instead of going to him in the drawing-room, she ran upstairs, put on her hat, and left the house. I want you to come with me to tell him."

Not a little mystified, Fred accompanied Helena to the drawing-room, where he saw a tall, dissipated-looking man of forty.

"I am sorry to say Miss Gray has gone——" Helena began; but the visitor interrupted her.

"Did she know I was here?"

"The servant," said Fred, "told her a gentleman was waiting, and described you to Miss Gray."

"She is my wife—Lady Tresserton!"

"Good Heavens!" muttered Fred.

"My wife left my house," Lord Tresserton explained indignantly, "a month ago. I employed a detective, and he found the cabman who drove her to the railway station. He succeeded in tracing her here."

"Lady Tresserton has had time to catch the train?" he asked.

"Easily," Helena answered.

"And the next?"

"There is no other for an hour."

Muttering an imprecation, Lord Tresserton left the room.

"I should not like to be his wife," cried Helena. "Poor old Fred!" she murmured. "How blind you were!"

That evening Fred went to the railway station and spoke to the station-master. He learnt that Lady Tresserton, as he now thought of her, had caught the London train, but had first made hurried inquiries concerning the place to take ship for New York. Also, she had asked whether she could book through to Liverpool. Lord Tresserton had been told all this, and there could be little doubt that both had travelled to the Mersey.

* * * * *

Miss Gray's name was not mentioned during the next few days.

As they passed a great change came over Fred. His face looked haggard and worn, his manner was taciturn and irritable.

About a week later Helena went to London for the day, and Fred was smoking when the library door opened.

"Miss Gray to see you, sir; she is in the drawing-room."

A few hurried strides took him across the hall. She was standing in the middle of the room, and Fred stopped as if he had seen a ghost.

"I assumed you were on your way to America," he blurted out.

"It is true I took my passage," she said. "You see I have come back to you instead."

"But your—your husband——"

"I have not got one yet," she said, with a smile; "perhaps I never shall have one."

"Lord Tresserton——"

"My brother-in-law. He married my sister Winifred. I lived with her for two years—she refused to stay with her husband unless I did so. We had very little money; so that we could not leave Armestead Square until I found a home. We sent the servants out one day and called a cab," she explained. "The trunk containing my clothes has Winnie's—Lady Tresserton's—initials on it. My box held her things. I entered the cab; my sister walked away. At the station I sent my box, containing her clothes, to a cottage a mile from here. With the other I travelled to the house. I stuck a label over the initials—you see they had done their work."

"Thrown Tresserton off the scent?" Fred queried.

"I imagined," she continued, "Lord Tresserton would succeed in tracing the cabman, whom I thought would describe the box. In the event of his pursuing me here, I thought I might be able to lead him further astray. I asked absurd questions at the station to lead him to think I intended sailing to New York. I travelled to Liverpool the same night, and took a passage by the Sioux, a slow boat on the point of starting. I guessed Lord Tresserton would follow on by the next, and in fact I was on the quay when he went aboard the following day. I have taken my sister away, "and on his return I don't fancy he will discover her. Besides, she will take steps to protect herself legally now," she continued. "I am going back to Winnie. I don't think your sister will want me any more."

"But I want you, Winnie!" cried Fred.

"My name is Maud," she quietly corrected.

Stanley Hammond.

Digitized by Google

TRUE FRIEND OR FALSE?

An Entrancing Story, Telling How the Fates Were Kind.

"Of course, as sub-manager, your salary will begin at £300," said the senior partner, "and that is a pleasant item. On the other hand, you might not care to go to Australia?"

"I shall be very pleased to go there," said the younger man, almost bitterly, "and the sooner I go the better I shall like it."

"A week from to-day?"

"To-morrow, if you wish, sir."

The above conversation had taken place two years ago, and now Humphrey Wallis was home again in England, having been transferred back to headquarters at his own request.

The time he had spent in Australia had not had the desired effect, for he was slow to change. He went out loving Enid Glynn with all his heart, although hopelessly, and now—after two years of absence——

He shrugged his shoulders. If only he could forget as other people seemed to do so easily.

As he was walking across London towards Euston Station, he saw in front of him an old Manchester friend, who was also a cousin of Miss Glynn.

Probably the latter consideration was uppermost in Humphrey's mind as he stepped forward and saluted his friend with a hearty slap on the shoulder.

Egerton Lee turned swiftly, and stared, white-faced and trembling, at his former friend.

"Hope I didn't startle you!" said the latter apologetically. But his remark was wasted, for the other man fled as though for his life. Humphrey stared after him in absolute amazement, without attempting to follow him.

Then a whimsical explanation of his old friend's terror occurred to him, which he accepted at once.

"Poor beggar, looked at me as though I had been a ghost come back to life," he thought; "perhaps that's what he thinks, for I haven't written to a soul in this country since I left it."

He arrived in Manchester some four hours later. One of the first people he met on coming out of the station was a former acquaintance, to whom he extended his hand with a certain amount of difference. But this time there was no terror, only a hearty greeting and a crowd of questions.

"And Lee—Egerton Lee?" said Humphrey presently. The other man's face became serious at once.

"Ah, yes," he answered; "you heard about it, then?"

"Heard about what?"

"He died, you know, a few months ago."

Humphrey stared in amazement, unable to speak for the moment.

"A very sad case," continued his acquaintance. "You know that cousin of his who was so delicate?"

"Miss Glynn!"

"No, no. Walter Lee—quite a young fellow; been ill off and on for years. Well, he became worse, and Egerton, who was always rather quixotic, gave up his situation and took him away to Blackpool. His first idea had been to send the lad alone, but he wouldn't go that way, so they went together. Egerton had had a little legacy, thirty shillings a week or so, and he drew slightly on his principal each week, so as to make up enough to keep them comfortably."

"But it was Walter who was ill."

"Exactly; yet it was Egerton who died, and they had been in Blackpool three months. That was what surprised everybody. They've no relations here except Miss Glynn, and even she was not notified of the funeral. Merely a short note when all was over, to tell her of the death, and that she was entitled to this money—about £2,000."

"And where did Walter go?" said Humphrey. "Did you never hear how Egerton died?"

"Not a word. Nobody even knows where Walter is. Perhaps he was jealous because the money went to Miss Glynn instead of to himself. But I must be off now. Good-bye, old man!"

And away he went, leaving Humphrey more puzzled than before.

"I can't leave the matter at this stage," thought the latter. "There's some mystery, and it must be cleared up. I'm quite certain it was Egerton I met in London; and, anyhow, nobody could confuse him with Walter.

"And Enid has received a legacy, and is further out of my reach than ever!"

* * * * *

Meanwhile, Enid Glynn was not obtaining much pleasure from her money, although it had certainly made a considerable difference to her. For one thing, it had removed the necessity to work for her living, and, as she had never been particularly strong, the change was very welcome on this account alone, and should have made her life happy.

But happiness is entirely relative, and is much more concerned with such matters as the heart and the mind than mere possession of money. And when the heart is grieving, all the legacies in the world cannot cure it.

So Enid found, and her grief was for Egerton Lee. Some little comfort she took from the knowledge that he had loved her, even though he had never said so. But she reproached herself for not having encouraged him to speak when he had obviously wished to do so. And now it was too late. He had died without knowing that she loved him, in a strange house, with only one, who was himself an invalid, to attend to him.

How sudden it had been! Everybody knew that Walter Lee was delicate, and that the end of his life was only a matter of a very few years, or possibly months. But that he should take a turn for the better and be able to leave his bed and even resume business whilst Egerton, the very pattern of health, should be stricken down with the same dreadful complaint and carried to his grave in a few weeks, this was extraordinary.

Digitized by Google

She had known nothing of this until about a week after Egerton's death. Then, and then only, she received a short note from Walter, saying that his cousin was dead and that she succeeded to the £2,000 in accordance with the terms of their grandfather's will.

He gave her the address of the lawyers who would arrange the matter, and said that, as for himself, having to some extent recovered his health, he was going to the south of England, where he intended to obtain work and settle down.

Out of love comes jealousy, and there were times when Enid, thinking over the circumstances, felt vague suspicions against Walter Lee. The love that hungered in her heart whispered that there had been foul play; that Walter had had some interest in getting rid of his cousin.

The suspicion was strengthened by the fact that Egerton's watch and rings had disappeared, and that his own savings, apart from the £2,000, had been withdrawn from the bank only a few days before his death. And there were other circumstances. Why should Walter disappear so mysteriously?

She was thinking these things over for the thousandth time when there came a sudden ringing at the front-door bell. The sound jangled hideously upon her over-wrought nerves, making thought impossible, and she threw herself upon the sofa, holding her hands over her ears. The landlady entered the room.

"There's a gentleman downstairs would like to see you, Miss Glynn."

"To see me?"

"Yes; Mr. Wallis."

A faint flush crept over Enid's face. She had heard how hardly Humphrey had taken his rejection, and of his voyage to Australia. The present visit proved, at any rate, that he had not forgotten her. But if he had come—she shook her head at the idea that occurred to her, and made her way to the drawing-room.

The usual greetings were exchanged with a certain amount of awkwardness on both sides, and then Humphrey plunged immediately into his subject.

"If you will allow me to refer to a painful subject," he began.

She bowed resignedly, and made up her mind to give him a very definite no this time. It was not that she disliked Humphrey; far from it, but there was only room for one in her heart.

"I want to speak about poor Egerton Lee," he said.

"About Egerton Lee?" This was not at all what she had expected to hear, but it was very welcome, nevertheless.

"Yes; I have just heard of his death; it was very sudden."

"It was worse than sudden," she cried piteously. "It was suspicious!"

It was Humphrey's turn to stare now.

"He was my cousin," she explained hurriedly; "and excepting Walter, the only relative I had in the world. I never liked Walter. Where has he gone to? And where is Egerton's watch, and his rings and his money—his own money? Egerton was strong and well when he called here before he went to Blackpool, and yet we hear a few weeks later that he is dead. And the other one disappears and daren't show himself!"

"I suppose it was all straightforward," he answered slowly. "And, besides, I understood you received your grandfather's legacy, so that goes to disprove any suspicions of foul play. But Egerton and I were old friends, and if you don't mind giving me the address at Blackpool, Enid, I thought of going there for a day or two to get to know how the poor fellow died."

"I don't know the address. Walter simply headed his letter 'Blackpool,' and that was all. If I'd known, I might have gone myself."

"It doesn't matter much. They are bound to have registered the death, and I can get to know all I want from that."

"And you will let me know?"

"Yes, I will call here and tell you."

"If you could satisfy me that he was not harmed, and that everything was right and straightforward, I could become more reconciled. But these doubts and suspicions are wearing my life away."

"And if, when I return, I can assure you of that?"

"If you could——"

"I came here to-day with another purpose in addition to wanting to know something about Egerton. It's two years since we parted, Enid, and I've been hoping sometimes against hope that you might have changed your mind about what I asked you. If you only knew how much it means to me! And you admitted then that you liked me as well as any of the others."

"I did, and I like you still," she said.

"Then say 'Yes' to me, Enid, and come away from these dreary lodgings to a home of our own. Just think how happy we should be together!"

She sprang to her feet with a new light flashing from her eyes, walked quickly across the room, and then turned suddenly to him as though she had at last made up her mind.

"I like you very well, indeed, Humphrey, but all my heart and soul seem bound up now in the fate of my poor cousin."

"In his fate? But you don't think he is alive?" he cried.

"I know he's dead—I've no doubt about that! The lawyers must have seen the death certificate before they transferred that money to me. But I want to know how he died, and if there was any foul play."

"And if I find out all about that, if I find the house at which he dies, and get to know the whole of the circumstances so as to satisfy you one way or the other?"

"Ah, if you could only set my mind at rest about that!"

"Would you say 'Yes' to my question, Enid?"

"I would say—whatever you wished!"

But as he advanced towards her she broke away and fled from the room. And as he walked out of the house, Humphrey resolved upon a dishonourable action for the first time in his life. He would go to Blackpool and make inquiry there, but to what extent he would communicate the result to Enid, that was another matter.

* * * * *

His suspicions as to the fate of Egerton Lee were confirmed with startling promptness the next day. He travelled to Blackpool by an early morning train and found his way at once to the Registry Office, where he obtained a copy of the certificate of Egerton's death.

His next call was upon the doctor who had signed the certificate, from whom he begged as an old friend of the dead man, some particulars as to the illness of the latter. The doctor was interested as soon as he mentioned the name.

"I will tell you what I can with pleasure," he said cordially, "and the case you mention has a particular interest for me, as I nearly made a most extraordinary mistake in writing out the certificate. Just imagine, my dear sir; here were two cousins. Walter Lee, poor fellow, was doomed long before he came to Blackpool. I knew he wouldn't live."

Digitized by Google

"Walter Lee! You knew he couldn't live!" cried Humphrey.

"Yes—no, my dear sir, a thousand pardons; I should have said Egerton, not Walter. Walter was the healthy one — a particularly healthy young fellow, in fact. Well, I attended Mr. Egerton for a good many weeks, and all that time I addressed him and thought of him as Mr. Walter. And naturally when the poor fellow died, I filled in the certificate with the name of Walter. The other young man turned quite pale when he read it, and begged of me to alter it immediately; said it might be unlucky, and I don't know what else! He explained that there had been a misunderstanding as to their names."

"And you altered it?"

"My dear sir, I would rather have written a thousand certificates than have hurt his feelings in the way I did. It was only superstition, but superstition is very human. Oh, yes, I altered it as quickly as I possibly could."

Humphrey thanked him and then hastened away. He had made up his mind already to make his way straight to London and endeavour to trace Egerton there. The apparent difficulties of his task did not daunt him, for he knew there were very few firms in the whole of England engaged in the business to which Egerton had been trained.

Humphrey left Blackpool that evening, and walked out of Euston Station early next morning. A hurried breakfast, five minutes with the directory, and he set out with three addresses, at one of which he was almost certain to find the man he sought.

He had decided to see Egerton in order to learn his reason for disappearing. Having learnt that, he could shape his course accordingly, for he should know what tale to tell to Enid and how far it would be safe to deceive her. Upon one thing he was quite determined, and that was to marry Enid Glynn, whether by truth or falsehood. His love had become a passion, and was already blunting his sense of honour.

When he called upon the second of the three firms he was told that Walter, not Egerton Lee, had been engaged with them, but had resigned rather suddenly a few days previously. However, they gave his private address to Humphrey, and thither he made his way.

The landlady had a Mr. Walter Lee staying at her house. He was leaving London, and was upstairs at that moment packing his trunk. If the gentleman would give her his name.

But Humphrey slipped a half crown into her shrivelled old palm, and begged her to tell him where the room was, which she did at once.

He opened the door with considerable nervousness. A man who was stooping over a trunk stood up suddenly, and stared at Humphrey as though he saw a ghost.

"You! You've followed me!"

"Yes, I have," said Humphrey doggedly. "You didn't suppose I'd let an old friend go under in this fashion, especially not if I could help him?"

"And who knows you are here?"

"Nobody. Not a soul, Egerton."

The other man breathed a sigh of relief. "What do you want to know?" he said next moment.

"I want to know why you died," answered Humphrey smiling nervously. "Come along, old chap, you surely can trust me not to give the show away, whatever your game may be."

"Yes, I trust you," said Egerton slowly. "And besides, the tale concerns you to some extent. I had the good fortune, Humphrey, to have a little money left to me, and the evil fortune to fall in love with a girl who didn't care twopence about me. In fact, I'm almost certain you are the favourite suitor now, whatever you may have been before, and therefore I don't hesitate to mention her name to you."

"Miss Glynn?"

"Yes, Enid Glynn. Well, I had often felt what a shame it was that I should have the use of that £2,000 whilst she—poor, delicate little woman—had to work so hard for her living. Whilst I was nursing my cousin Walter, I suddenly saw a way out of the difficulty. It was risky, especially with the Doctor, but everything turned out well. And now I've turned to work again, and feel better for it, and she has the money, and will put it to good use, whether she marries or not.'

"So you gave up all your hopes——"

"I had none to give up. She never cared for me."

"But you cared?"

"Yes, I cared for her, and so I did what I could to make her happy."

Humphrey stood silent. He knew now why Enid had refused him, and he knew why the legacy had brought little or no happiness to her life. With him lay the power, by half a dozen words, to bring these two together and lead them to their life's happiness. But those half dozen words he would never speak. Friend, honour, everything might go, but he could not speak the words that would separate him from Enid Glynn.

He left Egerton soon after. The faithful self-sacrifice of the latter made Humphrey despise himself. He shook hands with the friend whom he meant to betray, and ran from the room as though he were a thief. Even at the door he turned, half resolved to explain everything. But Egerton came forward, and pushed him bodily from the room.

"You go to your happiness, to Enid," he said wistfully; "for myself, I'm a superfluity, so the best thing I can do is to efface myself again."

Humphrey hurried down the stairs without another word. Out of the house, away, anywhere. And all the time he fought blindly, savagely, against every instinct and prompting of his better self.

That night he spent in a hotel in Tottenham Court Road, but he did not sleep. All through the weary hours he sat, thinking silently in the darkness, combating every argument that his sense of honour, dying hard, suggested. And in the morning, when he came downstairs, his heart was as hard as a rock towards Egerton, even though his mad passion for Enid blazed more fiercely than ever.

An hour later he took his seat in the Manchester express, due to leave Euston at ten o'clock. By this time the strain of the previous night was beginning to tell upon him, and he fell into an uneasy sleep. Other people got into the carriage, one in particular, who was closely muffled up, and who smiled, though rather sadly, as he took his seat beside Humphrey.

Meanwhile the latter was passing through a nightmare of remorse. He turned uneasily, groaned, clenched his fists and loosened them as suddenly, and then at last a fierce ejaculation broke from his lips, and he opened his eyes and stared in wild terror at the calm, serious face of Egerton Lee.

A sudden impulse came over Humphrey to tell the whole tale then and there. But simultaneously he thought of the look that Enid had given to him two days before—a look that was all kindness and might so easily be changed into love.

"Are you coming to Manchester after all?" he said coldly, "coming to claim your legacy back again?"

Digitized by Google

"No, not quite that," said Egerton, "but I'm going to ask a favour from you."

"What is it?"

"I intend to leave England altogether and strike out afresh in the Colonies, but before going I thought if I could see Enid once, just for a moment——"

"It's quite impossible," said Humphrey harshly. "She thinks you are dead."

"No, you don't understand my plan. I didn't mean to speak to her or even to let her see me or know of my presence."

"What then?"

"I thought of driving straight to a hotel, and staying there until after it was dark. Then, with my face well covered, I might come to the street where she lives; and I thought perhaps you, who have so much influence with her, would call and persuade her to come out for a walk."

"And if I do?" said Humphrey doggedly.

"I shall see her as she passes."

"You swear not to make yourself known to her in any way."

"I swear."

"Then I agree. I'll call at the house where she is staying about seven o'clock this evening."

"And you think she will come out?"

"Yes, I think so. I'll send a wire to say I've discovered something in regard to a matter she asked me to inquire about, and that I'll call to take her out about seven."

Egerton seized his friend's hand and shook it eagerly. "You're a real friend," he said, "in all the lonely days to come I shall think of you the next after Enid."

"Don't; you hurt my hand," said Humphrey roughly, and drew it away.

* * * * * * *

The landlady showed Humphrey straight into the drawing-room where Enid was waiting for him. She advanced eagerly, holding out her hand in welcome.

"How cold you are!" she cried, "and your face is pale! What is the matter?"

"It's nothing. I've been worried a great deal."

"I'm sorry," she said gravely. "I suppose it is for somebody else, as usual, Humphrey. I remember in the old days how generous you were, and how you looked after all your friends."

"I always tried to be faithful to my friends," he said, speaking slowly and almost hoarsely. "Do you mind coming out for a stroll while I tell you what I have discovered?"

"About Egerton?" she cried, "but tell me one thing before we go any further," and she came closer and looked up at him appealingly. "There has been no foul play. You have not found out anything of that sort?"

"No, nothing of that sort," he said, and then, with sudden fierceness, "And when I have told you, you promised——"

"I will marry you," she said simply. "I promised, and I will keep my word. We both loved Egerton, did we not, Humphrey?"

"Why do you keep mentioning his name?" he cried. "Let the dead be quiet in their graves; it is ungenerous to keep reminding me."

She looked at him in astonishment, but seeing how ill he looked—his face was ghastly pale—she forebore to speak, but ran out of the room and put on her hat and jacket. When she opened the door again Humphrey was standing where she had left him, staring stonily before him. He followed her from the room without a word and out of the house. And as they walked beneath the light of the lamp a man, who was standing at the opposite side of the street, leant forward and stared at the slender figure of the girl as a lost soul might stare at the barred gates of Heaven.

Meanwhile Enid and Humphrey walked along in utter silence for several minutes, until at last she spoke.

"You are not well," she said softly.

"No, I am not. And then with a sudden burst of passion that swept all the barriers of his restraint, "I don't deserve to be well," he said bitterly. "I am a thief and a liar and a false friend; but, before Heaven, it shall finish now. But before I tell you, Enid, promise to look kindly upon me. If I had betrayed my friend and stolen his happiness it would have been for love of you. Because I could not bear to give you up, even though I knew you loved him and not me."

Some faint glimmering of the truth must have reached her, for she stood still in the dark and deserted street, and seized his arm, trembling piteously, and begged to know what he had to tell.

"You loved Egerton?" he said.

"I did; I do now," she answered, with a sudden light springing in her eyes and making her face beautiful in the moonlight. "I have never deceived you about that, Humphrey."

"And if he were still alive?"

"If he were? Is he alive?" she whispered. "Is that what you have discovered?"

He nodded his head silently. "He is in the street we have just left," he said a moment later.

"And you? You have sacrificed yourself for your friend and for me and you ask for forgiveness!" she cried, her eyes shining.

"I ask for forgiveness," he repeated.

"Then I grant it to you," she said earnestly, and made him stoop and kissed him. "I don't know how it has all come about, but I know that we owe our life's happiness to you, and to you alone."

And thus they parted, and went their different ways in life Humphrey walked slowly on through the darkness, and Enid turned to meet Egerton, who was trying to avoid her. But when she called he came slowly and hesitatingly towards her, not knowing what happiness the Fates had reserved for him.

Wal Frank.

"Is that young man gone, Matilda?" cried her father from the top of the stairs. "Oh, awfully!" returned Matilda.

He: "What's a fellow to do when a girl breaks his heart?" She: "Get a new one." He: "A new what?" She: "A new girl."

"Jack told me last night that he had given me his heart." "Well, it's damaged goods. He told me last week that I had broken it."

He: "I understand that you are to be congratulated?" She: "No; the engagement is broken off." He: "That is what I heard."

"Confound the printers!" "What's the matter?" "Why, I wrote a sonnet to my fiancée's 'Wee Foot,' and they've printed it 'Web Foot.'"

"Did your wife listen to your excuses for coming home so late last night?" "Oh, yes; she listened to me, and then——" "Then what?" "I listened to her—for four hours."

"The summer will soon be here again, Mr. Hardfact—summer, with its murmuring streams, blossoming flowers, and sweet birds on the wing!" "One moment, Miss Gushly! There is no bird on the wing. The wing is on the bird!"

Maud: "What do you do when a man persists in asking for a dance and you don't care to dance with him?" Marie: "Tell him my card is full." Maud: "But supposing it isn't, and he still persists?" Marie: "Then I insist that it is, and let him see that it isn't."

"I think I'm making some headway," said the persistent lover, who is not in favour with her father. "But I thought the old gentleman kicked you out whenever he found you at the house?" "He does; but I have noticed that he is not kicking nearly so hard of late. I feel sure that he is gradually relenting."

Digitized by Google

A Superstitious Wife.

Relating How She Was Cured.

Before Maud and I were married, her penchant for horse-shoes and four-leaved clovers did not impress me as an indication of anything more serious than the harmless romanticism of innocent maidenhood. I did not then realise what it is to have superstition in the family. Even later, when she implored me to wear my left sock wrong side out for luck, I regarded it only as the sign of affectionate solicitude for my welfare, which would evaporate after the honeymoon. I noticed that she was very particular about these things.

She thought that it was flying in the face of Providence to leave a room by a different door from that by which she had entered. This was a very uncomfortable superstition in our flat, because the rooms were strung along in a line, so that it was practically impossible to pass from our drawing-room to the dining-room without going through a couple of bedrooms. Maud was in a fearful dilemma about this at first. I suggested that she should let herself out of the front window by a rope, walk round the house, and climb into the back window on the fire-escape. She seemed to be pained by the levity of this advice, and I left her in tears. When I returned she was radiant with hope.

"If you go out of the second door backwards it reverses the charm and gives you good luck," she said, and she stuck to it even after she had fallen over a door-mat and driven a hairpin into the back of her head in her efforts to propitiate the Fates. I couldn't see much luck in that, but she called my attention to the fact that if she had gone out in the usual way she might have driven the hairpin into her nose, which would have been much worse.

At first she was the only victim of her vagaries, but later they began to get in their work on me. She sat up late one night to put a genuine, hand-painted, four-leaved clover about two feet in diameter on the back of my coat, and she was so nervous about it that she painted it on the outside instead of on the lining. It took a quart of benzine to bring back peace to our household.

One day I came home and found her seated behind her sewing-table, which was covered with cards. As soon as she saw me she sprang to her feet with her countenance full of hysteria. She pointed her finger at me with a gesture of desair.

"Howard, you have been followed by a dark woman. Who is she? Don't attempt to deceive me!"

"My dear, I can conceal nothing from you," I replied. "She is the woman who attends to our laundry. She met me at the door with a demand for six pounds, and I told her to call again in the summer."

I never saw anybody so relieved as Maud was.

"I knew the cards couldn't be wrong," she said. "I've just got a book that tells all about them. Now I'm going to tell your fortune."

She made me cut the pack and then she began to deal out the cards.

"A black knave; that's you," she said.

"Thanks, awfully," said I.

"That only means a young man who is of dark complexion," she explained. "There's a light queen following him. That's I, of course. Isn't it nice? The ace of spades is the next one! Oh, Howard, that means that I'm going to die," and she began to cry.

"Turn over the next one and let's see about the inquest," I said, trying to pass the thing off with a joke.

"The ten of hearts," she sobbed. "That means a laugh and a merry time. Oh, Howard, to think that you should go off and enjoy yourself after I'm dead! You horrid, horrid thing!"

"But, my dear, I should cry my eyes out. There must be a misdeal here somewhere; it can't be otherwise."

"No," she moaned, "and the very next card is the nine of clubs, which means that whatever you're told is sure to come true. I am as good as dead, and you will be happy."

"Light of my existence——"

"Don't speak to me. Would you deceive a woman who has only a few days to live?"

In desperation I turned the next card. It was the two of diamonds. Maud was looking over the top of her handkerchief. I saw her face brighten.

"That's the best money card in the pack," she said. "We're going to be rich before I die."

"Then cheer up, my dear. You must make up your mind to stay by me until I'm rich."

After this there were no more tears for a while. I did not transgress the rules of Fate again that evening except by picking up a pin the wrong end first. Maud was much frightened at the prospect of bad luck, but I explained that I had picked up the pin off the bedroom carpet with the bottom of my bare foot, and that under the circumstances it is nearly impossible to get at anything but the business end of a pin.

Day by day Maud grew worse, until finally I decided to have some doctors come to see whether some of her numerous superstitions had not cast a shadow over her once brilliant intellect. Of course, I didn't let her know about it. I said that some friends would call, and she must entertain them. The experts arrived about three o'clock one afternoon. I did not get there till 4.30. When I came in a curious scene met my gaze. Maud was standing behind her table telling fortunes, and the old medical fossils were so interested that they had forgotten what they came for, and did not even notice my entrance. I caught a confused sound of voices. "Did you say I was going to be pursued by a blonde?" "Gracious me! Brunette? Thank Heaven! That bars my wife out."

When they saw me there was confusion, and the doctors hurriedly took their leave. Maud burst out laughing.

"The old sillies!" she said. "I made them believe that all the girls in town were running after them. They swallowed it all. I never realised before how absurd cards were."

"And you'll give up telling fortunes?" I gasped.

"Yes; I don't believe in cards any more. These men have cured me."

"Good!" I murmured under my breath, "they've broken their professional records."

"And you won't be superstitious any more?" I said aloud.

"Never again," she promised. "I'll begin to-day. Goodness, no; I can't begin to-day. It's Friday. And to-morrow is the 13th of the month. Oh, dear, I'll have to wait. But the first good lucky day, when the sun doesn't rise in a cloud, and I get out of bed with my right foot first, I will renounce superstition for ever—if I haven't a bad-luck dream during the night."

Charles Watson.

Digitized by Google

Outwitted.

The Tale of a Lawyer's Narrow Escape.

"Are you a lawyer, sir?"

I started violently at the words, for I had been sitting for some time at my desk, plunged in a fit of the deepest thought, and had not heard anyone enter the office.

It was a warm summer's evening, and I had left the windows and doors open, for the sake of the refreshing draught. Rising from my seat, and turning up the gas-jet on the table, I turned and surveyed my interlocutor, who proved to be none other than a well-dressed, rather good-looking man of forty or thereabouts, of medium height, and possessed of a pair of small, piercing eyes, which returned my gaze unflinchingly.

"I am Mr. Avery, the junior partner of the firm, as you might have seen, had you taken the trouble to read the sign upon the door," I replied shortly; for I was in no wise pleased with his interruption upon my reveries.

"True," he answered courteously; "but the door was open, and the hall unlighted. I require your services for a short time," he resumed, seating himself, "provided you are disengaged for to-night."

"Professionally I am at your disposal for the evening," I answered.

"Ah, your remark reminds me of what I ought to do," he said laughingly, taking out his pocket-book and laying four five-pound notes on the table. But I waved my hand impatiently, informing him that no payment was necessary until after consultation, and requested him to proceed to business.

"The business to which I referred," he continued, replacing the money, and fixing his keen, black eyes upon my face, "will require your services until late in the night, if not until to-morrow morning. My niece, who resides some miles away, is dangerously ill, and, her recovery being extremely doubtful, she desires to make her will. For this purpose, I have applied to you, promising you, should you accede to my request, any fee you may demand."

I communed with myself for a few moments, eyed the man suspiciously, and then asked the distance to the young lady's residence, and the mode of conveyance thither.

"About ten miles," he responded, handing me his card, on which I read, "Martin Jackson, Castletown, Surrey." "As a train does not leave for some hours yet, I have provided a carriage and driver, which is awaiting us in the street. May I consider your services as engaged?"

I responded that he might, and a few moments sufficed to find us ensconced in a closed carriage.

The more populous portion of the town was soon passed, my companion, meantime, enlightening me with an account of his niece's illness, and previous history. I was a young man, and my nervousness and suspicions of the man beside me may be excused, when his evident anxiety in employing myself, an inexperienced lawyer, are considered. His story, too, did not sound consistent in all respects, for he spoke of his niece, Miss Blanche Pickering, as being, at times, subject to short fits of insanity. I, therefore, was prepared to find something mysterious on my arrival at our destination—which occurred shortly—in a thick grove of oak trees.

When the carriage stopped, it was in front of a large, dark-looking stone building, standing a short distance back from the road, and surrounded by tall trees. A feeble light flickered in a single window at the side of the house, and a few dim rays shone through the lower-storey window.

One thing struck me as rather curious as I walked up the gravel walk to the mansion, and tended to arouse my suspicions still more. The man Jackson dismissed the carriage, after paying the driver, with a few low, whispered words, the import of which I was unable to ascertain, and the carriage turned round sharply. I said nothing, however, but, shifting my revolver into a more convenient position in my inner pocket, entered the house with my companion, who unlocked the door with a latch-key, and was ushered into the drawing-room, which was poorly lighted by a hanging-lamp.

Having seen me seated at a table, on which were spread refreshments, Jackson left me, for a short time, and, returning shortly with a large, well-built man, whom he introduced as Mr. Cooper, took a seat beside me, his companion following his example, and, pouring out some wine, requested me to join them, which I courteously refused, on the plea of being a teetotaler. After a few moments of conversation I was again left alone, and, lighting a cigar, waited patiently my summons to actual business.

The door was opened a short time after, and by request of Cooper, I followed him up the staircase to the gloomy hall above, then into a room, where was seated my first applicant by the side of a bed, apparently in conversation with someone reclining there.

The room was a luxurious one, and appeared more so for the great contrast it presented to what other portions of the house I had seen. The rich carving, the heavy tapestry, and general appearance of the surroundings, bespoke the wealth of the possessor, whoever that person might be. Seating myself at a small table drawn up near the bed, with Jackson seated in his former position, and Cooper withdrawn to the other end of the apartment, reclining on a lounge and apparently indifferent to all that was to transpire, I awaited further developments, taking one look at the face of the occupant of the bed.

It was no wonder that I gazed long and earnestly at the countenance of the woman who reclined there. A more perfect face I had never seen—pale and with an expression of care and pain, it might have been, yet there was no trace of illness or disease, and as my eye wandered from those beautiful features, the sad yet sweetly smiling eyes, down to the plump white hand which rested in the large brown one of Jackson's, I felt that there was some mystery in the case, and that he had been untruthful in his revelations. Suddenly the man rose, dropping the lady's hand, drew up a chair opposite to my own, and with an impatient, uneasy exclamation, brought my investigation to an end.

"You will draw out the ordinary formula of a testament," he said, giving the young girl a close, scrutinising look, in which I could detect a warning expression, "writing as I dictate (Miss Pickering having acquainted me with her destined disposal of her property), and allowing her to acquiesce when it is finished. I suppose her affirmation will be all that is necessary ? "

Digitized by Google

I was somewhat surprised at the strangeness of the request, but replied :

" Certainly, if I am confident that she is compos mentis, and she is too ill to dictate herself."

Here a slight exclamation broke from the lips of the occupant of the bed, as if about to frame a word or sentence, but she was checked by Jackson, who, with a threatening scowl, evidently not meant for my observation, said :

" Do not exert yourself, my dear niece ; I will do all that is necessary," and then, as I drew the writing material before me, he quickly leant over towards her, and hissed in her ear : " Remember—be careful ! " with such emphasis as to cause her to sink, pale and trembling, back among the pillows of the bed.

A half-hour elapsed, and the will had been completed. All Blanche Pickering's property, personal and real, was to be divided between the man Jackson and his son Henry, with the exception of a few small legacies. Then I read it, and after propounding the few necessary interrogatories to the legator, which were answered in a low, trembling affirmative, I requested her to sign it.

Drawing my chair up to her side, with the paper and pen in my hand, I waited for her to obey my request—intimating to Jackson that it would be as well to have Cooper as a witness.

The latter individual had evidently fallen asleep, for a call to him not bringing him to the bedside, Jackson rose and walked to where his companion lay.

At this moment, and with the rapidity of light, the girl's hand caught my own, and leaning my head downwards, so that I could listen to what she might desire to say, I heard her whisper, in passionate, beseeching words :

" I am forced to this ! They intend to kill me ! For Heaven's sake, help me ! "

Then she sank back, and before Jackson had been able to observe us, we had both resumed our former relative positions.

At last the will had been signed, witnessed, and sealed, and, hat in hand, I stood at the table, awaiting my client's further pleasure, as unconsciously as if I had not the idea in my mind of returning before morning, and that, too, with the police.

Mr. Jackson handed me some bank-notes, shook hands with me warmly, and then requested Cooper to show me to the door. As I left the room, I cast an encouraging glance at Miss Pickering, which did not escape the notice of the lynx-eyed guardian, for he looked me sharply in the face as if to detect some sign of recognition there.

Then I followed my servitor down the stairs, listened to his untruthful regrets that the carriage must have returned to the house, as agreed upon, and then gone to the town, declined his offer to remain for the night, and having been directed on my road, stood once more in the open air.

My first thought was to make all haste to the town, and, on the slight evidence of foul play I had, to obtain justice for the young girl.

The idea was immediately discarded, for, as I was about to start out, a wild scream of terror assailed my ears.

In a moment I was again up the steps, and turning the knob of the door in an ineffectual attempt to gain admittance.

I was about to attempt to force an entrance through the window, when the door was flung suddenly open, and the man Cooper stood before me.

He saw me at once, and, with an oath, struck at me with his clenched fist. Evading the blow, I whipped out my revolver, and striking him with the butt end, knocked him senseless to the ground.

I was again about to turn and enter, when the form of Jackson dashed down the staircase, through the open door, and I felt myself in his grasp.

I saw at once that he was unarmed, and, raising my pistol, fired ; but the shot was turned aside, and the weapon knocked from my hand to the ground.

Then ensued a fearful struggle between us, in which we both were precipitated down the steps upon the gravel walk below—I uppermost.

It was, perhaps, for two minutes that I held him by the throat, dealing him blows with my disengaged hand—he having the other in his strong grasp—when, with a dexterous twist of his powerful arm, he turned me aside, and I lay prostrate upon the ground, with the vice-like grip of his strong fingers grasping me by the throat, until my eyes were starting from their sockets and every muscle became inactive.

Seizing a large stone, which lay near him, he raised it in his left hand, and was about to strike me on the head, when a sharp, loud report rang on the air. The form of the ruffian fell back—his fingers relaxed their grasp.

A form in white passed before my uncertain vision ; and then, for the space of five minutes, I was utterly unconscious.

When, at length, my mind awoke from its stupor, a form—that of Miss Pickering—was bending over me, chafing my temples, and attempting to perform what Nature had done—restore me to sensibility.

From her I learnt that she had risen from her bed, at the exit of the two ruffians from her room, and, observing my dangerous situation, had fired at Jackson, just as he was about to strike me with the stone, with my revolver, which she had picked up.

I also learnt that her scream was caused by the resolution of the murderous twain to start after and murder me—fearing that she had communicated something to me which might upset their well-laid plans.

Having securely bound the still unconscious Cooper, and treating Jackson in the same way, we waited for the dawn. Miss Pickering, meanwhile, informed me of her imprisonment, by Jackson, for over a year, and his resolve to force her to make her will, and then make away with her. Her parents having died, and left her sole heiress to great wealth, her appointed guardian, Jackson, a half-brother of her mother's, was playing for a no diminutive stake.

The next morning a farmer's cart conveyed Cooper and Jackson to the town, where they were handed to the police.

Not long afterwards Miss Blanche Pickering became Mrs. Avery.

The will and revolver are still in our possession—the sole mementoes of that exciting night, when I almost lost my life, and gained a bride.

D. Harrison.

A Wonderful Journey.

Count Vay de Vaya may justly claim to be the most widely-travelled man in the world. He has visited, literally, every country on earth, and speaks no fewer than seven languages. He recently accomplished the remarkable feat of penetrating, on a mission connected with charitable and religious institutions, through the wilds of Siberia, from the Near East of Russia to the mysterious and romantic Far East, to which the eyes of the whole world are now turned. At Peterhof, near St. Petersburg, Count Vay de Vaya was accorded an audience by the Tsar, and during his subsequent journeyings he received a similar honour at the hands of the Emperors of China, Korea, and Japan. To have been received by these great monarchs, certainly four of the most unapproachable of the world's sovereigns, is a wonderful record: and the Count's diary of what he saw and heard in their little-known palaces, of what they told him, and of what they asked him, is of deep and unique interest at this moment. Count Vay de Vaya's diary is published just as he wrote it at the time in Pearson's Magazine, his audiences with the Tsar and the Emperor and Dowager Empress of China appearing in the April number, on sale April 1. The audiences with the Emperors of Korea and Japan will appear in the May number.

Digitized by Google

An Unkind Suggestion.

Cholly: "I was thrown out of a carriage the other day, and would have been killed if I hadn't alighted on something soft." She: "Really? Did you fall head first?"

A Different View.

Her Mother: "I think that Mabel has a slight leaning towards this young Mr. Smith." Her Father: "Slight? Great Scott! You ought to have seen them last night!"

No Encouragement Required.

Her Father: "What! You say you're engaged to Fred? I thought I told you not to give him any encouragement?" His Daughter: "I don't. He doesn't need any."

Cause and Effect.

Alice: "What a gallant person Mr. Dunkley is. He never addresses me without beginning 'Fair Miss.'" Dorothy: "Oh, that's force of habit. He used to be a 'bus conductor."

He Had Just Been Accepted.

Algy: "So you've been taking Miss Haughtie out boating on the river. Rather stylish girl, but too reserved for me." Reggie: "Yes, I expect she is; I've just reserved her for life."

Thankful for Small Mercies.

Ethel: "And so you told him what you thought of him, did you? And what did he say?" Kittie: "The horrid thing! He said he was pleased to know that I thought of him at all."

The Only Choice She Had.

Mother: "Why did you accept Charlie from among all the young men who have paid you attention?" Daughter: "Because he was the only one that had the good taste to propose."

Her Version.

He (bitterly): "You have no heart." She: "What nonsense!" He: "It's the truth. You flirt outrageously with every man you meet." She: "Then I must have a large heart to take in so many."

The Retort Courteous.

His Wife: "I wish I had lots of money." He: "If one could get what one wished for, I think that I should wish for common-sense, not money." Wife: "Naturally, everybody wishes for what they haven't got."

A Bitter Emphasis.

Vexed Wife: "There's no calamity that can befall a woman that I have not suffered!" Amiable Husband: "Wrong, my dear; now, you have never been a widow." Vexed Wife: "I said calamity, sir!"

Absent-Minded.

Elsie: "Yes, dear, my husband is a doctor, and a lovely fellow, but awfully absent-minded." Ada: "Indeed?" Elsie: "Only fancy! During the marriage ceremony, when he gave me the ring, he felt my pulse and told me to put out my tongue."

Extremely Wonderful.

Editor (gazing on his fiancée's picture): "That girl is a poem." Poet (curiously): "And still you do not reject her?"

A Surprising Fact.

"Did you call on Miss Jonas?" "Yes. She was awfully disagreeable, too; didn't cheer up, really, until I started to leave."

Should Try Again.

He (desperately): "Then I am to give up all hope, am I?" She (consolingly): "Not of necessity. There are lots of girls about still, you know."

She Was Bored.

She: "Don't you play, Mr. Staylate?" He: "No; but I am thinking of taking lessons. I have a good ear for time, don't you know." She: "Indeed! Was it eleven or twelve o'clock that just now struck?"

The Last Straw.

He (bitterly): "If I were rich you'd marry me readily enough!" She: "Don't, Gussie, don't! Such devotion breaks my heart!" He: "What do you mean?" She: "Often have you praised my beauty, but never before my common-sense!"

A Shrewd Wife.

Mrs. Greene: "I hope you trust your husband implicitly?" Mrs. Brown: "Oh, yes, indeed! But I wouldn't have him know it for the world. If he were aware how absolutely I trust him he might be tempted to take advantage of it, you know."

Spoken in Haste.

Daughter: "Should I give Mr. Cash an immediate answer to his proposal, mamma? He has only known me four months, you know!" Mother (anxiously): "Goodness gracious, yes, child! When he's known you longer he might want to back out of it!"

Breaking it Gently.

Fred: "I've news for you, cousin Mabel! Daisy Green is engaged to be married!" Mabel: "Heavens, Fred! That red-nosed little spitfire! Whoever could want to marry her? Surely the poor fellow isn't here to-night?" Fred: "Yes, he's here, dear—I'm he!"

Matrimonial Bliss.

"Marriage," acridly said the Grizzled Bachelor, with a grin as pessimistic and mirthless as that of a laughing hyena, "is always a disappointment—to the fellows who don't get the girl, and to the girls who don't get the fellow; also to the girl who does get him, and to the fellow who gets her."

That Awful Child Again.

Willie: "Where did the hen bite you, Mr. Jones? I don't see any of the marks." Mr. Jones: "Why, Willie, I haven't been bitten by any hen." Willie: "Mamma, didn't you tell papa Mr. Jones was dreadfully henpecked? Why, mamma, how funny you look! Your face is all red."

Sour Grapes.

Robson: "Where are you going to?" Remsen: "Up to ask my pretty cousin to marry me." Robson: "Well, good luck to you." Remsen: "Thanks, old chap." Robson (an hour later): "Well, did your pretty cousin say yes?" Remsen: "No; the plain-looking hussy refused me."

Her Objection.

Miss Askew: "So your marriage is put off?" Miss Crummy: "Yes, papa is not at all satisfied with his position; mamma doesn't like his family connections, auntie thinks he is too careless in his dress, and I think——" Miss Askew: "Yes, what do you think?" Miss Crummy: "I think I ought to wait till he asks me."

Digitized by Google

Concludes in This Number.

DUPES OF DESTINY.

By BLANCHE EARDLEY.

FIFTY-THIRD CHAPTER.
The Lifting of the Shadows.

"WHERE is he?"

"They carried 'im into the lodge keeper's at the Court, sir. They got a doctor at once, but 'e's still unconscious, they say."

The ex-millionaire wiped his brow with a trembling hand. Then he was again too late! He had arrived with the two detectives and the weak, delicate wife of Edward Day, and they had stopped in the village to make some inquiries, while he had gone as quickly as he could to find news of Philip. It was too far to go to Danger Point and look for him. Had he fallen into the trap laid for him, what was to have happened would have taken place the day before. Oh! fool that he had been not to have gone immediately on receipt of the telegram that poor girl had contrived to send by someone. Now he had arrived to learn that the night before a man dying of wounds was brought down from Danger Point, and when he had asked the name, he had been told that it was the "young gentleman who was once often seen about at the Court," and his heart told him that it was Philip—Philip, the son of his youth, who was bone of his bone, flesh of his flesh, who lay dying.

At the door of the lodge he hesitated. "I—I—want—to see him!" he muttered to the kindly-faced woman who met him.

He walked into the tiny room and took off his hat. The room was empty, but in the inner one he heard voices.

A shadow stood on the threshold. He looked at it with dim eyes. It came towards him; then, as the full light fell upon it, he staggered and would have fallen had not the shadow flung out a strong hand and supported him.

"Why, Mr. Johnson! What wonderful stroke of Fate brings you here! There's nothing wrong, I hope, with Marcella?" and Philip Nullius gazed anxiously into the white drawn face of the man who seemed to have suddenly aged.

"No—no!" and Caleb J. Johnson drew a long, quivering breath. "All is well. She is safe with—with Lady Violet. But you, Philip," he went on, using the young man's name unconsciously, "you are safe and unhurt! How is it? They told me you were dying, and I hurried here."

"It was good of you, sir," Philip answered gravely. "I am not in the least hurt—though I was in danger once. It is not I who am dying, but—Edward Day!"

"Ah! tell me?" the ex-financier cried harshly. "Did he make an attempt upon your life, then? And did you instead nearly kill him, Philip?" and he laughed cruelly.

"He did make an effort to fight me, sir," Philip said gravely, "but he fell and struck his head. I left him to go and find someone to help me, and when I returned I found him stabbed, with a dagger left in his side."

"Dying! and soon he will be dead! So have his sins found him out—the young liar, thief, would-be-murderer and forger that he was!" Mr. Johnson's voice shook with the hate that seized him.

"Hush!" Philip said sharply. "Don't revile the dying, sir; besides—there is another reason"—his voice trembled—"I cannot stand by and hear him abused now."

"Why, not? He bore you no love."

"No," was the sad reply, "but I have just discovered that he is my twin-brother."

"What!" the ex-millionaire shouted, "your—twin—brother? Oh, Heaven!—if this be true—if this be true—then I am indeed paid back by Destiny!"

Philip looked at him wonderingly, and, as he looked, the perspiration broke out in beads upon his brow. The wild words and distraught manner of the one-time financier pointed to a strange conclusion, and it was one that almost bewildered him in its weird possibilities. Who was this man with the quivering face and haggard eyes, that he should ask such strange questions?

"What do you mean, sir?" he said sharply. "Do you know the secret that has baffled me for so long—the secret of my birth?"

Mr. Johnson raised his face from his hands where he had hidden it.

"Yes, lad—I know it! I am not Caleb J. Johnson, but Caleb Jerningham—your father, and also father of the unfortunate boy lying in that room. It is a long story, lad; don't blame me now—my punishment is great! I have only known of this a short time."

There was a silence, then a hand was laid on the older man's shoulder. "Come, let us go into him—before he dies."

And by the death-bed of the weak, erring son of that once loved girl-bride, Caleb Jerningham drained the dregs of the cup of bitterness. He had fought with his own son, and that son had brought him down in name and position, robbed and betrayed his father. It had been a battle of blood against blood, brain against cunning, and cunning had prevailed—to what purpose?

"That is the dagger we found in him," Philip whispered

He looked at it, and his mind leapt the space of years. He saw a couple of hearty miners on a gold claim in Australia; one presented his friend with a quaint dagger of Eastern pattern as a memento of troublous times. And that friend's name had been Rayne! He shivered. Rayne had worshipped Helen in those days, and now—now he had done her son to death!

Almost as though the dying man read his thoughts, Edward Day murmured faintly:

"Confound you, Rayne! You have won the last trick! I did all the others fairly well; but you—have scored, Rayne!" His eyes flickered and caught the tender glance of Philip bending over him, and for an instant he paused. "I'm sorry!" he whispered. "It is the only thing for which I have regret. Forgive!"

Philip turned to the ex-financier. "Will you tell him—now?"

He shook his head. "It would only embitter the end for him. I must bear it alone. He did me grievous wrong. I forgive him now."

Then, over the dead body of the sinful man, the two men gazed at each other. Father and son; and between them lay another of their blood—a man who had wronged them both.

Philip reached out his hand; his eyes gleamed through a mist. "Father!"

"Son!"

And across the dead the hands of the living met in a clasp of fellowship and understanding.

At the door of the cottage they came face to face with the two women most dear to them. They were Lady Violet and Marcella, who flew with a cry into her lover's arms.

"We could not stay behind," Lady Violet said. "My darling and I were anxious; but tell us what has happened? Why are you and Mr. Nullius both together, and looking so grave?"

"Come in here," the financier said, drawing her back into the room. "We all have much to explain, and now is the best time for shadows to be lifted. Come, Philip, my son—come, Marcella."

Digitized by Google

YOUR HEALTH

IS THE BEST THING IN THE WORLD.

Kill Infection instantly by means of

NUBOLIC SOAP

For Clothes, Bedding, Floors, Furniture, Paint, Oilcloth, Drains, &c.
In the Bathroom, Nursery, Cellar, and Kitchen. For Plates, Pots, Pans, &c.

SAVE HEALTH. SAVE LIFE. SAVE WRAPPERS.

Sold Everywhere by Grocers, Oilmen, Stores, &c.

ANOTHER GREAT PRIZE SCHEME

120,419 Prizes

FOR SOAP WRAPPERS. Cash Prizes as high as £100 each. Thousands of WATCHES, CYCLES, SEWING MACHINES, TIMEPIECES, DRESS LENGTHS, and other Articles. N.B.—Collect the Wrappers and send them to the address below. £25,969 worth of valuable Prizes, some in money, some in the shape of beautiful costly and useful articles to be distributed amongst users of NUBOLIC SOAP. Wrappers of WATSON'S MATCHLESS CLEANSER and SPARKLA may be used by competitors for the prizes. Full particulars with each tablet of the three soaps.

Value £25,969

JOSEPH WATSON & SONS Limited, Whitehall Soap Works, LEEDS.

If you wish to EAT WELL
— TAKE —

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

You will EAT WELL,

because by their specific action on the digestive organs Beecham's Pills remove the sensation of fulness and oppression commonly experienced, give the appetite "edge," and restore the stomach to healthy and natural function.

Sold everywhere in Boxes price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

"NO BETTER FOOD."

Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's

Pure Concentrated

Cocoa.

300 GOLD MEDALS, ETC.

The MEDICAL PRESS, including the "LANCET," "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL," and "MEDICAL ANNUAL," testifies to its

ABSOLUTE PURITY.

IMPORTANT CAUTION.—Sold only in tins with gilt top.

Digitized by Google

FIFTY-FOURTH CHAPTER.
In the King's Name!

"So you have betrayed me, have you? Thus is your promise to be bought, is it? You think to have scored off me—to have given me away! But you have reckoned without your host, my dear Major Dick!" and Sir Cyprian laughed quietly, yet with a thrill of triumph in his voice that made the man with him wince uneasily. His eyes followed those of the baronet, and saw through the window an unpretentious-looking trap come slowly up the drive. There was nothing out of the way about it, but his lips parted in a slow smile of satisfaction as he turned to the man whom he had betrayed.

"You see, Rust, they think you will take some catching. You are no ordinary criminal; but you must cave in now—oh, Great Chief!" he laughed recklessly.

The lines round the baronet's mouth grew deeper, and his eyes sparkled as he said softly:

"And you have sold me for a price, my dear Major. Turned King's evidence, eh? Well, it's a pity; but I don't think you will live to enjoy the proceeds of your treachery!"

"What do you mean?" burst from the other man hastily.

Sir Cyprian slipped his hand in his pocket. "That the law of all traitors to a cause is that they must die. It is a penalty they must pay."

The other rose and stumbled to the door. He had not considered that his own safety was in danger. It had escaped him for the nonce that the man he had betrayed would die hard, and not without an attempt to wipe out the score.

"Don't trouble!" laughed the sneering voice; "the key is in my pocket—that way of escape is closed, there is only one thing left to you now."

The craven coward, sodden with drink and dazed with terror, fell on his knees before the door. "For pity's sake, Rust, let me go! I—I can't die!"

"No? That's a pity, because it is the only thing left to such a worm as yourself!" Then his rage flashed forth. "You won't have the pleasure of seeing me in the hands of the police. The 'Spade' will play the trump card yet."

Then with a swift movement he drew his hand from his pocket. There was a report—a flash of smoke, and then—silence. The man who had been kneeling near the door fell over limply, and from his temple oozed a small stream of red.

"Open! In the King's name!" cried a loud, commanding voice outside the door, and there was a sound of tramping feet.

Sir Cyprian replaced the weapon in his pocket and smiled; then touching a panel in the wall, he disappeared, just as the door was broken open, and a crowd of men tumbled into the room. As they saw the bundle on the floor they recoiled.

"Suicide! Too late!"

"No!" cried another voice—that of Caleb Jerningham—"not suicide—murder!" They turned the body over, and as the ex-financier's eyes fell on the upturned face, he exclaimed in amazement.

"This is Flash Dick—the informer," the detective said. "I see he's got his deserts!"

And Caleb Jerningham realised, with a throb of gratitude, that the woman he had wronged by marrying was indeed free to be his wife again; for the man with the dead, unsightly face was the erstwhile dashing cavalry officer, Major Richard Frayne-Lennox—once the husband of Lady Violet, and the father of innocent Marcella!

"Thank God he is dead!" he murmured, as he turned away. "Marcella shall never know."

Sir Cyprian Rust sat in a chair in the room at the end of the secret wing. It was the room where he had for years kept his mad wife a prisoner, while defrauding the insurance people of twenty thousand pounds. He sat with his face to the light, a mocking smile still resting on the cynical mouth, at having cheated the law, even at the eleventh hour. In the midst of the beautiful curios and jewels for which he had so successfully devoted his evil genius in obtaining, they found him, true to the end to his fatal love of sin and crime, surrounded by the objects of his unprincipled passion. His left hand hung over the side of the chair, and from it a pool of blood ebbed slowly. With his usual love of neatness and precision the baronet had severed the main artery, and so facing the famous picture that was stolen from the one-time millionaire, he died, his fingers clutching the "Sign of the Spade," the "Society" over which he had so long reigned as an unworthy monarch. At a higher tribunal he was answering for his sins, while the law, clamouring for admittance, cried: "In the name of the King!"

* * * * *

A beautiful summer day; on the lawn at the Court a garden-party was in full swing.

"It seems like the days of your grandfather back again, Sir Philip," said an old Army veteran to the tall, manly young Squire; "and your wife, too, reminds me of her aunt. How the old chap would have rejoiced to see his grandson back in the old place—dear, dear! All's well that ends well!"

Sir Philip Jerningham agreed, and his eyes met those of the gracious young chatelaine of the Court, in a glance of love and understanding.

All was well indeed with them, and the present compensated for the horrors of the past year, when they had fought against such fearful odds. The news of Sir Cyprian's suicide had been followed by the amazing news that a will, made on the death-bed of the late Sir Basil Wingate, leaving everything unconditionally to the children of his daughter, had she any, was found in a secret drawer in Sir Cyprian's study; then came another thunderbolt from Mr. Caleb J. Johnson, who, taking his own name of Jerningham, revealed himself as the husband of the late Sir Basil's daughter and father of Philip Nullius—the new baronet.

The past was hushed and forgotten in the events that quickly followed.

"Dearest love," Sir Philip whispered to his wife, "how lovely you look, my darling, and how I love to see you happy, little wife."

Her fingers caught his for an instant.

"I am almost too happy, beloved; but there is another couple running us very close. See!" she laughed softly, "my dear mother and your father, Philip. And Aunt Laura, Sir Cyprian's wife, how happy she is now that she has regained her reason and is living so comfortably with us. It's like a fairy tale for us all to be so united after the fearful misunderstandings of the past!"

He smiled. "Yes, it is a wonderful fairy tale, beloved, and we must never let it come to an end. Dear little Lottie seems happier, too. Your mater has already a match-making idea fermenting in her brain, I notice. See how she artfully contrives to leave her with young Halebury!"

Marcella laughed softly. "Yes—dear, loyal, little Lottie will change her name by-and-bye, that is evident. She will forget soon, I hope." Then, turning to her husband, she murmured: "Oh, Philip, how grateful I am to God for having guided us through so much trouble, and brought us into such a beautiful haven of happiness—such 'dupes of destiny,' as we all were."

"Yes, darling!" he answered. "And now 'children in Fairyland'!"

THE END.

ABOUT OUR NEW SERIAL.

You have now finished reading "Dupes of Destiny." Now turn at once to the first pages of this number and begin our splendid new serial. The first instalment is a fine long one, and if you read it there is no doubt that you will want to read all the succeeding ones. Arnold Bennett, the author of "Phantom Shadows," is an exceptionally clever writer, and this is one of his very best stories.

Digitized by Google

A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle at ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.
"CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," "SINGERS," &c.
Their names guarantee their quality.

FROM 8/- MONTHLY.

A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6
On approval. Two Years' Warranty.
Write for Lists (Free).
EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. S3),
World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

FREE TO YOU.

To advertise S.L.S. Records we are giving away our noted Phonographs for a limited time. Absolutely not a penny to pay for one. Write, giving full address and nearest railway station; enclose stamp. Mention this paper.
SYMONDS' LONDON STORES, 124-128 CITY ROAD, LONDON.

REAL DEVONSHIRE CREAM (CLOTTED).

Absolutely pure; no preservatives used; the most efficacious substitute for cod liver oil, invaluable for children and invalids; ½lb. 1/4; 1lb. 2/4; 2lbs. 4/4, free; supplied constantly to the Countesses Cadogan, Pembroke, Sefton, Dundonald, Guilford, Lichfield, etc., by Mrs. CONYERS, Chagford, R.S.O., Devon.

JUNO CYCLES

ARE THE VERY BEST.
FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN.
Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.

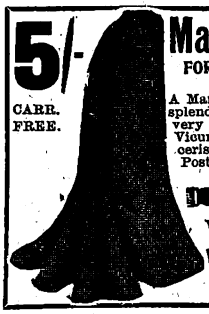
Rustless Roman Rims & Hubs.

CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of
£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 8 0 „ 15/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/8 „
9 10 0 „ 17/6 „
JUNO Motor Cycles, 3 H.P., £34, or Monthly Payments.
JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles, £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.
Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ld., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

5/- CARR. FREE.



Marvellous Offer
FOR A SHORT TIME ONLY.

A Manufacturer's Stock of these splendid Tailor-Made Skirts, very latest design, in Black Vicuna Cloth, Strapped Mercerised Silkette. Send at once Postal Order for 5/-

With length of front and waist measurement to
WIGAN SKIRT CO.
WIGAN.
Est. 1885

TEN DAYS' FREE TRIAL

Allowed on every cycle bought of us. Your Money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory.
Highest grade fully warranted
BRITISH MADE CYCLES
LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6
New Departure Free Wheel and Hub Brake, BEST MAKES Tyres, and best British-made equipment.
200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, good as new, £1 to £2-10
Factory clearing sale at half prices.
EARN A CYCLE taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Active Agents wanted in each district. Large profits easily made. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer.
Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos half prices.
MEAD CYCLE CO., Dept. 44E,
85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool,
19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

FREEMAN'S
TRADE MARK
THE ORIGINAL & ONLY TRUE
CHLORODYNE
Best Remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.
Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 6s., or postage free by the INVENTOR, R. FREEMAN, 70 KENNINGTON PARK ROAD, LONDON, S.E.
RECOMMENDED BY MEDICAL MEN.
N.B.—Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Justices James and Mellish, decided in favour of Freeman's Original Chlorodyne, and against Browne & Davenport, compelling them to pay all costs.
—"Times," 24-7-73.

For quick and easy washing, white—sweet clothes—and bright—healthy homes.
Use it in your Spring Clean.
Sold in ¼-lb. packets everywhere.
By Special Appointment. Makers to the King.
The Patent Borax Co. Ld.
Birmingham.
WRITE FOR FREE SAMPLE, &c.

BORAX STARCH GLAZE
IMPROVES ALL STARCH.

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted
Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

GIVEN AWAY
with next week's
HOME NOTES
(No. 534)

A PAPER PATTERN of this
Spring Coat.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.
PRICE ONE PENNY.

You Can Dress Better and Save Money By using
MAYPOLE SOAP

Colours 4½ per cake — WHICH — Black 6½ per cake
DYES ANY COLOUR
BRILLIANT—DURABLE—FAST—ECONOMICAL.
Curtains, Blouses, Frocks, Silks, and Satins made to look like new.
NO MESS—NO TROUBLE.
Send for Free Booklet "THE PERFECTION OF HOME DYEING" to the Maypole Co., 17 Cumming Street, London, N.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Mammon versus Love.

"IRIS" writes: "My family is very poor, but quite recently a rich aunt took a fancy to me, and desired me to live with her. She is a widow with no children, and my parents were naturally delighted with the opportunity, and, of course, I was equally pleased. But there is one circumstance which mars my joy. At home, I kept company with a young man who is a clerk, hard-working and desirable in every way except in worldly means. My family had no objection to him at the time, but since I am with my aunt all is changed. She and they absolutely forbid my having anything to do with him, merely because of his social position. I love him very dearly, and he tells me that he hopes to be considerably advanced in position and able to marry me shortly. My aunt is very determined, and would cast me off if I disobeyed her, and that would mean many disadvantages for myself and my family."

* * * * *

You must decide whether the young man on the one hand, or your own wealth and prosperity and the welfare of your family on the other, is dearer to you. Some girls would give up everything for love, others would think twice before surrendering worldly wealth. Your own nature must decide. There is only one compromise. Don't pledge yourself to the young man, but just wait until he has attained the prosperous condition he speaks of. Persuade your aunt, if possible very tactfully, that he is quite a desirable young man and effect an introduction. She may take a fancy to him, too, and then everything would be right. But between now and then I should advise you to appear to be obeying your aunt.

Tittle-Tattle.

"A. S. R." is in an awkward position. She is engaged to a man some years older than herself, of whom she is most fond. However, since her engagement is announced she has been hearing all sorts of whispering about the man. There are rumours that he was concerned in some scandal a good many years ago, of which "A. S. R." knew nothing when accepting his proposal. Should she take any steps in the matter, as her friends are talking a great deal, and one of them advised "A. S. R." to break off the match?

* * * * *

If at the time of his proposal you knew nothing to the detriment of your fiancé, then the scandal with which he is said to have been connected cannot have been a very serious one. If you really love him, you will be fully prepared to withstand the talk of tattlers. Even if their stories are true, quite possibly the incident has long been forgotten, and is not one which is really much against the man. I imagine the rumours are simply exaggerations, set about to make mischief by people who are either malicious or jealous. You should show your character by absolutely ignoring them. No doubt your fiancé will explain everything in good time, and you should wait until then.

The Way to Meet Girls.

"WHAT is a man to do who has no opportunity for getting to know girls?" asks "WORRIED," who finds himself in that position. "I have found it so difficult," he adds, "that I almost despair of ever getting to know them?"

* * * * *

I cannot quite understand a man who is in this position. The ways of getting to know girls are numerous. If a man has sisters, for instance, he should be able to meet their girl friends. If he has no sisters, then he must have male friends, who have sisters, whom he should be able to meet. Failing either of these, a young man can often meet the right sort of girl in connection with his place of worship. He could join a tennis-club, or a dramatic society, or a musical club. Dances, and At Homes are the certain result of his belonging to such bodies. The man who, like "WORRIED," finds himself out of touch with the fair sex, has, I think only himself to blame. By a very little effort he should be able to meet a sufficient number of the opposite sex from which to select a possible sweetheart.

A Rival Stepmother.

A tale of a serious love affair comes from "DELICE." "I am twenty and about to become engaged. But my domestic relations are very strained, owing to the fact that my young stepmother—aged twenty-nine, the widow of my deceased father—wishes to marry the man I love. She is still pretty, young, and smart, and makes her love for him very evident. He is flattered by it, and puts down whatever I may say about her to jealousy. He does not exactly encourage her, but finds it difficult to repulse her. She uses every possible means to influence my lover in her favour and against me. She is malicious and ill-natured, and always refers to her own perfections and to my faults. I just hate her, and am sorely afraid she will do me mischief with my lover."

* * * * *

Why, "DELICE," need you meet him at the same house as that in which your stepmother lives? Could you not so arrange it that he did not visit you there? Evidently, she is more experienced than yourself, and far cleverer in making herself attractive to a man, or she would never have caused the havoc she has. You should candidly ask the young man which of the two he loves. If he confesses that it is yourself, then implore him not to see your stepmother any more, and arrange your meetings elsewhere. It would be quite hopeless to expect a settlement so long as this pitched battle continues.

A Bumptious Sweetheart.

"MY sweetheart," writes "A. M.", "has got into a way lately of bragging about himself, trying to make himself look bigger and more important than he really is. I am very fond of him, and he of me, but it makes it unpleasant when we are with friends, and makes him look very small. What could I do to break him of this habit? He is just reaching his twentieth birthday."

* * * * *

I should not be alarmed. The approach of one's twentieth birthday has often the effect of swelled head on young men, who are just beginning to realise that they are growing important. In a very short time your sweetheart will discover that his importance is of a very limited order, especially if you continue to treat him just as before, and always squash him whenever he indulges in this bragging habit. Don't on any account treat it seriously. The complaint from which he suffers rarely lasts long at that age. If it should seize him five or more years later, it would be much worse.

Cynthia.

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

All Players of Football,

All Lovers of Football,

ATTEND!

Among its extraordinarily varied and interesting contents there are three articles in

The APRIL . .

Royal Magazine

which you dare not miss unless you wish to repent it all your life long, viz.,

"FOOTBALL IN DIAGRAMS."

This is something quite unique. It describes a method of reporting a game by which every movement of the ball and any player can be followed and recorded with minute exactitude from start to finish.

You will be able to get up these interesting diagrams yourself without any difficulty.

"THE GENTLE ART OF GOAL-GETTING"

is the other article which you positively cannot afford to miss if you wish to become proficient in the game. It contains many useful tips from the leading exponents of football.

DON'T FORGET . .

4D. THE ROYAL MAGAZINE 4D.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

FENDERS AND BEDSTEADS

of Every Description
Direct from Works.

Also CURBS, FIRE IRONS, BRASSES, FIRE GUARDS, &c.

Send particulars of your requirements.
Sketches and Prices can be sent on at once.

SPARKHILL FENDER AND BEDSTEAD CO.,
B88 DURHAM ROAD, BIRMINGHAM.

Your Food will do you more good when salted with . .

CEREBOS

Table Salt

"The pickle of pickles."

THE MILITARY PICKLE.

A choice condiment of Oriental Fruits and English Vegetables.

HAYWARD BROS. Ltd., 319 KENNINGTON ROAD, S.E.

THE "SIRDAR" RUG-WOOL

FIRST & BEST FOR RUG & MAT MAKING
ENDLESS WEAR

BRIGHT IN FINISH! OF SUPERIOR QUALITY!
May be had in 30 Art Shades from the principal dealers. Insist on having the "SIRDAR" & TAKE NO SUBSTITUTE.

PLAIN DIRECTIONS FOR RUG & MAT MAKING FREE.

WHOLESALE ONLY FROM
HARRAP BROS., BECTIVE MILLS, WAKEFIELD.

"MENE"

A SAMPLE ½ DOZEN OF THESE FAMOUS SANITARY TOWELS

IN ASSORTED SIZES, WILL BE SENT POST FREE FOR SIX STAMPS.

NONE EQUAL THEM FOR CLEANLINESS COMFORT & ECONOMY

SOLD BY ALL UNDERCLOTHING HOUSES AND CHEMISTS.

LADIES SHOULD WRITE FOR SAMPLE TO MISS HAYNES, 55 FANN ST. LONDON, E.C.

A TURKISH BATH AT HOME
BY USING THE

"IMPERIAL"
FOLDING
VAPOUR BATH
CABINET

CLEARS THE SKIN.
Gives Health & Vigour. CURES RHEUMATISM
GOLD MEDAL, 1903.

PRICE 20/10 COMPLETE WITH STOVE

Send for full particulars to
KITCHING BROS. & Co. IMPERIAL WORKS, HULL.

Digitized by Google

SPLENDID NEW SERIAL JUST STARTED.

SHORT STORIES

The millionaire seized Jules by the throat. Would the man do as he was bid?

(An Exciting Incident in this week's instalment of our New Serial, "Phantom Shadows." See inside.)

ONE PENNY.] [No. 797. Week Ending April 9th, 1904.

BROWNIE KODAKS

For BOYS and GIRLS.

No. 1 BROWNIE, 5s.

THE No. 1 BROWNIE

giving Photographs 2½in. x 2½in.
Price 5s. only.

THE No. 2 BROWNIE

giving Photographs 3¼in. x 2½in.
Price 10s. only.

For LADIES, CYCLISTS, &c.
THE FOLDING POCKET KODAKS,
From 26s. to £5 2s. 6d.

THE DARK ROOM DISPENSED WITH!

KODAK Daylight Deve oping Machine.

Develops Films in Day-light—Gaslight—Any Light—Anywhere.

10s. to 45s.

Marvellously Simple and Efficient.

Of all Photographic Dealers, or of

KODAK LTD., 41-43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Depot: 96 Bold St., Liverpool, and 72-74 Buchanan St., Glasgow.

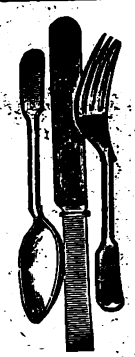
Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, E.C.; 115 Oxford St., W.; 171-3 Regent St., W.; 40 Strand, London, W.C.

J. G. GRAVES

THE

"Enterprise" Parcel

OF SHEFFIELD CUTLERY AND PLATE.



Contains: 6 Table Knives, 6 Table Forks, 6 Dessert Knives, 6 Dessert Forks, 6 Dessert Spoons, 6 Tea Spoons, 6 Egg Spoons, 2 Table Spoons, 2 Salt Spoons, 2 Mustard Spoons, 1 Moist Sugar Spoon, 1 pair Sugar Tongs, and 1 Pickle Fork.

51 PIECES FOR 25/-

The Knives are made of best Sheffield Steel and fitted with 'Ivorette' Handles. 'Ivorette' is the best known substitute for genuine Ivory. The Forks and Spoons are made of 'Columbian' silver, a hard metal which wears white throughout and is not affected by acid foods or exposure.

DIRECT FROM MY FACTORY TO YOUR HOME.

Sent on receipt of 2/6 and your promise to pay the balance in nine more monthly payments of 2/6.
Discount Advantages to Cash Purchasers.

Handsome Catalogue of Sheffield Cutlery and Plate, post free.

AGENTS WANTED. Good Pay. No Responsibility. Write for Terms.

J. G. GRAVES, 169 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

SONGS COPIED

Legible as print, 5d. page; transposed correctly, 6d. page.

Mrs. CONYERS,
Chagford, R.S.O., Devon.

Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, etc.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY!

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of "Short Stories," 9/4/904. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, we will forward, Direct from our Looms to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns and art colourings, to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for our goods below the actual cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, this saving the purchasers all middle profits.

OVER 200,000 SOLD DURING THE PAST 12 MONTHS.

GIVEN AWAY! GIVEN AWAY!

With every Carpet we shall Absolutely Give Away a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs for 9/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials Received.

Illustrated Bargain Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Table Linen, Curtains, &c., post free.

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants.

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Sale Price: 3/6 Postage 4d. extra.

Free Gifts. Sizes: 38, 40, 42.

F. HODGSON & SONS, City of Leeds, will Present Free to every reader of "Short Stories," 9/4/1904.

carriage paid, on receipt of postal stamps 4d. extra, for our Ladies' Beautiful Serge Dress Costume Skirts, in Black or Navy, richly trimmed with mercerised silkette straps, with good linenette pockets, and fitted with good linenette pocket. We shall include FREE with each Skirt a Massive 18-ct. Gold Pattern Curb Bracelet, with Heart Pendant, mounted with Pearls and Turquoise, and scented with Forget-me-Nots. Cased with Pure Gold. Money willingly returned if not approved. Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Curtains, &c., post free.

Address; F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.), Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Headache,

Neuralgia & all Nerve Pains

One dose of Kaputine, costing 1d., cures in ten minutes the most violent nerve pain, —every time.

Kaputine is not an aperient, and causes no inconvenience, but is for one purpose only—to cure Nerve Pains.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—and gives immediate relief.

Kaputine, unlike the dangerous white headache powders consisting of one crude drug, is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical Profession.

Kaputine is sold by all Medicine Dealers, Packets of 18 doses, 1/-. Samples 1d. each.

Write now for samples free and post paid to
C. C. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN 17 APR 1904

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 797.] Week Ending April 9th, 1904. [One Penny.

THIS SPLENDID NEW SERIAL HAS JUST BEGUN.

A Story of Love and Crime.

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

Synopsis of First Chapters.

Mr. Theodore Racksole, American multi-millionaire, accompanied by his daughter Nella, arrives at the GrandBabylon Hotel. At dinner he orders Jules, the dignified head-waiter, to bring him a steak and a bottle of Bass.

Jules is annoyed at this strange order, and refuses to carry out the millionaire's instructions.

Calmly, without a word of expostulation, Racksole seeks out Félix Babylon, the proprietor of the hotel, and in less than twenty minutes contracts have been signed between the two parties, by which it is transferred to Racksole for the sum of £400,000.

The millionaire then orders the chef, Rocco, to cook him a steak, and to see that it is served, with a bottle of Bass, by Jules at their table in the dining-room.

When Racksole returns to his daughter, he finds that with her is a Mr. Reginald Dimmock, English companion to Prince Aribert of Posen. As Jules is serving the steak, Racksole sees him give a significant, ominous wink to this Dimmock. In the course of conversation, the latter says that his master is on the point of coming to the hotel.

Racksole stays talking very late that night to Mr. Babylon, and as he is making his way to his room in the small hours of the morning, he sees Jules emerging from Room 111—Nella Racksole's! What can it mean? Ten silent strides, and the millionaire, revolver in hand, is upon him.

THIRD CHAPTER.

The Struggle Between the Millionaire and Jules.

"One word, my friend," the millionaire began, carelessly waving the revolver in the air. Jules was indubitably startled, but by an admirable exercise of self-control he recovered possession of his faculties in a second.

"Sir?" said Jules.

"I just want to be informed what the dickens you were doing in No. 111 a moment ago?"

"I had been requested to go there," was the calm response.

"You are a liar, and not a very clever one. That is my daughter's room. Now—out with it, before I decide whether to shoot you, or throw you into the street."

Racksole seized him by the throat.

"Excuse me, sir, No. 111 is occupied by a gentleman."

"I advise you that it is a serious error of judgment to contradict me, my friend. Don't do it again. We will go to the room together, and you shall prove that the occupant is a gentleman, and not my daughter."

"Impossible, sir," said Jules.

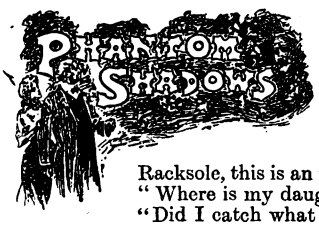
"Scarcely that," said Racksole, and he took Jules by the sleeve. The millionaire knew for a certainty that Nella occupied No. 111, for he had examined the room with her, and himself seen that the trunks and her maid and herself had arrived there in safety. "Now open the door," whispered Racksole when they reached No. 111.

"I must knock."

"That is just what you mustn't do. Open it."

Confronted by the revolver, Jules readily obeyed, yet with a deprecatory gesture, as though he would not be responsible for this outrage against the decorum of hotel life. Racksole entered. The room was brilliantly lighted.

Digitized by Google



'A visitor, who insists on seeing you, sir," said Jules, and fled.

Mr. Reginald Dimmock, still in evening dress, and smoking a cigarette, rose hurriedly from a table.

"Hello, my dear Mr. Racksole, this is an unexpected—ah—pleasure."

"Where is my daughter? This is her room."

"Did I catch what you said, Mr. Racksole?"

"I ventured to remark that this is Miss Racksole's room."

"My good sir," answered Dimmock, "you must be mad to dream of such a thing. Only my respect for your daughter prevents me from expelling you forcibly, for such an extraordinary suggestion."

A small spot half-way down the bridge of the millionaire's nose turned suddenly white.

"With your permission," he said, in a low, calm voice, "I will examine the dressing-room and the bath-room."

"Just listen to me," Dimmock urged, in a milder tone.

"I'll listen to you afterwards, my young friend," said Racksole, and he proceeded to search the bath-room and the dressing-room without any result whatever. "Lest my attitude might be open to misconstruction, Mr. Dimmock, I may as well tell you that I have the most perfect confidence in my daughter, who is as well able to take care of herself as any woman I ever met, but since you entered it there have been one or two rather mysterious occurrences in this hotel. That is all." Feeling a draught of air on his shoulder, Racksole turned to the window. "For instance," he added, "I perceive that this window is broken, badly broken, and from the outside. Now, how could that have occurred?"

"If you will kindly hear reason, Mr. Racksole," said Dimmock in his best diplomatic manner, "I will endeavour to explain things to you. I regarded your first question to me when you entered my room as being offensively put, but I now see that you had some justification." He smiled politely.

"I was passing along this corridor about eleven o'clock, when I found Miss Racksole in a difficulty with the hotel servants. Miss Racksole was retiring to rest in this room when a large stone, which must have been thrown from the Embankment, broke the window, as you see. Apart from the discomfort of the broken window, she did not care to remain in the room. She argued that where one stone had come another might follow. She therefore insisted on her room being changed. The servants said that there was no other room available with a dressing-room and bath-room attached, and your daughter made a point of these matters. I at once offered to exchange apartments with her. She did me the honour to accept my offer. Our respective belongings were moved—and that is all. Miss Racksole is at this moment, I trust, asleep in No. 124."

Theodore Racksole looked at the young man for a few seconds in silence.

There was a faint knock at the door.

"Come in," said Racksole loudly.

Someone pushed open the door, but remained standing on the mat. It was Nella's maid, in a dressing-gown.

"Miss Racksole's compliments, and a thousand excuses, but a book of hers was left on the mantelshelf in this room. She cannot sleep, and wishes to read."

"Mr. Dimmock, I tender my apologies—my formal apologies," said Racksole, when the girl had gone away with the book. "Good-night."

"Pray don't mention it," said Dimmock suavely—and bowed him out.

FOURTH CHAPTER.
Entrance of the Prince.

Nevertheless, sundry small things weighed on Racksole's mind. First there was Jules' wink. Then there was the ribbon on the door-handle and Jules' visit to No. 111, and the broken window—broken from the outside. Racksole did not forget that the time was three a.m. He slept but little that night, but he was glad that he had bought the Grand Babylon Hotel.

It was an acquisition which seemed to promise fun and diversion.

The next morning he came across Mr. Babylon early.

"I have emptied my private room of all personal papers," said Babylon, "and it is now at your disposal. I purpose if agreeable to yourself, to stay on in the hotel as a guest for the present. We have much to settle with regard to the completion of the purchase, and also there are things which you might want to ask me. Also, to tell the truth I am not anxious to leave the old place with too much suddenness. It will be a wrench to me."

"I shall be delighted if you will stay," said the millionaire, "but it must be as my guest, not as the guest of the hotel."

"You are very kind."

"As for wishing to consult you, no doubt I shall have need to do so, but I must say that the show seems to run itself."

"Ah!" said Babylon thoughtfully. "I have heard of hotels that run themselves. If they do, you may be sure that they obey the laws of gravity and run downwards. You will have your hands full. For example, have you yet heard about Miss Spencer?"

"No," said Racksole. "What of her?"

"She has mysteriously vanished during the night, and nobody appears to be able to throw any light on the affair. Her room is empty, her boxes gone. You will want someone to take her place, and that someone will not be very easy to get."

"H'm!" Racksole said, after a pause. "Hers is not the only post that falls vacant to-day."

A little later, the millionaire installed himself in the late owner's private room and rang the bell.

"I want Jules," he said to the page.

While waiting for Jules, Racksole considered the question of Miss Spencer's disappearance.

"Good morning, Jules," was his cheerful greeting, when the imperturbable waiter arrived.

"Good morning, sir."

"Take a chair."

"Thank you, sir."

"We have met before this morning, Jules."

"Yes, sir, at three a.m."

"Rather strange about Miss Spencer's departure, is it not?" suggested Racksole.

"It is remarkable, sir."

"You are aware, of course, that Mr. Babylon has transferred all his interests in this hotel to me?"

"I have been informed to that effect, sir."

"I suppose you know everything that goes on in the hotel, Jules?"

"As the head waiter, sir, it is my business to keep a general eye on things."

"You speak very good English for a foreigner, Jules."

"For a foreigner, sir! I am an Englishman, a Hertfordshire man, born and bred. Perhaps my name has misled you, sir. I am only called Jules because the head waiter of any really high-class hotel must have either a French or an Italian name."

"I see," said Racksole. "I think you must be rather a clever person, Jules."

"That is not for me to say, sir."

"How long has the hotel enjoyed the advantage of your services?"

"A little over twenty years."

"That is a long time to be in one place. Don't you think it's time you got out of the rut. You are still young, and might make a reputation for yourself in another and wider sphere." Racksole looked at the man steadily, and his glance was as steadily returned.

"You aren't satisfied with me, sir?"

Digitized by Google

"To be frank, Jules, I think—I think you—er—wink too much. And I think that it is regrettable when a head waiter falls into a habit of taking white ribbons from the handles of bedroom doors at three in the morning."

Jules started slightly.

"I see how it is, sir. You wish me to go, and one pretext, if I may use the term, is as good as another. Very well, I can't say that I'm surprised. It sometimes happens that there is incompatibility of temper between a hotel proprietor and his head waiter, and then unless one of them goes, the hotel is likely to suffer. I will go, Mr. Racksole. In fact, I had already thought of giving notice."

The millionaire smiled appreciatively.

"What wages do you require in lieu of notice? It is my intention that you leave the hotel within an hour."

"I require no wages in lieu of notice, sir. I would scorn to accept anything. And I will leave the hotel in fifteen minutes."

"Good day, then. You have my good wishes and my admiration, so long as you keep out of my hotel."

"Good day, sir. And thank you."

Racksole got up.

"By the way, Jules, it will be useless for you to apply to any other first-rate European hotel for a post, because I shall take measures which will insure the rejection of any such application."

"Without discussing the question whether or not there aren't at least half a dozen hotels in London alone that would jump for joy at the chance of getting me," answered Jules, "I may tell you, sir, that I shall retire from my profession."

"Really! You will turn your brains to a different channel."

"No, sir. I shall take rooms in Albemarle Street or Jermyn Street, and just be content to be a man-about-town. I have saved some twenty thousand pounds—a mere trifle, but sufficient for my needs, and I shall now proceed to enjoy it. Pardon me for troubling you with my personal affairs. And good day, again."

That afternoon Racksole went with Félix Babylon first to a firm of solicitors in the City, and then to a stockbroker, in order to carry out the practical details of the purchase of the hotel.

"I mean to settle in England," said Racksole, as they were coming back. "It is the only country——" And he stopped.

"The only country?"

"The only country where you can invest money and spend money with a feeling of security. In the United States there is nothing worth spending money on, nothing to buy. In France or Italy, there is no real security."

"But surely you are a true American?" questioned Babylon.

"I am a true American," said Racksole, "but my father, who began by being a bedmaker at an Oxford college, and ultimately made ten million dollars out of iron in Pittsburg—my father took the wise precaution of having me educated in England. I had my three years at Oxford, like any son of the upper middle class! It did me good. It has been worth more to me than many successful speculations. It taught me that the English language is different from, and better than, the American language, and that there is something—I haven't yet found out exactly what—in English life that Americans will never get. Why," he added, "in the United States we still bribe our judges and our newspapers. And we talk of the nineteenth century as though it was the beginning of the world. Yes, I shall transfer my securities to London. I shall build a house in Park Lane, and I shall buy some immemorial country seat with a history as long as the A. T. and S. railroad, and I shall calmly and gradually settle down. D'you know—I am rather a good-natured man for a millionaire, and of a social disposition, and yet I haven't six real friends in the whole of New York City. Think of that!"

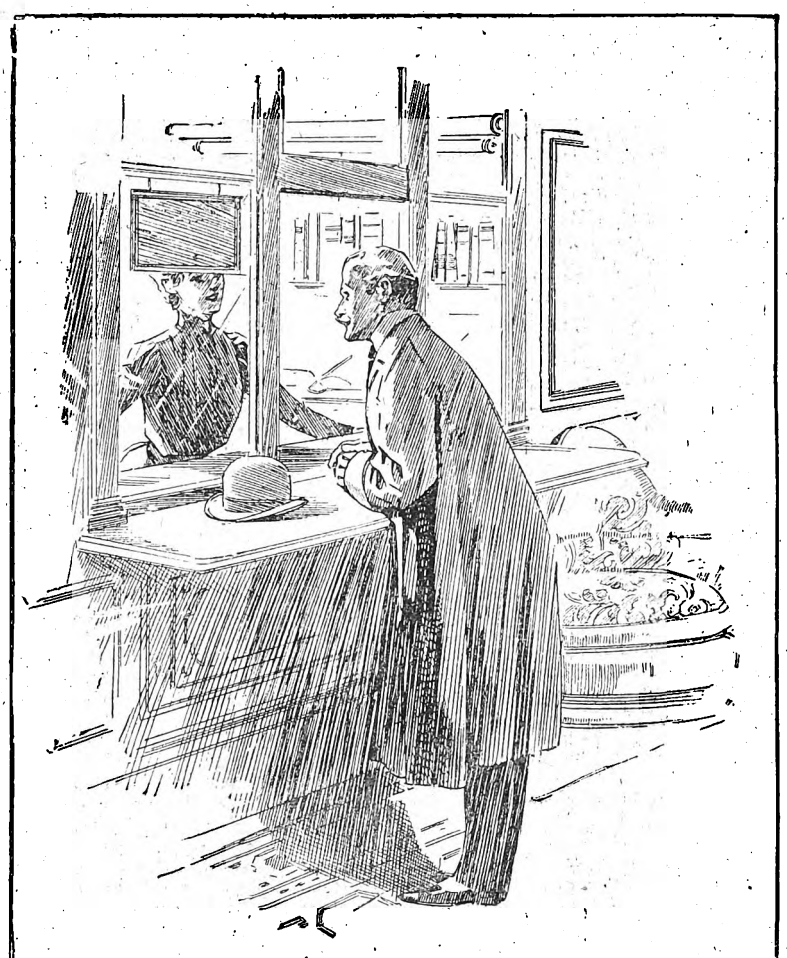
"And I," said Babylon, "have no friends except the friends of my boyhood in Lausanne. I have spent thirty years in England, and gained nothing but a perfect knowledge of the English language and as much gold coin as would fill a rather large box."

These two plutocrats breathed a simultaneous sigh.

"Talking of gold coin," said Racksole, "how much money should you think Jules has contrived to amass while he has been with you?"

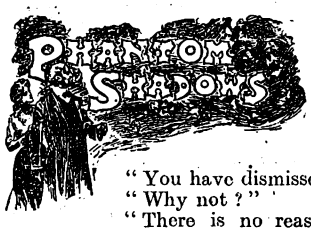
"Oh!" Babylon smiled. "I should not like to guess. He has had unique opportunities—unique opportunities."

"Should you



Nella saw a young man of about thirty years at the window. It was his Serene Highness Prince Aribert of Posen.

Digitized by Google



consider twenty thousand an extraordinary sum under the circumstances?"

"Not at all. Has he been confiding in you?"

"Somewhat. I have dismissed him."

"You have dismissed him?"

"Why not?"

"There is no reason why not. But I have felt inclined to dismiss him for the past ten years, and never found courage to do it."

"It was a perfectly simple proceeding, I assure you. Before I had done with him, I rather liked the fellow."

"Miss Spencer and Jules—both gone in one day!" mused Félix Babylon.

"And no one to take their places," said Racksole. "And yet the hotel continues its way!"

And when Racksole reached the Grand Babylon he found that Miss Spencer's chair in the bureau was occupied by a stately and imperious girl, dressed becomingly in black.

"Heavens! Nella!" he cried, going to the bureau. "What are you doing here?"

"I am taking Miss Spencer's place. I want to help you with your hotel, dad. I fancy I shall make an excellent hotel clerk. I have arranged with a Miss Selina Smith, one of the typewriters in the office, to put me up to all the tips and tricks, and I shall do very well,"

"But, look here, Helen Racksole. We shall have the whole of London talking about this thing—the greatest of all American heiresses a hotel clerk! And I came here for quiet and rest!"

"I suppose it was for the sake of quiet and rest that you bought the hotel, papa?"

"You would insist on the steak," he retorted. "Get out of this, on the instant."

"Here I am, here I stay," said Nella, and deliberately laughed at her parent.

Just then the face of a fair-haired man of about thirty years appeared at the bureau window. He was very well-dressed, very aristocratic in his pose, and he seemed rather angry.

He looked fixedly at Nella, and started back.

"Ach!" he exclaimed. "You!"

"Yes, your Highness, it is indeed I. Father, this is his Serene Highness Prince Aribert of Posen—one of our most esteemed customers."

"You know my name, Fräulein?" the newcomer murmured in German.

"Certainly, Prince," Nella replied sweetly. "You were plain Count Steenbock last Spring in Paris—doubtless travelling incognito——"

"Silence," he intreated, with a wave of the hand, and his forehead went as white as paper.

FIFTH CHAPTER.

What Occurred to Reginald Dimmock.

In another moment they were all three talking quite easily, and with at any rate an appearance of being natural. Prince Aribert became suave, even deferential to Nella, and more friendly towards Nella's father than their respective positions demanded. The latter amused himself by studying this sprig of royalty, the first with whom he had ever come into contact. He decided that the young fellow was personable enough, "had no frills on him," and would make an exceptionally good commercial traveller for a first-class firm. Such was Theodore Racksole's preliminary estimate of the man who might one day be the reigning Grand Duke of Posen.

It occurred to Nella, and she smiled at the idea, that the bureau of the hotel was scarcely the correct place in which to receive this august young man. There he stood, with his head half-way through the bureau window, negligently leaning against the woodwork, just as though he were a stockbroker or the manager of a New York burlesque company.

"Is your Highness travelling quite alone?" she asked.

"By a series of accidents I am," he said: "My equerry was to have met me at Charing Cross, but he failed to do so—I cannot imagine why."

"Mr. Dimmock?" questioned Racksole.

"Yes, Dimmock. I do not remember that he ever missed an appointment before. You know him? He has been here?"

"He dined with us last night," said Racksole—"on Nella's invitation," he added maliciously; "but to-day we have seen nothing of him. I know, however, that he has engaged the State apartments, and also a suite adjoining the State apartments—No. 55. That is so, isn't it, Nella?"

"Yes, papa," she said, having first demurely examined a ledger. "Your Highness would doubtless like to be conducted to your room—apartments I mean." Then Nella laughed deliberately at the Prince, and said, "I don't know who is the proper person to conduct you, and that's a fact. The truth is that papa and I are rather raw yet in the hotel line. You see, we only bought the place last night."

"You have bought the hotel!" exclaimed the Prince.

"That's so," said Racksole.

"And Félix Babylon has gone?"

"He is going, if he has not already gone,"

"Ah! I see," said the Prince; "this is one of your American 'strokes.' You have bought to sell again, is that not it? You are on your holidays, but you cannot resist making a few thousands by way of relaxation. I have heard of such things."

"We shan't sell again, Prince, until we are tired of our bargain. Sometimes we tire very quickly, and sometimes we don't. It depends—eh? what?" Racksole broke off suddenly to attend to a servant in livery who had quietly entered the bureau and was making urgent, mysterious signs to him.

"If you please, sir," the man by frantic gestures implored Mr. Theodore Racksole to come out.

"Pray don't let me detain you, Mr. Racksole," said the Prince, and therefore the proprietor of the Grand Babylon departed after the servant, with a queer, curt little bow to Prince Aribert.

"Mayn't I come inside?" said the Prince to Nella immediately the millionaire had gone.

"Impossible, Prince," Nella laughed. "The rule against visitors entering this bureau is frightfully strict."

"How do you know the rule is so strict if you only came into possession last night?"

"I know because I made the rule myself this morning, your Highness."

"But seriously, Miss Racksole, I want to talk to you."

"Do you want to talk to me as Prince Aribert or as the friend—the acquaintance—whom I knew in Paris last year?"

"As the friend, dear lady, if I may use the term."

"And you are sure that you would not like first to be conducted to your apartments?"

"Not yet. I will wait till Dimmock comes; he cannot fail to be here soon."

"Then we will have tea served in father's private room—the proprietor's private room, you know."

"Good!" he said.

Nella talked through a telephone, and rang several bells, and behaved generally in a manner calculated to prove to Princes and to whomever it might concern that she was a young woman of business instincts and training, and then she stepped down from her chair of office, emerged from the bureau, and, preceded by two menials, led Prince Aribert to the Louis XV. chamber in which her father and Félix Babylon had had their long confabulation on the previous evening.

"What do you want to talk to me about?" she asked her companion, as she poured out for him a second cup of tea. The Prince looked at her for a moment as he took the proffered cup, and being a young man of sane, healthy instincts, he could think of nothing for the moment except her loveliness.

Digitized by Google

Nella was indeed beautiful that afternoon. The beauty of even the most beautiful woman ebbs and flows from hour to hour. Nella's this afternoon was at the flood. Vivacious, alert, imperious and yet ineffably sweet, she seemed to radiate the very joy and exuberance of life.

"I have forgotten," he said.

"You have forgotten! That is surely very wrong of you? You gave me to understand that it was something terribly important. But, of course, I knew it couldn't be, because no man, and especially no Prince, ever discussed anything really important with a woman."

"Recollect, Miss Racksole, that this afternoon, here, I am not the Prince."

"You are Count Steenbock, is that it?"

He started. "For you only," he said, unconsciously lowering his voice. "Miss Racksole, I particularly wish that no one here should know that I was in Paris last Spring."

"An affair of State?" she smiled.

"An affair of State," he replied soberly. "Even Dimmock doesn't know. It was strange that we should be fellow guests at that quiet, out-of-the-way hotel—strange but delightful. I shall never forget that rainy afternoon that we spent together in the museum of the Trocadéro. Let us talk about that."

"About the rain, or the museum?"

"I shall never forget that afternoon," he repeated, ignoring the lightness of her question.

"Nor I," she murmured, corresponding with his mood.

"You, too, enjoyed it?" he said eagerly.

"The sculptures were magnificent," she replied, hastily glancing at the ceiling.

"Ah! So they were! Tell me, Miss Racksole, how did you discover my identity?"

"I must not say," she answered. "That is my secret. Do not seek to penetrate it. Who knows what horrors you might discover if you probed too far?" She laughed, but she laughed alone. The Prince remained pensive—as it were, brooding.

"I never hoped to see you again," he said.

"Why not?"

"One never sees again those whom one wishes to see."

"As for me, I was perfectly convinced that we should meet again."

"Why?"

"Because I always get what I want."

"Then you wanted to see me again?"

"Certainly. You interested me extremely. I have never met another man who could talk so well about sculpture as the Count Steenbock."

"Do you really always get what you want, Miss Racksole?"

"Of course."

"That is because your father is so rich, I suppose?"

"Oh, no, it isn't!" she said. "It's simply because I always do get what I want. It's got nothing to do with father at all."

"But Mr. Racksole is extremely wealthy?"

"Wealthy isn't the word, Count. There is no word. It's positively awful the amount of dollars poor papa makes. And the worst of it is he can't help it. He told me once that when a man made ten millions no power on earth could stop those ten millions from growing into twenty. And so it continues. I spend what I can, but I can't come near coping with it; and, of course, papa is no use whatever at spending."

"And you have no mother?"

"Who told you I had no mother?" she asked quickly.

"I—er—inquired about you," he said, with equal candour and humility.

"In spite of the fact that you never hoped to see me again?"

"Yes, in spite of that."

"How funny!" she said, and lapsed into a meditative silence.

"Yours must be a wonderful existence," said the Prince. "I envy you."

"You envy me—what? My father's wealth?"

"No," he said; "your freedom and your responsibilities."

"I have no responsibilities," she remarked.

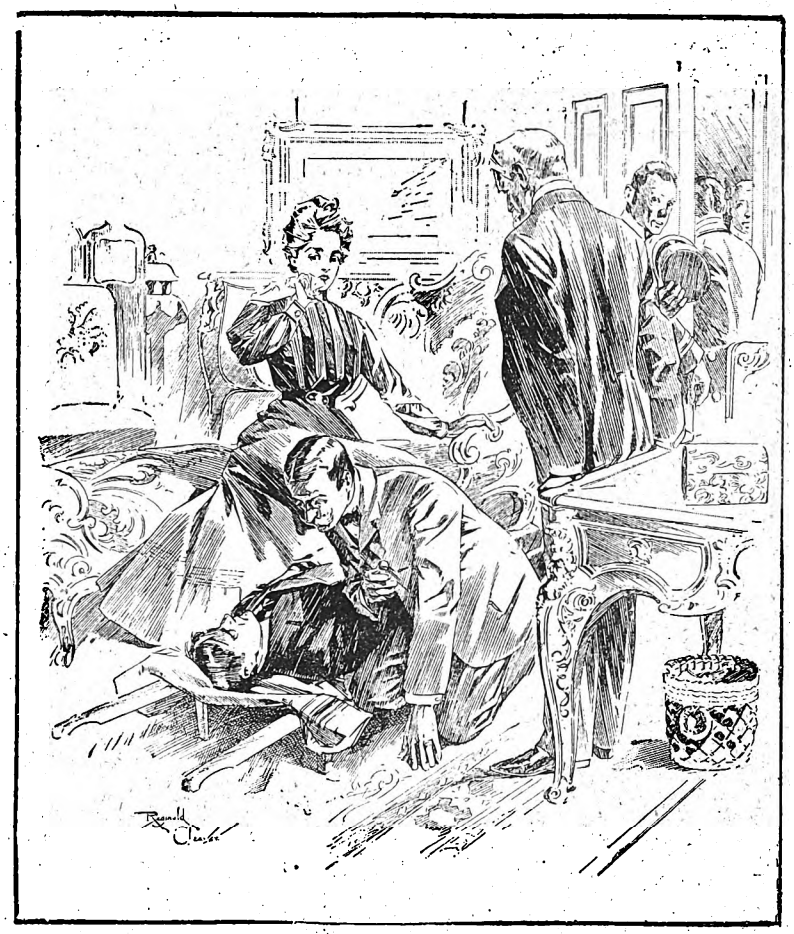
"Pardon me," he said; "you have, and the time is coming when you will feel them."

"I'm only a girl," she murmured with sudden simplicity. "As for you, Count, surely you have sufficient responsibilities of your own?"

"I?" he said sadly. "I have no responsibilities. I am a nobody—a Serene Highness who has to pretend to be very important, always taking immense care never to do anything that a Serene Highness ought not to do. Bah!"

"But if your nephew, Prince Eugen, were to die, would you not come to the throne, and would you not then have these responsibilities which you so much desire?"

"Eugen die?" said Prince Aribert, in a curious tone



"Dimmock—dead!"

Digitized by Google

"Impossible. He is the perfection of health. In three months he will be married. No, I shall never be anything but a Serene Highness, the most despicable of God's creatures."

"But what about the State secret which you mentioned? Is not that a responsibility?"

"Ah!" he said. "That is over. That belongs to the past. It was an accident in my dull career. I shall never be Count Steenbock again."

"Who knows?" she said. "By the way, is not Prince Eugen coming here to-day? Mr. Dimmock told us so."

"See!" answered the Prince, standing up and bending over her. "I am going to confide in you. I don't know why, but I am."

"Don't betray State secrets," she warned him, smiling into his face.

But just then the door of the room was unceremoniously opened.

"Go right in," said a voice sharply. It was Theodore Racksole's.

Two men entered, bearing a prone form on a stretcher, and Racksole followed them. Nella sprang up. Racksole stared to see his daughter.

"I didn't know you were in here, Nell. Here," to the two men, "out again."

"Why!" exclaimed Nella, gazing fearfully at the form on the stretcher, "it's Mr. Dimmock!"

"It is," her father acquiesced. "He's dead," he added laconically. "I'd have broken it to you more gently had I known. Your pardon, Prince." There was a pause.

"Dimmock dead!" Prince Aribert whispered under his breath, and he knelt down by the side of the stretcher. "What does this mean?"

"The poor fellow was just walking across the quadrangle towards the portico when he fell down. A commissionaire who saw him says he was walking very quickly. At first I thought it was sunstroke, but it couldn't have been, though the weather certainly is rather warm. It must be heart disease. But anyhow, he's dead. We did what we could. I've sent for a doctor, and for the police. I suppose there'll have to be an inquest."

The millionaire pays an early morning visit to the kitchen.

Theodore Racksole stopped, and in an awkward solemn silence they all gazed at the dead youth. His features were slightly drawn and his eyes closed; that was all. He might have been asleep.

"My poor Dimmock!" exclaimed the Prince, his voice broken. "And I was angry because the lad did not meet me at Charing Cross!"

"Are you sure he is dead, father?" Nella said.

"You'd better go away, Nella," was Racksole's only reply; but the girl stood still, and began to sob quietly. On the previous night she had secretly made fun of Reginald Dimmock. She had deliberately set herself to get information from him on a topic in which she happened to be specially interested and she had got it, laughing the while at his youthful crudities—his vanity, his transparent cunning, his absurd airs. She had not liked him; she had even distrusted him, and decided that he was not "nice." But now, as he lay on the stretcher, these things were forgotten. She went so far as to reproach herself for them. Such is the strange commanding power of death.

"Oblige me by taking the poor fellow to my apartments," said the Prince, with a gesture to the attendants. "Surely it is time the doctor came." Racksole felt suddenly at that moment he was nothing but a mere hotel proprietor with an awkward affair on his hands. For a fraction of a second he wished he had never bought the Grand Babylon.

A quarter of an hour later Prince Aribert, Theodore Racksole, and a doctor, and an inspector of police were in the Prince's reception-room. They had just come from an antechamber, in which lay the mortal remains of Reginald Dimmock.

"Well?" said Racksole, glancing at the doctor.

The doctor was a big, boyish-looking man, with keen, quizzical eyes.

"It is not heart disease," said the doctor.

"Not heart disease?"

"No."

"Then what is it?" asked the Prince.

"I may be able to answer that question after the post-mortem," said the doctor. "I certainly can't answer it now The symptoms are unusual to a degree."

The inspector of police began to write in a note-book.

SIXTH CHAPTER.

In the Gold Room.

At the Grand Babylon a great ball was given that night in the Gold Room, a huge saloon attached to the hotel, though scarcely part of it, and certainly less exclusive than the hotel itself. Theodore Racksole knew nothing of the affair, except that it was an entertainment offered by a Mr. and Mrs. Sampson Levi to their friends. Who Mr. and Mrs. Sampson Levi were he did not know, nor could anyone tell him anything about them except that Mr. Sampson Levi was a prominent member of that part of the Stock Exchange familiarly called the Kaffir Circus, and that his wife was a stout lady with an aquiline nose and many diamonds, and that they were very rich and very hospitable. Theodore Racksole did not want a ball in his hotel that evening, but the arrangements for it had gone too far, so the ball went forward.

The Gold Room of the Grand Babylon was built for a ball-room. A balcony, supported by arches faced with gilt and lapis-lazuli ran round it, and from this vantage men and maidens and chaperons who could not or would not dance might survey the scene. Everyone knew this, and most people took advantage of it. What everyone did not know—what no one knew—was that higher up than the balcony there was a little barred window in the end wall from which the hotel authorities might keep a watchful eye, not only on the dancers, but also on the occupants of the balcony itself.

Digitized by Google

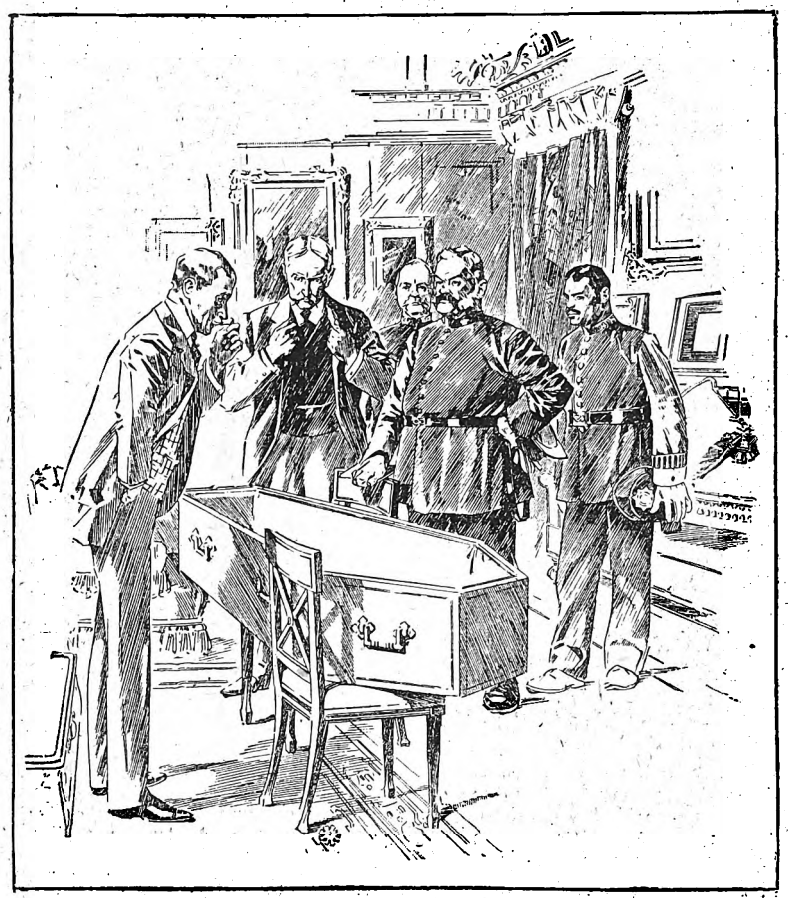
It may seem incredible to the uninitiated that the guests at any social gathering held in so gorgeous and renowned an apartment as the Gold Room of the Grand Babylon should need the observation of a watchful eye. Yet so it was. Strange matters and unexpected faces had been descried from that little window, and more than one European detective had kept vigil there with the most eminently satisfactory results.

At eleven o'clock Theodore Racksole, afflicted by vexation of spirits, found himself gazing idly through the little barred window. Nella was with him. Together they had been wandering about the corridors of the hotel, still strange to them both, and it was quite by accident that they had lighted upon the small room which had a surreptitious view of Mr. and Mrs. Sampson Levi's ball. Except for the light of the chandelier of the ballroom the little cubicle was in darkness. Nella was looking through the window; her father stood behind.

"I wonder which is Mrs. Sampson Levi," Nella said, "and whether she matches her name. Wouldn't you love to have a name like that, father—something that people could take hold of—instead of Racksole?"

The sound of violins and a confused murmur of voices rose gently up to them.

"Umph!" said Theodore. "Confound those evening papers!" he added, inconsequently but with sincerity.



The coffin was empty. Dimmock's body had disappeared!

"Father, you're very horrid to-night. What have the evening papers been doing?"

"Well, my young lady, they've got me in for one, and you for another; and they're manufacturing mysteries like fun. It's young Dimmock's death that has started 'em. It'll be all over New York to-morrow morning, too. The worst of it is that Babylon has gone off to Switzerland."

"Why?"

"Don't know. Sudden fancy, I guess, for his native heath."

"What difference does it make to you?"

"None. Only I feel sort of lonesome. I feel I want some one to lean up against in running this hotel."

"Father, if you have that feeling you must be getting ill."

"Yes," he sighed, "I admit it's unusual with me. But perhaps you haven't grasped the fact, Nella, that we're in the middle of a rather queer business"

"You mean about poor Mr. Dimmock?"

"Partly Dimmock and partly other things. First of all, that Miss Spencer, or whatever her wretched name is, mysteriously disappears. Then there was the stone thrown into your bedroom. Then I caught that rascal Jules conspiring with Dimmock at three o'clock in the morning. Then your precious Prince Aribert arrives without any suite—which I believe is a most peculiar and wicked thing for a Prince to do—and moreover I find my daughter on very intimate terms with the said Prince. Then young Dimmock goes and dies, and there is to be an inquest; then Prince Eugen and his suite, who were expected here for dinner, fail to turn up at all——"

"Prince Eugen has not come?"

"He has not; and Uncle Aribert is in a terrible stew about him, and telegraphing all over Europe. Altogether, things are working up pretty lively."

"Do you really think, dad, there was anything between Jules and poor Mr. Dimmock?"

"Think! I know! I tell you I saw that scamp give Dimmock a wink last night at dinner that might have meant—well!"

"So you caught that wink, did you, dad?"

"Why? Did you?"

"Of course, dad. I was going to tell you about it."

The millionaire grunted.

"Look here, father," Nella whispered suddenly, and pointed to the balcony immediately below them. "Who's that?" She indicated a man with a bald patch on the back of his head, who was propping himself up against the railing of the balcony and gazing steadily into the ball-room.

"Well, who is it?"

"Isn't it Jules?"

"Gemini! By the beard of the prophet, it is!"

"Perhaps Mr. Jules is a guest of Mrs. Sampson Levi."

"Guest or no guest, he goes out of this hotel, even if I have to throw him out myself."

Theodore Racksole disappeared without another word, and Nella followed him. But when the millionaire arrived on the balcony floor he could see nothing of Jules, neither there nor in the ball-room itself. Saying no word aloud, but quietly whispering wicked expletives, he searched everywhere in vain, and then, at last, by tortuous stairways and corridors returned to his original post of observation that he might survey the place anew from that vantage ground. To his surprise he found a man in the dark little room, watching the scene of the ball as intently as he himself had been doing a few minutes before. Hearing footsteps, the man turned with a start.

Digitized by Google

It was Jules.

The two exchanged glances in the half light for a second.

"Good evening, Mr. Racksole," said Jules calmly. "I must apologise for being here."

"Force of habit, I suppose," said Theodore Racksole drily.

"Just so, sir."

"I fancied I had forbidden you to re-enter this hotel?"

"I thought your order applied only to my professional capacity. I am here to-night as the guest of Mr. and Mrs. Sampson Levi."

"In your new rôle of man-about-town, eh?"

"Exactly."

"But I don't allow men-about-town up here, my friend."

"For being up here I have already apologised."

"Then, having apologised, you had better depart; that is my disinterested advice to you."

"Good-night, sir."

"And, I say, Mr. Jules, if Mr. and Mrs. Sampson Levi, or any other Hebrews or Christians, should invite you again to my hotel you will oblige me by declining the invitation. You'll find that will be the safest course for you. I hope you fully understand me. Good-night."

"Good-night, sir."

Before midnight struck Theodore Racksole had ascertained that the invitation list of Mr. and Mrs. Sampson Levi, though a somewhat lengthy one, contained no reference to any such person as Jules.

He sat up very late. To be precise, he sat up all night. He was a man who, by dint of training, could comfortably dispense with sleep when he felt so inclined, or when circumstances made such a course advisable. He walked to and fro in his room, and cogitated as few people besides Theodore Racksole could cogitate. At 6 a.m. he took a stroll round the business part of his premises, and watched the supplies come in from Covent Garden, from Smithfield, from Billingsgate, and from other strange places. He found the proceedings of the kitchen department quite interesting, and made mental notes of things that he would have altered, of men whose wages he would increase and men whose wages he would reduce. At 7 a.m. he happened to be standing near the luggage lift, and witnessed the descent of vast quantities of luggage, and its disappearance into a Carter Paterson van.

"Whose luggage is that?" he inquired peremptorily.

The luggage clerk, with an aggrieved expression, explained to him that it was the luggage of nobody in particular, that it belonged to various guests, and was bound for various destinations; that it was, in fact, "expressed" luggage dispatched in advance, and that a similar quantity of it left the hotel every morning about that hour.

Theodore Racksole walked away, and breakfasted upon one cup of tea and half a slice of toast.

The above is a reduced facsimile of the picture which will be printed in colours on the cover of next week's Short Stories. It illustrates how Nella sees something very suspicious in the demeanour of the old lady at the table, and, watching her, notices her take a pellet of paper from the tart she is eating. Nella immediately decides on her course of action.

At ten o'clock he was informed that the inspector of police desired to see him. The inspector had come, he said, to superintend the removal of the body of Reginald Dimmock to the mortuary adjoining the place of inquest, and a suitable vehicle waited at the back entrance of the hotel.

The inspector had also brought subpœnas for himself and Prince Aribert of Posen and the commissionaire to attend the inquest.

"I thought Mr. Dimmock's remains were removed last night," said Racksole wearily.

"No, sir. The fact is the van was engaged on another job."

The inspector went away to perform his duties.

In a few minutes a message came from him requesting Mr. Racksole to be good enough to come to him on the first floor. Racksole went. In the ante-room, where the body of Reginald Dimmock had originally been placed, were the inspector and Prince Aribert, and two policemen.

"Well?" said Racksole, after he and the Prince had exchanged bows. Then he saw a coffin laid across two chairs. "I see a coffin has been obtained," he remarked. "But it's empty."

"Just so," said the inspector. "The body of the deceased has disappeared. And his Serene Highness Prince Aribert informs me that though he has occupied a room immediately opposite, on the other side of the corridor, he can throw no light on the affair."

"Indeed, I cannot!" said the Prince, deeply distressed.

"Well, this licks creation," murmured Racksole.

(Another long instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

WHITE LILACS.

Telling the Influence They Had on a Man's Life.

"WHO is he?"

Mrs. Allingham held the snowy card lightly in her jewelled hand. The bit of dainty pasteboard read: "Keith Montrose."

Her daughter Genevieve turned from the mirror where she was arranging her magnificent hair.

"Why, it's one of Alec's friends! It must be Colonel Montrose, whom he met at Baden."

Mrs. Allingham swept back her satin cap-strings.

"I've no doubt it is. Dear me, where's my handkerchief? He must bring news from Alec—oh, I hope nothing has happened!"

Vieve looped up a curl.

"If he's nice, mamma, send up for me."

Mrs. Allingham bustled away.

It is just possible that when Colonel Keith Montrose saw this fat, over-dressed, bustling woman, he wondered whence the handsome student, Alec Allingham, derived his grace and refinement. But when Vieve—in response to her mother's summons—appeared, he might have wondered still more at the family beauty. Vieve turned her lustrous orbs full upon the handsomest man she had ever seen, and immediately began planning how to capture him.

The Colonel was just home—had seen young Allingham six weeks before. He had promised to make reports of his prosperity to his mother.

"You will stay and dine with us, Colonel?" purred Mrs. Allingham.

Vieve lifted her white lids alluringly.

"I shall be very happy to," said the Colonel.

Neither at Baden nor at Paris had he seen such hair and eyes.

Dinner was late. The Colonel and Vieve walked out on the long verandah in the Spring sunshine. The Colonel could not keep his eyes from the coils of raven hair against the ivory neck, and the curve of her ripe lips as she stood beside him smiling.

"You are Alec's only sister, Miss Allingham?"

"Oh, no—there is Henry."

There was no explanation of this ambiguous reply, for a ringing voice broke out, singing:

"Thy blue bonnet, when thou came hither,
Could scarce keep out the wind and weather,
But now it has turned to a hat and feather—
Thy bonnet has blown, whither, oh, whither?"

The ringing young voice carolled on.

Vieve rose, mortified and angry.

"Shall we go in, Colonel? The sun is rather warm."

The Colonel rose instantly, but made a feint of examining a flower at the door while he listened again.

"Thy sword at thy back was a great black blade,
With a basket-hilt of iron made,
And now a long rapier doth hang at thy side,
And huffingly doth this bonny Scot ride!"

The last line was given with an indescribable emphasis. In spite of himself the Colonel laughed. Vieve's cheeks were crimson.

"She is only a child, Colonel, and in spite of all mamma can do, she is very noisy."

"Your sister?"

"Yes; it is Henriette."

The next moment they went down to dinner. Mr. Allingham was in town. The guest sat down with the ladies.

At first there was only Miss Allingham and her mother, but half through the first course the door swung open, and a tall girl, with black hair falling over her shoulders, wearing a crimson dress, and bearing a branch of white lilacs in her hand, nonchalantly entered the room. Vieve glanced apprehensively at her mother.

"Henriette," warningly, "are you quite ready for dinner?"

No answer. The branch went rustling upon a table. A little velvet hat, with a white plume of the fragrant blossoms went after it.

"I don't want any dinner."

"Why, my dear?"

"Shay is dead!"—with a tumultuous sob. A door slammed and the girl with the unconquerable spirit was gone.

"Oh, dear!" sighed Mrs. Allingham, as though words would not express her feelings.

"I wish all her dogs were dead!" said Vieve, charitably.

"If it were not dogs, it would be something worse. No one can tell what I suffer with that child."

"The black sheep!" thought the colonel, full of pity for the quivering lips he had caught sight of. The girl was, perhaps, fifteen years old. She had splendid eyes, like Vieve, but the expression of her face was totally different.

It was a face that haunted Colonel Montrose. The forehead under the jetty tresses had a splendid breadth. The eyes were full of passion, yet the pale cheek had a strangely chastened look for a child.

But Henry did not appear again, much to her sister's relief, and before sunset the Colonel took his departure. He went down the garden-path, Vieve's tones honey-sweet in his mind; but just beyond the garden, at the edge of the avenue, the breath of fresh lilacs bathed his face, and the sound of passionate sobbing smote his ear.

After listening a moment he turned aside from the path, and below the garden wall, beneath a thicket of lilacs in bloom, he caught sight of a crimson dress. He gazed until he made out, in the gloom, a little brown hand, a prostrate figure, and a head of hair. For a moment he was at a loss what to do. Then he went forward slowly, his step falling softly in the grass. The sobs were growing only heavier. He discovered a little mound, and saw how it was—the child was weeping over Shay's grave.

"My child," he said gently, "is it right to grieve so for a dog?"

The girl looked up.

"He was only a dog, but he was all I had to love me," she said.

The Colonel sat down upon a stone.

Digitized by Google

"Will you tell me about him?"

"Do you really care?" said the girl.

She looked at him wistfully.

"Yes," he said, gravely.

"He knew so much!" said poor Henry. "Once, when I was alone in the woods, I fell into the lake, and he plunged in and pulled me out; and when I came to my senses, I was lying on the bank, and he was lapping my face. I walked home in my wet clothes, two miles, and was ill for a month with fever. I did not dare tell mamma how it happened, for fear she would scold me; but all the time Shay lay on a mat by the bed, and would not leave me, though they whipped him to drive him out. He was a St. Bernard—so handsome! He was so good—so good! And he always loved me!" And Henry's locks went down upon the fresh mound in another paroxysm of grief.

"If I might send you another," ventured the Colonel. "The St. Bernards are always brave and affectionate. He would soon get attached to you."

"No, no!" cried Henry. "You are very good. But I don't want another dog; they always die. Rose, Shay's mother, died, and—and everything that loves me dies!" and the child shook with her sobs.

Words had no effect. She would not be comforted, and at last Colonel Montrose rose and went on his way, wondering, and yet touched to the heart. And for years he never inhaled the odour of white lilacs without recalling the girl whom he had so vainly tried to console under their shadow—the odd, wild girl, who sang rollicking songs, and roamed in the woods, and would not be conventional.

* * * * *

The splendid seaside Pavilion was crowded with guests. Aristocracy had, at last, found a suitable place in which it could worship Nature—everything at the Pavilion was smoothed and cultivated and gilded to perfection. And here millionaires lolled in the sea-breezes, and swung down to the front in their carriages, and found the beach delightful.

It was quite late in the summer when a party of cavalry officers rode out from the town and arrived at the Pavilion on the day previous to a grand ball. The horses curvetted and pulled hard at their silver bits, and the riders doffed their military caps right and left to the smiling ladies upon the beach.

"General Montrose is the handsomest man in the service!" they averred.

The General and his suite met with a universal welcome. Cavalry officers are treasures in a ball-room. Already there was a great fluttering among the ladies.

"The General has blue eyes, and I know he prefers brunettes. I shall wear my pink crêpe," said Hallie Lee.

"What you wear will hardly matter," said her mother discontentedly. "You forget Miss Allingham."

Miss Hallie pulled her curls and pouted.

But the General was not a dancing man. When the waltzers tripped their lightest, and the music rang its sweetest he stood quietly talking with a knot of gentlemen.

"Have you seen our belle, General?" asked one of them.

"I have seen many beautiful ladies, Bromley, but I have not been told who bears off the palm."

"Then you have not seen Miss Allingham. I never saw such a woman off canvas."

"Is she present?"

"Yes, at the further end of the room—wearing a dress of white silk. We cannot see her face here. Shall we go that way?"

But half way across the hall General Montrose started and turned aside. He had met Henry Allingham's eyes.

He hardly knew why he avoided her—why he was conscious of a great confusion and pain. But, Heavens, how beautiful she was—far more so than Vieve had ever been. Vieve, who had married a poverty-stricken German baron, and had gone to Dresden.

It was not till late in the evening that he found himself in the vicinity of the brilliant belle. He had found Alec Allingham. It was the brother who presented him—and the beautiful Henry uttered a few silvery words, and then seemed to forget his existence.

"Spoilt," he muttered, bitterly, and turned coldly away.

It was not until then that he knew how he had held his memory of this girl as an assurance of the hearts of women.

"Now that she can make fools of men, she will not cry for a dog," he said cynically. "Well, I will never marry. I am too world-wise and heart-weary to value mere beauty in women. My life is more than half gone. Let the rest go quickly."

* * * * *

It was early morning—he was pacing the sands. One of the hotel boats, marked Pavilion, was floating at its moorings. He entered it, and rowed away.

The bay was smooth as glass. Far away in the shining water he saw a black object; for want of a better goal, he pulled towards it.

It was a low line of rocks covered with shells and seaweed. He moored his boat and sprang upon them, gathering a handful of the rosy shells, and tearing a strange sea-moss from a cleft. The sky was shining with the faint gold of the rising sun; the sea-birds screamed around him.

Suddenly he saw the boat, the only one in sight, drifting far out of his reach. It had not been securely moored, and had quickly yielded to the press of the water. The tide was coming in, and the boat was drifting to land.

"An absurd situation," he muttered.

He thought that was all, at first. Then he perceived that the rocks were below high-water mark, and the feeling of annoyance changed to one of horror. For he could not swim.

He measured his distance from the shore. It was so great that he could not make out the figures which he knew must, at that hour, be moving about the beach, and it was utterly unlikely that they would discover his situation.

He was to drown, then. He smiled, with pale lips.

The water had risen to his knees, when he heard a call:

"Courage!"

Then he heard the dip of oars; next, saw their flash, as a boat, bearing a cargo of lilacs, and rowed by a slight girlish figure, glided up to him. He stepped in, and sank down with a white cheek, saved from death.

For several moments he did not know his preserver. Half an hour's waiting for death had unnerved and weakened the man. But suddenly he felt to whom belonged the great eager eyes, so dark, so lustrous, fixed upon him.

"You are ill," said Miss Allingham. "Be patient; I shall row as fast as I can. The storm is growing very fast."

She pulled deftly. The boat shot ahead. There was a lilac bloom, white and fragrant, in her little velvet hat, a splendid glow upon her cheeks.

"I had been two miles up the shore to an old garden, for my favourite flower, when I met a boat of the Pavilion. I feared something was wrong, and so I kept on the alert until I discovered you. How fast the storm is coming!"

"Yes; it will overtake us. You should have saved yourself, and left me to my fate."

The boat was tossing like a cockle-shell, yet she showed no fear, only lifted her eyes to his face, at those hard words—so bitter, unnatural, ungrateful—with a pathetic reproach. Those eyes set his heart on fire; his lips and cheeks grew red with passion.

At that moment an oar broke. Henry uttered a cry.

"Let it go!" he cried hoarsely. "We will die together."

"No," she answered. "I mean to live. Can you scull?"

"Forgive me!" he exclaimed. "I am a brute."

He took the remaining oar from her hand. She smiled gloriously in his face.

"Beauty," he said, "why did you risk yourself to save me? What was I to you?"

"You were more than life to me," she answered. "It was for your love that I gave up my hoyden ways, and strove to grow wise and womanly. I think that you like me a little. Now—now," with a little arch smile, "will you scull to land?"

And while the white lilacs were yet in bloom, they were married.

Florence Martin.

Digitized by Google

The Last Coupon will Appear Next Week.

£25 IN CASH PRIZES!

1st Prize, £10. 2nd Prize, £5. 3rd Prize, £2.

And Eight Cash Prizes of £1 each.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find six signatures. Each of these signatures is the ordinary signature of the person to whom it belongs. The writing is not assumed for the occasion; it is just the way in which each of the persons signs his name to letters or to cheques. The first four sets of signatures have already appeared, and the numbers containing them can be had from any newsvendor, or from this office for 1½d. each post free.

What you have to do is to print in the space opposite each signature the name (initials, Christian name and surname) which you think it to be. No one but the Editor possesses the correct names of all the signatures shown. If you are in doubt as to the correct rendering of any signature or signatures ask some of your friends. When you have filled up the coupon to the best of your ability, cut it out and keep it by you, with the other coupons, until you see an announcement in SHORT STORIES telling you to send them in, together with the coupons which will appear in SHORT STORIES.

CONDITIONS.

(1) The name must be clearly printed in ink opposite each signature.
(2) Only one name is allowed in each space.
(3) No alterations are allowed in the words.
(4) When you have filled up your coupon, cut it out and keep it by you, together with the coupons which have appeared and will appear in SHORT STORIES.
(5) Each competitor may send only one set of coupons, but all the members of one household may compete. Each set will be accepted independently.
(6) In all cases the Editor's decision is final, and competitors may only enter on this condition.

COUPON No. 5.

No. 24.
No. 25
No. 26.
No. 27.
No. 28.
No. 29.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

Digitized by Google

My Ward's Conquest.

Telling How a Young and Beautiful Girl Captured a Whole Family.

WHILE sitting in my library one morning in July, I received a letter from the executors of the will of one Harold Marsden, informing me of the fact that the aforesaid Harold Marsden was dead, leaving a daughter and a large fortune, and—could my eyes deceive me?—I was appointed guardian of the daughter of the deceased.

Now to me, a man of forty years, who had travelled all my life, and seen enough of the fair sex to totally disgust me, this was anything but pleasant news. I had never seen this daughter of my college friend Harold; but I had heard rumours of a great beauty and flirt, and to have the young lady thrown at my head in this manner was anything but agreeable.

As I sat frowning and wondering how to get out of this difficulty, my good sister Mehitable, who kept house for me at my pretty country home, Grey Gables, entered.

"Why, Willis, you look troubled! What is the matter?"

And as I had always done from childhood, I straightway poured my troubles into the sympathetic ears of Mehitable.

"Why, that is news; but we must make the best of it."

"Well, what am I to do?"

"Do? Why, you are to write the poor child, and invite her here at once. Where is she?"

"The letter says she is at school."

"Of course, she is waiting to hear from you; and as I now have my flowers to attend to, I will leave you, and when I return I do not want to see that frown. This ward may prove a blessing instead of a calamity."

And so the letter was duly written and posted to Miss Muriel Marsden—the name was not bad, and I found myself repeating it, and wondering what sort of a girl this new ward of mine was.

At last I received a letter in a delicate, girlish hand, thanking me for my invitation, and stating that the writer would be with us on Thursday at 5 p.m., and this was Tuesday.

A letter from my scapegrace brother Jack, stated that he would be home from college Wednesday morning. I laid both letters down with a sigh. No more peace for me now, with a grown ward and my mischievous brother Jack in the house. Thursday arrived only too soon for me, and with it a telegram calling me to Narfield, a small town eight miles away.

"I will be back by the three o'clock train, in time to meet Miss Marsden, when she comes," I said to Mehitable; "and if I should not happen to get there, send Jack."

I could not finish my business as soon as I expected, and so had to go by the very train I expected my ward. As I took my seat facing two young ladies, I heard a bell-like voice exclaim:

"Oh, won't I lead him a life of it!"

And the older lady said to her companion:

"Well, you are capable of it."

Something in the smooth, clear voice reminded me of the letter I received on Tuesday, and I listened intently to try to catch more of the conversation.

"How old is he?" presently asked the old lady.

"Oh, about forty—a regular old fogey, and hates women."

"Well, you have the power to make him change his mind on that subject, if anyone has."

The other shrugged her shoulders in a manner unmistakably Frenchy, and laughed.

"Oh, I'll lead him a dance! I hear he has a younger brother."

"Muriel, you are a dreadful flirt."

"Now, Grace, do not scold; but here is Lakeville. Now to beard the lion in his den; the——"

I waited to hear no more, but hurrying from the station, rushed through the woods by a path that led to Grey Gables. Muriel! I knew it! And so this small, giddy creature was my ward, was to make my house her home hereafter, and had already designs on Jack.

Now, I liked a stately, dignified woman; but these giddy laughing butterflies—bah! I hated them. My conscience began to prick me for not honourably making myself known. But, pshaw! Jack was there, no doubt, and I could not endure a ride all the way to Grey Gables with that designing little creature.

As I neared the drawing-room windows, I heard a merry peal of laughter in a voice already hateful to me, and instead of going in to welcome her, I stole up to my rooms to dress for dinner. While dressing, I occasionally heard that ringing laugh. So she was one of these nuisances who laugh incessantly—how was I to bear it?

At last the dinner-bell rang, and as I looked in the glass I thought what a well-preserved man I was—no one would take me to be a day over thirty. So I mustered up courage, and walked down to the drawing-room.

The family had assembled; Mehitable, in her quiet, black gown, sat by the window knitting; Jack was leaning over a red easy-chair, in his usual graceful manner; and in the chair sat the small being I had already begun to hate. She was looking at Jack, and laughing at some remark he had just made.

As she heard the door she glanced up, and, seeing me, came quickly across the floor with a graceful, gliding movement, that reminded me of a snake, saying:

"I know this is my new guardian, so shall not wait for an introduction"—at the same time offering me her cool, little hand.

As I said some stiff words of welcome, I gazed at the most beautiful creature I had ever seen.

The dimpled, peach-bloom face, rosebud mouth, perfect teeth, and, above all, a pair of wonderfully-beautiful, brown eyes, as soft and pleading as a fawn's, all this framed in the fluffy golden hair, made a most beautiful picture.

Digitized by Google

She had changed her grey travelling dress for one of some soft, white clinging material, and a bunch of crimson roses gleamed bright and warm on her breast. But as I looked at the figure standing before me, the pleading look in the brown eyes only seemed to say "treachery," and my stiff, conventional greeting was hardly one in which to welcome a stranger.

In an instant the little figure was drawn proudly erect, and the eyes that a moment before were so soft and beautifully brown, flashed steely grey into mine; and deliberately turning her back to me, she walked to the window, and commenced talking to Mehitable.

At the dinner-table she was as bright and gay as ever, addressing all her remarks to Jack and Mehitable, never once looking at me. As we rose from the table, Mehitable said:

"Willis, perhaps Muriel would like to walk through the garden—we have some beautiful roses, dear."

I could see at once that Mehitable was completely captivated by the girl, and I waited anxiously for her answer.

"Oh, I would not trouble Mr. Craig. Jack will show me the roses, will you not?"

And so she called him Jack already. I groaned inwardly as I watched the two saunter down the garden path. Mehitable turned to me with her sweet smile, saying:

"Is she not lovely?"

"I have not noticed anything particularly lovely about her," was my cool answer.

"Now, Willis!"—and Mehitable's hand was laid approvingly on my arm. "After seeing her, will you persist in this insane dislike? She is a sweet, lovable child—a little wayward, perhaps, but you only know that from what you have heard."

"I detest flirts."

"You do not know she is a flirt."

"Well, enough said, Mehitable; the fact that she was thrust on me in this manner is very disagreeable," and, turning wearily, I left the room.

And so it went on, day after day, and week after week; it seemed as if the girl had bewitched them all; she called Mehitable "Auntie," and caressed her in that clinging manner I called "snaky." She and Jack were inseparable, and as for her behaviour to me, she showed her dislike in every word and look. She had not only captivated Mehitable and Jack, but everyone in the little village in which we lived seemed to worship her; I alone detested her. I could see only her utter heartlessness and fickleness.

At last a new actor appeared on the scene, in one Gerald Hastings, who, it appeared, had been an old lover of Muriel's. But the girl played with him, as she did with all others—one day all smiles and as gracious as a queen, the next cold, chilling, and indifferent. I at once took a great liking to Gerald Hastings, and invited him to Grey Gables. He accepted my invitation; and I plainly saw his passionate love for Muriel.

"What a capital thing it would be," thought I, "if I could marry her off to Hastings; he loves her devotedly." My conscience sometimes pricked me, as I wondered if I was doing exactly right by the daughter of my old friend, but I would ease it by saying: "Pshaw! what made him bring her up in that manner?"

One day Gerald came to my library, asking the hand of my ward in marriage. He said she had refused him twice, but he could not give her up. I promised to do all I could for him, and went to bed, resolving to speak to Muriel about it.

The next morning, at the breakfast table, Jack said: "Have you heard the news?" Of course we were all anxious to hear it, and he continued:

"Old Mrs. Raynor's son was run over last night and nearly killed. He is not dead yet, but cannot last long; and I heard they had hardly a mouthful to eat."

We were all expressing sympathy and regret, when Muriel said, with that shrug of the shoulders I hated so:

"Oh, do not talk about such horrid things; they cannot hear you expressing your sympathy, and they would not appreciate it if they did; that kind of people never does."

I looked at her in amazement. What kind of a woman was she to talk so heartlessly of her fellow creatures? The talk drifted in other channels, and as we rose from the table, I said:

"May I see you in the library in the course of an hour, Miss Marsden?"

She looked at me in surprise, and then said indifferently:

"If you wish it."

I went to the library, and sat thinking what a beautiful woman she was, but how heartless and cruel. How I wished I could marry her off. My thoughts were interrupted by the frou-frou of skirts, a tap at the door, and she stood before me, looking as haughtily at me as a queen might look on her lowliest subject.

"You wish to see me?"

"Yes; be seated."

"I prefer to stand."

"Very well—Mr. Hastings last night asked your hand in marriage."

At the mention of his name a look of disdain came on her face, as she said:

"And so he has appealed to you, has he? What did you tell him?"

"Miss Marsden, as your guardian, I am bound to look after your welfare, to a certain extent. You can never find a better man than Gerald Hastings, or one more passionately in love with you; besides that, he is wealthy, handsome, has pleasing manners, and I wish you to marry him."

"You wish me to marry him! I would not marry him, for that reason alone, even if I loved him—but I detest him, therefore shall not marry him."

She gathered her skirts in one little jewelled hand and prepared to leave the room.

"Stop! I wish you to remain here and think this matter over carefully."

"Sorry to displease you, but I have an engagement; and besides, I never think; it is too tiresome." Bowing gaily, she tripped down the hall, whistling: "Good-bye, my lover, good-bye!"

I smothered an oath. So that was the way I was to be treated, in my own house, by a chit of a girl. I should never stand it. Walking to the window, I saw her on the lawn, engaged in a skirmish with Jack, over a book. At last, she threw it at him, and turning, ran into the house. Such antics were disgusting to me, and I determined to find Mehitable, and have a talk with her about it.

I entered the dining-room, and at first thought it was empty, but a second glance revealed a little figure, curled up in an easy-chair, before the fire, which we always kept lighted in the autumn, reading. It was Muriel. Jack came in after me, and, approaching Muriel, said:

"I say, Muriel, I am awfully sorry, but I have got to go to Harsgreen to-morrow, and we cannot have our ride."

"I am sorry, too, Jack; as, in that case, I shall have to ride alone."

"What horse will you take?"

"Black Beauty."

Digitized by Google

"But, Muriel, I hate to have you take her when you go alone; she is dangerous."

"Oh, I can manage her. I shall not ride any other."

"Then you cannot go," said I.

"Indeed, and why not."

"Because Black Beauty is no fit horse for you, and I do not want you to take her."

"Well, I intend to go, and I shall ride Black Beauty, so what are you going to do about it? Come, Jack, I am going for a walk," and, taking her hat, she left the room, followed by Jack, while I proceeded to the stables, and ordered John on no account to saddle Black Beauty the following day, and then went to the house to do some writing.

As the dinner bell rang, Jack came in alone, saying Muriel had grown tired of him, and sent him back, while she finished her walk alone. I straightway dismissed her from my mind, as an unpleasant subject. My writing finished, about six o'clock I started to the post-office. As I neared the cottage of Mrs. Raynor, I thought of the poor woman and her son, and reproaching myself for not helping them, resolved to stop and see them on my way home. Suddenly the door was opened, and I heard a voice I knew only too well:

"Oh, that is all right, Mrs. Raynor, I am glad to help you. I will see that he has a more comfortable bed, and to-morrow will come again."

Could I believe my eyes? There stood Muriel, in all her bright beauty, and beside her Mrs. Raynor, thanking her, in a broken voice, for what she had done. They did not see me on account of the dusk, but as I walked on, my mind was in a very disturbed state. Was this the woman I had called heartless? Bah! It was only a new freak of hers, this trying to play "Lady Bountiful." I was detained at the post-office, therefore it was too late to stop at Mrs. Raynor's on my way back. As I neared my own door, I met Gerald Hastings, coming down the steps, with bag in hand.

"Good-bye, Mr. Craig," he said, offering his hand; "I have seen Muriel again, and it is all up with me."

"Why, Gerald, are you going?"

"Yes, but I thank you for what you have done for me. I cannot talk now, but will write you. Good-bye!"

Morning dawned, bright and clear, and as Muriel was not down to breakfast, I did not see my ward, but as I was sitting in the library, I heard the clatter of hoofs down the drive, and Muriel, radiantly beautiful, in her dark habit, mounted on Black Beauty, dashed past the window, and was out of sight before I could recover from my amazement. I called John, and wrathfully demanded what that meant.

"I could not help it, Mr. Willis," said the old man. "Miss Muriel ordered me to saddle the horse, and when I told her what you said, she went to work and saddled him herself, and I could not help it, sir, she would not stop."

"That will do."

No more writing for me now. I went out on the verandah and sat down. So my commands were to be regarded as lightly as air, and she was to go on hearing no master, but following the inclination of her own sweet will. My musings were interrupted by the appearance of little Susie Fielding, the daughter of an old shoemaker, who barely did enough work to keep the wolf from the door.

"Mr. Craig," she said, shyly, "is Miss Marsden in?"

"No, she is not. Anything I can do for you, Susie?"

"No, sir; she told me to come to-day and get my books."

"What books?"

"Oh, don't you know? She promised to get me some books and a dress, so I can go to school."

"When did she tell you this?"

"The last time she came to sing to father."

"Does she sing to your father?"

"Oh, yes, since his eyes got so bad he cannot read, Miss Marsden sings for him every day! Oh, sir, she is a perfect angel! We all love her—don't you?"

I evaded the embarrassing question, and asked:

"What else has this angel of yours been doing?"

"Oh, sir, she does everything! She bought a nice map for the school-house, and a chair for lame Willie Sanson, and she paid Mrs. Hammond's doctor's bill, and lots of other things, and everybody loves her. If I come to-night, do you suppose she will have my books?"

"I daresay."

"All right, I will come."

Surprise upon surprise, where would it end? And so this mischievous little flirt, whom I had termed heartless and cruel, and whom I had hated with all my heart, was really a good fairy, going round and helping the poor of the place in which I had lived all my life without even once realising their desolate condition. But why was she so wilful and haughty, always treating me with such supreme contempt? And then the thought arose, if I had been a little more gracious that first night, perhaps all would have been different. But her wild trick of the morning, I could not readily forgive that. What was that coming slowly up the hill? Farmer Brown in his waggon, with Black Beauty tied behind. Two steps took me to the gate, and, as he drew nearer, I saw Muriel lying on a feather bed in the bottom of the waggon. My heart gave a great leap, she looked so white and still. Was she dead? Just then, Farmer Brown, seeing me, called out:

"Mr. Craig! The little one got thrown, and wife said I had better bring her home, as you are nigher a doctor than we are."

"Where is she hurt?"

"Sprained her foot, I think. Now, if you'll help me, we'll get her in."

We carried her in and laid her on the sofa, while I summoned Mehitable to stay with her, and started for a doctor. Dr. Agnew came, and after cutting off the dainty French boot and examining her foot, he pronounced it a severe sprain, one that was liable to keep her in her room for weeks. And so wilful Muriel was punished, and I had no hand in it.

Two weeks had passed and I had not yet seen her, but Jack and Mehitable brought me favourable news of the invalid, and I never saw one of the villagers, but what her praises were rung in my ears, until I began to feel heartily ashamed of myself for acting as I had.

One morning I had gone to her door, but Mehitable brought me word that Muriel did not want to see me. After that I had not troubled her, until one day the doctor said Jack might carry her downstairs. Mehitable said she was wild with delight at the prospect of once again leaving her room. But, as luck would have it, Jack was called away on business, and, with great misgivings, I walked up to Muriel's room and knocked at the door. As she said "Come in," I entered. When she saw me, that look of dislike, I knew so well, crossed her face and she said:

"Oh, is it you?" and went on with the book she was reading. I walked to the sofa.

"Muriel, why did you not tell me?"

"Tell you what?"

"Tell me of the part you were playing as good fairy to our villagers."

"Why should I tell you anything? You took no interest in me or any of my doings."

"Muriel, forgive me! I confess I did wrong, but, little ward, I will explain it some time. Let bygones be bygones; shake hands and say we are friends."

Her little hand was laid in mine, and her brown eyes, full of unshed tears, looked gratefully at me, as she said:

"If you wish it."

"That will do," said I. "Now we are firm friends."

She laughed the wicked little laugh of old.

"You are strangely forgetting the duty of a friend; you have not even asked how I am feeling this bright morning."

"I know you are feeling well enough to go downstairs, and, as Jack is not here, I come to take his place, if you will trust yourself to me."

She looked at me from under her half-closed lids, saying slyly:

"Cruel guardians sometimes get rid of naughty wards by throwing them from their castle window when all attempts to marry them off have proved unsuccessful."

"Now, Muriel, I thought we were to forget the past."

Digitized by Google

"So we are, and to show you how completely I forget it, I will let you carry me down."

As I lifted the slender figure and gazed at her pale face, resting so confidently on my shoulder, an indefinable something stole over me, and I could not explain my feelings, so I carefully descended to the sitting-room, where we surprised Mehitable, who sat by the window, sewing. Muriel laughed as she saw Mehitable look at us in wonderment.

"Do not look as though you thought the heavens were about to fall about your ears, aunty. This stupid old guardian of mine has come to his senses; we have buried the hatchet."

After that Muriel and I were the best of friends. Every day I carried her to the sofa in the sitting-room, and every day I sat by her side, and read or listened while she talked of her dear papa. And, as time wore on, I grew more ill at ease, as I thought that Jack loved her, and she only looked on me as an elder brother. At last I could bear it no longer, and, one morning, as Jack and I were alone, I said:

"Jack, do you love Muriel?"

"Well, yes; who could be in the house with her and not love her?"

A great lump rose in my throat, and I thought what an old fool I was to fall so desperately in love with my ward.

"Does she know this?"

"Know what?"

"Of your love for her?"

He turned and looked at me, and then said:

"Oh, that is what you mean, is it? Well, see here, this is the girl I love in that way," and he drew from his pocket the photograph of a dark, gipsy-faced girl. How light my heart felt as I looked at that photograph, and how I blessed that little dark-haired beauty for stealing Jack's heart before he saw Muriel.

"But does she not love you?"

"She? No, she knows all about Bessie. Now, you old goose," Jack said, assuming a paternal manner, "don't you suppose I know how matters are going? Go ahead and win, my son, and I will give you my blessing."

So that settled it. All day I felt as though treading on air. But I could not make up my mind to see Muriel until next day. As I entered the sitting-room, bearing a big bunch of red roses, which I laid on the sofa by her, she said:

"Why have you not been to see me before? Just think, Jack had to carry me downstairs this morning, you truant."

"Well, I will try to make myself very entertaining. Now I have come to tell you a story."

"To tell me a story? All right, I am all attention."

I sat down by her and commenced:

"Once on a time, as the story-books have it, there was a cross old bachelor, who had travelled a great deal, and seen enough of women to thoroughly disgust him. One day, when he received a letter announcing the death of an old friend, he felt very sorry; but when he read further, and found that this friend had appointed him guardian to his daughter, his anger knew no bounds, and, like the unreasonable man he was, he made up his mind to dislike the poor little daughter, and make it as unpleasant for her as possible. The evening of her arrival he travelled in the same train and overheard a conversation between her and another lady that only increased his dislike.

"As time wore on, he felt harder than ever towards her, and, while sitting on the verandah one day, wondering how to punish her, he learnt from a little girl how kind she had been to the poor, doing all sorts of good deeds, and he saw she had only used that heartless tone and manner as a cloak to cover her good deeds. And as he was thinking of her, she was brought home, and he found his ward had been injured. Well, they grew firmer friends from day to day, but he wished to be something more than a friend to her, so deeply did he love her. He went to her and told her all about it. Can you tell me how she felt?"

I waited a moment for an answer, and then the little hand was slipped in mine, and the happiest moment of my life was when Muriel's brown eyes looked in mine, and her dear voice murmured: "I love you."

Duncan Rivers.

Your Attention, Please.

I HAVE a few words of good advice for you, and will claim your attention for a few moments. This is what I want to say to you especially — don't delay in starting to read "Phantom Shadows," the excellent new serial story that has just begun in this paper. You can commence it this week, for the summary will give you the gist of the first instalment. After you have read to the end of chapter six, which concludes this week's instalment, I am certain that you will look forward to the time when the next S. S. will be published, so that you will be able to continue with the story. Really, Mr. Arnold Bennett's best work is contained in "Phantom Shadows," which is going to prove one of the most successful of S.S. serials. Just drop me a line on a post-card criticising it, will you, for I should be very glad to hear what my readers themselves think of it?

Do You Want £10?

WHEN you have read "Phantom Shadows," turn to page 459, and learn all about the competition, full details of which are given. Cannot you decipher the signatures? Perhaps not at first glance, but you may be able to after a careful study. At any rate it will be worth your while to do your best to solve them. The four back numbers of this paper containing the previous sets can still be obtained, so if you wish to enter the competition, you will find no difficulty on that score, for any newsagent will only be too glad to procure them for you, if he has not got them in stock, and they will be sent post free from this office on receipt of sixpence in stamps. The concluding set of signatures will appear next week.

A Chance for Small Advertisers.

THERE is an announcement on page 468 that will doubtless interest many readers. If you have something on your hands that you wish to dispose of, or have any small wants of any sort, you now have a unique opportunity of gratifying your wishes. Full particulars are given in the announcement referred to above.

Next Week's Number.

OUR next number will contain, besides the usual features, another splendid long instalment of "Phantom Shadows," and the Eleventh Unsolved Love Problem, entitled "Brian Cresswell's Choice." A prize of one guinea will be offered in connection with this latter.

I shall also announce next week the winner of the guinea offered in connection with the problem, "The Heart of Claire Gilchrist."

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

- An - Imaginary Wedding.

Telling What Happened in Consequence of a Girl's Foolish Fancy.

MISS FAINE looked dreamily out on the housetops of the crowded city and bit the corner of a heavy white envelope in her hand. It contained an invitation to the wedding of an old schoolfriend—the last of her class to marry, save herself—and she was thinking of the letter she had received from the merry little bride to be, a letter so full of happiness and anticipation. She thought, too, of Marian, her particular chum, who had married last Spring, and of how happy she was. Miss Faine had never been in love; she had never had a sweetheart, and so she thought less of the sentiment of love than of the satisfaction of not being an old maid or the fun of telling one's friends about one's wedding and of the delight of preparing a trousseau.

With characteristic impulsiveness and firmness and a bright smile of merriment, she decided to experience all the pleasure of anticipating and preparing for a wedding. She would get the prettiest trousseau imaginable and tell her friends—this much she would enjoy even if the groom was wanting. To that individual she gave but a passing thought; she should think of a name for him and when she talked of him at all it would be as of someone far away but possessed of all the manly traits she could think of. She resolved to begin the frolic by writing to Marian a confidential letter, telling her all about it and asking forgiveness for laughing at her foolish happiness the Spring before; then half the fun would be in telling Dr. Barnes, the cold man of the world who wanted her to marry him; the dressmaker, a gossipy little woman, would have to know, and the affair might be vaguely but cunningly hinted at in the boarding-house.

Miss Faine was a good-looking, graceful young woman of twenty-two. She dressed well, talked well, and, though considered indifferent and formal, was accorded considerable attention by reason of her being Society editress of the Daily Telephone.

She was exceedingly clever and tactful in business, but, though men liked and admired her, she was too smart to be flattered and too busy to devote to the men she met enough time to show her real character; so few had loved her. She had always been busy, successful, and ambitious, and cared little for men in general.

She had seldom thought of marriage until this morning, when she received the wedding invitation; then the monotony and emptiness of her life impressed her.

That night Miss Faine braided her long hair thoughtfully and lay down on her little white bed, not to sleep, but to think—as happy as a little child. She planned what she should say to Marian; then she could see herself downstairs in the drawing-room next evening when Dr. Barnes called—she should lean on the mantel with a deliciously indifferent air and tell him that she had promised to marry another—oh, the delight of that! Then she grew weary of thinking of the long list of friends to whom she should tell the secret as a profound one, and she fell asleep with thoughts of linen and lace and love floating through a mind usually filled with sterner things. In her dreams she heard the good-natured landlady gossiping to the new arrivals: "Now don't say I told you, but they say Miss Faine is engaged."

She left the house early next morning and stopped at the dressmaker's. Her face was quite pink when she said:

"Mrs. Martin, I want to see you about some sewing. I shall need rather more than I have needed. You know—about—that is, in February."

"Oh, Miss Edith, now are you goin' to be married? Well, now you can't think how glad I am. A sweet, pretty girl like you, without no mother, why, it's the very thing."

And she spent an hour planning and talking with Mrs. Martin.

By the time she reached her desk she had become so enchanted with the idea of her own wedding that she could think of nothing else. The society column that day would be short, for she must write to Marian.

"My dearest Marian," she began, "I am going to tell you a very important secret which must be carefully guarded. I am going to be married in February to Mr.——"

Here she lifted her pen and looked thoughtfully over the head of the editor-in-chief. Of course she must determine "his" name, occupation, and so on, though she had not given those things a thought. She took a scrap of paper and wrote "Mr. Ernest Field," but that did not please her, and she tried one after another until she decided on "Mr. Richard Blake." Then she continued:

"——Richard Blake, and he is, I think, all a man should be. He is kind, sympathetic and tenderhearted, besides being firm and manly."

She read this over and, without observing its inconsistency, liked it. Then added:

"He is literary in his tastes and appreciates the ability I may have in this direction."

Miss Faine was delighted with Mr. Richard Blake, and as she wrote the last sentence she thought of reckless, aristocratic Tom Arnold, to whom, it had been said, she was engaged, and of how he had scorned the idea of her taking a position on the Daily Telephone. She was conscious of liking her imaginary bridegroom infinitely more, and resumed:

"Without being strikingly handsome, he is good-looking, with strong, clear features and an expression of firmness about the mouth. I dare say, dear Marian, that all this seems very unlike my practical, unsentimental self, but I confess a complete change has come over me. We are planning to keep house, and all my aspirations, ambitions, hopes, and longings centre round the thought of that little home. And just think how I used to detest the idea of ever having to keep house!"

Then she wrote page after page concerning the pretty things she expected to have and asking Marian's advice.

When she posted that letter she thought she had never remembered feeling so happy. She pictured Marian with her pretty face full of smiling surprise, wondered if she would tell Fred, and then counted the hours until her answer should come.

Digitized by Google

Walking home, she tried to recall the qualities she had attributed to Mr. Richard Blake, and she smiled as she said to herself: "I shall be sure to forget what he is like. I should have kept a copy of that description."

That evening she put on a daintily frilled and flowered dress and went downstairs to see Dr. Barnes. Afterwards she laughed outright at her own cleverness in acting the part so prettily, and she enjoyed it all so thoroughly that once or twice, after she had gone to her room, she wished she might share the joke with someone; but she had no intimate friends and she was one who lived so much alone that she seldom betrayed her innermost thoughts and feelings, even to her best friends.

Dr. Barnes had folded his arms and said quietly, looking her straight in the eyes:

"May I ask whom you are to marry?"

"Mr. Richard Blake," she had answered, naturally enough and with an appropriate downward look. She had feared he would ask other questions, and she was not quite prepared to give definite information concerning Mr. Blake, for he was very shadowy in her mind as yet. But Dr. Barnes was too conventional, too stiff to show any decided feeling concerning the information, and it did not occur to her that he really cared; perhaps he did not.

Little by little the news of the engagement of Miss Faine spread among her acquaintances, and she heard it hinted at in the boarding-house, at the office, and in Society.

She tacitly admitted it to some, smiled indifferently at others, and occasionally she flatly denied it. But always she enjoyed it fully and was glad to have been spared the pains of talking much about Mr. Blake. The few times she had had occasion to discuss him she had got a little mixed, and he never assumed a very definite shape in her mind. When she got her cheque from the office on Saturday she spent its contents in pretty accessories to her "trousseau," all of which were carefully put away and looked at and admired very often. She economised and planned for the wedding until the whole thing had got to seem a reality, and she would not have given up the dream for all the newspaper fame in the world.

Miss Faine buttoned her dark blue jacket closely across her chest and went into the street. She looked at her watch and found that she had just time to dress, after getting home, before it was time to go to the hotel where she was to dine with Marian and Fred. They had come to London for a day or two, and Marian had written that she would expect her. She took out her note and read:

"We have a great surprise for you—something you would never suspect, and I want you to look your very prettiest."

For the first time Edith began to be concerned as to the denouement of the little drama she had been playing. The trousseau was almost ready, the secret was well circulated among her acquaintances, and February was almost here. True, she had enjoyed it all—even more than she realised—but she was puzzled over how to end it.

She thought of telling her friends that it was only a joke concocted by herself—certainly it was innocent enough—but at once she knew that would not do. Her dignity, her love of truth, her reputation for veracity would suffer. She could not do that. She might say that Mr. Richard Blake had died suddenly, but that would only complicate matters. She might pretend a great many things, but she could not pretend to mourn. She almost dreaded to see Marian, for she felt quite guilty.

"If you two think you can fool me, you are mistaken, though I confess you act well."

An hour later, when she arrived at the hotel, she found Marian talking animatedly to a strange gentleman in the lofty hotel parlour. Another minute and there were kisses, embraces, and exclamations, and the man in the case sat silently by, unnoticed for a moment. Miss Faine recovered herself and looked at Marian for an introduction; the gentleman rose and also looked expectantly at Mrs. Fred Howard. That little lady looked at both, then laughed, and as she retreated, said:

"Now, if you two think you can fool me you are mistaken, though I confess you both act well. I am going to find Fred."

They were quite alone and both were embarrassed, Miss Faine most.

"Mrs. Howard evidently thinks we know each other," he began. "I am sure I don't know why she should. I am Mr. Blake, and you are——"

"Miss Faine," she answered, with a deep blush and a glowing smile.

He was mystified over the blush at the mention of his name as well as over the knowing smile—in fact, at the whole thing. She fairly dropped into a chair and said:

Digitized by Google

"Will you be kind enough to tell me your first name?"

He took a card from his pocket and handed it to her, regarding her quizzically. She held it between thumb and finger and read it a dozen times before she looked up. Then she handed it to him and said hurriedly:

"It's all a joke, Mr. Blake—a very practical and unfortunate joke. For Heaven's sake don't let Marian and Fred know—just let them think you know me, and at the first opportunity I'll explain everything, and you will see that it is a very serious joke. Miss Faine—don't forget my name, Edith Faine. Accept whatever may be said and don't be surprised at anything. I promise to straighten it all out afterwards. Marian is coming." Then, with an appealing look: "Please help me out."

What Mr. Richard Blake thought it would be difficult to say, but what he did was to appear perfectly at ease when Mr. and Mrs. Howard entered, and to admire Miss Faine extravagantly.

"Well, Miss Faine, how are you?" was Mr. Howard's greeting as he shook her hand and noticed the flushed face. Then, placing his hand affectionately on Mr. Blake's shoulder, he continued:

"Just to think, Marian has known about this for ever so long and never told me until a week ago. Dick and I have travelled the same territory for five years, and when I found out how it was, why, I just pretended ignorance and persuaded him to stay a day with Marian and me. Dick, I want you to understand that I knew it all, if you did keep as mum as an oyster. Miss Edith, do you know he has never told me a word about it?"

Miss Faine, in confusion, turned to Marian with some pleasantry, feeling that she would rather be anywhere else in the world than where she was.

"So you have suddenly grown very wise, have you, old man?" said Mr. Blake for the want of something else to say.

Marian was asked to sing; afterwards dinner was served and the time passed quickly. Marian and Fred were bright and talkative, feeling that they had surprised and pleased their guests. Miss Faine was perfectly miserable, but was intensely gratified at the cleverness Mr. Blake showed at every turn, and often when she was at an utter loss.

That gentleman, however, was never so puzzled in his life, and he watched every action, every expression, every remark on the part of the three companions to solve the mystery if possible. Once he thought the joke must be at the expense of Miss Faine, then some remark from her would make him believe that she was the perpetrator of a joke on Mr. and Mrs. Howard, and again he would decide that the whole thing, whatever it was, was concocted for his confusion; then he would console himself with the thought that at least he was partially alive to the situation, and occasional approving glances from Miss Faine told him he was successfully playing the part she had assigned him.

It was barely eight o'clock when Miss Faine pleaded an important engagement and stood ready to leave her friends at the hotel. Mr. Blake, hat in hand, was at her side, and Edith joined him in thanking Mr. and Mrs. Howard for a pleasant evening.

Edith Faine had never felt so wretched and embarrassed as when she found herself alone with Richard Blake. She wanted to speak, to tell him everything, to ask him what she should do, for she felt full of gratitude to him for having steered her safely through that miserable dinner. She was silent, and, noticing her embarrassment, he talked of commonplace things as they walked towards her boarding-place. He had seldom visited London, he was saying, and had but few acquaintances there. Howard, he thought, was a clever fellow, and when he had urged him to stay a day with him and Mrs. Howard he could not refuse; he had no idea of making so pleasant an acquaintance, and wouldn't she tell him all about the little joke and what he had to do with it. Whatever that was, he was innocent of it all and he hoped she would not feel otherwise than kindly towards him.

Where should she begin? How was she ever to make him, an utter stranger, understand the foolish caprice that had led her to this horrid deception? And what would he think of her when he knew all? All these things and more passed through her mind as she walked at his side, silent and miserable, and she wished she might go away forever from everyone she knew. For the first time since they left the hotel she spoke, frankly and quietly:

"Mr. Blake, it is all my fault, and I am sure if you only could know how wretched I am over it you would forgive me. It is most singular that your name should be Richard Blake—there's where the whole trouble came in."

Miss Faine said this seriously enough, but in spite of the solemnity of her tone and expression Richard Blake could not repress a smile. If that was really the "whole trouble" the case was hopeless, for he could think of no convenient way to change his name. He was wishing the "whole trouble" was in her name—that might be easily changed.

"You see," she began again, looking into his face, "I had no idea there was anyone in the whole world named Richard Blake—I just selected that name because I liked it, and if I had chosen any other everything would have been all right."

Still Mr. Blake was not enlightened, and though he was impatient for the facts he was amused and interested at her pretty confusion. Soon they had reached the door of her home and she invited him into the drawing-room, where he was to wait until she removed her hat. She went upstairs and bathed her burning cheeks, and, standing before her mirror, looked into her own face in questioning dismay. She did not know that at that very moment downstairs in the drawing-room, Dr. Barnes was introducing himself to Mr. Richard Blake! When she went into the room a few minutes later she felt like running away as fast as she could. Was this dreadful mistake to haunt her at every turn? This was certainly decidedly awkward, and she was greatly relieved when Dr. Barnes said "Good evening," and left her once more alone with Mr. Blake.

"Mr. Blake," she said, taking a chair near him, "I never had a sweetheart, and about four months ago, when one of my girl friends married, I happened to think that it must be ever so nice to have a wedding—I mean to plan for it, to tell one's friends all about it, you know."

Mr. Blake listened intently and encouraged her to talk freely by an interested and sympathetic manner.

"I have just been interested in my work—that was all—and when I thought it would be nice to have a wedding I didn't think of the man at all. There was no man in particular to think of, you see, and so I just thought I would select a name for him and that he would play a very unimportant part." She was beginning to feel more at ease now and laughed a low laugh as she leant back in her chair and said:

"I see now that he is a very important feature of a wedding."

He was glad of an opportunity to laugh, without seeming to ridicule, so he joined her heartily.

"So you were planning to have a wedding without a groom?"

"No," she explained. "I didn't see the end of it all—I was just enjoying the fun of telling some of my friends, I did not once think of an ending for the affair until I received the note from Marian this morning. Then I began to wonder what I should say when the wedding day arrived and there was no wedding. I did think of killing you—think of that! That was the only thing that had suggested itself to me, to say that Mr. Richard Blake had suddenly died; but imagine my feelings when I read your name on that card! Until then I had not thought of there being a real Mr. Richard Blake, and I knew then that you had to live!"

Both laughed heartily at this, and Edith was almost enjoying it.

"You see, I told Marian first of all," she continued, "and when she told Fred, why of course he thought you were the man. It is terrible that my own little joke should have turned out so disagreeably," and Miss Faine grew serious again. "Now I haven't any idea what to do. Do you think it best for me to say to Marian and Fred and the rest of them that I manufactured the whole story? Why, they would hardly believe it, would they?"

Digitized by Google

Mr. Blake did not think they would and said as much as he regarded the pattern of the carpet. He was thinking.

Richard Blake was a man who had seen and felt much; he knew the world and had lived in it. In the girl before him and the story she was telling he was learning something that was a revelation to him. He was learning that a bright young woman, attractive and gentle, as he could plainly discern, could live in the same world that he knew, mix with the passing throng, and yet be something apart from it and have little in common with it. He knew Society girls who flirted and danced and gossipped, but he had never known one who had so much imagination, determination and spirit of caprice combined with the good sense this young lady evidently possessed.

He thought he understood her—understood the motives and the childish dreams that prompted this odd little romance of hers. But he was at as great a loss as she as to what was best to be done now that things had taken so unexpected a turn.

He could see that the whole thing was very romantic and that the most romantic thing he could do would be to propose to her. Such a possibility would have occurred to most girls, but it had never suggested itself to Miss Faine. She looked at him with perfect confidence in his ability to help and vaguely wondered what he would say.

"Well," he said, after a pause, "it is rather a peculiar combination of circumstances, and I wish I knew how to release you from this self-woven net. I don't even know what to suggest." And Richard Blake bit his lip thoughtfully. "Of course it would make a nice ending to the story if we could be married in February, but that would hardly do, for we don't even know each other."

She answered quickly and without embarrassment.

"No, no, that wouldn't do at all."

And after a moment she added, "Certainly not," with a toss of her head and a firmness that she had not exhibited before.

Mr. Blake wondered a little at her decided disapproval of a suggestion that would not have been considered bad by some girls he knew, and perhaps his vanity was a trifle wounded.

There was silence for some seconds, and it was he who spoke first.

"I am not engaged, I haven't any sweetheart, and I am not considered such a bad fellow—suppose we let things stand as they are. It won't hurt you to let your friends think you are engaged to me, and I am sure I shall feel honoured. I am going away, you know, and we shall probably not meet again. In the course of time you will love and marry someone, and then you can fix up some story about this that will sound all right—say we didn't agree, or that you found someone else you liked better."

She was thoughtful a moment, then her face brightened gradually as she said:

"Will that inconvenience you at all? I don't think you will be likely to meet anyone who has heard of it—you just happened to know Fred Howard—I can just say we decided to put the wedding off for a year, or something like that."

And so it was decided. Richard Blake left the presence of Miss Faine that night in a very peculiar frame of mind. He was practically an engaged man, and the woman was one whom he had never seen before. He laughed at the situation and planned to have Miss Faine and Mr. and Mrs. Howard to dine with him next afternoon.

Some say Miss Faine is fickle; others say they never believed the story, and those who know her best contend that she may give up her ambition for Richard Blake, but they doubt it.

Mr. Blake himself is wondering if she would.

Ida Gallagher.

A CASE FOR REFORMATION.

Telling of a Rule that Worked Both Ways.

Mr. and Mrs. Josiah Greenleaf Hamilton were enjoying their first breakfast in their mutual home. The honeymoon was over, the hotel meals and the table d'hôte dinners would be enjoyed no more. Mr. and Mrs. Hamilton were "at home," not only in the sense in which society understands the term, but literally. Mrs. Hamilton realised the fact with a slight feeling of apprehension, Mr. Hamilton with a sense akin to joy. To him the honeymoon trip had been a useless expenditure of good money and valuable time. To her it had been the main thing, after the trousseau, that had reconciled her to matrimony.

Mr. Hamilton drew off the glasses with which he had been reading the paper, and put on his other spectacles in order to better look at his wife on the other side of the table. She presented a pretty sight, with her fluffy hair. Her breakfast jacket was of pink cashmere, so cunningly disguised with wandering embroideries and foams of lace that one could scarcely tell of what the foundation for all this ornamentation consisted. Her skirt was nothing more or less than an extremely frivolous petticoat of pink silk and beading, with countless numbers of useless little bow-knots in pretty ribbon, and the foot that was outstretched on the hassock under the table was ensconced in a chic, high-heeled slipper.

Mr. Hamilton mused upon his ideal of a wife and housekeeper. It was an ideal founded upon recollections of his own mother, who lived in the days when one good dress a year sufficed any woman, and who died while her son was still so young that her memory had become a sacred thing, undimmed by recent recollection. His mother, he remembered, always breakfasted in a severely plain frock, with her hair neatly disposed in a net, and round her neck a simple frill of white lace, fastened always with the same brooch, one containing the hair of her departed father. Would Lucille, wondered Mr. Josiah Greenleaf Hamilton, wear a lock of his hair in case he was called away before her?

"I fear not," he sighed to himself, "unless I beforehand thoroughly succeed in forming her mind."

Mr. Hamilton had never read "David Copperfield"—he considered novels unworthy the attention of a successful hide and leather merchant—but like the redoubtable David, he had married in the hope of forming the mind of the extremely giddy damsel whom he had selected for his helpmate. The law of attraction for one's opposite had led him to fall in love with Lucille, the other law that prevents many a man from letting well enough alone was urging him to begin the reformation right away.

Digitized by Google

"My dear," he said, in what he imagined was a firm and unyielding voice.

"Yes, Popsey," returned Lucille in the universally sweet tone she employed to everyone she considered worth speaking to, from the greengrocer to her dearest bosom friend.

Mr. Josiah Greenleaf Hamilton's brow became corrugated in a frown. "Popsey" was all very well as an endearment during the courting period, but it was quite inappropriate now. Perhaps it was too much to expect his wife to always refer to him as "Mr. Hamilton"—though such had been the habit of that ideal woman, his mother, but at least she might say "Josiah."

He began again:

"My dear, now that we are at home we ought to talk things over in a definite manner, and have our future course of action fully arranged."

"That's so, Pops," returned Lucille in the most cordial manner, at the same time filling a saucer with cream for Dodo, her fat pug, that was another of Mr. Hamilton's unmentioned grievances.

"You know, my dear, as married people, we shall find certain duties confronting us that perhaps never troubled us in our unwedded days," Mr. Hamilton continued. He was going to be very harsh with the pretty girl presently, but just now, in order to get to the point more easily, he was using the term "us" in order to tacitly class himself among those needing reformation.

"We are sure to, Pops," replied Lucille, with such amazing alacrity that her husband began to feel quite cheered, and his seemingly difficult task no trouble at all.

He considered where he would begin. Would it be best to tell her of his inborn objection to a useless pug dog, or to giddy morning gowns? Should he desire her to order a number of plain, sensible hats at once, or should he tell her that he considered "Popsey" a very improper form of salutation to be used by a wife of twenty to a husband of forty-four? Ought he to tell her that he wished her to belong to more charitable societies and fewer clubs for the appreciation of bridge whist, or might it not be as well to start at once on his pet grievance of all, her extravagance? To be sure, her wishes had never gone beyond his ability to gratify them, but he had not the slightest intention of living up to his income, and, in fact, had married in the hope of economising, and adding to his already respectable fortune.

The man who hesitates is supposed to be lost. Mr. Hamilton, at any rate, lost his chance to speak, for while he was ruminating, Lucille finished feeding the dog, and completed her idiotic proceeding by wiping Dodo's cream-bespattered jaw with her lace handkerchief. Then she came and perched herself on the arm of Josiah Greenleaf Hamilton's chair and said:

"Darling old Popsey, I'm so glad you've started on this subject, for it's one I've bothered my head about ever since I promised to love and honour you. There are such a lot of things in this household that need reformation."

So she saw it, too! Dear girl, she wasn't so frivolous.

"Now, Pops, there's no use beating about the bush, we might as well speak plainly, mightn't we, old boy?"

He was so gratified at the way in which she was playing up to him, that he quite overlooked the unreverential "old boy," and nodded benignly.

"So," she went on, "I'm going to say what I want to say, and after that you can do your speaking, dear. Now, first, this house. It's all wrong."

Mr. Hamilton gazed at the dusty chairs, the tables laden with articles wholly unsuited to a breakfast room—new slippers and parcels of goods sent home "on approval" were among them—and thought that the house indeed needed the attention and the ministering feather duster of a housekeeper such as his mother had been.

Mrs. Hamilton was continuing her remarks:

"And, Popsey, we'd better just tear out the whole inside and do it over. Those parcels over there are some sample chintzes and wall-paper, which I'm going to look at just as soon as you've gone to the city, leaving Dodo and me alone. And you needn't fear my taste, Pops, for I shall show every pattern to Dodo, and if he barks at them I'll not take them, for Dodo has darling taste—haven't you, old doggy-woggy? I thought I'd have this room pink. You know Clara Gibson? Well, she had her boudoir that way, and it was fine. Then we'll rip up all that faded, green, tarnished gold in the drawing-room, and have it in ivory and café au lait, with Louis Quinze chairs. As for your den, you positively must have a cosy corner in it done up in Japanese style, and then I'm going to make you learn to smoke cigarettes. They seem the only kind of smoke permissible in a cosy corner."

She paused to reflect, then went on.

"Then you know, dearie, your clothes aren't at all what they should be. That old tailor of yours isn't any class at all. You must give up wearing mutton-chop whiskers and ready-made neckties. Positively, dear, you'll never realise how your neckties made me suffer when you used to come a-wooing, and what I've gone through because of the way my sisters laughed at them. They guessed first that I—liked you, because Celia said I must be dead gone or I could never put up with such cravats. And your collars aren't right, either, and I wish you'd have more patent leather shoes. I saw a crack in those you wore at dinner last evening.

"And when you have had the house done up we must get some new servants and select a livery for them—something neat and showy, with red and yellow, is what I'd go in for, with white silk stockings on the men. And I have got to have a carriage of my own, if I'm to go out as much as I really think I ought to, in order to keep up our social standing. I ought to have some more diamonds, too. And, Popsey, there's just one thing more you must promise me. It's the most important of all. I've wanted to speak of it all through the honeymoon, and now we're going to run the house on a rational basis, with our friends coming in every other evening or so, I hope, to play a simple game of bridge, if nothing else. Popsey, I want you to promise to call me Lulu. Lucille is altogether too frumpy and aged for me, it doesn't suit my style any more than that horrible Josiah suits yours, Pops, and I'm sure I'd as soon call you Jehoshaphat as Josiah."

Mr. Josiah Greenleaf Hamilton has not, up to now, even started at the task of forming his wife's mind. He is too busy earning money to pay for her reforms in household decoration and trying to dodge her proposed reforms in his own ways and whiskers.

J. Cranford.

BUYING AND SELLING.

In response to many and oft-repeated requests, we have decided to throw our advertisement columns open to the small and the private advertiser. Many a bargain goes a-begging for want of a suitable medium for bringing buyer and seller into touch with one another, and we believe that Short Stories, with its colossal circulation, can do wonders in this respect. We shall, therefore, commence at once a miscellaneous advertisement column for the reception of genuine bargain announcements—wants, holiday apartments, exchanges, etc., at a uniform rate of 6d. per line of eight words, so that if you have something you want to sell quickly, and it's cheap, try a line in Short Stories, or, if you want to pick up a bargain, watch our miscellaneous column. All advertisements should be addressed to the Advertisement Manager, Short Stories, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and should reach us not later than Friday of each week, when they will appear eleven days afterwards.

Digitized by Google

PETITE'S PROPOSAL.

A Very Pretty Story, Relating how a Darling Little Girl was the Cause of Great Happiness.

An accident, or, rather, the crowd about an accident, which had just occurred at the street corner, prevented the handsome greys, drawing Miss Beatrice Bloom's brougham, from going a step farther.

James climbed down from the box, and came to the carriage door to explain the delay to his mistress.

"A man has been run over by a dray," he said. "They won't keep us long."

"Poor man; I am sorry! I will go into White's tea-shop while we are waiting," and Miss Beatrice Bloom, tall, stately, dignified, a handsome orphan, a charming heiress, a social favourite, left her carriage to enter the tempting confectioner's just at hand.

At two o'clock on this same December afternoon, Petite and Raspberry, in the lonely garret of a tenement, were holding a conversation; that is, Petite did the conversing, while Raspberry, being a doll, could only listen in bland, smiling silence.

"Oh, dear," said Petite at last, "we'll die, Waspberry, if papa don't tomed soon; den we'll go up to the sky wiv mamma. It's a very long time since he's been goned. Let's go, find him; he'll be so glad!" And popping on an old hat, like an extinguisher, over her fair curls, and catching Raspberry by her only arm, the little sprite hopped down the long flight of stairs, reached the pavement without encountering one of the tenement boys, who had twice called her "yellow top" in the one week that she and her father had tried to realise the small tenement garret as "home" for the present, then scampering round the corner and running straight ahead, for many streets, she found herself in the heart of the great city.

"I fought I could tomed," she said confidentially to Raspberry; and for the next two hours she feasted her blue eyes on the wonderful things in the shop windows. "This is a weal nice one, Waspberry," she said, holding up her doll so that she, too, could see the tempting pink and white confections in White's window. "See the little wound ones wiv the nuts on, and the awful good butter-tups, and the house wiv frost all on it."

She stopped, for some feathery flakes of snow were sifting from the sky upon her, and melting into dark spots upon the remnant of a raspberry satin gown, in which her doll was dressed.

"Oh, Waspberry," said Petite, shiveringly, "I wants my papa!" and, forgetting the charms of the window, she turned quickly to cross the street, when she ran into Miss Beatrice Bloom, about to enter the shop.

"You tiny little girl!" exclaimed Beatrice; "where are you going all alone?"

"To find papa," replied Petite, looking up to the young lady's face, with eyes deeply troubled.

"But you can't get across the street now," said Beatrice, delaying the child with her gloved hand; "there is such a crowd. Where is your papa?"

"I don't know," Petite answered, the trouble deepening in her eyes; "but I know he's somewheres; Waspberry and me is finding him."

"Where do you live?" questioned Beatrice, clasping the little girl's cold fingers firmly, impressed by Petite's lovely face and artless manner.

"I don't quite know," replied Petite, "but somewheres."

"And what is your name?" continued Beatrice, studying more closely the general appearance of the little waif, with as sober a face as she could command.

"Mine is Petite and hers is Waspberry. May I go now, please?" and she tried to draw her little hand away. "The peoples is almost goned now, and papa might never det founded, if Waspberry and me don't hurry awful much."

"Wait a moment, dear," said Beatrice, "and we will see if this man knows where your papa is," and she nodded to a passing policeman, who hastened to her.

"No, Miss Bloom," he said, at once recognising the young lady, "I don't know anything of the child or her father—these small ones get lost often, and when there's nobody to mind them, we just send them to one or another of the homes; but this one is uncommonly nice-looking; her friends'll turn up all right; just let her come along with me."

Petite clung tightly to Beatrice's fingers as the policeman spoke, but she scanned his face with round eyes, as tearless and unfrightened as her doll's.

"I'll take her with me," said Beatrice, with a sudden resolution. "I—I think I would like to keep her for a day or two, while you are searching for her friends."

"Just as you like, miss," he responded, and managing to learn from the little girl that papa was "papa," her doll "Waspberry," and her own name "Petite, of tourse," he made a note of this slender clue, and touched his hat as he put the little one into Beatrice's brougham, persuaded that the child was much better off than she had ever been before.

"Is we going to find papa?" asked Petite, as the carriage rolled away.

"The kind policeman is going to look everywhere for him while you go home with me," replied Beatrice gently.

"And may papa tomed, too, when he's founded?" questioned Petite.

"I expect he will be very anxious to come and get you," laughed Beatrice; and, Petite, apparently satisfied with the reply, climbed on to her knees, and held Raspberry to the carriage window, that she might not miss any of the street sights.

"Oh, Waspberry, look!" she exclaimed, as they whirled round a corner, "they is carrying a poor man, under a blanket, all hurted to def; isn't it too bad, Waspberry?"

"That is the poor man who was hurt at the corner,"

Digitized by Google

explained Beatrice, watching every motion of her new charge; "they are taking him to a hospital."

"I wish papa didn't get losted," said Petite, tears gathering in her eyes for the first time that day. "What does papas get losted for?" and she sat down on the seat as if outside attractions were all gone.

"Perhaps it is the little girls that get lost," observed Beatrice, drawing the golden head nearer to her. "Do you think you'll like to stay with me?"

"Ye-e-s, please, when papa tomes, too," Petite replied, brushing the tears from her fair little face with her cold hands.

And "papa"? Alas, it was he who, penniless and sick at heart, had been knocked down and run over by a heavy dray, as he crossed the street that afternoon, and it was he, on his way to a hospital, whom Petite saw, when looking from the window of Beatrice's brougham.

* * * * *

Spring was approaching, and in spite of constant advertising and the conscientious efforts of Miss Bloom and the policeman, no one claimed Petite, and she, with Raspberry, fitted out with a new arm and raspberry satin gown, had become an unquestionable part of Beatrice's household.

Beatrice's friends had been not a little amused at this, "her latest fad," but one glimpse of the fair-haired, blue-eyed maiden, and an introduction to Raspberry, invariably resulted in a complete surrender to the beguiling little protegée.

"I really believe I should adopt the little fairy myself, if I had a chance," said Mrs. Ravenswood at one of Beatrice's afternoon teas.

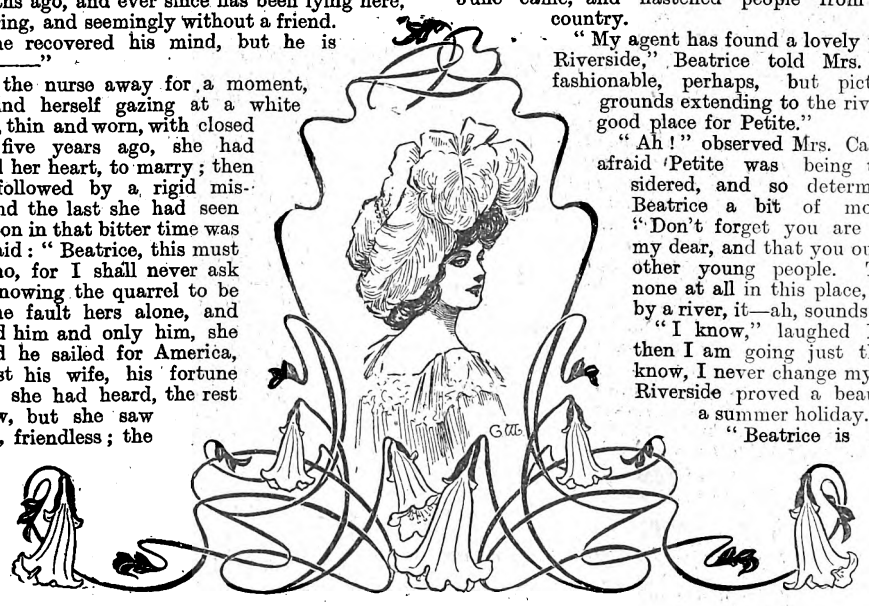
"But she is not adopted, you know," said Mrs. Calton; "her friends are expected to claim her at any time."

"Petite," said Beatrice, one Saturday morning, looking across a mass of blossoms which were piled in a reckless heap upon the dining-table, "would you like to help me tie these flowers into bunches, and then go with me to leave them at the hospital, so that the poor patients can have them?"

Petite danced up and down in delighted assent, then laying Raspberry on a chair, busied her dainty fingers in tying wax-stemmed roses, deep-scented carnations, and fragrant violets into clusters, to be distributed at the hospital by her own wee self, and an hour later she was handing them here and there to the occupants of a long row of hospital cots.

"This is a sad case," said one of the nurses to Beatrice, as they stopped before the last cot in the row; "he was run over several months ago, and ever since has been lying here, his reason wandering, and seemingly without a friend. A few days ago he recovered his mind, but he is lame for life, and——"

Someone called the nurse away for a moment, and Beatrice found herself gazing at a white cot, on which lay, thin and worn, with closed eyes, he whom, five years ago, she had promised, with all her heart, to marry; then a quarrel came, followed by a rigid misunderstanding, and the last she had seen of Ralph Pattington in that bitter time was on the night he said: "Beatrice, this must be a final yes or no, for I shall never ask you again!" Knowing the quarrel to be of her making, the fault hers alone, and knowing she loved him and only him, she bade him go, and he sailed for America, married there, lost his wife, his fortune also. This much she had heard, the rest she did not know, but she saw him now, helpless, friendless; the bitterness in the past was all gone, and the old love, mellowed by sympathy and pity, brightened her eyes.



His angry farewell on that night, five years ago, had now her benediction, and yet he knew it not.

"Hush, dear," she said softly, taking a bunch of white carnations from Petite's hand, as the little girl hurried towards her, "he is asleep; we must not wake him. I will give him the flowers," and stooping over him, she laid the small posy where his eyes must see it when they opened.

"Poor man," said Petite, tip-toeing from his cot, without venturing a glance at him, so afraid was she of arousing him.

"I will send some fruit and jellies for the case you were telling me of," said Beatrice to the nurse, who had just returned to her, "and if there is anything else I can do, please let me know at once."

She spoke the last words with so much stress, that Petite looked up into her face questioningly as they left the nurse.

"You don't know it all, little golden-hair," said Beatrice, lifting Petite in her arms as if about to place her in the carriage, "but you have helped me to be patient with my trouble, and perhaps some time the trouble will all go away."

Petite's eyes were still upon her with a deeply puzzled expression as the carriage whirled them out of the hospital grounds.

"Twouble," said Petite at last, having caught this word in Beatrice's strange address; "yes, that is what peoples has when their papas is losted. Is your papa losted?"

A few days later, Ralph Pattington received a note from certain bankers in the City, telling him that a generous sum of money had been placed on deposit for his use in their bank.

A week later they received a note from Ralph Pattington, courteously declining the gift, and this note they forwarded to Beatrice.

She trembled as she read it, but kept it because of the handwriting. Had she known that kind Fate, in the shape of a lawyer, had hunted out Ralph Pattington, and presented him with a moderate fortune and estate, left him by an uncle, she would not have felt offended at the returned gift.

The uncle's fortune speeded Ralph's recovery, and, making a handsome restitution to the hospital for the attention and care he had received there, he began a vigorous search for lost Petite.

* * * * *

June came, and hastened people from town to the country.

"My agent has found a lovely place for us at Riverside," Beatrice told Mrs. Calton; "not fashionable, perhaps, but picturesque, high grounds extending to the river edge, and a good place for Petite."

"Ah!" observed Mrs. Calton, who was afraid Petite was being too much considered, and so determining to give Beatrice a bit of motherly advice. "Don't forget you are growing older, my dear, and that you ought to be with other young people. There may be none at all in this place, and to settle by a river, it—ah, sounds so wet!"

"I know," laughed Beatrice, "but then I am going just the same. You know, I never change my mind."

Riverside proved a beautiful spot for a summer holiday.

"Beatrice is growing quite gay in this quiet place," said Mrs. Calton, who accompanied her, to those that called,

Digitized by Google

" and dear little Petite becoming a perfect gipsy under that big hat of hers." And then she would tell Petite's story.

Shut in by high, dense hedges, no one knew much of the place " next door," until Mrs. Calton learnt through the cook, who was told by the milkman, that a strange gentleman had come there to spend the summer, and opened the house for the first time in many years.

" I believe I saw him the other morning," added Mrs. Calton; " if so, he is quite lame."

Beatrice said nothing, but her heart beat faster, and her colour deepened at the word " lame." Then, taking herself to task for foolish fancies, she caught Petite by the hand and ran out into the garden.

Petite's blue eyes were upon her, and she seemed reflecting in a child's vague way.

" What are you thinking of, my Petite ? " asked Beatrice, catching her up, and carrying her to a bench near by.

" I want papa," said the child.

" What ! with Raspberry and me ? " questioned Beatrice.

" Yes," nodded Petite; " why don't he be founded ? Why is he losted ? "

Beatrice's face lengthened.

" Dear little one," she said, " I don't know why he isn't found, but I can't spare you, even if he is."

" But you said he might come, too, wiv Raspberry and me; don't you 'member ? "

Beatrice smiled.

" Den it will be so lovely," continued Petite. " I'm so tired this way."

" Ah ! dear little Petite, don't—please, don't ! " and the stately and dignified Miss Bloom leant her head on the child's soft neck and cried.

Instinct was trying to tell her whose little child this was, and who was living " next door," yet it seemed but preposterous fancy.

" Waspberry and me loves you awful," said Petite, trying to comfort Beatrice; " we just only want papa founded, too, that's all."

" Yes, dear," replied Beatrice more calmly; " now run and get your hat, and we will go boating for a little while."

The gentleman " next door," stepping out upon a balcony almost overhanging his neighbour's ground, saw and heard this little scene in a stupefaction of surprise, delight, and unbelief. It was the first time since occupying the house left him by his uncle that he had given his neighbours a thought. His mind was engrossed in what, until this wonderful moment, had been a fruitless search for his little daughter, Petite, and now behold her found, almost upon his threshold ! Or was he dreaming, or his mind adrift, as it had been during that long hospital illness ?

No ! thank Heaven ! he could say " No," for there, on the river, but a little distance away, he could see his little one in a boat, with Beatrice at the oars. And why Beatrice with his child in charge ? he asked himself, in deepest bewilderment; and, mopping a sudden perspiration from his face and hands, he seized his stick and hat, and, hastening to his boat-house, drew out the boat, and was on the water.

' Petite is careless; she leans too far over the side," he said to himself, as if excusing himself for his eager pursuit.

" Be careful, Petite, or you will fall in," cautioned Beatrice, her back turned to the boat that was coming nearer and nearer.

" Then when papa is founded I would be dwounded." rhymed the little sprite, intending to draw back from the boat edge, but, instead, losing her balance and toppling in the water.

Beatrice's boat made a violent lurch as she reached out to catch the child.

" Wait, Beatrice ! " said a well-remembered voice near her, and Ralph Pattington, cool and reassuring in the face of danger, pulled his boat close to hers, and while she steadied it with her slender fingers, that it might not upset, he reached down into the water and grasped, and grasped, and grasped again, until he brought Petite to the surface.

" Let me take her," said Beatrice, holding out her arm for the unconscious child.

He obeyed; then clambering into Beatrice's boat, he set his own adrift, and rowed her quickly to land.

" To my house ? " he asked hurriedly.

" Mine, please; let it be mine," replied Beatrice, the colour surging to her pale, frightened face; and there together they fought death by drowning, and at length won.

Petite opened her blue eyes, and they rested on her father.

" Oh, papa ! " she gasped, with a little cry of delight they had never before heard, " you is founded, you is founded ! And I isn't dwounded, and you is to stay here wiv Waspberry and me."

" Am I, Beatrice ? " he asked involuntarily. " But I forget," he added quickly; " I said I was never to ask that question again. Petite must ask it for me when she is a little stronger."

And so it came to pass one August afternoon, when Beatrice, Petite, and her father were together, that Petite put her arms about Beatrice's neck, and said:

" Please will you let papa come and live wiv you always, and Waspberry and me, now he is founded ? "

" Yes," laughed Beatrice, in spite of the solemnity of the moment.

" Just wait till I tell Waspberry," said Petite, with a little caress, as she skipped off to find her doll.

" I understand now," said Ralph, taking a bunch of withered carnations from the pages of his pocket-book, " the message of forgiveness which these flowers brought me in the hospital. I am forgiven."

" I thought you had the forgiving to do," she said quietly.

M. C. Hyde.

" Doctor," she said archly, " some physicians say kissing isn't healthy. What do you think of it ? " " Well, really," replied the handsome young doctor, " I don't think you or I should attempt to decide that off-hand. Let's put our heads together and consider."

Freddie: "If after all that has been, Mabel, I should tell you that I found I did not love you as much as I love someone else, and that I could not marry you, would it be a great trial for you, dear ? " Mabel: " Yes, Freddie, dear. It would be a breach of promise trial."

" Yesterday was pa's birthday," said the young man's best girl, as they stood talking over the gate early in the evening. " Yes ? " he replied, absently. " What did you give him ? " " A pair of nice soft slippers. He is walking about the room in them now. You ought to see him." " I think I will. This might be a good time to ask him if I might have you."

Digitized by Google

Arranged Matters.

"You are the world to me," he whispered. "All right," she answered; "you can be the sun. I'm going to marry your father."

Then He Wondered.

He: "Why, I never have any sense when I'm in the company of a pretty girl." She: "What a queer way of paying me a compliment, Mr. Sappy!"

Her Opinion.

Gladys: "He said he would die if I refused him." Ethel: "And still you refused him?" Gladys: "Oh, yes. I think he will live long enough to propose again."

As Women Do.

He: "I don't see how you can say such terrible things about another woman." She: "You don't understand, you silly. Why, Carrie is my dearest friend."

His Preference.

"Somehow or other I don't think I'd care to be the prettiest girl in the world," he remarked. She: "Why not?" He: "Because I'd rather be next to the prettiest."

Gave Vent to His Anger.

"Why are you crying, dear?" "Oh, mother, last night I showed Henry the seat on which we first courted. "What did he do?" "He went over and kicked it."

The Superiority of Women.

Ada: "Men are so slow! It took him nearly two hours to propose to me last night." Floss: "And how long did it take you to accept him, dear?" Ada: "Just two seconds."

The Height of Happiness.

Dorothy: "I do wish we were rich, father." Her father: "How rich would you like to be?" Dorothy: "Oh, awfully rich; rich enough to snub people and still be called agreeable."

In Times to Come.

The Hawk: "I have one great advantage over you. I don't need to keep dodging motor-cars all the time." The Cow: "No; but just wait till they get these airships going."

Repudiated the Offence.

Young Lady (in the music shop): "Have you 'Kissed Me in the Moonlight'?" Assistant: "No, miss; it wasn't me. It must have been the other assistant. I've only just come here."

Good Advice.

Mabel: "Do you think a girl should answer a young man's proposal by letter?" Tom: "Not one letter, but three." Mabel: "Three letters?" Tom: "Certainly. Y-e-s."

Of Course Not.

Wife: "George, the way you flirted with that red-headed girl in the shop was perfectly shameful!" Husband: "Well, my dear, as you have such a penchant for shopping, you must not be surprised if I have a counter-attraction!"

No Star-Gazer Needed.

He: "The astrologer described you exactly, and said that I would marry you." She: "What a waste of money! I could have told you the same thing myself if you had asked me."

A Biassed Arbitrator.

"The reason I can't get along with my wife is that she wants to submit all our differences to arbitration." "To arbitration?" "Yes. She always wants to refer disputes to her mother."

A Too Candid Friend.

Maude: "What is the quarrel between Alice and Kate?" Ethel: "Why, you see, Alice asked Kate to tell her just what she thought of her." Maude: "Yes?" Ethel: "Kate told her."

He Regretted Having Spoken.

He: "Before proposing, Miss Lulu, I wish to know if you have anything in the bank?" She: "Yes, Mr. Poorman, I I have a lover there. He is the cashier, and we are to be married next week."

He Had Done His Share.

He: "Mary, this milliner's bill is unusually large. I thought we had decided to be economical." She: "And we have been. Haven't you given up smoking and horse-racing and the club?"

A Reception.

Little Ethel (horrified): "We've invited too many children to our tea-party. There's only enough cake for them to have a tiny piece each." Little Dot (resignedly): "That's too bad. We'll have to call it a reception."

Of Course She Wouldn't.

Jack: "Miss Fay, will you marry me?" Miss Fay: "I wouldn't marry you if you were the last man on earth." Jack: "Oh, I say—that's rather hard—I——" Miss Fay: "Goose! How could I? Who'd perform the ceremony?"

Choice of Two Evils.

Horrified Mother: "I just this minute saw Mr. Nicefello's arm round your waist. It's perfectly awful." Repentant daughter: "Y-e-s, mother, but it would be a good deal more awful to see his arm round some other girl's waist."

Insult to Injury.

"I'm tired of you laughing at my game," said the amateur golfer. "If I hear any more impudence from you I'll hit you over the head." "All right," replied the caddie, "but I'll bet you don't know what would be the right club to do it with."

What a Brute!

Clara: "Of all mean, selfish, worldly, despicable creatures I think Mr. Huggem is the worst." Dora: "Why, what has he done?" Clara: "When I refused him, he did not commit suicide, or do anything so rash at all. He got engaged to a girl I hate."

From the Frying-Pan Into the Fire.

Youth: "What is your father stamping about for?" Maiden: "I told him you wanted to marry me, and I'm afraid he's looking for his stick." Youth: "Phew! Go and tell him it's all a mistake, and I don't want to marry you." Maiden: "Horrors, no! Then he'd go like a shot for his gun."

He Sat Much Closer Then.

He was seated on the other side of the room. "Harry," she said, "if a fire were to break out suddenly in the house, what would be your first impulse, do you think?" "Well, my first thought would be for you, of course. I would get you to a place of safety, and then do what I could to extinguish the flames." "That would be very nice of you, Harry, to think of me first; but if a fire were to break out now, for instance, wouldn't you lose valuable time reaching me from right over there?"

Digitized by Google

DEAF AND DUMB.

Telling the Consequences of a Deception.

"I've just dropped in for a few moments, Herbert," said young Edward Ogden, a fair-haired, handsome boy of about fourteen, entering the bachelor apartments of his cousin, Herbert Lawrence. "I'm on my way back to boarding-school, you know; I regret to say that it opens on the 1st of September. Mother instructed me to call here, and to remind you of that promised visit to Greenlawn Cottage."

"Did I promise, Edward, to pay her a visit? Oh, yes; I remember. It was last April, just before she left town, and I said 'upon my honour, I'd come,' and all that sort of thing." Here Mr. Lawrence mysteriously expressed his sense of how deeply the recollection of that promise affected him, by a nervous pull at his moustache. "When does she want me, Ned?"

"The first week in September, as you agreed, Herbert."

"I'm sorry, Ned; but I shall have to delay my visit till the 10th. I've positively engaged myself to join a shooting-party for the next few days. The 10th will be perfectly convenient to your mother, won't it?

"Perfectly, I expect. She only wishes you to keep your promise, some time during the month. My word!"—as Edward glanced at the clock over his cousin's mantel—"I'd no idea it was two o'clock, Herbert. I must hurry off, or I'm bound to miss the train."

"A moment more, Ned, if you please. Has your mother anyone staying with her at present? Any young lady, I mean?"

The boy laughed merrily.

"No, Herbert, or you may be sure, knowing your hatred for the species, that she wouldn't have asked you. Excepting herself and Mary Curtis, there's not a person at Greenlawn, male or female."

"Mary Curtis?" Herbert asked. "Who is she?"

"A young lady; but she hardly counts as one, poor thing. You've heard mother speak of her, haven't you? She's deaf and dumb."

"How charming she must be!" exclaimed Herbert, so seriously that his young cousin burst into a peal of laughter, long and loud. "I shall learn the mute's alphabet, Ned, so as to be able to converse with her. I've always considered that a woman's tongue is the greatest drawback she can possibly possess.

"Mother's told me of your odd sentiments, Herbert, before now. Well, I'm sure you'll like Miss Curtis. She has an interesting, lovely face, and is really very clever in her own quiet way. Mother is very fond of her, and so am I."

His cousin's words filled Herbert Lawrence with no slight curiosity to meet Miss Mary Curtis, and on arriving at his aunt's house one pleasant afternoon, about a fortnight later, the young gentleman felt that his curiosity had been growing stronger and stronger during his journey to Greenlawn.

"I say, Aunt Charlotte," he remarked, while occupying with Mrs. Ogden the tasteful little drawing-room into which he had been shown, "has she gone yet?"

"Whom, Herbert?" asked his aunt, opening her eyes in genuine astonishment at the interested manner which accompanied her nephew's use of the feminine pronoun.

"Why, Miss Curtis," was the reply. "Edward told me that she was staying with you. A charming, lovely girl, with the rare attribute of not being able to talk. I was really quite anxious to meet so precious a social curiosity. I'm sure we should like each other."

"Yes, Herbert, Miss Curtis is still staying here," responded his aunt, after a moment of hesitation; "would you like to be presented?"

"Above all things. Of course I sha'n't be able to converse with her, unless you teach me the manner of doing so. Is it hard to learn, by-the-way?"

Mrs. Ogden appeared not to have heard his question, however, and left the room a moment after it was spoken. She remained absent an unusually long time, Herbert thought, considering that her errand was so trivial a one as merely to inform Miss Curtis that he desired an introduction.

"Perhaps she's assisting the fair mute in her toilet," he meditated. "I suppose deaf and dumb girls share the flippancies of their talkative sisterhood. Women are still women, perhaps, even without their right of speech."

His aunt returned presently, accompanied by a young lady, who struck Herbert, the moment his eyes rested upon her, as exceedingly and fascinatingly beautiful. A mass of soft, wavy hair was brushed back from the whitest forehead imaginable. Two dark, lustrous eyes looked out from beneath golden lashes. A mouth of the most enchantingly sweet expression smiled amiably upon him, as Mrs. Ogden said, or rather motioned, using her fingers as a means of communication:

"Let me present Mr. Herbert Lawrence."

There was a somewhat awkward pause after the introduction had taken place, but Mrs. Ogden soon broke it by addressing Herbert.

"As you are unacquainted with the alphabet for mutes, I have requested Mary to bring paper and pencil. She converses very fluently in this way, if I may use the term. You will find her ready to reply almost before you have written your sentences."

Herbert glanced towards the young lady who was now seated opposite him, although at considerable distance; and as their eyes met, with a charmingly graceful gesture Miss Curtis pointed to a vacant chair at her side, using in the action a roll of tinted notepaper which she held.

Not long afterwards Mrs. Ogden was a smiling observer of her two guests, while they sat, with a small table between them, engaged in what appeared to be a conversation absorbing as it was silent. Herbert Lawrence soon found that the fair mute with whom he held communication was one of the most accomplished and brilliant women whom it had ever been his lot to meet. She wrote with a brevity, wit, and style that quite put to shame his own literary powers, and accompanied this tête-à-tête, to Herbert so novel and agreeable, with smiles and glances that were something more than merely attractive. Her quick perception of the ideas which he wished to express considerably lightened Herbert's labours with the pencil, and she bore her own share of the chirographic interview with an ease that truly surprised him. "Are you at all tired?" he wrote, at the end of an hour. Her answer was a prompt negative.

Digitized by Google

Miss Curtis did not appear at dinner that afternoon, nor yet at breakfast on the following morning; though this absence from meals—caused, as Mrs. Ogden told her nephew, by a feeling of sensitiveness before the servants that were strange to her—was the young lady's only evidence of being conscious how severe and alienating was her affliction. When in the society of Herbert and his aunt her bright, smiling looks were the very reverse of that melancholy which might have been so easily accounted for had she really exhibited it. Before two days had elapsed Herbert found himself forgetting her true condition, and assuming towards her a gay carelessness of manner that appeared thoroughly natural, and during the week which followed his stay at Greenlawn Cottage became every hour more agreeable. Before the end of that week—let us announce a plain fact plainly—Herbert Lawrence had told himself that he devotedly loved Mary Curtis.

At last it happened that one evening, as Mrs. Ogden was seated alone in that same pleasant little drawing-room where her nephew had first met the present possessor of his heart, Herbert entered, and approaching her side, said, in slow, calm tones:

"I have come to tell you, Aunt Charlotte, that this is to be my last night at Greenlawn. I shall be forced to leave to-morrow morning."

"Is not your intention a very recently formed one, Herbert?" Mrs. Ogden asked, in surprised tones.

"Yes—no—that is, I began to think of going yesterday morning." Then, after a slight silence, he continued: "Perhaps you care about hearing, aunt, my true reason for quitting Greenlawn to-morrow?"

"I should like to hear it, Herbert. Your going is a great disappointment to me. Miss Curtis and I had expected the pleasure of your society for at least a week longer."

"Does Miss Curtis think my society a pleasure?"

"Yes; I am sure that she does."

Another silence, which Herbert again broke.

"Well, aunt, my reason for going is simply this—I love Mary Curtis."

Mrs. Ogden started up from her seat with a little gasp of amazement.

"You love any living woman, Herbert! I can't believe it!"

"Nevertheless, it is true. I don't know why I make this confession to you, Aunt Charlotte, since of course I have not made it to her."

"And why not, Herbert?"

"Do you ask me?" he responded, with a thrill of intense mournfulness in his voice. "How could a confession of love from me to her be anything but the worst of mockeries?"

"You mean——?"

"I mean that the world would laugh at me if I made that unhappy girl my wife, and that we would both be pointed at afterwards as curiosities, in whatever society we entered. Not that I care much for the world's opinion, aunt, but in matters of this sort a man cannot wilfully disregard it. I could bear the ridicule, perhaps; but that she should be subjected to it is quite another matter. "No, no," he went on almost passionately, "even loving her as I do, it is better that I should make no effort towards discovering whether my love is returned. Do you not agree with me?"

Mrs. Ogden's face was concealed from Herbert's as she answered him, and a kind of faint tremulousness in her voice showed a depth of sympathy that he had not expected to find. Herbert was aware that his aunt fondly loved him, but he was nevertheless not a little surprised at her prompt compassion for the pain he suffered.

"I scarcely know how to answer your question, Herbert," Mrs. Ogden said. "Were certain prejudices of yours not well-known to me—had you not spoken, even before meeting Miss Curtis, as though you looked upon her affliction as almos a charm—had not——"

"I understand you, aunt," he interrupted. "I acted, thought, and spoke very foolishly, if you will, but I see my folly now. There is melody in the voices of those we love which no other sound equals. I think that if Mary Curtis could find a voice, and tell me that she would be my wife, Herbert Lawrence might safely call himself the happiest of living men."

"Then call yourself so at once, Herbert, for I have found a voice, and mean to keep it all the rest of my days."

"Can I believe my senses?" Herbert Lawrence gasped, as none other than Miss Curtis now glided across the room to where he was standing, and paused, her beautiful face a picture of roguish merriment, close at his side.

Mrs. Ogden gave vent to a peal of the noisiest laughter, and approached her nephew, managing to secure both his hands in both her own, and fixing upon him a pair of eyes that literally danced with fun.

"It was all my doing, you horrid woman-hater, and I am very glad that I did it, too. It's taught you a lesson that I hope you will never forget. Of course, if Alice had not been so perfectly charming I should have had very slight hopes of making you fall in love with her, and thereby prove to yourself what an essential attribute of woman is woman's tongue. Perhaps you're surprised at my calling her Alice and not Mary. Her elder sister, Mary, who is deaf and dumb, poor darling, had left Greenlawn a few days before your arrival, and Alice's visit had only just begun. There's the whole story in a nutshell. Alice never dreamt of deceiving you, nor I either, until your idiotic remark about poor Mary being a precious social curiosity vexed me into bringing about the whole affair."

Herbert and Alice Curtis are man and wife now, and a very devoted couple they make.

F. Wills.

FOR THE SECRETS OF A LADY'S TOILET

GET

The Art of Beauty.

BY A TOILET SPECIALIST.

Price 1s., or post free, 1s. 2d.

Here are a few of the numerous subjects dwelt upon in this splendid handbook:

Cure for acne or blackheads—Reducing stoutness—Arms hands, and nails—Bleaching the hair—Complexion brushes—Baths—Bloomers for cycling—The bodice for evening wear—Boots—Evils of tight boots and high heels—Colours for brunes—How to improve the bust—Benefit of bathing the chest—Preventive against chilblains—Beauty and health of children—Clothing for children—"Clammy" hands and the cure—Classification of beauty—Cold cream, recipe for making, etc.—Warning against small-tooth combs—Bad complexions and their causes—To darken the hair—Prevention of corns—Use and abuse of corsets—Corsets for stout people—Faults of English corsets—Hair-curle s—Dandruff and its cure—The dress—The morality of dress—Hair dyes—Removal of warts and moles—Eruption of the skin—Importance of exercise—The eyebrows—The eyelashes—The eyes—The feet and toe-nails—The figure—Freckles—Fringes and edgings—Sleeping in gloves.

At all Booksellers.

ORDER FORM. S.S.

To Book Publisher,
17 Henrietta Street, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "The Art of Beauty," for which I inclose the sum of 1s. 2d.

Name .....

Address .....

.....

Digitized by Google

THE WOMAN HE LOVED.

A Sorrowful Tale of a Man who would not Trust his Sweetheart.

RODNEY DANE and Alice Farley sat on the verandah together, and he had been reading to her. Suddenly the latter looked up, and asked:

"Would you wholly trust the woman you love, Rodney?"

"Wholly," he answered. "There must be entire faith or no faith at all. Where there is not confidence there cannot be love. The woman whom I love," he added, smiling down into the face upturned to his, with a look in his eyes that brought to it a flush like that you see in the heart of wild roses when the sunshine first coaxes their petals apart, "will trust me wholly, as I shall trust her. I think you would trust me too, Alice, for you are the woman I love."

Then he bent down and kissed her, and the woman who was watching them from behind the curtains of a window close by shut her hands fiercely together, and her face was full of jealous pain as she witnessed the caress.

"I wonder what he would think if he knew what I do?" she whispered. "I wonder"—with a look of perplexity on her face—"if Alice Farley is deceiving him? It does not seem possible that she is capable of such deceit, and yet—what else can one think when they see what I have seen? If he knew—if he only knew!"

That afternoon, as Rodney Dane and Alice Farley were walking up and down the path that led along the river bank, Margaret Worth joined them.

"We have been talking about ghosts," Alice said. "I believe in them, and Rodney does not. What do you think about them?"

"I am half inclined to believe in them," answered Miss Worth, "though I have always been sceptical on the subject; but last night I saw one, I think. It was just as the clock was striking twelve—the traditional hour for ghosts, you know—when I saw what convinced me that there were stranger things in earth than I had dreamt of. I was sitting by my window, for I had had a headache all day, and was unable to sleep. I happened to look down the path, and I saw a ghostly figure coming towards the place where we are now standing. It was too far off for me to be able to distinguish its features, but in general appearance it resembled you, Miss Farley."

Alice Farley's face turned suddenly white, and the hand that was toying with a rose shook with some strong emotion. Then, feeling that Rodney Dane's eyes were on her, a strange, guilty-looking flush took the place of the pallor that Miss Worth's words seemed to have occasioned.

"It must have been a ghost in love," went on Miss Worth, with her keen eyes on Miss Farley's face, to note the effect of her words; "for it had evidently come to keep a ghostly tryst. It was met by another ghost, and the meeting was very much like that of lovers who are in the flesh."

Alice Farley's face was white again now, and the eyes she lifted for a moment to Rodney Dane's had a frightened look in them.

"Did you dream this, or is it a little romance of the imagination for our amusement?" asked Dane, mystified by Miss Worth's words and manner, and their effect on Alice Farley.

"I did not dream what I have told you about, and I did not imagine it," answered Miss Worth. "I saw precisely what I have told you. If I did not see ghosts, what did I see?"

"Don't let's talk about such things," Alice said, with a shiver. "The river has a tempting look—take us out for a row, Rodney."

But the river could not charm away the spell that Miss Worth's strange words had left behind them. Rodney Dane could not help wondering what meaning lay hidden under them, and Alice Farley knew well enough what he was thinking about.

"The little rift within the lute," Miss Worth kept whispering to herself, exultantly, as her keen eyes saw what thoughts were at work.

That evening Rodney Dane met Margaret Worth in the hall.

"What did you mean to-day?" he asked, in an imperative tone.

"I meant—I scarcely know what," she answered. "But your talk about ghosts brought to my mind what I had seen and I spoke of it."

"Of course you did not expect us to think that you thought you had really seen a ghost," he said. "What was it, or, rather, who was it, that you saw? I am curious to know, you see, what romantic maiden holds midnight meetings with her lover."

"I cannot tell you that, because I do not know," she answered. "It looked like Miss Farley, but it scarcely seems possible that it could have been she."

"Of course it was not she," said Dane, but for all he spoke so decidedly, Miss Worth knew that there was a sort of doubt—or perhaps fear was a better word to use—at work in his mind. It was a feeling he could give no name to, as yet, because it was so vague; but because of that vagueness it was all the more tormenting.

Digitized by Google

It was on the following night that Rodney Dane saw the ghost that Miss Worth had seen.

He was sitting at the window, watching the lurid effect with which frequent flashes of lightning lit up a world of darkness. He could never sleep during a thunderstorm, so he stood looking out of the window.

A vivid flash made the landscape light as day, and showed to him a woman's figure stealing down the path. Before the lurid light had died away, the woman looked back as if fearful of being seen, and he saw the face of Alice Farley.

"Heavens," he cried, "where can she be going on such a night as this, and at such a time?" He threw up the sash and leant out into the night. Another flash showed her to him further down the path. Then there was quite an interval of darkness. When the next flash came, it showed him the woman he loved with a man's arm about her, and he saw her face lifted for a kiss.

The rest of that night was like a hideous dream to him. He scarcely knew what he was about as he made preparations to leave the place where his dream of life had come to him, and the terrible awakening from it.

"False! False!" he kept saying.

When morning came he was ready to go. He hoped to get away without seeing Alice, but he did not.

She met him in the hall.

"I am going away," he said, while his face was white. "I can scarcely be expected to stay longer after what I saw last night."

She grew pale to the lips.

"Oh, Rodney, if you only knew!' she cried. "Believe me, you would not blame me if you knew."

"Perhaps not," he answered coldly. "But not knowing, I judge by what I see."

"Oh, Rodney, trust me!" she cried. "You shall know the truth by-and-bye. I would explain it all to you now, but I dare not, until——"

"And yet you ask me to trust you!" he cried, breaking in upon her with words full of cruel scorn and unbelief. "I wish to Heaven I had never seen you—I hope I shall never look into your face again."

Then he turned away, and a moment later was gone; while Alice Farley stood there speechless and pale as death, and listened to the sound of his departing feet, and felt in a kind of numb way that her heart was breaking.

A week later Rodney Dane heard that Alice Farley had left her father's house for ever. Why, no one knew, but she was gone, and her father had forbidden anyone to speak of her to him. "Let it be as if she were dead," he said.

* * * * *

Five-and-twenty years after that day when he looked for the last time, as he believed, on the fair, false face of Alice Farley, Rodney Dane and his son were sitting in the private parlour of Dr. Graham's Asylum for the Insane. Dr. Graham had been Dane's schoolmate; Dane had come to visit Dr. Graham, bringing with him the young man who bore his name, and had a face so like his own that he was often startled at the likeness. It almost seemed as if he saw himself living life over again.

"I never saw a more striking resemblance," Dr. Graham said. "Looking at him I see you as you were at his age, and it seems as if you had kept your youth, while I have grown old."

By-and-bye, when the young man had left them, the two grey-haired men talked about the happenings of the years since they had seen each other.

"The last time I saw you, you will remember, was when you were on your way to some country place," Dr. Graham said. "From what you said to me I inferred that you expected to win a wife while there. Did you do so?"

Rodney Dane's face paled at the question. Five-and twenty years had not healed the wound that Alice Farley's supposed falseness had left in his heart. For, although he had tried to forget her, or, at least, to kill the love he had felt for her, he had never been able to do so. There had never been a day that he had not seen her as he saw her that last time, with the anguish of a breaking heart in her face. That look haunted him at night. It came to him like the ghost of something he had murdered. Though he told himself that she was false, and deserved no pity from him, he could not think of her without a strange thrill of regret and sorrow. For, you see, he had loved her as a man can love but once.

"No," he answered with a sigh, "I did not win the woman I told you of; or, rather, I won her and I lost her. You knew the woman I married—Margaret Worth—I think."

"I knew her well," Dr. Graham replied. "I used to think she cared more for you than she did for anyone else, but I never thought you would marry her."

"Things seldom happen as we think they are going to," Rodney Dane said, with a sigh. "Yes, I married Margaret Worth, and she was a faithful wife to me for many years. She, at least, was true," he added, while the memory of one who was false stirred his heart. He wondered if she were living or dead. For five-and-twenty years she had been dead to the world he lived in, but the grass of the grave might not be growing over her yet.

When young Rodney Dane joined them, after his walk through the grounds, Dr. Graham proposed that they should visit the Asylum.

"I have some strange cases under my charge," he said, as they entered the wards. "There is one," pointing to a woman who was standing at a window, looking out as if she hoped to see someone she had long been looking for, but who never came. Her face was hidden from them, but the snow-white hair that fell upon her neck told that she was no longer young.

"She has been here nearly fifteen years," Dr. Graham said. "Her story, told me by her brother, who put her in my charge just before his death, is like a leaf from a romance. This brother, years and years ago, was suspected of having committed a terrible crime. His father believed him guilty, and to save his life he fled from the home of his boyhood. Only one person had believed his story of innocence, and that person was his sister.

"For five years he wandered about the world, an outcast. Then the longing came over him to visit his old home again. He went back to it as a stranger, daring to make his identity known only to his sister, who had never lost her belief in his innocence. She met her brother secretly; but it seems that her lover witnessed their last meeting, and, believing that she was false, he left her in anger. She dared not tell him the truth, fearing that her father, who was a stern, unforgiving man, would set the police on the fugitive's track. In some manner, her father found out the truth, after all, and he was furious with wrath because she had disobeyed his command that she should never see her brother again. She was strong in her belief in that brother's innocence, and dared to say so. Then the old man, in his bitter, cruel wrath, drove her from home, and she sought refuge with her brother. Her trouble brought on a long illness. When bodily health came back, her mind was a wreck. Her brother kept her with him until he knew that he had not long to live. Then he put her in my charge, and she has been here ever since; and probably will still remain here, as her father died long ago, and she has no relatives. Since her brother died, I have been told that his innocence has been fully established by the confession of the guilty party. She seldom speaks to anybody, but is always watching and waiting for someone."

Rodney Dane's face had grown very pale as he listened to his old friend's story. Was it the story of the woman he loved that was being told him? Something assured him that it was.

The woman at the window turned suddenly, and faced them. Thus, after five-and-twenty years, Rodney Dane and Alice Farley met again. A cry, that had the sound of a sob in it, broke from the woman's lips. She sprang forward with outstretched hands.

"Oh! Rodney, Rodney, I have been waiting for this time so long, so long!" she cried, and her poor pale face was full of the unutterable pathos of the dead years. "I was not false to you, Rodney. Believe me!—oh! believe me!"

But her hands were not reached out to the Rodney Dane who had been her lover. Instead, she stood before his son, and to him her passionate plea was uttered.

Digitized by Google

"Alice," the Rodney of her past said, gently. "I am the man you mean. This man whom you mistake for me is my son. Have I changed so that you do not know me?"

"No, I do not know you," she said, looking at him as one might look at an utter stranger. "I never knew you. But you, Rodney—you have not grown a day older, it seems to me, than you were when I saw you last; while I—I have grown to be an old, old woman."

Young Rodney Dane looked from one to the other in perplexity.

"Alice," his father said, hoping to make the truth clear to her bewildered brain, "you are mistaken. This is another Rodney Dane. I am the one you knew."

"Why do you tell me that?" she cried. "I know better. You are an old man. This is the Rodney I knew," turning to the young man again. "Oh, Rodney, the man you saw me with was not my lover, but my brother, and I would have told you the truth, if you had trusted me a little. But you would not, and my heart broke when you left me, thinking I was false. Do you remember, Rodney, you said you prayed God you might never see my face again? But I prayed we might meet some time before I died, that I might tell you that I was true to you; and my prayer, not yours, has been answered. I could not die until I had told you the truth. Oh, Rodney, tell me that at last you believe me, and let me die in peace."

Rodney Dane signed to his son to give her the assurance she desired.

"I believe you," the young man said, with a strange feeling of being someone else. To his father it seemed, as he listened to the words that were meant for him addressed to another, as if he had died years ago, and this young man was the ghost of his former self.

"He believes me, and tells me so!" she cried, and her face was full of unutterable gladness. "I can die now."

She wavered like a reed in the wind, and would have fallen if her old lover had not sprung forward and caught her.

"The end's here," she whispered, her eyes on the young man's face—a look full of love that had outlived the sorrowful years. "Tell me again that you believe me, and kiss me once—just once, Rodney—to seal the peace between us."

Young Rodney Dane felt moved by something outside of himself. A great wave of tenderness for the woman who was lying in his father's arms swept over him. It was as if he became, for the time being, the man who loved her. He drew her to his breast and kissed her, and the man whose heart was mightily stirred by the love of long ago was obliged to see the kiss he longed to give, given by another.

"Good-bye," she said faintly, a great light coming into her face and making it radiant. "Sometime—sometime——"

Yes; sometime, somewhere, poor, weary heart, the tangled threads of Fate will be straightened out, and then——

There was a little flutter of the hands, one last look of love that could never die, and the woman Rodney Dane loved was dead in the arms of another. And it seemed to him that this was his punishment for his lack of faith in her, years ago, and a great sense of loss came over him as he looked through tears upon the face of the dead.

H. Trangmar.

ARE YOU GENEROUS? ARE YOU MEAN?

ARE YOU CLEVER? ARE YOU DULL?

Whatever you are it is as well to know other things concerning yourself, so send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope, to Ranee, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. A reliable delineation of your character will reach you in return—this will give you the required information.

The Slave's Revenge.

"The stomach," says Souvestre, "is a slave which is obliged to accept everything imposed upon it, and finally avenges its wrongs with the slyness and cruelty of a slave."

The eminent French author has happily expressed an important physical fact. When one comes to reflect upon it, there is something unique and pitiable about the position of the stomach in the human body. Upon no other organ except the lungs can you impose anything from the outside world. And it is your interest as well as your desire to draw into your lungs pure, fresh air only. And air in some form is the only thing the lungs ever receive. On the other hand, the stomach is a general receptacle, entirely at the mercy of its owner as to what shall be put into it, when, where, and how much. A man can throw into it anything that can be swallowed—every variety of food, any sort of drink, any amount of both, up to the bag's elastic capacity; and, if he wants to, he can put a layer of marbles on top, and finish off with prussic acid.

The point is, as M. Souvestre says, that this most important of all our organs is our slave. It cannot resist, it cannot call the police, it has no recourse to the law; it just takes what comes, and abides its time. But how to take care of the health, how to prevent the outbreak of ailments, is a problem much more complex than it seems to be. Therefore, when the enslaved and outraged stomach turns and lashes its owner with the cat-o'-nine-tails called dyspepsia, it must not be assumed, offhand, that the owner intended to drive his servant to desperation.

Mr. Thomas Anderton, of 50 Mill Lane, Newcastle-on-Tyne, described in writing on June 3rd, 1897, how his stomach punished him, and what he did to cure his ills. He said: "For many years I suffered from indigestion and weakness. My appetite was bad, and after eating I had pain at the chest and bowels. I never felt well rested, was heavy and weary, got very weak, and at times had to leave my work. I tried several medicines, and spent pounds in physic, but got little benefit. A friend told me of the benefit he derived from taking Mother Seigel's Syrup. I got a bottle of this medicine, and after taking it could eat well, and the food agreed with me. I soon found that the medicine was doing me more good than anything I had taken. By taking a dose now and again I keep in good health."

It will be seven years next June since Mr. Anderton made that statement, and he has not been ill since—his stomach lashes him no more. Read for yourself what he says to us in a letter dated at his old home, on February 15th, this year: "Gentlemen, it may interest you to know that since sending you my testimony in 1897 to the value of Mother Seigel's Syrup, I have continued to enjoy good health. I still take the medicine as I need it, and would not be without it in the house. When I think of how I suffered I am sorry I did not know of it sooner. I never had a proper night's rest, and I became so weak and languid that I could not work. Nothing did me any good but Mother Seigel's Curative Syrup. That cured me, and I shall always be grateful."

It is better never to be sick, but when we do fall ill it is a grand fact that a cure is at hand in the form of Mother Seigel's Syrup, which soothes the stomach and transforms it once more into a willing and faithful servant—not a rebellious slave.

A Woman's Power.

The smiles and favour of a beautiful woman are heaven enough for most men. But beauty and grace in women are founded on good health. Good health depends on good digestion, and that invariably follows the use of Mother Seigel's Syrup, a tonic made of roots and herbs. Beauty and strength spring up beside it, as flowers on a sunny slope. It brightens the eyes, clears the skin, and gives vigour, vivacity, and health to the languid and weak. All women need it occasionally.

Digitized by Google

RIVALS FOR SOPHIE.

A Sad, Sorrowful Tale of a Practical Joke.

Johnson and I were rivals — bitter, wicked, deadly rivals —and the object of our dual affections was a young lady named Sophonisba Robinson.

Now, so far as priority of acquaintance goes, I certainly had the advantage over Johnson, for it was at a small party given by my parents in celebration of my fifth birthday, that Sophie and I first met. She was about three and a half, and well do I remember her a plump, apple-cheeked, golden-haired, blue-eyed little darling, in a white muslin frock with a pink sash.

She came in with her mamma, who led her up to me, saying:

"Now, Sophie, dear, take your finger out of your mouth, and kiss the little boy, and give him his popgun."

Sophie did so. From that moment I felt that she was mine; and I have continued to feel the same thing (on and off) ever since.

For many years, however, a cruel Fate kept us apart. Then we met again; and I found that the old, old wound was still there. I also found that Johnson had a wound of a similar nature, and the discovery was not altogether pleasing, for Johnson is rather a good-looking fellow, and no end of a ladies' man, while an excessive natural modesty prevents me shining in society as I otherwise might.

Before I discovered his unfortunate partiality for Sophonisba, Johnson and I had been the best of friends; from that moment we were implacable foes, perpetually plotting and planning to undermine and cut each other out.

Johnson found that Miss Robinson played tennis, and he wasted a whole month's salary in getting a suitable rig-out, and joining her club. The very next week Sophonisba resigned.

Then I discovered by accident that she was passionately fond of boating, and I spent no end of time and money in learning how to row. When I considered myself a sufficiently skilful sculler, I invited Sophonisba to spend an afternoon with me on the river. We went; and never shall I forget it. It was a glorious day in midsummer.

The great sun shone; the little birds sang; the tall trees rocked in the breeze; the golden corn waved, and all that sort of thing; and there, like an angel in the stern of the boat, beautiful, radiant, and gracious, sat Sophonisba, my Sophonisba.

"Oh! Sophie! Sophonisba!" I thought, "if in one boat we two might float adown the stream of Life together, how happy would I be."

I was just getting up steam to make this remark aloud to Miss Robinson when I caught sight of my hated rival, Johnson, standing on the river-bank, sniggering.

Of course I felt considerably upset and put out. The next moment, in my excitement, I caught a crab, upset the boat, and we were both put out. Fortunately for me (for I can't swim) we were in very shallow water, so, after about two minutes' struggling and gasping, I managed to recover my feet, and having wiped from my eyes the mud I had gathered at the bottom of the river, I looked anxiously round for Sophonisba.

Would you believe it? That wretched, interfering Johnson (who, by-the-bye, can swim like a fish) had actually dived in and rescued her. Why didn't he leave her alone? What had it to do with him? I daresay I could have got her out myself. Anyhow, I should have tried. Then, again, what right had he to take her home, leaving me to tow the boat back?

It was about six weeks later that Sophie and I met again. Then I found her just as gracious as ever—only it was to Johnson instead of to me.

But I didn't give in. Sophonisba could sing, so I endeavoured to regain her affections by playing her accompaniments. Then that Johnson was so abominably mean as to sing love-duets with her behind my back, while I played.

Next I tried to wheedle her affections with the violin. Johnson retaliated with the banjo and comic songs. I went in for the hornpipe, and Johnson came out with the Highland sword dance in costume. Then I gave a series of recitals in heavy tragedy, and Johnson gave a course of entertainments in parlour magic and table turning.

So we went on, hammer and tongs, until Johnson and I bade fair to become the two most accomplished young men in our town. And at the end of it all Sophonisba seemed to dislike us about equally.

But this kind of thing couldn't go on for ever, and it was equally certain that we couldn't both marry her.

So I determined to bring the matter to an issue. I redoubled my exertions, straining every nerve; and at last, after having been on my knees in a moist conservatory for half an hour and five minutes, I managed to wring from Sophonisba the confession that she "was not altogether indifferent to me, but she was afraid her father would never consent." Of course I suggested an elopement, and after a proper amount of hesitation Sophonisba consented.

It was arranged that I was to hire a carriage and call for Sophie at the house of a friend, and, in order to disarm the suspicions of this friend, I was to go closely disguised as a lady. Then we were to drive to Euston, proceeding thence by train to some friends of mine in the North of England; and the next morning we were to be married by special license.

I will not weary you by detailing the hopes and fears that alternated within my bosom, when the eventful evening at length actually arrived. Suffice it to say that I went; that I found Sophonisba waiting, closely wrapped and veiled ready for our journey; that she entered the carriage, and we drove off into the darkness.

How can I describe the bliss of that moment. I felt that at last I had triumphed indeed, and I positively gloated over the thought of the awful misery that would come upon Johnson when he heard of our elopement, and then to think that Sophonisba Robinson was mine at last!

I could scarcely wait until we were a safe distance from the house, before I turned to seize her in my arms, and imprint one long passionate kiss upon her lips—and I came in contact with a heavy moustache! It wasn't Sophonisba after all! It was Johnson!

It was only too true; Sophonisba had deceived us both; had induced us to adopt ridiculous disguises, and then made us elope with each other.

I need not say how sadly and quietly Johnson and I sought our respective homes that evening.

One word more. Sophonisba is married now. Johnson and I are warm friends again—but we are both bachelors.

R. Panfold.

Digitized by Google

A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle at ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.
"CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," SINGERS," &c.
Their names guarantee their quality.

FROM 8/- MONTHLY.

A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6
On approval. Two Years' Warranty.
Write for Lists (Free).
EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. S3),
World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

Beauty.

Without Icilma Natural Water, Soap, and Cream no woman can keep a clear, healthy, and delicately-tinted skin. Icilma invigorates, cleanses, and beautifies as no artificial cosmetic can do; by its use alone can natural beauty be assured. Prevents sunburn and refreshes. Cures nettlerash and mosquito bites. (Samples Soap and Cream, 2d.) Icilma (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

£8 10

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted
Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

Of all Chemists, or Post Free for P.O. only for 1/3, 2/10, and 4/7 from the Sole Proprietors:

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Mfging. Chemists, NOTTS.

FREEMAN'S

TRADE MARK

THE ORIGINAL & ONLY TRUE

CHLORODYNE

Best Remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.

Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 6s., or postage free by the INVENTOR, R. FREEMAN, 70 KENNINGTON PARK ROAD, LONDON, S.E.

RECOMMENDED BY MEDICAL MEN.

N.B.—Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Justices James and Mellish, decided in favour of Freeman's Original Chlorodyne, and against Browne & Davenport, compelling them to pay all costs.
—"Times," 24-7-73.

GIVEN AWAY

With This Week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 534)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

Spring Coat.

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents.

PRICE ONE PENNY.

Now appearing in 12 fortnightly parts. Price 7d. Each NET.

PART V. JUST PUBLISHED.

PEARSON'S

HOME MANAGEMENT.

Over 1,000 Pages.
12 Beautifully Produced Coloured Illustrations.
64 Full Page Half Tone Illustrations.
Many Small Cuts in the Text.

SOME OF THE CONTRIBUTORS ARE:

Mrs. HUMPHRY, "MADGE" of Truth, on "The General Management of the Home."
Mrs. RATTRAY. Diplomée of the National Training School of Cookery on Plain Cookery, with Hundreds of Recipes.
Mrs. WILSON, of the National Training School of Cookery, on High-Class Cookery, with Hundreds of Recipes.
T. F. GARRETT, on Carving, with practical diagrams.
EDWIN WOOTON, L.M., on the Choice of a House.
Miss WHYTE WALTON, on Furnishing and Decorating.
Mrs. WALDEMAR LEVERTON, on Furnishing Small Homes.
FRED. MILLER, on Doing up the House.
G. R. M. DEVEREUX, on Etiquette.
A TOILET SPECIALIST, on the Toilet.
Miss JOSEPHA CRANE, on Sewing and Embroidery.
MARY FERMOR, on Laundry and Dairy Work.
F. E. WILSON, on Poultry Keeping.
Miss VIOLET BIDDLE, on Gardening and Flowers and Plants for Indoor Decoration.
LYDIA LENEY, M.D., Home Doctoring of Children.
A BARRISTER-AT-LAW, on Legal Points for Householders.

Forming the most complete and up-to-date work on Household Management yet published.

5/-

CARR. FREE.

Marvellous Offer

FOR A SHORT TIME ONLY.

A Manufacturer's Stock of these splendid Tailor-Made Skirts, very latest design, in Black Vicuna Cloth, Strapped Mercerised Silkette. Send at once Postal Order for 5/-

With length of front and waist measurement to

WIGAN SKIRT CO.
WIGAN.
Est. 1885

JUNO CYCLES ARE THE VERY BEST

FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN

Rustless Roman Rims & Hubs

Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.

CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of
£3 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
3 3 0 „ 15/10 „
3 10 0 „ 16/8 „
3 10 0 „ 17/6 „
JUNO Motor Cycles, 3 H.P., £34, or Monthly Payments.

JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.

Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ltd., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S

(The most nutritious)

COCOA

And take no other.

DAILY EXPRESS.

ONE HALFPENNY.

RIDER AGENTS WANTED

One in each district to ride and exhibit a sample 1904 Cycle.
Highest grade fully warranted
BRITISH MADE CYCLES
LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6
New Departure Coaster Hubs, Best Makes Tyres, and best British made equipment throughout.
200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, good as new, £1 to £2-10
Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. We send on approval and allow Ten Days' Free Trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded without question if you are not satisfied.
EARN A CYCLE taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Our agents are making large profits. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer. Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos, half prices.
MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 446,
85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool,
19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

IN CONFIDENCE

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Matrimony for Managers.

"CONSTANT READER."—I don't think your letter at all childish, and your case interests me very much. You are twenty-three, and still unattached. You have worked in a situation for seven years and are now manager at a decent salary, and your master informs you that it is almost essential you should soon be married. You have never had an attachment in your life, but have a comfortable home. There are no nice girls in your neighbourhood. You hate dancing, and would not speak to a girl without introduction.

* * * * *

Altogether, you seem just the sort of man who would make a girl a good husband. But that you have never had an attachment suggests that you are not of a very affectionate disposition. That does not matter so very much, for many men do not develop that part of their character until much later in life. Your master may be quite right, from his point of view, that you should soon get married. But it seems rather hard to expect you to produce the woman of your heart at such short notice. As he seems to have such an interest in you, why not ask him to take you in hand himself, and introduce you to his own circle? Many masters anxious to find wives for their model employés have gone so far as to give their own daughters. Instead of looking about casually for a girl, try to get your master to help you in your search. He must be able to do so. For my own part, as you must know, if you have read Short Stories, it is impossible for me to undertake to introduce readers to each other, as if I consented in one case, I could not refuse in another, and that would turn this paper into a matrimonial agency.

To Squash Slanders.

So, "LAURA," some kind friend has been spreading slanderous stories about you, and you wish to bring it home to somebody. You believe it to be a certain young lady of your acquaintance, but cannot be sure about it. What you say is important—to stop the slanders spreading, and to make the person who started them apologise. What do I recommend?

* * * * *

You must be very careful not to fix the blame on the wrong person. Even if the lady you suspect had something to do with the affair, for all you know her own conduct may have been quite blameless. I advise you to do as I have often advised other readers. When next you meet the young lady, tell her that you have reason to believe that somebody has been spreading false stories about you. Point out that these stories are doing you great injury, and that they must at once stop. You need not accuse anybody, but the gentle hint you will thus give the person you suspect may extract a confession, and, in any case, will certainly convey a warning. If, later on, you succeed in tracing the source of the slanders, I do not advise legal proceedings, as they seldom result satisfactorily in private affairs. But if you can force the person to apologise you will have done the best thing possible.

Wants Curly Hair.

"I HAVE got soft, straight hair," writes "P. O. T." "Can you give me a remedy for making it curly?"

* * * * *

This is the first time I have heard of "soft, straight hair" as requiring a "remedy." "P. O. T." evidently does not know that her kind of hair is often quite as becoming as curly hair. No young man is likely to admire her more for curls which are artificially made. I take it that "P. O. T." is a young lady. That such a question would bother a young man seems scarcely likely.

Dance Matters.

A LADY you have met at a dance, "V. B.," is not compelled by etiquette to recognise a partner on meeting him afterwards. If she likes, she can do so, or not, as the case may be. In any case, it rests with the lady.

* * * * *

The best way, at a dance, for an engaged young man to avoid causing his sweetheart jealousy, is to dance with the older and less beautiful lady guests—preferably those of the maternal and dowager type. It is doing the old ladies a kindness, and young men often find them strangely interesting and attractive if properly dealt with.

A Cooling-off.

"PERPLEXED."—I think the coolness you speak of in the young lady to whom you are engaged must be the result of some falling-off in your affections. After a year's engagement it is quite often that little things happen which cause slight misunderstandings. Unless these affairs are instantly cleared up, the coolness increases, and the two parties find themselves drawn apart.

* * * * *

Now, this seems to have occurred in your case. Evidently your fiancée feels that you have not been properly attentive to her. Perhaps she has got wind of the friendship which has sprung up between yourself and the other young lady. She certainly feels slighted in some way. It is now your plain duty to declare your own feelings. You confess that the second young lady seems to be fonder of you; that she seems to have a nicer character; and more "true love." You admit that you feel yourself beginning to love her. Now this cannot have happened unless you have fallen off in some way towards your fiancée. My advice to you is to definitely choose between the two girls. The second girl seems to me to promise to make you the truer wife. As the first girl has offered to release you from your engagement, you have it in your own hands to break off. If your affection for her is waning, it will have waned almost entirely in another year. Better avoid all deception and declare your intentions at once.

Between the Tiffs.

"ARTHUR" was introduced to a girl some months ago, understanding her to be engaged to a young man also known to him. The other day he again met this girl, and on inquiring for her fiancé, was informed that the two had quarrelled, and were no longer seeing each other. As "ARTHUR" was very much struck with the girl, he asks: "Would it be safe now for me to pay her attentions?"

* * * * *

That is for the girl to decide. As she is free, apparently, from her engagement with the other man, there is nothing to prevent your showing her attention. She will soon enough pull you up if it should turn out that she is really in love with the other man. It is a trifle risky to step in so soon after the breach, as tiffs like that between lovers have a way of healing themselves, and the person who steps in between usually comes out worst in the encounter.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"The Most Perfect Form of Cocoa."

—Guy's Hospital Gazette.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa

300 Gold Medals, &c.

TRY ALSO FRY'S COCOA AND MILK.

A Combination of FRY'S PURE COCOA with the Best English Milk.

MADE INSTANTLY WITH BOILING WATER.

NO MILK OR SUGAR REQUIRED.

"Refreshing and Nutritive."—Lancet.

Digitized by Google

"Reading between the lines"

When you consider how much depends upon it, what can be more important to you than the state of your health?

often reveals a story more

If you are troubled with bad or indifferent health, your capacities for work and pleasure are affected—interesting than is at first you cannot get sufficient rest or nourishment—even your life is threatened. Thousands of people, in all parts of the globe, apparent. Just read "between maintain good health by occasionally taking BEECHAM'S PILLS, the best and safest medicine obtainable. It has been proved beyond doubt these lines" and something that BEECHAM'S PILLS are the most valued specific to keep health up to the right standard. One trial of great importance to will convince you that, for restoring you to perfect condition and keeping you so, BEECHAM'S PILLS are indeed Worth a Guinea a Box.

you will be disclosed.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London W.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 798. Week Ending April 16, 1904 Price One Penny.

The Baroness was Miss Spencer in disguise! Nella had seen her take a pellet of paper from the tart she was eating! What could it mean?

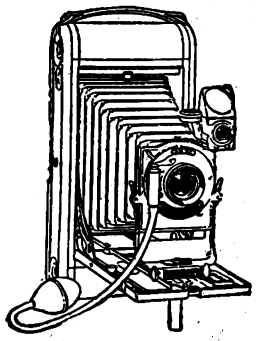
A Dramatic Episode from "Phantom Shadows," the Splendid New Serial just started.

The most popular pastime of the day is

- Picture -

Postcard Making

for which no camera is so effective as an Eastman Kodak. Any pattern will do, but the 3a F.P.K. is particularly suitable on account of its shape, the pictures given being 5½ by 3¼ inches. For printing postcards from your own negatives use Kodak Solio or Self-Toning Solio, the easiest of any to work.



Packets of Twelve Solio Postcards with two masks, are sold at 6d.

May be obtained from all dealers or from

Kodak Ltd.,

41-43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C.

Wholesale and Retail Branches: 96 Bold Street, Liverpool; and 72-74 Buchanan Street, Glasgow. Retail Branches: 59 Brompton Road, S.W.; 60 Cheapside, E.C.; 115 Oxford Street, W.; 171-173 Regent Street, W; and 40 Strand, London, W.C.

CAUTION.—Insist on having the "Kodak" brand. As the hallmark on silver, is the name "Kodak" on photographic goods. Beware of experimental imitations.

J. G. GRAVES'

Tailoring.

LOUNGE SUITS .. FROM 30/-

Smart Well-Fitting Suits in Serges, Vicunas, and Tweeds. Patterns sent free on application.

Send for Illustrated Catalogue of Men's, Youths', and Boys Suits, Overcoats, Mackintoshes, Hats, Collars, Ties, and everything for men's wear, sent post free, together with full particulars of latest styles, patterns, and measurement chart.

Easy Terms of Purchase, or Cash with Discount Advantages, as preferred.

Agents Wanted. Good Pay. No Responsibility. Write for Terms.

J. G. GRAVES, 169 DIVISION ST., SHEFFIELD.

An admirable Food of the

EPPS'S

Finest quality and flavour.

COCOA

Nutritious and Economical.

SAPON

THE IDEAL CLEANSER

A harmless vegetable compound which dissolves grease so wonderfully that the dirt "drops out" without rubbing and the clothes last longer.

Harmless to Hands.

Careful of Colour.

Death to Dirt.

THE ONLY PERFECT CLEANSER OF WOOLLENS.

Send a post-card to SAPON LTD. (Dept. 68), St. Swithin's Chambers, London, for a FREE TRIAL PACKET.

Kaputine

THE SAFE REMEDY

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Headache,

Neuralgia & all Nerve Pains

One dose of Kaputine, costing 1d., cures in ten minutes the most violent nerve pain,—every time.

Kaputine is not an aperient, and causes no inconvenience, but is for one purpose only—to cure Nerve Pains.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—and gives immediate relief.

Kaputine, unlike the dangerous white headache powders consisting of one crude drug, is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical Profession.

Kaputine is sold by all Medicine Dealers, Packets of 18 doses, 1/-. Samples 1d. each.

Write now for samples free and post paid to

O. Q. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 1904

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 798.] Week Ending April 16th, 1904. [One Penny.

THIS SPLENDID NEW SERIAL HAS JUST BEGUN.

A Story of Love and Crime.

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

Synopsis of First Chapters.

Mr. Theodore Racksole, American multi-millionaire, accompanied by his daughter Nella, arrives at the Grand Babylon Hotel. At dinner he orders Jules, the dignified head-waiter, to bring him a steak and a bottle of Bass.

Jules is annoyed at this strange order, and refuses to carry out the millionaire's instructions.

Calmly, without a word of expostulation, Racksole seeks out Félix Babylon, the proprietor of the hotel, and in less than twenty minutes contracts have been signed between the two parties, by which it is transferred to Racksole for the sum of £400,000.

The millionaire then orders the chef, Rocco, to cook him a steak, and to see that it is served, with a bottle of Bass, by Jules at their table in the dining-room.

When Racksole returns to his daughter, he finds that with her is a Mr. Reginald Dimmock, English companion to Prince Aribert of Posen. As Jules is serving the steak, Racksole sees him give a significant, ominous wink to this Dimmock. In the course of conversation, the latter says that his master is on the point of coming to the hotel.

Racksole stays talking very late that night to Mr. Babylon, and as he is making his way to his room in the small hours of the morning, he sees Jules emerging from Room 111—Nella Racksole's! What can it mean? Ten silent strides, and the millionaire, revolver in hand, is upon him.

By force, Racksole makes Jules return with him to Room 111. On opening the door, they find therein not Nella, but Dimmock!

The latter explains how the window of the room had been broken by a stone flung from the outside, and how, in order to save Miss Racksole from the discomfort occasioned thereby, he had volunteered to exchange rooms with her. The millionaire accepts the explanation, although the circumstances of the case worry him considerably.

Miss Spencer, the hotel clerk, is found to have left the hotel during the night in a very mysterious manner.

Racksole summons Jules, and, in a few words, during which he learns that the waiter has saved £20,000, dismisses him, forbidding him to enter the hotel again.

Prince Aribert arrives at the hotel and is received by Nella, who recognises him as the "Count Steenbock" she had met the previous Spring in Paris. He tells her that he is in London on important business, connected with his nephew, Prince Eugen, the reigning Duke of Posen, who is to follow him to the Grand Babylon immediately.

As they are talking Mr. Racksole and two men come into the room, carrying on a stretcher the dead body of Reginald Dimmock!

At the hotel that night is given a great ball by a Mr. and Mrs. Sampson Levj. In a little secret balcony, known only to the hotel authorities, from which the whole of the ball-room can be surveyed, Racksole finds Jules!

In the morning the millionaire is informed that during the night Dimmock's body has completely disappeared!

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

THIS WEEK'S INSTALMENT.

SEVENTH CHAPTER.

Nella and the Prince.

It appeared impossible to Theodore Racksole that so cumbrous an article as a dead body could be removed out of his hotel, with no trace, no hint, no clue as to the time or the manner of the performance of the deed. After the first feeling of surprise, Racksole grew coldly and severely angry. He had a mind to dismiss the entire staff of the hotel. He personally examined the night-watchmen, the chambermaids, and all other persons who by chance might or ought to know something of the affair; but without avail. The body of Reginald Dimmock had vanished utterly—disappeared like a fleshless spirit.

Of course there were the police. But Theodore Racksole held the police in sorry esteem. He acquainted them with the facts, answered their queries with a patient weariness, and expected nothing whatever from that quarter. He also had several interviews with Prince Aribert of Posen, but though the Prince was suavity itself, and beyond doubt genuinely concerned about the fate of his dead attendant, yet it seemed to Racksole that he was keeping something back, that he hesitated to say all he knew.

Racksole, with characteristic insight, decided that the death of Reginald Dimmock was only a minor event, which had occurred, as it were, on the fringe of some far more profound mystery. And, therefore, he decided to wait, with his eyes very wide open, until something else happened that would throw light on the business. At the moment he took only one measure—he arranged that the theft of Dimmock's body should not appear in the newspapers.

It is astonishing how well a secret can be kept, when the possessors of the secret are handled with the proper mixture of firmness and persuasion. Racksole managed this very neatly. It was a complicated job, and his success in it rather pleased him.

At the same time he was conscious of being temporarily worsted by an unknown group of schemers, in which he felt convinced that Jules was an important item. He could scarcely look Nella in the eyes. The girl had evidently expected him to unmask this conspiracy at once, with a single stroke of the millionaire's magic wand. She was thoroughly accustomed, in the land of her birth, to seeing him achieve impossible feats. Over there he was a "boss"; men trembled before his name; when he wished a thing to happen—well, it happened; if he desired to know a thing, he just knew it. But here, in London, Theodore Racksole was not quite the same Theodore Racksole. He dominated New York, but London, for the most part, seemed not to take much interest in him; and there were certainly various persons in London who were capable of snapping their fingers at him—at Theodore Racksole! Neither he nor his daughter could get used to that fact.

As for Nella, she concerned herself for a little with the ordinary business of the bureau, and watched the incomings and outgoings of Prince Aribert with a kindly interest. She perceived what her father had failed to perceive, that his Highness had assumed an attitude of reserve merely to hide the secret distraction and dismay which consumed him. She saw that the poor fellow had no settled plan in his head, and that he was troubled by something which, so far, he had confided to nobody. It came to her knowledge that each morning he walked to and fro on the Victoria Embankment, alone, and apparently with no object. On the third morning she decided that driving exercise on the Embankment would be good for her health, and thereupon ordered a carriage and issued forth, arrayed in a miraculous, putty-coloured gown. Near Blackfriars Bridge she met the Prince, and the carriage was drawn up by the pavement.

"Good-morning, Prince," she greeted him. "Are you mistaking this for Hyde Park?"

He bowed and smiled.

"I usually walk here in the mornings," he said.

"You surprise me," she returned. "I thought I was the only person in London who preferred the Embankment, with this view of the river, to the dustiness of Hyde Park. I can't imagine how it is that London will never take exercise anywhere except in that ridiculous Park. Now, if they had Central Park——"

"I think the Embankment is the finest spot in all London," he said.

She leant a little out of the landau, bringing her face nearer to his.

"I do believe we are kindred spirits, you and I," she murmured; and then: "Au revoir, Prince!"

"One moment, Miss Racksole." His quick tones had a note of intreaty.

"I am in a hurry," she fibbed; "I am not merely taking exercise this morning. You have no idea how busy we are."

"Ah! then I will not trouble you. But I leave the Grand Babylon to-night."

"Do you?" she said. "Then will your Highness do me the honour of lunching with me to-day in father's room? Father will be out—he is having a day in the City with some stockbroking persons."

"I shall be charmed," said the Prince, and his face showed that he meant it.

Nella drove off.

If the lunch was a success that result was due partly to Rocco, and partly to Nella. The Prince said little beyond what the ordinary rules of the conversational game demanded. His hostess talked much and talked well, but she failed to rouse her guest. When they had had coffee he took a rather formal leave of her.

"Good-bye, Prince," she said, "but I thought—that is, no, I didn't. Good-bye."

"You thought I wished to discuss something with you. I did; but I have decided that I have no right to burden your mind with my affairs."

"But suppose—suppose I wish to be burdened?"

"That is your good-nature."

"Sit down," she said abruptly, "and tell me everything—mind, everything. I adore secrets."

Almost before he knew it he was talking to her, rapidly, eagerly.

"Why should I weary you with my confidences?" he said. "I don't know, I cannot tell; but I feel that I must. I feel that you will understand me better than anyone else in the world. And yet why should you understand me? Again, I don't know. Miss Racksole, I will disclose to you the whole trouble in a word. Prince Eugen, the hereditary Grand Duke of Posen, has disappeared. Four days ago I was to have met him at Ostend. He had affairs in London. He wished me to come with him. I sent Dimmock on in front, and waited for Eugen. He did not arrive. I telegraphed back to Cologne, his last stopping-place, and I learnt that he had left there in accordance with his programme; I learnt also that he had passed through Brussels. It must have been between Brussels and the railway station at Ostend Quay that he disappeared. He was travelling with a single equerry, and the equerry, too, has vanished. I need not explain to you, Miss Racksole, that when a person of the importance of my nephew contrives to get lost one must proceed cautiously. One cannot advertise for him in the London Times. Such a disappearance must be kept secret. The people at Posen and at Berlin believe that Eugen is in London, here, at this hotel; or, rather, they did so believe. But this morning I received a cipher telegram from—from His Majesty the Emperor, a very peculiar telegram, asking when Eugen might be expected to return to Posen, and requesting that he should go first to Berlin. That telegram was addressed to myself. Now, if the Emperor thought that Eugen was here, why should he have caused the telegram to be addressed to me? I have hesitated for three days, but I can hesitate no longer. I must myself go to the Emperor and acquaint him with the facts."

"I suppose you've just got to keep straight with him?" Nella was on the point of saying, but she checked herself and substituted: "The Emperor is your chief, is he not? 'First among equals,' you call him."

Digitized by Google

"His Majesty is our over-lord," said Aribert quietly.

"Why do you not take immediate steps to inquire as to the whereabouts of your Royal nephew?" she asked simply. The affair seemed to her just then so plain and straightforward.

"Because one of two things may have happened. Either Eugen may have been, in plain language, abducted, or he may have had his own reasons for changing his programme and keeping in the background—out of reach of telegraph and post and railways."

"What sort of reasons?"

"Do not ask me. In the history of every family there are passages——" He stopped.

"And what was Prince Eugen's object in coming to London?"

Aribert hesitated.

"Money," he said at length. "As a family we are very poor — poorer than anyone in Berlin suspects."

"Prince Aribert," Nella said, "shall I tell you what I think?"

She leant back in her chair, and looked at him out of half-closed eyes. His pale, thin, distinguished face held her gaze as if by some fascination. There could be no mistaking this man for anything else but a Prince.

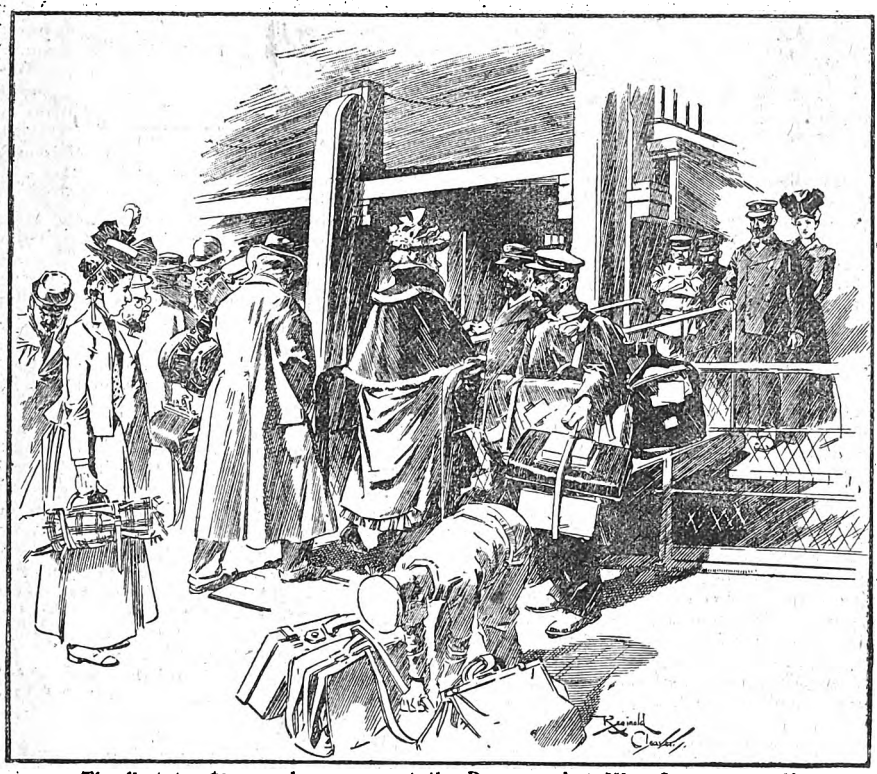
"If you will," he said.

"Prince Eugen is the victim of a plot."

"You think so?"

"I am perfectly convinced of it."

"But why? What can be the object of a plot against him?"



The first to step on shore was not the Baroness, but Miss Spencer herself.

"That is a point of which you should know more than I," she remarked drily.

"Ah! Perhaps, perhaps," he said. "But, dear Miss Racksole, why are you so sure?"

"There are several reasons, and they are connected with Mr. Dimmock. Did you ever suspect, your Highness, that that poor young man was not entirely loyal to you?"

"He was absolutely loyal," said the Prince, with all the earnestness of conviction.

"A thousand pardons, but he was not."

"Miss Racksole, if any other than yourself made that assertion, I would—I would——"

"Consign them to the deepest dungeon in Posen?" she laughed lightly. "Listen!" And she told him of the incidents which had occurred in the night preceding his arrival in the hotel.

"Do you mean, Miss Racksole, that there was an understanding between poor Dimmock and this fellow Jules?"

"There was an understanding."

"Impossible!"

"Your Highness, the man who wishes to probe a mystery to its root never uses the word 'impossible.' But I will say this for young Mr. Dimmock. I think he repented, and I think that it was because he repented that he—er—died so suddenly, and that his body was spirited away."

"Why has no one told me these things before?" Aribert exclaimed.

"Princes seldom hear the truth," she said.

He was astonished at her coolness, her firmness of assertion, her air of complete acquaintance with the world.

"Miss Racksole," he said, "if you will permit me to say it, I have never in my life met a woman like you. May I rely on your sympathy—your support?"

"My support, Prince? But how?"

"I do not know," he replied. "But you could help me if you would. A woman, when she has brains, always has more brains than a man."

"Ah!" she said ruefully, "I have no brains, but I do believe I could help you."

What prompted her to make that assertion she could not have explained, even to herself. But she made it, and she had a suspicion—a prescience—that it would be justified, though by what means, through what good fortune, was still a mystery to her.

"Go to Berlin," she said. "I see that you must do that; you have no alternative. As for the rest, we shall see. Something will occur. I shall be here. My father will be here. You must count us as your friends."

He kissed her hand when he left, and afterwards, when she was alone, she kissed the spot his lips had touched again and again. Now, thinking the matter out in the calmness of solitude, all seemed strange, unreal, uncertain to her. Were conspiracies actually possible nowadays? Did queer things actually happen in Europe? And did they actually happen in London hotels? She dined with her father that night.

"I hear Prince Aribert has left," said Theodore Racksole.

"Yes," she assented. She said not a word about their interview.

EIGHTH CHAPTER.

Arrival and Departure of the Baroness.

On the following morning, just before lunch, a lady, accompanied by a maid and a considerable quantity of luggage, came to the Grand Babylon Hotel. She was a plump, little old lady, with white hair and an old-fashioned bonnet, and she had a quaint, simple smile of surprise at everything in general. Nevertheless, she gave the impression of belonging to some aristocracy, though not the English aristocracy. Her tone to her maid, whom she addressed in broken English—the girl being apparently English—was distinctly insolent, with the calm, unconscious insolence peculiar to a certain type of Continental nobility. The name on the lady's card ran thus: "Baroness Zerlinski." She desired rooms on the third floor. It happened that Nella was in the bureau.

Digitized by Google

"On the third floor, madam?" questioned Nella, in her best clerkly manner.

"I did say on de tird floor," said the plump, little old lady.

"We have accommodation on the second floor."

"I wish to be high up, out of de dust and in de light," explained the Baroness.

"We have no suites on the third floor, madam."

"Never mind, no mattaire! Have you not two rooms that communicate?"

Nella consulted her books rather awkwardly.

"Numbers 122 and 123 communicate."

"Or is it 121 and 122?" the little old lady remarked quickly, and then bit her lip.

"I beg your pardon. I should have said 121 and 122."

At the moment Nella regarded the Baroness' correction of her figures as a curious chance, but afterwards, when the Baroness had ascended in the lift, the thing struck her as somewhat strange. Perhaps the Baroness Zerlinski had stayed at the hotel before. For the sake of convenience an index of visitors at the hotel was kept, and the index extended back for thirty years. Nella examined it, but it did not contain the name of Zerlinski. Then it was that Nella began to imagine, what had swiftly crossed her mind when first the Baroness presented herself at the bureau, that the features of the Baroness were remotely familiar to her. She thought, not that she had seen the old lady's face before, but that she had seen somewhere, some time, a face of a similar cast. It occurred to Nella to look at the "Almanach de Gotha"—that record of all the mazes of Continental blue blood; but the "Almanach de Gotha" made no reference to any barony of Zerlinski. Nella inquired where the Baroness meant to take lunch, and was informed that a table had been reserved for her in the dining-room, and she at once decided to lunch in the dining-room herself. Seated in a corner, half-hidden by a pillar, she could survey all the guests.

Presently the Baroness appeared, dressed in black, with a tiny lace shawl, despite the June warmth; very stately, very quaint, and gently smiling. Nella observed her intently. The lady ate heartily, working without haste and without delay through the elaborate menu of the luncheon. Nella noticed that she had beautiful white teeth. Then a remarkable thing happened. A cream puff was served to the Baroness by way of sweets, and Nella was astonished to see the little lady remove the top, and with a spoon quietly take something from the interior which looked like a piece of folded paper. No one who had not been watching with the eye of a lynx would have noticed anything extraordinary in the action; indeed, the chances were nine hundred and ninety-nine to one that it would pass unheeded. But, unfortunately for the Baroness, it was the thousandth chance that happened. Nella jumped up, and walking over to the Baroness, said to her:

"I'm afraid that the tart is not quite nice, your ladyship.'

"Thanks, it is delightful," said the Baroness coldly. Her smile had vanished. "Who are you? I thought you were de bureau clerk."

"My father is the owner of this hotel. I thought there was something in the tart which ought not to have been there."

Nella looked the Baroness full in the face. The piece of folded paper, to which a little cream had attached itself, lay under the edge of a plate.

"No, thanks." The Baroness smiled her simple smile.

Nella departed. She had noticed one trifling thing besides the paper—namely, that the Baroness could pronounce the English "th" sound if she chose.

That afternoon, in her own room, Nella sat meditating at the window for a long time, and then she suddenly sprang up, her eyes brightening.

"I know," she exclaimed, clapping her hands. "It's Miss Spencer, disguised! Why didn't I think of that before?" Her thoughts ran instantly to Prince Aribert. "Perhaps I can help him," she said to herself, and gave a little sigh. She went down to the office and inquired whether the Baroness had given any instructions about dinner. She felt that some plan must be formulated. She wanted to get hold of Rocco, and put him in the rack. She knew now that Rocco, the unequalled, was also concerned in this mysterious affair.

"The Baroness Zerlinski has left, about a quarter of an hour ago," said the attendant.

"But she only arrived this morning."

"The Baroness' maid said that her mistress had received a telegram, and must leave at once. The Baroness paid the bill, and went away in a four-wheeler."

"Where to?"

"The trunks were labelled for Ostend."

Perhaps it was instinct, perhaps it was the mere spirit of adventure; but that evening Nella was to be seen of all men on the steamer for Ostend which leaves Dover at 11 p.m. She had told no one of her intentions—not even her father, who was not in the hotel when she left. She had scribbled a brief note to him to expect her back in a day or two, and had posted this at Dover. The steamer was the Marie Henriette, a large and luxurious boat, whose state rooms on deck vie with the glories of the Cunard and White Star liners. One of these state rooms, the best, was evidently occupied, for every curtain of its windows was carefully drawn. Nella did not hope that the Baroness was on board; it was quite possible for the Baroness to have caught the eight o'clock steamer, and it was also possible for the Baroness not to have gone to Ostend at all, but to some other place in an entirely different direction.

Nevertheless, Nella hoped that the lady who called herself Zerlinski might be in that curtained state room, and throughout the smooth, moonlit voyage she never once relaxed her observation of its doors and its windows.

The Marie Henriette arrived in Ostend Harbour punctually

Digitized by Google

at 2 o'clock in the morning. There was the usual heterogeneous, gesticulating crowd on the quay. Nella kept her post near the door of the state room, and at length she was rewarded by seeing it open. Four middle-aged Englishmen issued from it. From a glimpse of the interior Nella saw that they had spent the voyage in card-playing.

It would not be too much to say that she was distinctly annoyed. She pretended to be annoyed with circumstances, but really she was annoyed with Nella Racksole. At two in the morning, without luggage, without any companionship, and without a plan of campaign, she found herself in a strange foreign port—a port of evil repute, possessing some of the worst-managed hotels in Europe. She strolled on the quay for a few minutes, and then she saw the smoke of another steamer in the offing. She inquired from an official what the steamer might be, and was told that it was the eight o'clock from Dover, which had broken down, put into Calais for some slight necessary repairs, and was arriving at its destination nearly four hours late. Her mercurial spirits rose again. A minute ago she was regarding herself as no better than a ninny engaged in a wild-goose chase. Now she felt that after all she had been very sagacious and cunning. She was morally sure that she would find the Zerlinski woman on this second steamer, and she took all the credit to herself in advance. Such is human nature.

The steamer seemed interminably slow in coming into harbour. Nella walked on the Digue for a few minutes to watch it the better. The town was silent and almost deserted. It had a false and sinister aspect. She remembered tales which she had heard of this glittering resort, which in the season holds more scoundrels than any place in Europe, save only Monte Carlo. She remembered that the gilded adventurers of every nation under the sun foregathered there either for business or pleasure, and that some of the most wonderful crimes of the latter half of the century had been schemed and matured in that haunt of cosmopolitan iniquity.

When the second steamer arrived Nella stood at the end of the gangway, close to the ticket-collector. The first person to step on shore was—not the Baroness Zerlinski, but Miss Spencer herself! Nella turned aside instantly, hiding her face, and Miss Spencer, carrying a small bag, hurried with assured foot-steps to the Custom House. It seemed as if she knew the port of Ostend fairly well. The moon shone like day, and Nella had full opportunity to observe her quarry. She could see now quite plainly that the Baroness Zerlinski had been only Miss Spencer in disguise. There was the same gait, the same movement of the head and of the hips; the white hair was easily to be accounted for by a wig, and the wrinkles by a paint brush and some grease paints. Miss Spencer, whose hair was now its old accustomed yellow, got through the Custom House without difficulty, and Nella saw her call a closed carriage and say something to the driver. The vehicle drove off. Nella jumped into the next carriage—an open one—that came up.

"Follow that carriage," she said succinctly to the driver in French.

"Bien, madame!" The driver whipped up his horse, and the animal shot forward with a terrific clatter over the cobbles. It appeared that this driver was quite accustomed to following other carriages.

"Now I am fairly in for it!" said Nella to herself. She laughed unsteadily, but her heart was beating with an extraordinary thump.

For some time the pursued vehicle kept well in front. It crossed the town nearly from end to end, and plunged into a maze of small streets far on the south side of the Kursaal. Then gradually Nella's equipage began to overtake it. The first carriage stopped with a jerk before a tall, dark house, and Miss Spencer emerged. Nella called to her driver to stop, but he, determined to be in at the death, was engaged in whipping his horse, and he completely ignored her commands. He drew up triumphantly at the tall, dark house just at the moment when Miss Spencer disappeared into it. The other carriage drove away. Nella, uncertain what to do, stepped down from her carriage and gave the driver some money. At the same moment a man reopened the door of the house which had closed on Miss Spencer.

"I want to see Miss Spencer," said Nella impulsively. She couldn't think of anything else to say.

"Miss Spencer?"

"Yes; she's just arrived."

"It's O.K., I suppose," said the man.

"I guess so," said Nella, and she walked past him into the house. She was astonished at her own audacity.

Miss Spencer was just going into a room off the narrow hall. Nella followed her into the apartment, which was shabbily furnished in the Belgian lodging-house style.

"Well, Miss Spencer," she greeted the former Baroness Zerlinski, "I guess you didn't expect to see me. You left our hotel very suddenly this afternoon, and you left it very suddenly a few days ago; and so I've just called to make a few inquiries."

To do that lady justice, Miss Spencer bore the surprising ordeal very well. She did not flinch; she betrayed no emotion. The sole sign of perturbation was in her hurried breathing.

"You have ceased to be the Baroness Zerlinski," Nella continued. "May I sit down?"

"Certainly sit down," said Miss Spencer, copying the girl's tone. "You are a fairly smart young woman, that I will say. What do you want? Weren't my books all straight?"

"Your books were all straight. I haven't come about your books. I have come about the murder of Reginald Dimmock, the disappearance of his body, and the disappearance of Prince Eugen of Posen. I thought you might be able to help me in some investigations which I am making."

Miss Spencer's eyes gleamed, and she stood up and moved swiftly towards the mantelpiece.

"You may be a Yankee, but you're a fool," she said.

She took hold of the bell-rope.

"Don't ring that bell if you value your life," said Nella.

Nella lost consciousness, and slipped gently to the ground.

Digitized by Google

"If what?" Miss Spencer remarked.

"If you value your life," said Nella calmly, and with the words she pulled from her pocket a very neat and dainty little revolver.

NINTH CHAPTER.

Two Women and the Revolver.

"You—you're only doing that to frighten me," stammered Miss Spencer, in a low, quavering voice.

"Am I?" Nella replied, as firmly as she could, though her hand shook violently with excitement, could Miss Spencer but have observed it. "Am I? You said just now that I might be a Yankee girl, but I was a fool. Well, I am a Yankee girl, as you call it; and in my country, if they don't teach revolver-shooting in boarding-schools, there are at least a lot of girls who can handle a revolver. I happen to be one of them. I tell you that if you ring that bell you will suffer."

Most of this was simple bluff on Nella's part, and she trembled lest Miss Spencer should perceive that it was simple bluff. Happily for her, Miss Spencer belonged to that order of women who have every sort of courage except physical courage. Miss Spencer could have withstood successfully any moral trial, but persuade her that her skin was in danger, and she would succumb. Nella at once divined this useful fact, and proceeded accordingly, hiding the strangeness of her own sensations as well as she could.

"You had better sit down now," said Nella, "and I will ask you a few questions."

And Miss Spencer obediently sat down, rather white, and trying to screw her lips into a formal smile.

"Why did you leave the Grand Babylon that night?" Nella began her examination, putting on a stern, barrister-like expression.

"I had orders to, Miss Racksole."

"Whose orders?"

"Well, I'm—I'm—the fact is, I'm a married woman, and it was my husband's orders."

"Who is your husband?"

"Tom Jackson—Jules, you know, head waiter at the Grand Babylon."

"So Jules' real name is Tom Jackson? Why did he want you to leave without giving notice?"

"I'm sure I don't know, Miss Racksole. I swear I don't know. He's my husband, and, of course, I do what he tells me, as you will some day do what your husband tells you. Please Heaven you'll get a better husband than mine!"

Miss Spencer showed a sign of tears.

Nella fingered the revolver, and put it at full cock. "Well," she repeated, "why did he want you to leave?" She was tremendously surprised at her own coolness, and somewhat pleased with it, too.

"I can't tell you—I can't tell you."

"You've just got to," Nella said, in a terrible, remorseless tone.

"He—he wished me to come over here to Ostend. Something had gone wrong. Oh! he's a fearful man, is Tom. If I told you, he'd——"

"Had something gone wrong in the hotel, or over here?"

"Both."

"Was it about Prince Eugen of Posen?"

"I don't know—that is, yes, I think so."

"What has your husband to do with Prince Eugen?"

"I believe he has some—some sort of business with him, some money business."

"And was Mr. Dimmock in this business?"

"I fancy so, Miss Racksole. I'm telling you all I know, that I swear."

"Did your husband and Mr. Dimmock have a quarrel that night in Room 111?"

"They had some difficulty."

"And the result of it was that you came to Ostend instantly?"

"Yes; I suppose so."

"And what were you to do in Ostend? What were your instructions from this husband of yours?"

Miss Spencer's head dropped on her arms on the table which separated her from Nella, and she appeared to sob violently.

"Have pity on me," she murmured, "I can't tell you any more."

"Why?"

"He'd kill me if he knew."

"You're wandering from the subject," observed Nella coldly. "This is the last time I shall warn you. Let me tell you plainly I've got the best reasons for being desperate, and if anything happens to you I shall say I did it in self-defence. Now, what were you to do in Ostend?"

"I shall die for this, anyhow," whined Miss Spencer, and then, with a sort of fierce despair, "I had to keep watch on Prince Eugen."

"Where? In this house?"

Miss Spencer nodded, and, looking up, Nella could see the traces of tears on her face.

"Then Prince Eugen was a prisoner? Someone had captured him at the instigation of Jules?"

"Yes, if you must have it."

"Why was it necessary for you specially to come to Ostend?"

"Oh! Tom trusts me. You see, I know Ostend. Before I took that place at the Grand Babylon I had travelled over Europe, and Tom knew that I knew a thing or two."

"Why did you take the place at the Grand Babylon?"

"Because Tom told me to. He said I should be useful to him there."

"Is your husband an Anarchist, or something of that kind, Miss Spencer?"

"I don't know. I'd tell you in a minute if I knew. But he's one of those who keep themselves to themselves."

"Do you know if he has ever committed a murder?"

"Never!" said Miss Spencer, with righteous repudiation of the mere idea.

"But Mr. Dimmock was murdered. He was poisoned. If he had not been poisoned why was his body stolen? It must have been stolen to prevent inquiry, to hide traces. Tell me about that."

"I take my dying oath," said Miss Spencer, standing up a little way from the table, "I take my dying oath I didn't know Mr. Dimmock was dead till I saw it in the newspaper."

"You swear you had no suspicion of it?"

"I swear I hadn't."

Nella was inclined to believe the statement. The woman and the girl looked at each other in the tawdry, frowsy, lamp-lit room. Miss Spencer nervously patted her yellow hair into shape, as if gradually recovering her composure and equanimity. The whole affair seemed like a dream to Nella, a disturbing, sinister nightmare. She was a little uncertain what to say. She felt that she had not yet got hold of any very definite information. "Where is Prince Eugen now?" she asked at length.

"I don't know, miss."

"He isn't in this house?"

"No, miss."

"Ah! We will see presently."

"They took him away, Miss Racksole."

"Who took him away? Some of your husband's friends?"

"Some of his acquaintances."

"Then there is a gang of you?"

"A gang of us—a gang! I don't know what you mean," Miss Spencer quavered.

"Oh, but you must know," smiled Nella calmly. "You can't possibly be so innocent as all that, Mrs. Tom Jackson. You can't play games with me. You've just got to remember that I'm what you call a Yankee girl. There's one thing that I mean to find out, within the next five minutes, and that is—how your charming husband kidnapped Prince Eugen, and why he kidnapped him. Let us begin with the second question. You have evaded it once."

Miss Spencer looked into Nella's face, and then her eyes dropped, and her fingers worked nervously with the table-cloth.

Digitized by Google

"How can I tell you," she said, "when I don't know? You've got the whip-hand of me, and you're tormenting me for your own pleasure." She wore an expression of persecuted innocence.

"Did Mr. Tom Jackson want to get some money out of Prince Eugen?"

"Money! Not he! Tom's never short of money."

"But I mean a lot of money—tens of thousands, hundreds of thousands?"

"Tom never wanted money from anyone," said Miss Spencer doggedly.

"Then had he some reason for wishing to prevent Prince Eugen from coming to London?"

"Perhaps he had. I don't know. If you kill me, I don't know."

Nella stopped to reflect. Then she raised the revolver. It was a mechanical, unintentional sort of action, and certainly she had no intention of using the weapon, but, strange to say, Miss Spencer again cowered before it. Even at that moment Nella wondered that a woman like Miss Spencer could be so simple as to think the revolver would actually be used. Having absolutely no physical cowardice herself, Nella had the greatest difficulty in imagining that other people could be at the mercy of a bodily fear. Still, she saw her advantage, and used it relentlessly, and with as much theatrical gesture as she could command. She raised the revolver till it was level with Miss Spencer's face, and suddenly a new, queer feeling took hold of her. She knew that she would indeed use that revolver now, if the miserable woman before her drove her too far. She felt afraid—afraid of herself; she was in the grasp of a savage, primeval instinct. In a flash she saw Miss Spencer dead at her feet—the police—a court of justice—the scaffold. It was horrible.

"Speak," she said hoarsely, and Miss Spencer's face went whiter.

"Tom did say," the woman whispered rapidly, awesomely, "that if Prince Eugen got to London it would upset his scheme."

"What scheme? What scheme? Answer me."

"Heaven help me, I don't know." Miss Spencer sank into a chair. "He said Mr. Dimmock had turned tail, and he should have to settle him, and then Rocco——"

"Rocco! What about Rocco?" Nella could scarcely hear herself. Her grip of the revolver tightened.

This is a reduced facsimile of our next week's cover. It shows how Nella Racksole is rescued from her perilous position by Prince Aribert.

Miss Spencer's eyes opened wider; she gazed at Nella with a glassy stare.

"Don't ask me. It's death!" Her eyes were fixed as if in horror.

"It is," said Nella, and the sound of her voice seemed to her to issue from the lips of some third person.

"It's death," repeated Miss Spencer, and gradually her head and shoulders sank back, and hung loosely over the chair. Nella was conscious of a sudden revulsion. The woman had surely fainted. Dropping the revolver she ran round the table. She was herself again—feminine, sympathetic, the old Nella. She felt immensely relieved that this had happened. But at the same instant Miss Spencer sprang up from the chair like a cat, seized the revolver, and with a wild movement of the arm flung it against the window. It crashed through the glass, exploding as it went, and there was a tense silence.

"I told you that you were a fool," remarked Miss Spencer slowly, "coming here like a sort of female Jack Sheppard, and trying to get the best of me. We are on equal terms now. You frightened me, but I knew I was a cleverer woman than you, and that in the end, if I kept on long enough, I should win. Now it will be my turn."

Dumbfounded and overcome with a miserable sense of the truth of Miss Spencer's words, Nella stood still. The idea of her colossal foolishness swept through her like a flood. She felt almost ashamed. But even at this juncture she had no fear. She faced the woman bravely, her mind leaping about in search of some plan. She could think of nothing but a bribe—an enormous bribe.

"I admit you've won," she said, "but I've not finished yet. Just listen."

Miss Spencer folded her arms, and glanced at the door, smiling bitterly.

"You know my father is a millionaire; perhaps you know that he is one of the richest men in the world. If I give you my word of honour not to reveal anything that you've told me, what will you take to let me go free?"

"What sum do you suggest?" asked Miss Spencer carelessly.

"Twenty thousand pounds," said Nella promptly. She had begun to regard the affair as a business operation.

Miss Spencer's lip curled.

"A hundred thousand."

Digitized by Google

Again Miss Spencer's lip curled.

"Well, say a million. I can rely on my father, and so may you."

"You think you are worth a million to him?"

"I do," said Nella.

"And you think we could trust you to see that it was paid?"

"Of course you could."

"And we should not suffer afterwards in any way?"

"I would give my word, and my father's word."

"Bah!" exclaimed Miss Spencer; "how do you know I wouldn't let you go free for nothing? You are only a rash, silly girl."

"I know you wouldn't. I can read your face too well."

"You are right," Miss Spencer replied slowly. "I wouldn't let you go for all the dollars in America."

Nella felt cold down the spine, and sat down again in her chair. A draught of air from the broken window blew on her cheek. Steps sounded in the passage; the door opened, but Nella did not turn round. She could not move her eyes from Miss Spencer's. There was a noise of rushing water in her ears. She lost consciousness, and slipped limply to the ground.

TENTH CHAPTER.

At Sea.

It seemed to Nella that she was being rocked gently in a vast cradle, which swayed to and fro with a motion at once slow and incredibly gentle. This sensation continued for some time, and there was added to it the sound of a quick, quiet, muffled beat. Soft, exhilarating breezes wafted her forward in spite of herself, and yet she remained in a delicious calm. She wondered if her mother were kneeling by her side, whispering some lullaby in her childish ears. Then strange colours swam before her eyes, her eyelids wavered, and at last she awoke. For a few moments her gaze travelled to and fro in a vain search for some clue to her surroundings. She was aware of nothing except a sense of repose and a feeling of relief that some mighty and fatal struggle was over; she cared not whether she had conquered or suffered defeat in that struggle of her soul with some other soul; it was finished, done with, and the consciousness of its conclusion satisfied and contented her.

Gradually her brain began to grasp the phenomena of her surroundings, and she saw that she was on a yacht, and that the yacht was moving. The motion of the cradle was the smooth rolling of the vessel; the beat was the beat of its screw; the strange colours were the cloud tints thrown by the sun as it rose over a distant and receding shore in the wake of the yacht; her mother's lullaby was the crooned song of the man at the wheel.

Nella all through her life had had many experiences of yachting. She had yachted in all seasons and all weathers. She loved the water, and now it seemed deliciously right and proper that she should be on the water again. She raised her head to look round, and then let it sink back; she was fatigued, enervated; she desired only solitude and calm; she had no care, no anxiety, no responsibility; a hundred years might have passed since her meeting with Miss Spencer, and the memory of that meeting appeared to have faded into the remotest background of her mind.

It was a small yacht, and her practised eye at once told that it belonged to the highest aristocracy of pleasure craft. As she reclined in the deck-chair (it did not occur to her at that moment to speculate as to the identity of the person who had led her therein) she examined all visible details of the vessel. The deck was as white and smooth as her own hand, and the seams ran along its length like blue veins. All the brass-work, from the band round the slender funnel to the concave surface of the binnacle, shone like gold. The tapered masts stretched upwards at a rakish angle, and the rigging seemed like spun silk. No sails were set; the yacht was under steam, and doing about seven or eight knots. She judged that it was a boat of a hundred tons or so, probably Clyde-built, and not more than two or three years old. No one was to be seen on deck except the man at the wheel; this man wore a blue jersey; but there was neither name nor initial on the jersey, nor was there a name on the white lifebuoys lashed to the main rigging, nor on the polished dinghy which hung high on the starboard davits. She called to the man, and called again, in a feeble voice, but the steerer took no notice of her, and continued his quiet song as though nothing else existed in the universe save the yacht, the sea, the sun, and himself.

Then her eyes swept the outline of the land from which they were hastening, and she could just distinguish a lighthouse and a great, white, irregular dome, which she recognised as the Kursaal at Ostend, that gorgeous rival of the gaming palace at Monte Carlo. So she was leaving Ostend. The rays of the sun fell on her caressingly, like a restorative. All around the water was changing from wonderful greys and dark blues to still more wonderful pinks and translucent unearthly greens; the magic kaleidoscope of dawn was going forward in its accustomed way, regardless of the vicissitudes of mortals. Here and there in the distance she descried a sail—the brown sail of some Ostend fishing-boat returning home after a night's trawling. Then the beat of paddles caught her ear, and a steamer blundered past, wallowing clumsily among the waves like a tortoise. It was the Swallow, from London. She could see some of its passengers leaning curiously over the aft-rail. A girl in a mackintosh signalled to her, and mechanically she answered the salute with her arm. The officer on the bridge of the Swallow hailed the yacht, but the man at the wheel offered no reply. In another minute the Swallow was nothing but a blot in the distance.

Nella tried to sit straight in the deck-chair, but she found herself unable to do so. Throwing off the rug which covered her, she discovered that she had been tied to the chair by means of a piece of broad webbing. Instantly she was alert, awake, angry; she knew that her perils were not over; she felt that possibly they had scarcely yet begun. Her lazy contentment, her dreamy sense of peace and repose, vanished utterly, and she steeled herself to meet the dangers of a grave and difficult situation.

Just at that moment a man came up from below. He was a man of forty or so, clad in irreproachable blue, with a peaked yachting cap. He raised the cap politely.

"Good morning," he said. "Beautiful sunrise, isn't it?" The clever and calculated insolence of his tone cut her like a lash as she lay bound in the chair. Like all people who have lived easy and joyous lives in those fair regions where gold smoothes every crease and law keeps a tight hand on disorder, she found it hard to realise that there were other regions where gold was useless and law without power. Twenty-four hours ago she would have declared it impossible that such an experience as she had suffered could have happened to anyone; she would have talked airily about civilisation and the nineteenth century, and progress and the police. But her experience was teaching her that human nature remains always the same, and that beneath the thin crust of security, on which we good citizens exist, the dark and secret forces of crime continue to move, just as they did in the days when you couldn't go from Cheapside to Chelsea without being set upon by thieves. Her experience was in a fair way to teach her this lesson better than she could have learnt it even in the bureaus of the detective police of Paris, London, and St. Petersburg.

"Good morning," the man repeated, and she glanced at him with a sullen, angry gaze.

"You!" she exclaimed, "you, Mr. Thomas Jackson, if that is your name! Loose me from this chair, and I will talk to you."

(Another long instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

"WELL, Caroline, how have you enjoyed yourself?" asked Mrs. Wheatley, as her daughter, looking not a little fatigued, entered their room at the hotel, and threw herself languidly on a lounge.

Mrs. Wheatley was a wealthy widow, just then sojourning at a certain rather fashionable watering-place, with her daughter Caroline, and her niece, Josephine Stanley.

"Fairly well, mamma," was the reply. "These yachting parties are always pleasant, you know, although to-day has been fearfully warm."

And Miss Caroline began fanning herself with an exceedingly pretty black velvet riding-hat.

"Clive Grosvenor was devoted as usual, I suppose?"

"Yes; he is still unchangeably loyal," laughed Caroline.

"That man's attentions to you have been invaluable, my dear, in a social way. Young, handsome, enormously wealthy, and of unquestioned birth, he is one of the most powerful friends you could possibly have made. Only yesterday, Mrs. Churchill said to me, in that pointed way of hers, 'What a remarkable fact it is that Clive Grosvenor should make any girl instantly the fashion, so to speak, by merely behaving politely to her!' It was meant for a very cutting speech, but, of course, missed its mark. Everybody knows that Clive Grosvenor has behaved much more than 'merely politely' to you, Caroline."

"I think you are wrong there, mamma. Clive likes me, but——"

"Nonsense, my dear! We have discussed that point too often already, to quarrel about it now. And I always do feel like quarrelling with you, Caroline, whenever you make the absurd statement that the man is only friendly with you. Let us talk of other matters. How did Josephine appear to enjoy herself?"

"Poor Josephine! Nobody noticed her, I believe. Nobody ever does."

"She is such a nonentity," said Mrs. Wheatley.

"Not exactly that, mamma, either."

Caroline appeared slightly puzzled for an instant, and then continued:

"The fact is, Josephine has never been accustomed to the sort of people one meets here. Her life has been quiet, and humdrum, and commonplace. She is clever enough, and can talk cleverly enough, after her own style. But then her style is not theirs. Gay butterflies like Charley Standford and Fred Effingham, and Clive Grosvenor, too, for that matter, prefer something a little less dignified and conventional than Josephine Stanley."

"And, then, she is not pretty," said Mrs. Wheatley, "though some people, it is true, consider her face attractive. I suppose, also, her known poverty has a great deal to do with the way in which she is treated. I think, for my part, we had better send her home, Caroline. You know I always objected to the plan of bringing her here, and your persistence in the matter alone conquered my prejudice."

"You were convinced that she would enjoy herself, and very possibly return with a lover. That last belief was simply absurd, as I told you. Poor girls don't get lovers nowadays. And though nobody feels more compassion than I do for Ellen Stanley, my own sister, with her ridiculously small income, and her family of seven daughters, not counting Josephine, still——"

But Caroline had risen from the lounge, and disappeared from the room to dress for dinner, while Mrs. Wheatley's sympathetic remark was yet in course of enunciation.

* * * * *

"Will you agree to it, Clive?" said Charles Standford.

"It will be a jolly experiment," said Fred Effingham.

"Nonsense!" said Clive Grosvenor.

"Of course it's nonsense," acquiesced the first speaker. "Neither Fred nor myself pretends to assert the contrary. But, then, it will be, as Fred says, the jolliest sort of experiment. You are to devote yourself for the space of a month to one of the least attractive girls in the hotel, and perform the noble deed of perhaps calling from obscurity some unhappy creature who has long pined for distinction. Who knows but that some social diamond may be brought to light, as it were, from the rubbish of—of——"

"Spare yourself further metaphorical effort, Charley," said Clive Grosvenor, smiling. "I am not so conceited as to believe that my devotions would make a fashionable beauty out of an ogress."

"But we need not select an ogress," put in Fred Effingham. "There are plenty of girls in the hotel who have not the slightest claims to beauty, and yet do not merit so severe a title as that you suggest. The case, as it now stands, is simply this: Charley and myself are anxious to find out whether you are socially powerful enough, Clive, to make any woman popular whom you choose to treat with marked attention. Hitherto your lady friends have all been personally, or at least mentally, attractive. Our idea is to provide you with some tame, uninteresting specimen of maidenhood, and to enjoy the joke of seeing her raised into a position of conspicuous favour. We have selected the object of your future devotion."

"Is it possible?" laughed Clive. "May I inquire her name?"

"She is that stupid little cousin of Caroline Wheatley's."

"By Jove!" exclaimed Mr. Grosvenor; "do you expect me to undertake such a piece of voluntary martyrdom as——"

"Not quite so loud, Clive," Charley Standford interrupted.

The three friends had been seated on the hotel verandah during this conversation, enjoying their cigars and the pleasant August moonlight at a rather late hour in the evening.

"Recollect," Charley continued, "that there are such characters in the world as eavesdroppers, and somebody might be listening to this little discussion of ours. Indeed, I thought I detected a slight movement just now in one of those blinds yonder," pointing, as he spoke, towards a window which opened out on the verandah from the adjacent hotel drawing-room.

"Will you consent, Clive?" asked Fred Effingham.

Clive Grosvenor did consent after a half hour of further persuasion on the part of his two friends, and Miss Josephine Stanley was the young lady whom he agreed to honour with his attentions.

Digitized by Google

* * * * *

Byron awoke one morning to find himself famous. Of Miss Stanley it may be said that she awoke one morning to find herself—somebody. Clive Grosvenor's civilities had suddenly transferred themselves from Caroline to Caroline's cousin. People stared and wondered, and stared again. What did it all mean? No more whimsical man than Clive Grosvenor ever existed, but that his caprice should have assumed so extraordinary a form as in the present instance created universal surprise.

First one good lady and then another began to discover "a certain something, you know," about "that cousin of Caroline Wheatley's." From having been utterly obscure, Josephine Stanley found herself rapidly becoming popular among the guests at the hotel. Where everybody had previously ignored, everybody now noticed and smiled upon her. Meanwhile, Clive Grosvenor's devotion became daily more and more marked.

The new recipient of social favour bore her good fortune with little outward evidence that it had either amazed or delighted her. Nothing, perhaps, could ever have made Josephine Stanley's manners resemble those of the born-and-bred Society woman. She was incapable of flirting. She knew nothing of the artful ruses by means of which coquettes accomplish their proudest triumphs. She had a pair of soft, deep-blue eyes (assuredly the best feature which her face could boast of), but she never "used" them. She had a ready fluency of conversation, but she could not speak little tender falsehoods, which pass by the name of compliments, and look as if every syllable she had uttered were gospel truth. Briefly, she was a simple, sensible, good-hearted, straightforward girl, and by no means the "nonentity" which Mrs. Wheatley had chosen to call her.

That lady was greatly horrified, and still more angered, by-the-way, at Clive Grosvenor's sudden abandonment of Caroline, and his inexplicable devotion to her niece. But then, Mrs. Wheatley was a woman of the world, and chose to mask her chagrin, refraining, for the present at least, from all discussion of Mr. Grosvenor's inconstancy, except during one or two private interviews with her daughter Caroline.

"I suppose Clive has deserted me because he's disgusted with me, mamma," that young lady said, carelessly. "For my part, I never particularly liked him. Fred Effingham is much pleasanter, I fancy, though he doesn't possess thirty thousand a year, and isn't quite so much the fashion."

Whereupon Mrs. Wheatley had chidden her daughter rather severely on the subject of her annoying unconcern in so important a matter, and had announced her intention of "giving Miss Josephine a piece of her mind."

"What fault has poor Josephine committed?" asked Caroline, smiling. "You certainly cannot blame her, mamma, for being attractive enough to win Clive Grosvenor's attentions—you who complained only a fortnight ago of her being a nonentity!"

The piece of Mrs. Wheatley's mind was administered, however, and one evening, just at twilight, Josephine Stanley appeared on the hotel verandah looking a trifle paler than usual, and showing on her countenance the traces of recent tears. Clive Grosvenor presently came and stood by her side.

"You are looking ill," he said. "I trust that you do not feel so, Miss Stanley."

Josephine hesitated a moment, and then answered in a low voice, that trembled a little despite her efforts to master it:

"I have just heard a most disagreeable piece of news, Mr. Grosvenor. It will be necessary for me to leave for London to-morrow morning. Of course, the thought of doing so is far from pleasant."

"You more than astonish me," Clive Grosvenor said, in a voice that was full of very genuine earnestness. "Are Mrs. Wheatley and your cousin to accompany you?"

"No; I shall go alone."

There was quite a long silence between them. Clive Grosvenor's face was slightly averted from Josephine's, and he appeared absorbed in some rather deeply engrossing thought. Perhaps he was thinking about the real reason of her departure.

"As I shall have to leave rather early in the morning, Mr. Grosvenor," Josephine said, presently, "it will be necessary for me to spend this evening in preparations. I shall, therefore, have to bid you good-bye, now; unless you choose," she added, with a faint smile, "that it shall be only au revoir until eight o'clock to-morrow morning. However, I know your distaste for early rising, and shall not think of making such a cruel exaction."

She had given him her hand while speaking. They were standing where nobody could see them, and the twilight shadows were darkening every instant. Clive Grosvenor did not release her hand quite as promptly as Josephine expected.

"I shall feel quite lost for society when you are gone, Miss Stanley."

"I can scarcely believe that, Mr. Grosvenor."

"And why not?" he asked, still retaining her hand.

"Because"—she hesitated a second, and then her voice grew clear and firm—"because that stupid little cousin of Caroline Wheatley's will relieve you from a voluntary martyrdom by her departure, will she not?"

"Can it be possible!" exclaimed Clive Grosvenor, stepping back several paces in his astonishment, "can it be possible, Miss Stanley, that Fred Effingham or Charley Standford have been base enough——"

"To narrate your little conversation on this verandah one evening, about three weeks ago? Not at all, Mr. Grosvenor; I myself heard it."

"You heard it?"

"Every syllable. I had left my fan in the drawing-room, and came downstairs to procure it. Happening to hear myself alluded to, I played the eavesdropper during the next half hour. Atrocious, was it not?"

"The joke? It was infamous!"

"I did not refer to that. Why should I consider it so? It has been the cause of all my enjoyment this summer. People have deigned to notice me since your singular resolution was adopted."

"For that reason, perhaps, you have tolerated my society, despising me as you must have done."

She was silent, and Clive Grosvenor continued:

"Assuredly I despise myself. Can I ever hope for your forgiveness?" Then his voice grew very low and tender, and he had somehow managed to take Josephine's hand within his own once more. "Can I ever hope for something far dearer to me, Josephine, than even your forgiveness? Something quite inestimable, I mean. Your love, darling; a treasure which I value beyond everything in the world."

Those deep-blue eyes of Josephine Stanley's were glistening with tears as they met Clive Grosvenor's, but a smile played about her lips.

"How I could revenge myself, now, Clive Grosvenor, if I chose to be revengeful."

"If, dearest. But I am sure you would rather cultivate the divine virtue of forgiveness, and in promising to be my wife, heap coals of fire upon this offending head of mine."

Well, reader, I have only to add that Josephine was not found lacking in the "divine virtue," and that she is Mrs. Clive Grosvenor now.

Fred Effingham and Charley Standford have been sworn to inviolate secrecy concerning a conversation which once took place between themselves and Clive on the verandah of the hotel. Between the former young gentleman and Miss Caroline Wheatley rumour affirms that a marriage will shortly be celebrated.

Mrs. Wheatley is now reconciled to her niece, and generally speaks of her as "dear, clever Josephine." A slight alteration, is it not, in Mrs. Wheatley's previous estimate of Josephine's character and mental qualities? But, then, there are some people capable of accommodating their opinions to all sorts of social exigencies.

V. Lowell.

Digitized by Google

This is the Last Coupon.

£25 IN CASH PRIZES!

1st Prize, £10. 2nd Prize, £5. 3rd Prize, £2.

And Eight Cash Prizes of £1 each.

WHAT YOU HAVE TO DO.

Below you will find six signatures. Each of these signatures is the ordinary signature of the person to whom it belongs. The writing is not assumed for the occasion; it is just the way in which each of the persons signs his name to letters or to cheques. The first five sets of signatures have already appeared, and the numbers containing them can be had from any newsvendor, or from this office for 1½d. each post free.

What you have to do is to print in the space opposite each signature the name (initials, Christian name and surname) which you think it to be. No one but the Editor possesses the correct names of all the signatures shown. If you are in doubt as to the correct rendering of any signature or signatures ask some of your friends. When you have filled up the coupon cut it out and attach it to the five which have already appeared—arranging them in numerical order—then put all in an envelope addressed to THE EDITOR, "Short Stories," Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., which you must post so as to arrive not later than by first post on Tuesday, April 26th. The envelope must be marked "Signature" in the top left-hand corner.

CONDITIONS.

(1) The name must be clearly printed in ink opposite each signature.
(2) Only one name is allowed in each space.
(3) No alterations are allowed in the words.
(4) Each competitor may send only one set of coupons, but all the members of one household may compete. Each set will be accepted independently.
(5) In all cases the Editor's decision is final, and competitors may only enter on this condition.

COUPON No. 6.

No. 30.
No. 31.
No. 32.
No. 33.
No. 34.
No. 35.

I hereby agree to abide by the conditions of the competition printed above.

NAME.....

ADDRESS.....

Digitized by Google

Unsolved Love Problems.

A Prize of One Guinea is offered to the reader who sends in the most Satisfactory Solution to the Problem. Replies should not exceed one hundred words. See "Your Editor Chats."

XI.—Brian Cresswell's Choice.

Brian Cresswell's mother was an Irishwoman; moreover, as a charming, impulsive girl of eighteen, she had married his father after a month's acquaintance. That the marriage had turned out a complete success, was, so her friends told her, "more by good luck than good management," it might (in fact, they felt it ought to) have been a terrible failure, but as she replied with her irresistible smile, "it wasn't."

This marriage, being the cause of Brian's presence in the world, what wonder he should fall desperately and entirely in love with a stranger at first sight.

It was a dreary day in February, but Brian's habitual cheerfulness was not to be damped by such things as pouring rain, a bitter north-west wind, and unutterable slush, so he strode cheerily along a dripping street in the west of London on his way to his club, till suddenly a slight figure, in a flapping mackintosh and struggling with a refractory umbrella, ran full into him.

They cried, "I beg your pardon" in unison, and Brian looked down from his superior height on the most glorious pair of dark eyes he had ever seen, raised to his in half laughing apology.

The face was small, and only slightly tinted with pink, the features were delicately formed, especially the mouth, which possessed the sweet curves seldom found after childhood, while curly black hair, rendered rebellious by the damp, stood out round the finely-poised head, the eyes—but here Brian completely lost his footing and fell, head over ears, desperately in love.

It was only a glimpse, however, and then the umbrella was once more under control and the little lady continued her way.

Brian was not one who suffered from want of decision in a crisis, and he turned immediately to face the blast and follow the black mackintosh as it fluttered before him.

In a street sacred to doctors he saw her run lightly up the steps, and was almost immediately admitted. He eagerly scanned the brass plate at the door—"Henry Lytton, M.D., F.R.C.S."

Having waited in the rain an hour, and, finding she did not re-emerge, he concluded she lived there and was no patient.

For some days he haunted the neighbourhood, and was rewarded by seeing her several times, and each time she appeared in his eyes more beautiful than ever.

Such an inactive campaign did not long recommend itself to him, and one day he called boldly at Dr. Lytton's, and, sending in his card, requested an interview. After waiting in some trepidation for about thirty minutes he was at last summoned to the doctor's presence.

A tall, thin man with close-cropped, iron-grey hair, a tightly-compressed mouth, and piercing, grey eyes, set very close together, greeted him in a grave, professional manner.

"Her father, I suppose," he thought to himself. "Somehow I don't much like the look of him, but here goes," and he said his carefully-prepared speech: "I wish to consult you professionally, Dr. Lytton, and I would be much obliged if you will give me a thorough examination, as I should like to know if I am quite sound."

The doctor bade him strip, and for forty minutes there was a heavy silence broken only, from time to time, by curt commands from the doctor.

This ended, he bade him put on his clothes again, and Brian was surprised to his heart beating with a nervous suspense as he waited to hear what should be the verdict, but he pulled himself together saying, mentally:

"What rubbish, I am quite well. There must be something in that mental telepathy after all, and it is the agonies of all the poor diseased beggars who have been examined in this room before me that affect me."

Then he answered searching, and, in some cases, most unexpected questions from the great man, and again he was disagreeably surprised to find that when he thought about it there certainly were symptoms of a kind to describe.

At last the doctor spoke:

"I take it that you really want the truth?"

Brian bowed his head.

"Well, then, I must tell you that I find you are suffering from an obscure disease that I have made my especial study, but which has as yet no name."

With the natural tendency of the mind when suffering from shock, to seize on any triviality, Brian found himself wondering if it could be called "Lyttonensis," or "Lyttonitis," but after a silence he asked in a dazed manner:

"Is it dangerous?"

"Yes," was the answer.

"But—but," stammered the young man.

The doctor raised his hand, and went on impassively: "I know what you would say—you feel well. That may be, for the disease is not yet far advanced, but in four months' time you will be feeling ill enough to believe anything may be the matter with you."

Brian stood aghast. Was his little comedy, then, to become a tragedy? Was it possible death could be so near to him? Still, he was not going to let himself be knocked down tamely; he meant to make a fight for this bright and beautiful thing called life, when one is young and in love.

He drew himself up stiffly, drew a deep breath, and said:

"Is there no cure?"

"There used not to be," said Dr. Lytton, "but I have, I am glad to say, sufficiently separated its symptoms from another and better-known disease which supervenes in its later stages, to be able to cure it by an operation before it reaches that state."

Brian's colour came back, and his spirits rose. Only an operation!

"And will you perform this operation for me now?" he asked impetuously.

The doctor almost permitted himself to smile at such precipitancy.

"Gently, my good sir; you are by no means sufficiently advanced yet for an operation to be possible. Besides, where do you live?"

"My real home, that is to say, where my parents live, is in Ireland, but I have diggings in town, and chiefly live at my club."

The doctor reflected, and then said:

Digitized by Google

"Have you any ties, business or otherwise, that would prevent you taking up your residence here with me for four or five months?"

Brian's heart gave a leap. Here was the chance he had sought. Four or five months in the same house as his divinity—why, it was cheaply obtained at the price of an operation; for, with characteristic inconsequence, he had flung all thought of danger to the winds, and only felt pleasure at the success of his plan. He replied, therefore, with joyful eagerness:

"I have no ties whatever. It would suit me excellently to come here, and I can come at once if you like."

Dr. Lytton looked somewhat surprised at the change in his tone, but appointed a date and hour for him to commence his residence with him.

A week later Brian was installed in the doctor's house. He found he had to observe strict regulations about his food and exercise, and to submit to frequent examinations, but was otherwise left to amuse himself as he liked. Need it be said that he contrived to see a good deal of the beautiful Lucille, and that she appeared not averse to his society, even when she had a good deal of it?

He made many discoveries, for Lucille was quite young, and as artless as perfect innocence, combined with a complete ignorance of the world, could make her.

He learnt that she was the ward of Dr. Lytton, and not his daughter, and her name was Lucille Lester. She was an orphan and she believed she would have a considerable fortune when she was twenty-one. Dr. Lytton was always most kind, but rather strict. She had another guardian, an uncle, but he lived right in the depths of the country and was rather cross, so, though she paid him a visit every year, she was glad to get back to the doctor.

All this and more she told him during their frequent conversations, undisturbed by the presence of the old lady, formerly Lucille's governess, who played propriety now she was grown up; and every day found Brian more in love with her beauty, her purity of mind, and her loving, child-like disposition.

The doctor was a busy man, seeing patients, attending hospitals, and delivering lectures, and he spent but little time with them, though when he was there little passed that his penetrating, grey eyes did not see.

At the end of a month he sent Brian to another specialist to hear his opinion of his case, and he was told:

"My diagnosis agrees exactly with Lytton's, and you cannot do better than remain under his care. He cured a man by a very clever operation a few months ago, and you seem a likely subject for a similar one. And let me tell you, young man, you are in the hands of the only man in England, I should say, in the world, who can help you."

And the specialist, who was a benevolent-looking old man, beamed at poor Brian till he felt that he ought to be proud of being a "likely subject" for this new operation, but somehow he felt more depressed than elated by the smiling assurance that his life was in this man's hands.

Dr. Lytton received in silence the repetition of his famous colleague's opinion of his powers, and at the end of his examinations he said:

"The disease has so far progressed that I think I could conduct a successful operation in two weeks' time."

Brian was delighted that the time of suspense and irksome restrictions should be drawing to a close. To his sanguine nature, there was no fear of failure, no dread of the operation, and he thanked the doctor with emphasis.

Dr. Lytton, however, checked his words by an impatient gesture, and motioned him to a chair.

"Will you kindly sit down? I am about to speak to you on private matters." And as Brian, wondering, obeyed, he continued: "Am I correct in supposing that you wish to marry my ward, Miss Lester?"

Brian was still young enough to blush, as he stammered:

"If I am so greatly honoured as to gain her consent."

"Tush!" replied the doctor. "I have been watching you, and I see you have made good use of your time. Lucille is still a mere child, and likely to be impressed by the first good-looking young man that pays her attention."

Brian, lifted to the skies by the first sentence, found the descent rude indeed, but lest indignation should betray him into impolitic speech, he determined to keep silence as long as he could. The doctor's next words, spoken with his grey eyes bent almost threateningly upon him, were a still greater surprise to him.

"I desire that you immediately leave here and give up all idea of ever marrying her."

All Brian's hot Irish blood rushed to his face at the tone of almost contemptuous command in the elder man's voice, but, still restraining himself, he only said:

"Why?"

"Because I say so."

Brian's breath came thickly, as he stood with his hands pressed against the table, and looked defiantly into the unflinching grey eyes.

"As her guardian?" he asked.

"As her guardian, in so far as it behoves me to look after her best interests, and," he added, with an almost insolent tone, "as a man, because I intend to marry her myself."

If a thunderbolt had fallen, Brian could not have been more astonished.

"You!" he cried, and laughed.

The genuine incredulity in his tone, and his laugh, stung the seemingly impassive man, and he answered sharply:

"Yes! Why not? I am still in the prime of life. At any rate, she stands more chance of happiness with me than with the first whipper-snapper that comes along attracted by her money."

"You're a liar, and you know it!" cried Brian in overpowering wrath. "I have enough money for both without touching hers; and it is for her to decide wherein lies her happiness."

Dr. Lytton was his cool, contemptuous self again.

"There is no need for such violent language. A child such as Lucille is no judge of wherein lies her true happiness. Ask her now, and she would no doubt choose you; six months hence, supposing you have left this house, she would be doubtful; a year hence, she would give herself to me and would never regret it to the day of her death."

Brian's blood was boiling, but his delicacy forbade his taking her love for granted before it had been declared. Nevertheless, he opened his mouth to protest, but Dr. Lytton went on smoothly, taking no notice:

"All I require, therefore, is that you should go into a nursing home till I can effect an operation, and that you should give me your word of honour as a gentleman never to seek to gain Lucille Lester's love from this time forth."

Then Brian burst out vehemently:

"I'm hanged if I give it!"

Dr. Lytton raised his eyebrows and replied, speaking rather more slowly than usual:

"Then you are a dead man."

Brian felt his blood run cold.

"What do you mean?" he asked.

"Simply this. Unless you give the required promise, I refuse to perform the operation, and unless you are operated on, you will be a dead man in three months' time; probably less."

Brian sat down heavily. Was death, then, so near?

Dr. Lytton, watching him, saw the drops of sweat gather on his brow, and said:

"The end is sudden—and painful."

Brian lifted his head and said bitterly:

"I believe you are inhumanity itself. Anyone human would have some pity in them. You offer me life, but at what a price! What is life without love?"

"Or what is love without life?" said the doctor with a meaning smile. "Come, I will give you till to-morrow to decide," and he left the room.

Thus Brian was left with this terrible choice before him. Life without love, or love without life. Now he saw why he had been sent to the great specialist, that he might know there was no escape for him. Had he not said: "Lytton is the only man in the world who can help you" L. Hughes.

Digitized by Google

DEFINITIONS.

Relating how a Girl Fell in Love.

"Oh, dear!" yawned Violet Mace. "This is dreadfully slow. Rain, rain, rain! I don't believe it has left off for two minutes since yesterday morning. Thirty-six hours right off—two whole days and one night! I've read the newspaper and the last book from Mudie's. If it rains to-morrow I shall either go mad or be obliged to read some of the learned books which my grave brother pores over in solitude."

"Perhaps you might learn something even from them," suggested her companion with just a touch of sarcasm.

"Of course, my dear Ada, you will defend your sweetheart," was the retort. "I don't think that there ever were a brother and sister so different in tastes as Will and I. He will be a professor some day, I haven't the least doubt; and when I come to see you I shall find him up to his eyes in treatises, and you making references for him when you can spare time from your domestic duties."

Ada laughed pleasantly. She was very fond of her cousin, who was two years younger than herself, and whose merry spirits made things very agreeable for those with whom she came in contact. Ada was a little more sedate, but less so than you would imagine from Violet's words; she could join in out-door and indoor sports and games with as much ardour as she could listen to a lecture on botany or read an article on astronomy.

"I hope it will be fine to-morrow and the next day," said Ada with pretended sympathy, "so that we can have that game of lawn lennis. That will give you an opportunity of spending some of the superabundance of your animal spirits. I do not despair of your turning your attention to more serious things, some day, than playing tricks on people and otherwise having what you are pleased to call a good time. I noticed during our last game that you seemed somewhat interested in one of the members, who showed a certain gravity in his demeanour. You should try to secure such a man for a partner"—there was a peculiar intonation in Ada's voice just then—"as he would be able to steady you a little. You want a little ballast."

"Ballast!" cried Violet contemptuously, but there was just a little more colour in her cheeks. Stooping, she took up a book which was lying on the carpet and held it at arm's length. "With this sort of thing, I suppose? 'Social Economy at the Beginning of the Twentieth Century.' This is what Will studies. I'll just see what it is like; very little in it, after all, I expect."

Just then her brother entered, and Violet, believing that her absence would be more welcome than her presence, remembered that she had something to do in her own room and retired.

She took the book with her unconsciously, and, finding that she still held it when she reached her own room, she sat down and began to scan the pages.

"I don't see much in this, nor do I understand why Will wants to be quiet when reading it," mused Violet a few minutes later. "Look at these definitions. 'Capital is a product saved and destined for reproduction.' I always thought that capital was money; why ever can't people say so plainly? 'Credit is an anticipation of the future.' H'm! If I get things on credit I am anticipating part of my future income, that's all right; but what about the man who lets me have the goods? There are lots of funny things like that. Another time when I want to read something really funny I shall try one of Will's serious books!"

She was about to put the book down when she caught sight of the name of the author.

"Professor Plowden! I believe he is the old gentleman I once saw at Mrs. Margetson's. I remember he had a most attractive bald spot on the top of his head, and that he looked so simple that I thought how easy it would be to make an April fool of him or something of that kind. I can't imagine him to be the writer of a learned book; I'm sure it would be perfectly easy to play a joke on the dear man. Oh, how I should like to have the chance!"

An amused smile testified to the pleasure that such an escapade would afford to Violet Mace. But she little thought how soon the opportunity would present itself.

The two following days were fine, and the lawn tennis was a complete success. The grave young gentleman was Violet's partner in one game and paid her some attention afterwards, which brought upon her a little chaff from Ada and caused her to be more boisterous than usual in an endeavour to show that she didn't care.

Rather more than a week later a party was given by Mrs. Margetson to which Violet, her brother, and her cousin were invited. Violet had by this time almost forgotten the book on "Social Economy" and its author, but both were suddenly recalled to her memory by seeing the old gentleman with the simple face among the guests. In a moment the mischievous spirit was alive, and she determined to carry out her idea of quietly poking fun at the learned gentleman. It did not take her long to secure an introduction, and, to her great inward amusement, she was soon engaged in conversation with him.

"I've been reading very deeply lately, Professor Plowden," said Violet demurely, assuming what she thought to be an expression befitting a blue stocking. "I have been studying your book on 'Social Economy.'"

"Indeed! I should hardly have thought—— H'm! do you like that sort of study?"

"Immensely! Now, frankly, I see that you find it difficult to believe it. I will prove it to you. On page six you give a definition of 'capital'—I remember it perfectly." And she rattled off the Professor's own words.

The writer of the book showed his pleasure clearly on his clean-shaven face. Then Violet gave him his own definitions of "value" and "property" and quoted one or two sentences which she remembered, but the exact meaning of which she did not understand. She was so encouraged in her jesting by the smiles on the Professor's countenance that she became bolder and began to quiz him about his definition of "credit."

But the Professor did not appear to notice any trace of levity; he entered into an explanation which he thought would make it quite clear, then he began to press her with questions and remarks which threatened to turn the tables on her—for it naturally did not require much to place her beyond her depth—and made her half sorry that she had undertaken to poke fun at him. She breathed more freely when the Professor ceased talking economics and expressed his unbounded pleasure at the fact that his book had attracted such attention as to cause a young lady to read and derive instruction from it.

Digitized by Google

"I am sure you will shine as an economist one day, Miss Mace," he cried, as their conversation came to an end. "You must permit me to send you a complete set of my works. I shall take it as an honour as well as a pleasure."

Violet pretended to be delighted, but in truth she was rather dismayed. Will and Ada would laugh at her when the books came, and whenever she might chance to meet the Professor she would be in an awkward fix, for she could never wade through his works and yet he would be talking to her about the subjects dealt with therein. However, there was no help for it.

On the following morning, as she was sitting in the drawing-room, Violet was informed by Ada that a gentleman—not a messenger—was waiting to see her with a parcel of books from Professor Plowden. There was a sly smile on Ada's face which Violet accepted as the first result of her prank of the previous evening. Before she had time to realise what was happening, she found herself confronted by Mr. Laurence Jordan, the "grave gentleman" of the lawn tennis party, and saw a figure vanishing through the doorway.

"My uncle, Professor Plowden, asked me to bring these books to you, Miss Mace," she heard him say. "The dear old gentleman was so extremely delighted with your knowledge of economics that he would send them by no one else; he thought I might be able to help you with some more definitions."

Violet's eyes dropped and her face grew scarlet; all the old defiant air had vanished. She felt that the Professor's nephew was retaliating, that he was quizzing her, and she recognised that the Professor had seen through her jesting. It was decidedly humiliating to have this handsome fellow fighting her with her own weapons. And there was something in his voice, too, that made her tremble a little; there was a certain emphasis on the words "some more definitions."

"Don't!" she summoned up courage enough to say. "It isn't fair."

Although he tried to keep grave, the visitor was obliged to laugh.

"There is no book on domestic economy," he remarked, "which is more in a woman's line than such treatises as these. But my uncle believes that you require no instruction on that subject; he thinks you are mistress of that, and, accepting his opinion, I have decided to ask for the post of examiner."

Violet shot a swift glance at him, and the look she saw in his eyes made her tremble still more. She tried to retreat, and asked herself indignantly where Ada had gone to; but there was no retreat, for the visitor now held her hand.

"Violet, there is one other word the meaning of which I must explain to you—at least, its meaning to me! Can you not guess what that word is? Do you know what I meant by the post of examiner?"

"No, no! I don't want to know. I——"

"You know without being told? Then that will save me some trouble!"

"I didn't mean that——" began Violet, some of her old defiance returning.

But she had no opportunity of completing the sentence; that defiant glance of hers had been too much for Laurence Jordan and he clasped her in his arms. A woman likes a masterful lover, and Violet surrendered without further struggle.

"Do you know the definition of 'love,' dearest?" he asked tenderly.

"Cheek!" exclaimed Violet saucily.

"Well, the lady's cheek has a good deal to do with it, and so have her lips!" was the quick rejoinder.

And he had just time to snatch a kiss before Ada entered. Then Violet, forgetting her previous indignation at her cousin's absence, inwardly wondered why people are always in the way when you don't want them.

Geo. Day.

Now or Never!

On page 491 appears the concluding set of six signatures in our fascinating competition. Aren't you making an attempt to win the £10 or one of the other cash prizes offered? You have quite as good an opportunity as anyone else to become a successful competitor. Look carefully at the signatures and see if you cannot decipher them. Even if one or two floor you that is no reason why you should not enter.

The preceding five sets can still be obtained through any newsagent or direct from this office. Make up your mind to have a good try for that £10 now, or it may be too late.

"Brian Cresswell's Choice."

You will all agree with me that the Eleventh Problem, which appears on page 492 is an extremely interesting one.

What should you advise Brian Cresswell to do?

I will award a prize of one guinea to the reader who sends in what I consider to be the best advice to him under the circumstances related in the story. Reasons for his advice must be stated clearly, but should not exceed one hundred words. Replies must be written on one side of the paper only, in legible handwriting. My decision as to the winner will be final. Address your envelopes to "The Editor, Short Stories, Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.," and mark them "Eleventh Love Problem," in the top left-hand corner. All letters must reach these offices by Friday, April 23rd.

"Phantom Shadows."

I hope that you are reading "Phantom Shadows." It is much too good a story to be missed. If you have not already started reading it, do so at once. You can quite easily pick up the thread of the story from the complete summary that is given. Week by week "Phantom Shadows" will grow more and more interesting.

A Hulme Reader Wins a Guinea.

I consider that Miss Marion Wadsworth, of 8 Lever Street, Hulme, Manchester, sent in the most sensible advice to Owen Rhys, the hero of the tenth Unsolved Love Problem, and I therefore award to that lady the guinea I offered.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

Myra Brockley's Joke.

The Story of a Forged Cheque.

THURSDAY was market-day at Burwell, and on that day much business was commonly transacted in the town, the banks being kept open an hour later than usual in consequence. But on the last Thursday in July two events were in progress, each of which, in its own way, interfered with the ordinary course of affairs. The annual flower show was held in Mr. Rodwell's grounds, just outside the town, and a meeting of the creditors of Messrs. Hall and Whitehead, bankrupts, was called for the same afternoon, and necessitated the presence of Mr. Brockley, manager of the Burwell branch of the Burfordshire Banking Company.

This last circumstance caused George Hervey, the cashier, to be alone at the bank counter for upwards of an hour. Business, however, was slack, and nothing noteworthy occurred till a few minutes before closing time, when a young man entered the office and presented a cheque for payment. The cheque was drawn in favour of George Duncan or order; it was signed by one of the principal customers of the bank and was duly indorsed "Geo. Duncan" in a bold, masculine hand. The amount of the draft was £50.

One of the qualities most essential to the success of a bank clerk, as of a detective, is the power of noting every peculiarity of the persons who come before him in the way of business, without appearing to observe them.

All that the presenter of the cheque saw was that the cashier took the slip of paper, read it rapidly, glanced at the back to see the indorsement, and stuck it on the file before him, barely raising his eyes to ask, in careless tones, the usual question, "How will you take it?" before beginning to shovel out the gold. But in those few seconds George had taken stock of his customer—a clergyman and a gentleman, evidently; though but for his clerical hat and overcoat—which last-named article of apparel struck George as being inconveniently heavy for a fine summer day—he would have looked too young to be in Orders.

George pushed the sovereigns across the counter in the rapid, matter-of-fact manner affected by bank clerks, who appear anxious to impress upon the public that they are so familiarised with the touch and sight of these coins, as to be quite indifferent whether they pay them away in fives or in thousands.

The young man who brought the cheque seemed less accustomed to the handling of money. He counted it slowly, and picked up the pieces with some difficulty. His gloves appeared to be too large for his hands, and to impede the free use of his fingers.

"Allow me," said the cashier, picking up the coins and counting them into the clergyman's hands. A passing feeling of wonder as to who his customer was crossed his mind, together with a sense that his face was not unfamiliar to him, though he could not recollect when or where he had seen it.

As the young clergyman left the bank a fussy old lady entered, and demanded her pass-book, with a long explanation of why she wanted it. George answered her absently, following the movements of the departing stranger with his eye. As the latter reached the door, George observed that he wore a pair of dress trousers, the ends of which just showed below his overcoat.

"Been to a funeral, probably," he thought. "That accounts for the great coat to hide his black suit," and he thought no more of the matter till it was time to shut out the public for the day. He fastened the outer door of the bank and returned to his desk, pausing idly on his way to glance out of the bow window. As he did so his eye was caught by the figure of the stranger, returning rapidly towards the bank, and he lingered a moment to see if he wished to re-enter the office or would merely pass on his way. He did neither; but on reaching the side door that led to the manager's private rooms, turned and passed quickly in, having apparently either found the door ajar or used a latchkey.

"A friend of Brockley's, evidently. Where can I have seen him?"

But the question was not worth thought, and George plunged into his work with the intent of getting it over as quickly as possible.

Before he had half finished Mr. Brockley returned, with the preoccupied air of a man who had just heard serious or unexpected news.

"Awful thing!" he exclaimed. "Poor Hammerton was found dead in his bed this morning!"

"Hammerton! Which Hammerton?" asked George, shocked and bewildered.

"Old Peter Hammerton, the father. Went to bed all right last night, and was found dead by his servant this morning. Must have had a fit, they think."

"But," returned George, incredulously, "I have just cashed a cheque of his, dated this very day."

"You have! Where is it? Who presented it?"

George found the cheque, and placed it in the manager's hands.

"Here it is, made out, as you see, to George Duncan. I do not know if that is the name of the man who cashed it, for it was indorsed before he presented it, and I do not know that I have ever seen him before. A clergyman; young, short, and fair—certainly a gentleman, and, seemingly, a friend of yours. At least he went into your house about half an hour ago."

Without a word Mr. Brockley turned and went into the house. All the rooms seemed empty. He rang the dining-room bell.

"Who has called here this afternoon?" he asked of the servant who answered it.

"No one, sir."

"No one? Think again. Has no gentleman been here?"

"Not to my knowledge, sir, except Mr. Stevens. He came back from the show just about four o'clock, and ran upstairs quickly, as though he had forgotten something and came back to fetch it."

"See if he is in his room now, and ask him to speak to me."

"I know he is not, sir. I have just come past his room and it was quite empty. He must have gone out again. I see he has left his great coat behind him. He had it on when he came in, but I suppose he found it too warm for such a day as this. I was surprised to see him in it."

Digitized by Google

"Did you let him in?"

"No. He must have borrowed missus' latchkey. I was coming out of the pantry, and just as I opened the door I saw Mr. Stevens come in at the front. He ran upstairs, without stopping to take off his hat or coat. I looked to see that he had made the door fast, and then went down to the kitchen, and saw no more of him. I don't know when he went out."

"You are sure no one else has been in?"

"Not that I know of. No one could have come in without a latchkey, unless I had let them in; and I have not answered the door this afternoon, except to the milkman, and he comes the back way."

"Of course. Well, never mind. That is all I want to know." And Mr. Brockley returned to the office.

"How was the clergyman dressed?" he asked the cashier.

"In an overcoat, dress trousers, and a rather worn felt hat. He spoke as though he had a cold. I fancied he must have been to a funeral; partly because of the trousers, and partly because he was wearing a pair of black gloves, two sizes too large for him. There seemed to me something familiar about his face, though I could not say where I had seen it. I should know him again in a moment."

"Miss Brockley," he said, "have you ever seen this cheque before?"

"And you are sure that he went into my house?"

"Quite sure. I saw him from the window, just as I had shut the door, and I watched for a moment, thinking he was coming back to the bank, but he stopped at your door and went in."

The manager took up the cheque, and examined it again.

"Are you sure that your news is true?" asked George. "The ink of the signature looks very fresh, and the date is certainly to-day."

"There is no doubt about my news. I have seen the doctor who was called in. If this cheque is genuine, it must have been drawn yesterday."

"Genuine! You don't doubt that, do you? People often do make a mistake in the day of the month; or Hammerton might have post-dated it intentionally."

"He might, of course," returned the manager; "and the signature is like his, only a little shaky."

"If he had a fit coming on, his hand would be likely to be unsteady," said George.

"No doubt. Still, Hammerton was the most accurate of men, and if he put a date not that of the day on which he wrote, he did it on purpose; but I suppose we shall have no trouble about it with the executors."

"I never thought of that. How does the law stand in such a case?"

"Can't tell offhand. I will ask Manners to-morrow. Let us get on now with the books."

"I cashed three other cheques of Hammerton's to-day," persisted George, "but they were all some days old. By the way, did he have a new cheque-book within the last few days? These three did not come from the same book as the last one. There is a difference of nearly two thousand in the numbers."

Mr. Brockley turned to his records.

"No," he said. "The last we sold him for his private account was more than a week ago—C. 38,151 to C. 38,200."

"And this cheque is C. 36,275. But, after all, that proves nothing. He may have borrowed a blank cheque."

"Just so. Let us get on."

It seemed to George that the manager, for some reason, did not wish to pursue the investigation; or that he had in his mind some other plan for discovering the mystery. The two men worked on without further remark.

When they had finished, Mr. Brockley said: "You are going to the show?"

"Yes; I promised my mother to meet her there."

"My wife and daughter are there. Let us walk together."

George assented. The walk was silent; the minds of both men were preoccupied, George thinking chiefly of the disagreeable uncertainty about the cheque, and Mr. Brockley feeling painfully the sudden disappearance of a well-known figure in Burwell life.

The two men walked quickly and somewhat absently through the tents, which were now becoming too crowded to be pleasant places to linger in; and having accomplished this duty, they turned towards the private part of the grounds, where Mrs. Rodwell was entertaining her friends amongst the company with tea and tennis.

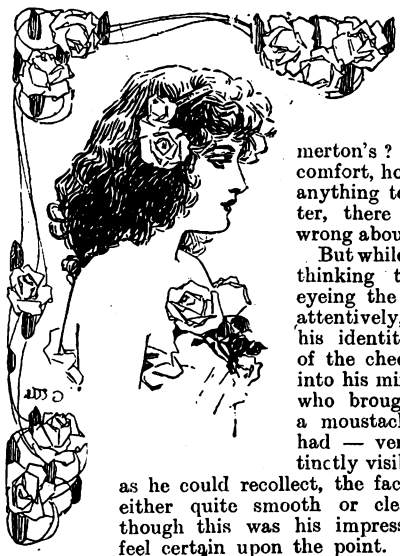
Just inside the gate that divided the lawn from the field, George grasped Mr. Brockley's arm.

"There's the man who cashed the cheque! That young fellow talking to Mrs. Merton; but he has changed his hat and his trousers."

"Nonsense! That's my nephew, Jack Stevens, who came to us last night, for a flying visit, on his way to his new curacy. If he had wanted to cash a cheque he would have done it in the morning, and not come away from the flower show for it."

But even while he spoke, Mr. Brockley remembered the maid's testimony, that his nephew had returned home, for some purpose or other, and that her account of his dress agreed with George's description of that of his unknown customer, who was, moreover, said to have gone into his

Digitized by Google



(Mr. Brockley's) house after leaving the bank. It was odd, certainly. How could Jack have got hold of a cheque of Hammerton's? There was one comfort, however, if Jack had anything to do with the matter, there could be nothing wrong about it.

But while Mr. Brockley was thinking thus, George was eyeing the young clergyman attentively, and doubts of his identity with the holder of the cheque began to creep into his mind. Had the man who brought the cheque got a moustache. Jack Stevens had — very light, but distinctly visible; whilst, so far as he could recollect, the face of the other was either quite smooth or clean shaven. But though this was his impression, he could not feel certain upon the point.

He made a point of speaking to Mr. Stevens, and grew more puzzled each minute. If this was the man whom he had seen in the bank, the reason why his face had seemed so familiar to him was clear enough. There was a striking family likeness between the curate and his cousin Myra, and George now saw a certain resemblance to his uncle also. The strange thing was that he had not known at once of whom his customer reminded him. But though Jack Stevens was young looking, he was not so absurdly young looking as he had fancied in the afternoon. The absence of moustache would, no doubt, make him look still younger. Was it possible that his moustache was false, and put on when his dress was changed?

At this moment Mr. Brockley strolled up.

"So you grew tired of the show, Jack, and came home in the middle?" he said.

"I?" returned his nephew. "No, I have been here all the afternoon. Myra went home to fetch her racquet, but she would not let me go with her."

"No," said Myra; "you were wanted here to play tennis with the Harcourt girls."

"And you really have not left the grounds?" repeated Mr. Brockley.

"Not since I came with Aunt, at half-past two."

"Curious," said his uncle. "Hervey here says he saw you in the bank, and Jane says you came into the house about four o'clock and ran upstairs while she was in the hall."

"I must be one of the unfortunate people with a double, then, for I have not been in either place this afternoon."

Myra laughed nervously.

"Better write an account to the Society for Psychical Research, papa. It seems a ghostly mystery; quite in their line."

"Or make a detective story of it," said the clergyman.

George Hervey felt uncomfortable. He was gradually becoming convinced that Mr. Stevens was not the man who had presented the cheque; and with the conviction, the impression that the writing of the draft was too fresh to have been traced more than a few hours before it came into his hands became deepened. He took the manager aside, and expressed his uneasiness.

The bank party left the show early. As soon as George and his mother found themselves alone in their lodgings the latter exclaimed:

"George, such a strange thing has happened! I have lost a cheque out of my book. Look here!"

George took the cheque-book that his mother offered him and saw that the counterfoil of the last cheque torn out was blank. He also saw that the blank counterfoil bore the number of the mysterious draft presented at the bank that afternoon: C. 36,275.

He started.

"When did you find this out, mother?"

"Just before I went out this afternoon. I was making up my accounts, and on looking, to be sure that I had not forgotten to enter any payment I had made by cheque, I saw that one cheque was gone."

"You are quite sure that you did not use it?"

"Quite. The last cheque I drew was on Tuesday. Mrs. Bryant came up to say that the collector for the Gas Company had called with their account, and as there were two quarters owing, the company threatened to cut off the gas if it was not settled at once. She had not quite enough money in the house to pay it, and asked if I would mind advancing a week's rent. Of course, I said that I would, as it would be due the next day, and then I found I had no money in my purse. Mrs. Bryant said that if I would write a cheque for the amount of the gas company's bill, she could give me change for the difference between that and the rent, and I did as she asked. Here is the counterfoil, 'Burwell Gas Co., £2 3s. 4d.' I am quite positive that that is the last cheque I drew. You gave me five pounds next day to go on with, you know."

"Was anyone in the room when you drew the cheque besides Mrs. Bryant?"

"Only Myra Brockley. She had been making a sketch of the old church out of our window, you know, and she was in the back room going on with it then."

"Myra Brockley! Think what you are saying, mother!" and George looked so startled and shocked as to astonish his mother.

She laughed.

"My dear George," she said, "I did not accuse Myra of taking the cheque. I only said she was in the room when I had the book out last. Why should she not be there? She was most innocently employed, I am sure."

George made an effort to recover his self-possession. He was horrified at the suspicion that had suggested itself to his mind, and would not for the world that his mother should guess at it.

"Most innocently, of course," he said. "But, mother, you must let me show this book to the manager."

"What in the world for? What business is it of his?"

"In all banking affairs, it is best to be on the safe side. Someone might pick up the cheque and use it who had no right to do so," and he hurried out of the room, giving his mother no time to ask further questions.

George walked as rapidly as he could to the manager's house, in the hope of being able to find Mr. Brockley before he should have gone out to prosecute the further inquiries he had expressed his intention of making that evening.

He was too late. The servant told him that Mr. Brockley had been gone for at least a quarter of an hour. He told her that he would await her master in his private room, and begged her to inform Mr. Brockley of his presence the moment he returned.

The time wore slowly on, and George's impatience and anxiety increased with every minute. When Mr. Brockley at last returned, he was accompanied by a detective.

"I am glad to see you, Hervey," said the manager, as he entered the room. "I am afraid there is no doubt that the cheque is a forgery; and the man that you and Jane took for Jack Stevens was clearly not he. Will you kindly give this officer an accurate description of the man as you saw him in the bank, and of his movements afterwards, so far as you observed them?"

"Will you let me speak to you alone first, Mr. Brockley? I have grave reasons for asking it."

Mr. Brockley hesitated. The more quickly the matter was investigated, and the police put on the track of the forger, the better. "Could not George's business wait until afterwards?"

But George was urgent, and the manager yielded, more because it seemed quicker to yield than to argue, than for any other reason.

Digitized by Google

As soon as the detective had retired, George began at once: "Mr. Brockley, I came to-night to ask you to make no further inquiries into this matter. The error was mine in accepting a forged cheque. If I had known of Mr. Hammerton's death I should have refused it unhesitatingly, for I was, and am, convinced that it was freshly written when it was presented for payment. I will refund the fifty pounds to the bank, and I beg you most earnestly to let the matter rest."

Mr. Brockley stared.

"Let it rest?" he exclaimed. "Make no effort to trace a forgery? Do you know that what you are asking is something very like compounding a felony?"

"I do not know what it may be in law; but if you persist you will repent it to your dying day. Mr. Brockley, I implore you to listen to me!"

"I could not, if I would, now; for I have already informed the police, and telegraphed for one of the directors to come down. The matter is out of my hands."

"Then, Mr. Brockley, I can only tell you the facts that I wished, if it might be, to keep from you. You have been a true friend to me, and I would be the last to cause you suffering, if I could help it. Mr. Brockley, have you ever noticed the extraordinary likeness between your daughter and her cousin?"

"Are you mad, Hervey, or trifling with me to gain time? What has nonsense of this kind to do with the forged cheque, I should like to know?"

"I told you that the man who cashed the cheque so closely resembled Mr. Stevens that at first sight I took Mr. Stevens for him. It was only close observation that convinced me that Mr. Stevens was older looking than the other, and wore a moustache, while the other did not. I believe now that the person I took for Mr. Stevens was a girl in disguise. Stop a moment," for Mr. Brockley interrupted him with an indignant exclamation. "I have, I am sorry to say, further evidence. This cheque-book is my mother's. You will perceive that there is a cheque gone, with no record of its use on the counterfoil. Look at the number of that cheque."

Mr. Brockley did so, and started.

"My mother says that she never used it. The last cheque she drew was the previous one, in favour of the Burwell Gas Company, which she drew at the request of Mrs. Bryant, our landlady. While she had the book out only two persons, besides herself, were in the room, Mrs. Bryant and Miss Brockley. My mother did not open the cheque-book again until this afternoon, shortly before starting for the flower show. She then saw that a cheque was missing."

Mr. Brockley's face had exhibited a variety of expressions during this speech: impatience, astonishment, indignation, and, finally, contempt. Without a word in reply, he opened the the door, and recalled the detective.

"Mr. Coomber," she said, "our task will be easier than I expected. Mr. Hervey has practically incriminated himself. He comes to intreat me to stop the investigation, offers to pay up the fifty pounds, which as yet, he has of course, not had time to spend, produces his mother's book to prove that the forged cheque was torn out of it, and then coolly tries to stop my mouth by throwing suspicion upon my daughter, because, forsooth, she was in the room when Mrs. Hervey drew some other cheque. On his own admission, the cheque comes from his house, he cashes it when he is alone in the bank, and then makes up a cock and bull story that it was presented by an unknown clergyman, closely resembling my nephew, but really a girl in disguise. I think we can make a fair guess at the real culprit. I give Mr. George Hervey into your hands on a charge of forgery."

"I am afraid I cannot arrest Mr. Hervey without a warrant," said the police officer. "And if you will excuse me, Mr. Brockley, I would recommend you to pause a moment before applying for one. I understand that part at least of Mr. Hervey's evidence is corroborated by your servant; and before I left the office I saw Constable Gregson, who was on this beat to-day, and he says that about 3.45 this afternoon, or, maybe, 3.50, as he was walking up on the other side of the street, he saw a clerical-looking young gentleman come out of the bank. He noticed the overcoat, and dress-trousers, and passed much the same remarks in his mind as did Mr. Hervey."

"Then I suppose you think that this young clergyman went first to Mrs. Hervey's desk and stole a blank cheque, do you, Mr. Coomber?"

"I said, 'a clerical-looking young gentleman,' Mr. Brockley. Constable Gregson did not ask to see his Letters of Orders, nor, as far as I understand, did Mr. Hervey," and the detective smiled a complacent smile at his own pleasantry. "If you have no objection, Mr. Hervey," he continued, after a moment's pause, during which neither of his hearers seemed disposed to reflect his smile, "I should like to hear your reasons for assuming this person to be a woman."

"I do not intend to say anything further at present. My late remarks were intended only for Mr. Brockley's private ear."

"You are wise not to incriminate yourself further, Hervey. I am truly sorry for you, and will do what I can to incline the directors to mercy; but, to my mind, I fear no further doubt is possible. I could have forgiven everything but the dastardly attempt to shift suspicion from yourself to my daughter. Coomber, I shall hold you responsible for Mr. Hervey's safe production to-morrow."

"I will walk home with Mr. Hervey, and let one of our men watch his house till he is safely in the bank to-morrow."

"I have endeavoured to save you pain, Mr. Brockley," said Hervey, with some emotion. "And I hold to my offer. I am responsible for cashing the cheque, and I will make the loss good."

"Further words are an insult, sir. Coomber, see to your prisoner."

Hervey bowed and left the room, Coomber following him closely.

But all the detective's efforts could not induce him to utter another word with regard to the occurrences of the afternoon.

On the following morning, before Mr. Brockley's usual breakfast hour, a knock at the front door announced the arrival of the expected director, who had travelled by a night train. By the time that the meal was on the table, the new-comer was in full possession of Mr. Brockley's views on the matter of the cheque; before it was well over, Coomber was once more upon the scene, and had given his version of the facts and the conclusions to which they pointed.

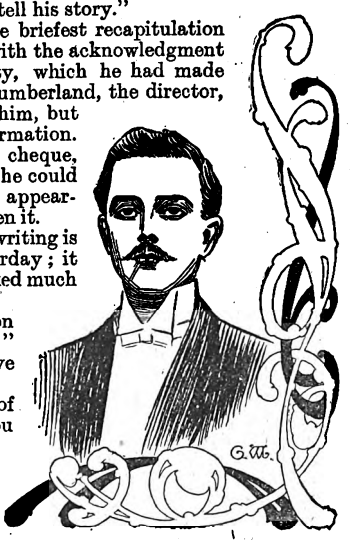
"Is Mr. Hervey safe?" asked the manager, impatiently.

"Walked up with me, and is waiting downstairs with Mrs. Hervey," replied the detective curtly.

The director looked at his watch.

"We have an hour before the bank opens," he said. "Let Mr. Hervey come in and tell his story."

George's story was the briefest recapitulation of the facts, and ended with the acknowledgment of his own responsibility, which he had made the night before. Mr. Cumberland, the director, put a few questions to him, but elicited no fresh information. At last he displayed the cheque, and asked the cashier if he could detect any change in its appearance since he had first seen it.



"Yes, the ink of the writing is blacker than it was yesterday; it had a blue tint, and looked much fresher."

"Did Mr. Hammerton ever use blue-black ink?"

"I do not know. I have not observed."

"You were ignorant of his death at the time you cashed this?"

"Of course; or I should have refused payment until I had been able to consult Mr. Brockley."

Digitized by Google

Mrs. Hervey spoke to the loss of the blank cheque, and then the detective said:

"I have sent a man down to make inquiries at the gas collector's office to discover through whose hands Mrs. Hervey's cheque passed. My belief is that she tore off the two together, and handed them both over to Mrs. Bryant."

Mr. Stevens was then produced, and Jane, the housemaid, who protested that if the man she had seen was not Mr. Stevens, it must have been his ghost. Constable Gregson was of opinion that the clerical gentleman he had seen coming out of the bank was younger and of slighter build than Mr. Stevens, and George was inclined to believe that he wore no moustache; though he seemed less confident on this point than he had been on the previous day.

The director then asked to see the ladies of Mr. Brockley's family. The manager consented to the demand, but haughtily declared that the proceeding was wholly uncalled for.

Mrs. Brockley and Myra had been kept in absolute ignorance of the events and suspicions of the last twenty-four hours. Mr. Cumberland's presence at the breakfast table had told them that some business of importance was on foot, but they were accustomed to make no inquiries as to the affairs of the bank, and had not concerned themselves in any way about the present business. Great, therefore, was their surprise at being summoned to a conference in the bank-parlour.

Mr. Cumberland went to the point at once.

"Miss Brockley," he said, handing Myra the cheque, "have you ever seen this before?"

The colour rushed to her face, and the police officer interrupted quickly:

"It is my duty to warn you, miss, that anything you say——"

But Myra broke in hastily. "What is the matter? Is there anything wrong with the cheque? Is it not a good one?"

Both her father and Mr. Cumberland began to speak, but George interrupted them both.

"Whatever is wrong is my fault, Miss Brockley. I cashed it, and I am responsible to the bank. Please say nothing."

Myra looked from one to the other in evident distress and confusion, and her father said sternly:

"The cheque is forged, Myra. Mr. Hammerton was dead when it was drawn."

"Forged! Oh, papa, indeed—indeed, I did not know! How could I? I did not know Mr. Hammerton was dead till you told us at the show, and I never even looked at the signature on the cheque."

Her father's face became sterner still.

"What have you to do with it?" he asked.

Myra looked round, colouring more than ever.

"I will tell you all I know about it, papa. But may I not tell you alone?"

Mr. Brockley looked at the director, and he looked at the detective, who said:

"Just as you please, gentlemen. It is for you to proceed in this matter or not, as you see fit. But if I hear much more it may be my duty to step in."

Coomber had a regard for the young lady, and a grateful remembrance of kindness shown by her to his wife and children during a severe illness. He had no wish to take her into custody.

"You may withdraw, I think, Mr. Coomber," said the director. "But I fear, young lady, that I must hear your story."

Myra's story was soon told. Her likeness to her cousin was a standing family joke, and on the evening of Jack's arrival her mother had commented upon it afresh, and had laughingly said:

"I believe, Myra, that if you were to put on Jack's clothes no one would know you apart."

The idea had tickled her fancy, and on her return home to fetch her racquet on the following afternoon her eye had fallen on her cousin's coat and travelling hat hanging in the hall; she was seized with a sudden desire to dress herself in them and try the effect.

"I slipped off my dress and put on my habit?" she said; "looping up the skirt, so that it did not show under the coat, and when I looked at myself in the pier-glass I was so like Jack that I felt convinced no one could tell the difference. At this moment I heard a cry in the street, just under the window, and looking out, I saw that someone in the side street opposite our house had fallen heavily, and seemed unable to rise. A momentary impulse induced me—quite forgetting how I was dressed—to rush down and help him up; which accordingly I did.

"He said he had hurt his ankle, and could not walk for the moment. He would not have cared for this, but that he had to go to the Burfordshire Bank to cash a cheque, and was afraid he should be too late. If he could not get the money that afternoon it would be a great inconvenience to him in his business. He looked so distressed and worried that I was sorry for him. He said at last to me:

"'Would you be so very kind as to cash it?'

"I said at once, 'Give me the cheque, and I will get the money and bring it to you here.' It seemed to me a delicious joke actually to go into the bank and take in Mr. Hervey; and I had no idea of anything being wrong. I could hardly help laughing outright when Mr. Hervey took the cheque quite gravely, and gave me the money just as he would have done to any strange man. I took the money back to the man, called a cab for him, and helped him into it, and then I came home, and ran upstairs as fast as I could, for I saw Jane in the hall, and was afraid she would recognise me. I put on my dress again, and went back to the show, and found that neither mother nor Jack had noticed how long I had been away."

Mr. Brockley's astonishment as he listened to this avowal may readily be imagined. Mr. Cumberland could scarcely conceal his amusement; and George stood by, red and uncomfortable, feeling far more guilty than the narrator of the story, whose pleasure in her successful imposture seemed quite as great as her mortification at having been entrapped into active assistance in successful forgery. But when Mr. Cumberland made it plain that the matter could not be suffered to rest at this point, but that the forger must, if possible, be traced and punished, she began to regard the affair in a more serious light.

The first step—after sending Myra to the drawing-room, with orders not to leave the house in case her evidence should be again required—was to recall the police officer, and send him to pursue the clue furnished by Myra.

It is needless to go through all the steps by which the story was unravelled; suffice it to say, that the forger was found to be the son of the man by whom the bills due to the Gas Company were collected. The young man had betted heavily on a horse race, and had not the money to pay up.

In helping his father with his accounts during a few days' holiday at home, he discovered the blank cheque, folded up with one drawn by Mrs. Hervey. Amongst the cheques that were in his hands was one of Mr. Hammerton's. He knew Mr. Hammerton to be a rich man, likely to have a large balance at the bank, and he contrived to keep his cheque for a day or two, and practised the necessary imitation of his signature; but as he was taking the forged draft to the bank, he began to feel nervous lest he should be recognised, and his identity proved when the forgery should be discovered, as it was sure to be the next time Mr. Hammerton examined his pass-book.

He debated with himself how best to avoid the danger. The fall and the excuse were easily planned, and the success of the ruse was complete. He got off to Manchester, where he was employed as a clerk, but was traced, and confessed his guilt. His father, however, offered to repay the money. And in order to spare Miss Brockley the pain of appearing in the witness box—and, perhaps, with some idea that the affair would bring ridicule upon the bank if made public, Mr. Cumberland induced the other directors not to prosecute, but to be content with the recovery of the money.

W. Evans.

Digitized by Google

In True Love's Eyes.

Relating How the Villain of the Piece Turned Hero.

"How can I go?" groaned Philip. "Oh, my darling, how can I leave you?"

It was a dark, raw day in late October. Splashes of rain blurred the windows of the drawing-room—dead leaves whirled by in gusts. On the beach, at the foot of the garden, the violet-black waves boomed ceaselessly.

Philip knelt at my side, his arm clasping my waist, his bonny, golden head crushing against the lace of my corsage. In an hour the Scythia would leave the Docks—further delay was impossible—the moment had arrived when we must "kiss and part."

"Great Heaven!" cried Philip, "why must my uncle fall ill in New York at this particular time—hardly more than two months before our appointed wedding-day—and cable me to his bedside? And why am I so poor that I dare not disregard his summons? Should he make a new will, you know, and leave his fortune to strangers, it would be very awkward for me. I go for your sake, Iris—I want to secure this fortune for you. Your friends do not look upon me with approval—they wonder how the beautiful Miss Daintree, with a score of lovers at her feet, can consent to marry a bank clerk——"

I put my hand upon his lips.

"Don't, Philip!"

"But it is true. There is Vaughan, with his inherited millions and long pedigree. A worldly-wise woman, Iris, would have turned her attention to him. To tell the truth, I have always felt a trifle jealous of Vaughan."

"Philip!" I cried, desperately, "these are our last moments together—will you waste them in talk like this? I have loved you poor—I can love you no better when you are rich. Indeed, I begin to hate your uncle's fortune, since it is that which calls you across the sea."

We clung together, shuddering.

"You will marry me when I come back, Iris?"

"If you return," I faltered.

"My uncle can only last a few days. No earthly power shall keep me more than a month. Ah! my best conception of Heaven," with an accession of gloom, "is a place where there are no partings! Darling, darling! Stop crying, or I cannot go at all."

"Don't mind me," I gasped, "I was never a heroine. If you do not hurry," and I pointed to the clock on the mantel, "the Scythia will sail without you. Oh, why prolong our misery, Philip? Say 'Good-bye' at once."

He turned my face upward in the dull-grey light.

"Good-bye, marvellous eyes!" emphasising every word with a devouring kiss—"good-bye, sweetest mouth that lover ever pressed—my beautiful queen, good-bye! Mind you don't flirt with Vaughan in my absence—I couldn't bear that, you know."

He tore himself from my arms, but turned back to cry: "Kiss me once—once more, Iris!"

Another embrace, heart strained to heart, then the door closed like a coffin lid, shutting life out and death in. He was gone down the long garden walk—my fair Viking, my lover! I fell on my knees, alone in the silent drawing-room, wild sobs shaking my body, wild prayers crowding to my lips.

"Oh, Heaven! Heaven! Bring him back to me in safety. There are so many things in the world that threaten happiness. I am very weak—I am full of forebodings of evil. Help me—help me, or I cannot endure it!"

A door opened—a limping step crossed the floor suddenly, someone bent over me, and with a sharp exclamation snatched me to my feet.

"This is cruel!" said a voice. "No living man is worthy of such tears, Iris! Hush! for Heaven's sake!"

Through a wet blurr I saw him standing beside me, frowning savagely—a lean, dark man, fastidious in dress, distinguished in bearing, and with cold, melancholy eyes, darkened by some violent emotion.

"How rude of you to intrude upon me here!" I said, bitterly; "and—how like you, Mr. Vaughan!"

He winced. He was a distant relative—so distant, indeed, that the tie of blood was never mentioned between us. His halting step was due to an accident, of which I was the cause. In my childhood he had rescued me from great peril, and by so doing injured himself for life.

"I meant no intrusion," he answered, with composure. "I was looking for your aunt. So Philip has taken his departure? Well," with a sneer, "he will return."

"How can one be sure of that?" I answered dismally. "The steamer may sink."

"It is a Cunarder."

"He may die in one of those dreadful American towns."

"His health is good."

"His uncle may keep him indefinitely."

"That's not Philip's luck. He is a favourite of the gods. No, he will come back, and bring a fortune to recompense you for the tears you are shedding to-day."

"I do not care for the money," I pouted. "I love him well enough without it."

His dark face grew alarmingly white.

"When you talk in that way I cannot listen," he hissed; "you sicken me!"

"I do not want you to talk at all!" I answered sharply. "It would be good taste on your part to leave me to myself

Digitized by Google

You will find my aunt upstairs." And I walked away to the window.

"Iris!"

The halting step had followed me to the window. I felt his hot breath stirring my hair—the fixed gaze of his intolerable eyes. He was trying to hum some lines of a song:

"I'll tell thee a part
Of the thoughts that start
To being when thou art nigh."

But his voice broke suddenly.

"Iris, there are things that I cannot stand. You know, for instance, when you talk of your love for Philip, a knife seems turning in my heart. No, you need not look at me with that forbidding air. I will not keep silent longer! I will out with the whole truth. I love you! Oh, Heaven! I cannot remember the time when I did not love you, Iris—when I was not ready to lie in the dust and let you walk over me. Your lover I have always been—secretly or openly—always your lover! And, as Heaven is my witness, I believe I might have won you but for Philip."

My wrath blazed high.

"Are you lost to all sense of propriety and honour," I said, "that you talk to me in this fashion? Have you not been told that I am to marry Philip when he comes back?"

His lean, olive face was full of bitter defiance.

"When the floods are out, Iris, such small barriers as propriety and honour must go down before them."

"You know," I panted, "you know that I belong to Philip!"

His pinched, grey look frightened me.

"Yes," he answered, with a ghastly smile. "I would tear you from him, if I could; but," making a gesture of despair, "I cannot—I cannot!"

An angry answer rose to my lips, but something held it back—the thought of a night, far away in the past, when a child, in the delirium of fever, I had escaped from a careless nurse, and leapt from a window of this same house out on a projecting roof, icy with winter sleet. I remembered how no servant, and not even my aunt, had dared attempt my rescue, fearful that I might, if pursued, precipitate myself to the earth below—how Noel Vaughan, a mere stripling, and agile as a cat, had dashed upon the roof, secured and placed me in the servant's reach, and then, missing his own foothold, had fallen headlong, and sustained the injuries that maimed him for life.

"I see," he said, with a sudden change of manner, "all this distresses you, Iris. I am a precious fool—forget what I have said. If I suffer, no one shall be the wiser. I will come to your wedding; I would promise to dance thereat, if," glancing at his injured limb, "dancing was in my line. See those boats out there in the rain—notice the fishermen. Picturesque enough for the Bay of Naples, are they not? They would drown if they were not amphibious by nature. I will not wait to see your aunt to-day."

The next moment he was gone. I stood alone by the window, feeling as though a suffocating wind had blown upon me.

My aunt had guests at dinner that night. While my French maid was dressing me, I sat staring absently into the silver-white, tossing seas, bearing Philip farther and farther from me every moment.

Marie gathered my bronze hair to the top of my head, and pinned it there with a golden comb; gowned me in a dress of a dull-pink hue; like a crushed rose; fastened my waist in a jewelled belt, and pinned a great knot of half-blown tea roses in my corsage.

"Oh," she said softly, "mademoiselle is as lovely as an angel!"

I went down to the drawing-room.

All the guests save one were assembled there. My aunt whispered in my ear:

"Dear me! Noel has just sent a note of excuse, and now we must sit down to table with that unlucky number, thirteen. Well, thank Heaven, I am not superstitious!"

I was placed beside a popluar M.P.—a smiling, rotund person, very fond of hearing himself talk.

"It's a pity Vaughan is growing so cynical," he said to me in a confidential tone. "He has no feeling whatever for your sex—never looks twice at any woman." I remembered the scene in the drawing-room, and felt myself colouring hotly. "Perhaps the belles have pursued him a little too closely. With his wealth and position he is a desirable parti; and his lameness—well, that was incurred in a manner so praiseworthy"—and he beamed benevolently on me—"that all women ought to find it an additional attraction."

I had no more interest in Noel at that moment than in Saturn and his rings, but I smiled vaguely, and answered:

"Oh, yes!"

"Philip St. Mark sailed to-day, eh?" continued my neighbour. "I hope his journey may not prove altogether fruitless. I know that uncle—an eccentric party, mad over a hundred and one schemes for suppressing the evils of the times. Upon my soul, he is not likely to leave much money to Philip."

I did not express the dismay which I felt. One need not be surprised to hear unpleasant things at a dinner-party of thirteen. Coffee was served in the drawing-room, and somebody played the piano, and then the guests departed.

"I fear," said my aunt, settling herself comfortably in an easy chair, "that the dining-room was too warm, Iris, and the sherry not properly cooled. Dear, dear, you have looked all the evening like a ghost, child. A voyage across the Atlantic in these days is nothing——"

A sharp, sputtering sound interrupted her. On a buhl table by her side, a lamp was flaring oddly—perhaps in a draught of air. I stepped forward to adjust it. As I lifted the shade of rose silk, it flashed and shrivelled in my hold—a whirl of scorching crimson leapt full in my face, stinging like a swarm of bees. The lamp exploded. In an instant I stood, sheeted, like a martyr, in fire.

With terrified shrieks my aunt snatched the rugs from the floor and wrapped them round me. Instantly the servants were on the spot. Through the puffs of grey smoke which filled the room, I saw pale, scared faces appearing and receding, saw my dinner-dress dropping from my body in curious black flakes, the scorched tea roses with it. Then a blood-red mist gathered before my eyes—I was writhing in excruciating torture; the drawing-room—nay, the whole world, seemed in some state of horrible upheaval. My aunt, and a surgeon who had been summoned, wrapped something about me, and I was carried up the stairs to my own chamber.

* * * * *

"Oh, Heavens! She is burnt!" I heard Marie, the maid, say.

"Hold me, somebody," my aunt answered, like one on the verge of distraction. "I cannot look at her—it is not Iris—that blackened thing! Take me away, or I shall faint!"

"A blackened thing!"—that was what she called me. The beauty which had been my pride, my power, my glory, which men had worshipped and women envied—where was it now? Gone in a breath of red flame. Then I thought of Philip, and prayed to die.

Some soothing drug was given me, that for a time deadened physical suffering. Yet I knew that Marie was still sobbing at the foot of my bed.

"Ah, the marvellous beauty—it is lost, it is destroyed! And the lover on the sea—what will he say?"

Dark days followed. In spite of my aunt's protests, I secured a hand mirror, lifted it to the level of my face, looked once, and flung it from me with a heart-broken cry.

"Oh, Heaven! What have I done," I said, "that such punishment should fall upon me? Shut the light away, aunt; hide me from all eyes; let no one look upon me again!"

My aunt, shuddering, pressed me to her heart.

"Your life is spared, Iris—be thankful for that."

"Thankful that I have outlived my beauty? No, no—you ask too much! Stop all preparations for my marriage, and write immediately to Philip, and—tell him—tell him that

Digitized by Google

I am disfigured past recognition—I release him from his engagement—from this moment he is free."

Weeping bitter tears, my aunt wrote as I dictated. Then a great shadow fell on the old house. All joyful preparations were at an end there. Mourning had taken the place of joy; despair of happiness. I felt dazed, annihilated, by the sudden blow. Of my rich ropes of bronze hair, only a short crop, like a boy's, remained. I walked again through the old familiar rooms, but the servants had taken care to remove every mirror from the walls, and the very reflection of my own figure on the polished woodwork made me hysterical.

I recall but one pleasant memory of that dreary time; day after day my aunt brought to me great baskets of orchids, and violets, lilies, and roses of every hue, silently heaping the bloom and fragrance before me, until I at last said:

"Does our conservatory yield all these flowers, aunt?"

She shook her head.

"Mr. Vaughan sends them. He has tried very hard to see you, but I told him you absolutely refused to receive visitors."

"Quite right," I answered, "the Iris whom he knew is dead." And I buried my face in the roses, and hot tears dropped on their pink petals.

At last came a letter from Philip. I fled with it to the solitude of my own room, and in fear and trembling broke the seal. He was wild with grief at my misfortune, and refused—absolutely refused—to break the engagement. If my beauty was marred he would love me with redoubled ardour. The preparations for the wedding must be continued. His uncle was in a dying condition, and would not permit his nephew to leave him for a moment, therefore, he could not fly to me, as his heart dictated; but as soon as release was possible, he would return and kiss away my tears.

The letter dropped from my nerveless hands. He meant it all—yes, I was quite sure that Philip was sincere in those tender assurances; but did he understand the magnitude of my misfortune? I remembered his ardent love for beauty, his antipathy to everything unsightly, repulsive.

"When we stand face to face again," I said to myself, "when he sees me as I am—will he still talk about keeping his engagement, or insist upon our marriage?"

Assailed by intolerable doubts, and unable longer to breathe indoors, I sallied forth upon the beach at the foot of the garden, and there began to pace aimlessly about in the ashen November twilight. Westward the moon shone, jewel-like on a sky of smoky crimson. I felt the soft, cool sands under my feet, the briny breath of the sea on my cheek, a rush of new life in my veins. And presently I heard a familiar voice calling my name: "Iris! Iris!"

He had espied me from afar, and was now hurrying over the beach to meet me. To escape was impossible. I stood quite still, and suffered him to approach. When he was within hand's reach, I flung back the veil from my face. He looked at me steadily. Neither by sound nor sign did he betray the shock which he must have felt. Limping a step nearer he extended both hands.

"Thank Heaven!" he cried, in a voice tremulous with strong joy.

"And why?" I queried bitterly.

"You live—you have regained health and strength. All is well with you again, Iris."

"All is well with me? You talk like a madman, Noel."

"I am mad—with the delight of seeing you once more. I could not batter down the walls of the house, you know, nor reach you by any fair means, and all the while I feared you might die."

"Why, I have prayed for death!" I answered sharply. "And, as you see, in vain. To the few who really seek it, it comes slowly."

"Don't talk like that!" he cried. "You have grown morbid with much suffering, Iris. What is this rubbish about releasing Philip from his engagement? He will not be released. By Heaven, I should long to shoot him if he would! Stop thinking improbable things. True love is eternal—deathless—not a matter to be affected by trifles——"

"Look at me, Noel."

"I am looking. You are as you have always been—incomparable. Your beauty is as deathless as love—fire could not injure it—it has not suffered. I see no change in you, Iris—none whatever."

"You must be beside yourself!"

"The man who loves you once will love you for ever. He is a good fellow—that Philip"—cheerfully. "He is made of the right stuff."

I was dumb with amazement. Then my heart gave a bound. Because Noel, my rejected suitor, could look upon me with composure; because I did not horrify or even startle him, I seemed to grasp and hold again a little of life—of the glad, sweet world—of love, even. Something of my own self was suddenly restored to me, and with it belief in God—belief in Philip! Noel Vaughan must have read my thoughts in my face. He grasped the hands which the fire had spared—they were still fine and white—held them a moment—released them reluctantly.

"My poor child, what torments you must have suffered! Take courage. By this time Philip is probably on his way to you. News of his uncle's death reached us to-day."

"Oh," I cried out, in mingled joy and consternation, "what shall I do?" He shrugged his shoulders.

"Give him such consolation as you can, Iris, for his great expectations have all vanished in thin air. The uncle's fortune was squandered long ago, on various schemes—nothing remains for Philip. However, I have heard of a capital business opening, which I shall offer him when he comes. It may, in some measure, console him for his disappointment."

He walked with me back to the garden, rattling on with extraordinary vivacity—praising Philip, whom, as I knew, he secretly detested, and striving in every way to divert my thoughts from myself. He put his own sorrows under foot that he might soothe mine.

"I shall wait until your marriage, Iris," he said, lightly; "until Philip is established in his new position, and then turn rover for awhile. I have sheep farms in Australia, and a sojourn in the bush has, at least, the charms of novelty to recommend it. Change is good for a man—it rubs off the rust of life."

I looked at him remorsefull

"Noel, I do not think I ever knew you until to-night," I said.

He coloured to his temples, and seemed about to answer; then lifted his hat without another word, and walked away.

One week later Philip came back.

It was a dreary night, with snowflakes whirling by the long windows, and a tumult of waves whitening the bay. My aunt, pale and unnerved, looked on apprehensively, while Marie dressed me in my plainest gown, and, by a few dexterous touches, prepared me for the ordeal.

"You are very dismal, aunt," I said, trying to laugh, "and your mood is infectious. I feel like some prisoner of the Terror, making a toilet for the guillotine."

Presently, we heard carriage wheels at the door.

Digitized by Google

"My poor child," groaned my aunt, "shall I go down with you?"

"No," I answered, "I will meet him alone," and I gathered my failing courage, and, with a firm step, descended the staircase.

He was standing before the hall fire drawing off his gloves. The red light played on his tall figure and handsome, fair face. He looked fatigued and out of spirits. As he heard the rustle of my garments, he turned, stared wildly, then reeled back a step.

"Philip!" I said, in alarm—"Philip, it is I!"

At least, he recognised my voice. Doubt became certainty. Perhaps he had tried to prepare himself for this meeting—for the change of which I had warned him. But human nature is weak. His imagination had failed to compass the truth.

"Not—Iris?" he gasped, in a voice that I shall never forget.

"Yes—Iris!" I answered.

"Great Heaven!"

He staggered, and fell like a log to the floor of the hall.

Here was something so eloquent—so decisive—that no appeal from it was possible. In that moment of horror love expired. My whole thought was to save him further trial; so I knelt beside him, as he lay prone and senseless, kissed him once—such a kiss as we give the dead, full of the anguish of final farewell—then rose and stole quietly out. I never saw Philip St. Mark again.

Life went on, as it always goes, whether sorrow rules it or joy. The meadows grew green in Spring and tawny in autumn; the blue bay smiled in sunshine and darkened in storm. I had dropped out of Society—out of my place in the gay world, as completely as though I lay with the coffined dead. In my lost dominion new belles and beauties reigned; I was virtually forgotten.

Time softened my disfiguring scars and smoothed away something of their harshness. My hair grew long, bright, luxuriant again. I still preserved the dazzling arms and hands and the grace of figure, about which my admirers had raved in previous days; but never again would I be known as the beautiful Miss Daintree.

One day I read of Philip's marriage with a rival—one who had once stoutly contested honours with me. I chanced to be sitting in the garden, when Noel approached, and laid the newspaper containing the announcement upon my lap. He was still a constant visitor at the house—his Australian sheep farms were, as yet, unvisited.

"Don't break your heart over this piece of news, Iris," he said.

I looked up into the only eyes that had refused to see any change in my poor face.

"Have no fear," I sighed. "Philip St. Mark has passed completely out of my life."

He leant over my garden chair.

"Iris, I want you to marry me!"

"What! Marred as I am—hideous——"

"Hush! You are the loveliest woman in the whole wide earth!"

"Your folly is inconceivable, Noel. Who but you would go on nursing such delusions, year after year, shutting your eyes upon facts that are plain to the rest of the world—seeking no cure for your madness?"

"Good Heavens! I would not be cured for the universe. Don't trifle. I am desperately in earnest, Iris."

I tried to smile.

"Often I have heard that love is blind, but now I am sure of it!"

"Iris, Iris, give yourself to me. Have you not kept me in despair long enough?"

"Very well," I said. "Since you are so foolish, Noel, and so persistent, take me!"

And I stretched out to him my unmarred hands.

E. W. Parsons.

OUR BACHELOR'S OBSERVATIONS.

Man proposes—and the young lady sends him round to papa to see if he opposes.

A woman never finds out the virtues of her first husband until she marries a second time.

One woman always pays more attention to what another woman has on than to what she says.

An ugly wart is a difficult thing to get off one's hands. An ugly daughter is still more difficult.

A woman in love is more or less foolish, but she never finds it out so long as the man is good to her.

Whenever a girl begins to lecture a young man on financial economy he can safely ask her to name the happy day.

A woman never sees a baby without wanting to run to it and a man never sees one without wanting to run from it.

A girl's features may be stamped on a young man's heart, but it's always her complexion that looms up on his coat-collar.

A man will not admit that there is a taint of insanity in his blood—until his rich uncle dies and leaves all his property to a society for stray animals.

A girl's opinion of a young man before she marries him is very like his mother's opinion of him; after marriage she thinks more as his father thinks.

The first year a man kisses his wife whenever he comes home, the second year he kisses her whenever he goes out; after that he kisses her whenever she makes him.

Call a girl a chick, and she smiles; call a woman a hen, and she howls. Call a young woman a witch, and she is indignant; call her bewitching, and she is charmed. Call a girl a kitten, and she rather likes it; call a woman a cat, and she'll hate you. Queer sex, isn't it?

To remain a woman's ideal, a man must die a bachelor.

Moonlight is accountable for many mistaken matches.

Love in a cottage is all right. The thing is to get the cottage.

Girls like a drooping moustache, especially when it droops their way.

The average woman will forgive her rival anything but her beauty.

In order to tell a woman's age correctly a man must first ascertain it.

Lovers who would avoid quarrels should never stroll in cross roads.

The talk of women is usually about men: even their laugh is "He! he! he!"

Silence gives consent, but most women prefer to employ the word "No" for this purpose.

If you think you are too tall, marry an extravagant woman, and you will soon find yourself short enough.

When a young lady offers to hem a handkerchief for a rich bachelor, she means to sew in order that she may reap.

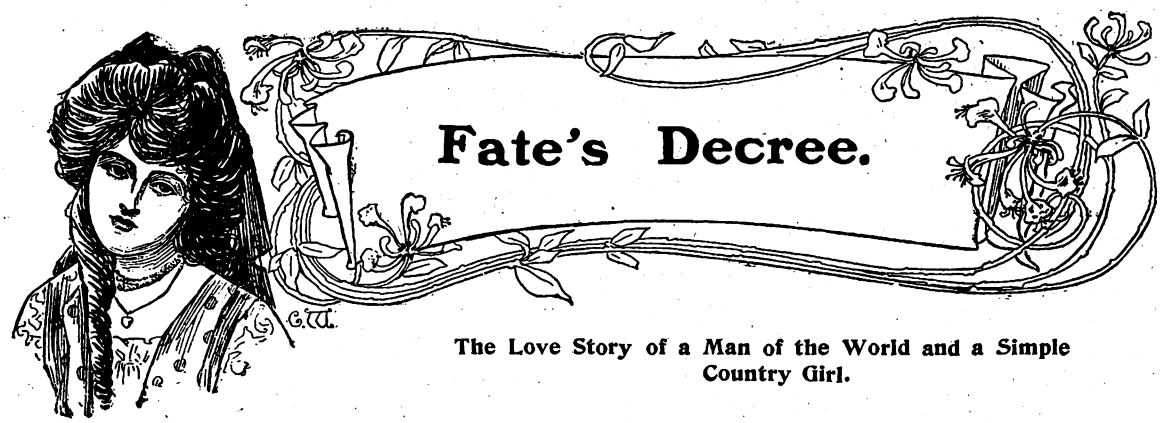
Some wives worry because they imagine their better half is in love with every doll-faced girl he happens to look at.

It seems a palpable injustice that the woman who is two-faced has no more complexion to worry about than the woman who isn't.

A man with an unmarriageable daughter is very much in the same predicament as a bankrupt. He is willing to put his property into the hands of a receiver.

If it is true that old maids are more numerous than they were seventy-five years ago it may only prove that the girls are more particular than they used to be.

Digitized by Google



Fate's Decree.

The Love Story of a Man of the World and a Simple Country Girl.

THE man of the world flecked a speck of dust from his patent-leather boots with a dainty silk handkerchief.

"Of course," said Mrs. Branscombe, "I shall do my best for my sister's child—get her a good husband, and all that; but, you see, Maisie is such a simple, shy sort of girl."

"My dear Mrs. Branscombe," observed the man of the world, "don't do too much for her."

Dr. Houghton had a lazy way of making such remarks. The fear of offence never seemed to weigh on him. Exceedingly ambitious, though he would never admit it, his regular, clear-cut features were stamped with the impassiveness to all emotion that marks the successful man of the world.

"You are extremely impertinent!" exclaimed Mrs. Branscombe, without, however, showing any signs of displeasure. "I know what you mean when you warn me not to do too much for her. You like that country flavour Maisie carries about with her. That is characteristic of you—superfastidious, pleasure-exhausted man that you are. It's a novelty—all that unaffected ingenuousness which clings to the poor child. You would call it awkwardness, stupidity, in a sister of your own."

"But——" interrupted the young physician, raising his hand.

"But," went on his lecturer, completely ignoring him, "but you like to amuse yourself with it when you encounter it in a simple, little country girl. Ah, you men are all alike. But Maisie, remember, is a relative of mine, and since Fate has thrown her into my way for the particular purpose of polishing up her rusticity, I mean to do my duty by her—even," she concluded, turning a smiling face and bright, keen eyes upon her victim, "at the risk of making her as frivolous and conventional a person as myself."

Dr. Houghton stroked his moustache reflectively and smiled.

"You know your charms are irresistible," he said.

"You also can be irresistible—when you choose. I should not wonder if you intend being so while I am gone." Mrs. Branscombe looked at him intently.

"While you are gone?"

"Yes. Maisie is to stay here, you know—under the protection of the ancient Miss Mariner. The old governess is excellent so far as she goes, but that's not very far. I am afraid she would be no match for you were you to suddenly take it into your head to make love to my little niece from the country.

"Oh, don't stare!" she continued. "You are quite capable of it. You would experiment with her. It would be a new case for you to study. It would interest the professional soul of the physician while it would exhilarate the palate of the man of the world." She looked at him intently.

"Why do you repeat that? Why do you call me a man of the world? I am a hardworking, impecunious drudge of a doctor. The two terms are far from the same thing."

"Oh, no false modesty! You know you are determined to succeed—to climb very high!" She laughed at his silence. "No, it never pleases a man like you to have his ambition unmasked, of course. Nevertheless, how can one help seeing and understand?"

She stood up, and Houghton took the hint as a sign to go. Mrs. Branscombe continued to smile at him with her keen, practised eyes, then she put out her hand.

"Don't relinquish your purpose, that's all. Climb high, by all means. I like to see such successes. They're a glorious thing. Most people are the servants of circumstance, either unwilling or too lazy to disobey its commands. But you are its master. You are determined that nothing shall prevent you from attaining your ends. That is the reason why I do not wish you to find my little Maisie too interesting."

It was on Houghton's lips to ask this vivacious little lady what she really meant. But he considered it would be a needless subterfuge; he knew quite well what she was hinting at.

"There is no telling what a man may do," he remarked lightly. A moment later he was gone.

Dr. Houghton did not pass Mrs. Branscombe's pretty ivy-clad villa till some days afterwards, when that lady's carriage drove up to the door. The grotesque figure of the old governess, Miss Mariner, alighted, followed by the fair young form of Miss Maisie Langworthy.

The young girl bowed shyly, blushed prettily, hesitated, and finally put out her hand. She had the air of not knowing exactly whether this were quite the right thing to do. But her rosy embarrassment in the setting of her broad, summer hat and her thin, white, muslin dress, pleased the critical sense of this undemonstrative and rather hard-to-please young man in an astonishing degree.

To be sure, he had in a way promised Mrs. Branscombe not to obtrude any attentions upon her inexperienced charge. But he reflected that merely being civil was not paying attentions. At any rate, and however he may have squared the matter with his conscience, he accepted the half-hesitating invitation which Miss Maisie extended to him to enter the villa.

He spent half an hour in Mrs. Branscombe's pleasant drawing-room, and for the rest of the day was somewhat pensive, and his cases absorbed him, perhaps, a shade less than usual.

A week later Dr. Houghton was invited to a garden-party held in the delightful grounds of one of the increasing number of fashionable women who believed that the clever young physician was the only person who thoroughly understood the various peculiarities of their constitutions.

This lady was a widow of uncertain age, the possessor of a very fat bank-book, and a figure that corresponded. To all intents and purposes, however, thanks to sundry visits to beauty doctors, Mrs. Chomley was a young woman. There was a consciousness of this fact in the smile with which she detained the rising celebrity at her side.

On this occasion Dr. Houghton was not such an attentive listener to the lady's chatter as he usually was. Now and again his cold, earnest eyes would persist in wandering to a certain little tea-tent. Mrs. Chomley noticed it.

Digitized by Google

"Leave me this instant, sir," she said, half seriously, "if you want to talk to that simple child over there."

"Must I?" asked Houghton, with gravity.

But the stout widow had already turned her back upon him.

Maisie was standing near a white canvas tent, wherein were grouped a number of young ladies, with haughty, critical eyes, engaged more in entertaining a cluster of slim, limp youths in ultra-fashionable garments than in the strawberries and cream and other dainties which adorned the little round tables. Maisie was entirely ignored by them, as she stood with a certain wistfulness upon her fair, childlike features.

"What brutes women can be to each other," commented Houghton, striding over the lawn.

Maisie brightened up with the most innocent pleasure at sight of him. She put out her hand as though they were quite old friends.

"Well, how do you like all this?" asked the doctor, smiling down at her. Maisie was eight inches shorter than Houghton.

"Oh, it's lovely!" she answered.

"Do you really find it so?"

The girl looked up quickly, and in his downward glance found a complete comprehension of the situation. She blushed slowly, in a pale, delicate fashion, which reminded Houghton of the fascinating accomplishment which superb young women of the world never seem to possess nowadays.

"Of course I am not one of them," Maisie remarked innocently. "They talk of things I don't understand. I don't know the people they know. So—it's natural."

"Natural that you should be left out in the cold?"

She looked a little frightened. He seemed to be accusing these animated, fluent, bright-eyed young ladies.

"Take my arm," he commanded gently; "we'll walk round the fruit garden."

Maisie put her hand obediently on his coat-sleeve.

* * * * *

"I want to have a serious talk with you," observed Mrs. Branscombe to Dr. Houghton, when she returned a fortnight later.

"I know quite well what you're going to say," he rejoined meeting her glance with one in which she read something that made her tighten her lips a little.

"You have not kept your promise."

"I could say that I never made a promise," replied the physician; "but that, after all, would only be literally true."

"I'm glad you're honest, anyway. It's all I can say for you. What has become of your vaunted common-sense, and your prudence? You know very well that you will be making the greatest mistake of your life if you allow this flirtation to go on to its final consummation. Maisie is the best little creature in the world, but she would make you as suitable a life's partner as a dove would an eagle."

Dr. Houghton regarded her coldly and with unmoved face.

"What," she added, exasperated at his silence, "what can you, with your temperament, see in the child, indeed?"

"I don't know," he confessed, after a moment's hesitation.

Mrs. Branscombe shrugged her shoulders.

"Well, and what do you propose to do? I can't allow you to dangle about the girl, giving her a possible interest in you which is not likely to culminate in anything. Maisie is not the sort of woman I care for—as a type; that type of yielding, unassertive woman who stirs no one to enthusiasm. But I will not have her trifled with. Your self-interest and duty bid you do a certain thing."

"I have been telling myself that for three weeks past."

"Then, act upon it at once! Go to Mrs. Chomley to-day and put yourself beyond the possibility of committing any folly."

"Women are astonishing. You propose that I should——"

"Offer yourself without preliminaries—of course not. But begin pursuit in that direction in a way which will leave no room for doubt. You know she would marry you. And, logically, that is the sort of marriage you should make."

Mrs. Branscombe followed her guest as he walked towards the door.

"Shall you go to Mrs. Chomley?" she inquired finally.

He stood for a whole minute, his brows contracted, his eyes fixed intently on the ground.

"Yes!" he said, at last.

* * * * *

"Maisie! My poor, poor child! Run for the doctor, someone! Quick! quick! There's not a moment to lose. There—lay the dear child down gently. My dear Miss Mariner, you are not hurt, are you? How—how did this terrible affair happen?"

But the poor old lady, with a vanished fringe and shaken nerves, was utterly unable to tell a lucid story. From her hysteric phrases, gasped out between sobs, and the short, abrupt answers of the footman, who stood very white and trembling before her with the sleeve of his coat torn, Mrs. Branscombe was able to piece together the story of how the carriage had been overturned and the coachman killed instantly.

"Who shall I go for, ma'am? Dr. Houghton?" cried the voice of one of the servants out of the confusion.

When Dr. Houghton arrived, a quarter of an hour later, Maisie had not yet opened her eyes. It was with white lips, after an agony of suspense in the silent room, that the young physician again raised his head.

"A complicated fracture," he said briefly.

Mrs. Branscombe was led weeping from the room. Besides her grief at her niece's misfortune, she was heartily ashamed of herself. She felt as though vengeance had descended upon her for her disloyalty to the daughter of her sister.

She refused to be comforted, and walked up and down her room, shuddering at every step, at every opening and shutting of the doors. When she could stand the suspense no longer she went downstairs to the drawing-room, into which Maisie's inanimate body had been carried. The door was open, and two or three servants were standing in a little whispering group about it. Dr. Houghton came towards her. The distracted lady laid her hand on his arm. Her throat was dry.

Her agonised eyes tried to read the doctor's face.

"She will be a cripple for life!" he said.

* * * * *

"And when do you intend to be married?"

Mrs. Branscombe asked the question with averted face. Dr. Houghton was standing in her drawing-room, where Maisie was reclining on a couch. Six months had elapsed since the distressing accident.

"As soon as possible," replied the young physician. "Maisie will not be able to stand a severe climate this winter. Her health has been too much shaken. I thought if you would let her be married from your house I could take her at once to the south of France."

Mrs. Branscombe remained silent for a moment.

"How will it suit your profession to go abroad and leave everything?"

"I don't know. But in any case that cannot count now."

"No; that cannot count now," Mrs. Branscombe repeated.

She afterwards confessed that, to her, weddings were always depressing, but that this particular one was the most torturing she had ever witnessed.

"And so," said Mrs. Chomley, who had made the bride a magnificent present and showed the doctor the most animated cordiality, "here is that promising Dr. Houghton with a delicate, crippled girl of a wife on his hands for life! It seems positively tragic! No money upon either side. The poor man has nothing but checks to success in his profession. It seems, my dear, really like the wreck of a brilliant career."

"My dear Mrs. Chomley," remarked Mrs. Branscombe, after a long silence, "I always held that human beings were superior to Fate. I think otherwise lately. I feel the change as the first warning that I am growing old. But what I have been asking myself during the last six months is whether Dr. Houghton was a man of the world, after all?"

H. Muston.

Digitized by Google

BETWEEN TWO STOOLS.

Relating How a Half-Hearted Lover Fell to the Ground.

It was the last masked ball of the season. Two genteel loungers who had strolled in to look at the costumes now sat in one of the little alcoves that opened upon the balcony, smoking and chatting over their cigars.

"Where are you going for a holiday?" said the one.

"On the Continent, I think. Party of us going; all the club; all save Durand."

"And he?"

Halbert laughed.

"He will not be induced to go very far this summer," he said. "He's done for, evidently."

"What! you don't mean he is in earnest with the dashing Octavie? I fancied he was not so far gone as that."

"I think he cares more for Octavie than he is willing to confess, even to himself. But he is off on a new trail now. There is a lovely wild rose of a girl been visiting friends of his. She is from Haresfield, fifty miles from town. Her father has a superb country residence, and she is an only daughter. He is invited up there for shooting and fishing by her brother. If he goes—farewell, Durand. The wild rose is very fresh and very fair, and her parents know it. They know, too, that Durand is rich as a young Crœsus, and wonderfully susceptible for one of his years and experience. I feel sorry for Octavie."

"Bah!" sneered the other. "You waste your pity. Women of her style do not need it!"

"You do Octavie a wrong," said Halbert. "She is grossly misjudged by most people. She is unconventional in her conduct at times, but she is a good girl, with a heart which I believe is deeply touched just now. I believe she loves Durand passionately."

"I doubt if Octavie is capable of loving!"

"And therein you wrong her. I believe she would make Durand an exemplary wife. Octavie excites my interest and pity. She always has. An orphan—with money, beauty, dash, spirits, wit, no caution, no adviser—she became a social code to herself. She dressed handsomely, but startlingly; she said witty things; her sayings became the property of the club-rooms; she attracted men by her dash and sparkle until she acquired the name of a heartless coquette. But nobody can lay a finger upon one wrong act in the girl's life, and if Durand would marry her, Society would accept her and make the best of it. She is not really dropped, you know—is simply looked on with suspicion. I wish Durand would marry her, but he has not the moral courage. I think he is going off to Haresfield to wean himself from her fascinations. He will come back wearing a wild rose as his talisman of safety. My cigar is smoked out. Let us move on."

They moved on, and did not see the figure of a woman who had sat just outside on the balcony. She had gone out of the heated ballroom to rest and breathe the pure night-air for a moment with her mask off.

She was of fine figure, which was well displayed by her lovely costume. Her rich, bronze hair fell in luxurious freedom over her handsome shoulders, her large brown eyes were full of unshed tears, her beautiful mouth drooped at the corners, her white hands had dropped the mask on her lap, and were clasped convulsively upon her bosom. It was Octavie.

She had heard all the loungers' conversation.

"So he is going to Haresfield," she said; "and to her! We will see!"

She picked up and adjusted her mask, drew her mantle over her shoulders, and glided back among the dancers. She was the observed of all observers—her grace, her charm, her matchless dancing! The masked and unmasked fashionable lookers-on were eager to see her face, but when the hour for unmasking arrived she had gone.

Two weeks later, a tall young fellow, in a straw hat, left his luggage to follow him, and, with a careless glance at the group of loungers about the little station, started across the fields for the hotel, half a mile away on the banks of the river at Haresfield.

He was, perhaps, twenty-eight or twenty-nine years old, clean-shaven, brown-haired, dark-eyed, with a handsome, weak mouth, and an irresistible smile and perfect teeth.

It was Durand.

As he walked leisurely along he heard the clatter of a horse's hoofs. Looking up he saw a handsome, high-spirited black horse, on which was seated a lady, in a perfectly-fitting riding-habit—a lady who reined in her horse when she saw him, and leant forward with a bright smile and bow.

"Octavie! by Jove!" he cried, surprise, pleasure, consternation, all mingled in his face and voice. Then he was over the pasture fence at a bound and standing beside her.

"Are you not glad to see me?" she asked, with one of her bright smiles, as she playfully touched his shoulder with her riding-whip.

"Glad? Why, yes, of course! Always glad to see you, you know, only it's so very sudden and unexpected! Called to see you last week in town, and was told you had gone into the country. Thought it queer you didn't say anything about it last time I saw you."

"Oh, it was very sudden!" smiled Octavie. "I was talking with Mrs. Allen—Mrs. Hugh Allen, you know—about summer resorts, and chanced to mention Haresfield as a nice, quiet place, where one could have plenty of air and exercise, and not be obliged to dress to death. She jumped at it immediately. Said she was here once a few weeks, and she made up a party of six of us in less time than I can tell you, and we came the next day. Have been here a week. I heard you were coming last night."

"Who told you?" queried Durand, as he lifted his hat and ran his slender, white fingers once or twice through his crisp hair.

"Who? Oh, Mr. Errall—Hugh Errall. He was up at the hotel, and said he expected you daily. We were all so surprised and pleased."

"Then you have met Errall?"

"Yes, and his sister came to call upon us to-day! Such a lovely girl—pink-and-white! We all thought her very pretty, and she and I struck up quite a friendship. I am invited there to spend the day soon."

Digitized by Google

A half-shadow crossed the face of Durand. He could not have told why, but he did not like the idea of these two women being friends. It seemed so incongruous! Sylvia Errall and Octavie!

"I am keeping you in the hot sun," she said, "when you want to get to the hotel, I know. Tra la! I will see you later."

She touched her horse, and was gone, with a bright, backward smile and glance, and Durand walked on at a swifter pace.

"So, after all, I am to be under the same roof with Octavie," he mused. "Instead of running away from her, I have run to her, and I'm hanged if I know whether I am glad or sorry. She holds a wonderful fascination for me, but I doubt if it's the sort of feeling a man ought to have for the woman he makes his wife."

Yet, when Errall came up that night, explaining how impossible it was for him to meet the train, and asking Durand to remove his luggage to the beautiful residence, Durand declined.

"Thanks!" he said; "but I will make my headquarters here, old fellow. All my traps for hunting and fishing and riding fill up lots of space, and would be no end of a bother at a private house. I will be with you gladly as much time as you will want me, but will stay here."

He went home with Errall and spent the evening. Sylvia Errall greeted him with that quiet and well-bred reserve that was so habitual to her. How fair she was! Like a blush-rose! And how low her voice! And her eyes!—but he had never seen them fully—the white lids always veiled them.

She sang and played dreamy music to him, and talked to him in her low, sweet voice, and begged him to consider her father's house his house, whenever he was so inclined, as he took his departure.

"What a difference!" he said mentally, as he walked towards the hotel. "I wonder how it would have seemed if she had said: 'Tra la! I will see you later!' when I left? Yet, somehow, Octavie says these things so splendidly! A fellow can't but enjoy them."

Three or four of the party were out on the balcony when Durand came up to the steps.

Mrs. Allen leant down and called to him to come up.

"I am smoking my cigar—I can't!" he answered.

"Shall I come down," said a gay voice, "and keep you from melancholy till you finish it?"

It was Octavie.

"Yes, come," he said, and they walked in the moonlight until all the others had left the balcony. And when he slept that night, it was the bright repartee and ringing laugh of Octavie, not the gentler tones of Sylvia Errall, that haunted his dreams.

But that was Octavie's last hour. Durand rose the next morning with a firm resolve to keep himself master of the situation.

"I must not compromise myself here," he said; "it is very different from London. There it was looked on as a flirtation. Here it would be thought to be a betrothal, and I don't want that idea to go out. I can be polite and civil, and all that sort of thing, without compromising myself."

And he was polite and civil and cordial when he was in Octavie's presence, which he managed should not be often. Most of his evenings were spent with Sylvia Errall, listening to her sweet, low voice, in speech and song, her carefully-worded phrases, her mild smile, which never became a laugh, and watching her slow, easy grace of movement, and telling himself she would do honour to his position and wealth were she his wife.

"She never startles—she is never striking," he said; "she is like the moonlight."

One day Octavie came down to spend the day, according to agreement. Hugh Errall and Durand came home from a two days' hunt and found her there, and Durand stayed to lunch.

Octavie never looked better. Striking she was always; her rich colouring, her fine figure, the general effect of the woman, made her that; but she seemed to fascinate and charm the gentle Sylvia with her wit and repartee, instead of shocking her, as Durand half expected.

Hugh was in the best of spirits, and his laugh was always ready if Octavie opened her lips, anticipating a witticism.

Durand, who had been strangely nervous when he first found himself in the presence of the two women, soon grew at ease, and made himself delightfully entertaining.

"I think Miss Somers—or Octavie, as you all call her—is charming," said Sylvia the next day to Durand. "I like her dash and sparkle, and she seems so genuine, and so earnest."

Durand, who was easily swayed by the opinions of others, felt his heart thrill. After all, Octavie was really charming.

He thought of her as he walked up the river path in the starlight, a few hours later. And as if in answer to his thoughts, he found her sitting alone on the balcony, enveloped in a white shawl.

"I know you do not object to smoking," he said, "so I will sit down here and finish my cigarette. May I?"

"Yes," she said, "and let me help you." She took the cigarette with a graceful gesture and a gay laugh, and held it close beside her lips. "Would I not make a fine profile picture now?" she asked.

Just then a window-blind was opened, and a blaze of light enveloped them. She gave back the cigarette, and then fell to talking lightly, while a thousand tumultuous thoughts surged through Durand's brain.

To the average man of the world a spice of abandon about a woman they know to be good is fascinating and attractive, whatever the world may say of it. Durand was compelled to admit to himself that he enjoyed the bright, changing variety of Octavie's society better than he did the unexplainable sameness of Sylvia Errall's demeanour.

It never occurred to him that a woman like Octavie Somers could be moulded into anything a man she loved would want her to be. His heart was not great enough to comprehend that.

One night he sat in the hotel, reading the evening paper. He and Errall had been out all day, and Errall had dined with him, and sat at a little distance, also reading.

Two strangers were carrying on a conversation in the office. Suddenly the attention of Durand was called by their mentioning a familiar name.

"'Didn't I see that dashing Miss Somers in the dining-room to-night?" queried one.

And the reply came: "Yes, she is here, handsomer and faster than ever, I should judge—I saw her smoking on the verandah with a gentleman the other night."

There was a dead silence for a second.

Durand paled behind his newspaper, but did not stir. Then, with a little spring like a young panther, Hugh Errall stood before the last speaker.

"You have lied and defamed a friend of mine," he said, in a low, quiet voice. "Take back what you just now said, or I will knock your teeth down your throat."

The man was a coward, as all men who speak lightly of women are, and fairly quailed in the white heat of Hugh's face.

"I—I beg pardon," he said. "I didn't suppose she was a friend of yours. I only spoke in jest."

"I would advise you not to make use of a lady's name in your jests hereafter," said Errall, as he turned away.

Durand followed him out into the starlight.

"Thank you for what you did, old fellow," he said. "It was a lie. Miss Somers held my cigarette in her hand a moment the other night on the verandah, and I suppose that that loafer saw it by chance. He deserves a good thrashing."

They said "Good-night," and Durand went to his room with a strange feeling at his heart.

How white and shaken Errall had been! Could it be that he cared for Octavie—that he loved her? The thought made him restless.

Digitized by Google

The story of Errall's defence of her name reached Octavie the next day. It had spread through the hotel, as such news will, like wildfire.

The next day she saw him alone she tried to thank him, but her tears choked her, and she covered her face with her hands. He took them both in his.

"I need no thanks," he said softly. "What man would not defend the woman he loved? I love you, Octavie. Will you be my wife?"

And she wore his diamond engagement-ring that night.

Durand heard a chance reference to the romantic finale of the sensation the next day. A sudden agitation seemed to seize him. He grew cold and hot by turns, and was like a man beside himself.

His heart and soul all rallied and cried out against another man's possessing this peerless creature, who had been his, virtually so long.

Ah! he would see her—he would talk to her; he would tell her she must not make this sacrifice, for sacrifice it surely was.

"Octavie is romantic," he said, "and she thinks she must give herself to repay this man for his defence of her. But it must not be. I have been mad, blind, to let it go so far."

It was hours before he could see her alone. Then he drew her aside into an alcove.

"Octavie," he cried, a fire in his dark eyes she had never seen there before—"Octavie, what do I hear? Are you betrothed to Errall? Have you promised to be his wife?"

"Yes," she answered, very softly.

He seized her hand.

"Why did you do it?" he cried. "Did you not know I loved you—had loved you for a long time? You are sacrificing yourself to a romantic idea, Octavie, in marrying Errall—it must not be!"

She drew her hands away and looked him straight in the eyes.

"It must be," she said. "I am not sacrificing myself to any idea; I am going to marry Hugh Errall, because I love him."

"Love him?" he repeated, like one dazed.

"Yes," she said, "with all my heart. No other man has any place in my life—he fills it completely."

He heard her with a sharper pain in his soul than he had ever supposed it possible for him to suffer.

"I had dreamt—I had fancied——" he began, and paused.

"Yes, I know," she said. "I had dreamt, too—dreamt that you could make me into anything high and true and noble that you desired; but you did not try, and I began to study you—afterwards to compare you with Hugh Errall, and I found him so much nobler that all my heart has gone to him. I have been a motherless girl, Mr. Durand, all my life—gay, spirited, passionate; but I always knew a loving hand could lead me to any height. I have been praised, admired, flattered, scolded, censured, slandered, and it all has made me reckless. Now I am loved, and by that love I mean to grow to all womanly grace and worth!"

"But I loved you, Octavie!" he cried, his selfish heart in a wild passion of pain at the loss of her.

"No," she said; "no man loves a woman who waits for his friend to defend her name. Good-night."

Two months later, when the party had all gone back to the city, Durand lingered behind.

"A man is a fool who grieves his life away over any woman," he said. "And Sylvia Errall would be a model wife, I doubt not."

So he asked her to accept the vacancy.

"Are you not aware that I am betrothed to my cousin, now in America?" she asked, turning her calm eyes upon him in surprise. "I supposed you knew of it—an engagement of long standing, and known to all my friends. I am sorry this has occurred."

So was Durand.

Reynold Frazer.

Excessive Fatness.

DISTRESS yourself no more about your excessive fatness. There is a sure, guaranteed, permanent cure. "Antipon" is a home remedy which will reduce you to normal weight and graceful proportions within a few weeks without any discomfort. There is no starving required, nor anything disagreeable.

"Antipon" expels the fat from the system by absorbing and eliminating it without the slightest strain on the constitution. It is quite harmless; a child might use it without danger to health. There is no question about it. Hundreds have testified to its almost magical power. It is pleasant to the taste, easy to take (being a liquid), and wonderfully economical. The treatment can be followed without anyone else knowing anything about it. "Antipon" helps to strengthen the system by increasing the appetite and improving digestion. At the same time as it reduces weight it enriches the blood, gives renewed nerve power, clears the skin, and beautifies the complexion.

Excessive fatness will spoil the beauty of the most attractive women and the handsomest men. Once the tendency to corpulence asserts itself it is difficult to arrest development. No matter how you starve yourself or go in for violent exercise, the fat still increases, and, without "Antipon," will go on increasing. This marvellous remedy will speedily improve matters. The double chin, flabby cheeks, bulky neck, protuberent abdomen, large hips, and all other indications of excessive fatness will very soon subside into normal proportions, and, once reduced to symmetry, will permanently remain so reduced. You will not get stout again. "Antipon" will take off from 8oz. to 3lb. within a day and a night of the first dose. The reduction then proceeds steadily until proper dimensions are regained, together with restored health, excellent appetite, and a feeling of exhilaration and buoyant energy which very stout people can never experience.

"Antipon" is sold by Chemists and Stores, in bottles price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d., from stock or on order; or, should any difficulty arise, may be obtained (on sending remittance), post free, in private package, direct from the "Antipon" Company, 13 Buckingham-street, Strand, London, W.C.

Illustrated Sporting and Dramatic News.

"'Antipon,' to which warm praise has been given by medical authorities, reduces flesh—or, rather, fat—from the very first dose, and has a general tonic and invigorating effect upon the entire system, so that at the end of the cure the patient is both healthier and stronger in muscle and nerve. 'Antipon' may be regarded as a very beneficent discovery."

Methodist Recorder.

"It is satisfactory to know that the new cure, 'Antipon,' is the practical result of a specialist's researches and discoveries so that reliance can be placed upon its efficacy."

Illustrated London News.

"'Antipon' not only speedily absorbs and throws out of the system all superabundant adipose matter, but increases strength and vitality."

THE CURE IS COMPLETE AND PERMANENT.

"ANTIPON" may be had of Chemists, Stores, &c., in bottles, price 2s. 6d. and 4s. 6d., or in case of disappointment by sending cash remittance to the "ANTIPON" Company, 13 Buckingham Street, Strand, W.C.

Requests for further information or advice will at all times receive prompt attention. All correspondence regarded as strictly confidential.

Digitized by Google

On the Look-Out.

She: "They say that persons of opposite qualities make the happiest marriages." He: "That's why I'm looking for a girl with money."

Might Rely Upon Him.

"Well, old fellow, it's all settled. I am going to be married in two months. You will come to the ceremony, I hope?" "Count upon me. I never desert a friend in misfortune."

She'd See to That.

They were returning home, and the glamour of the elopement had somewhat worn off. "Marry in haste and repent at leisure," said Jack, just the least bit worried. "Oh, don't worry, dear," said she, sweetly; "I'll see that you don't have any leisure."

He Saw His Reflection.

"Mamma," said Jamie, mysteriously, "did I ever have a little brother that fell into the well?" "No," said his mamma. "Why?" "Because when I looked into the well this morning there was a little fellow down there that looked just like me."

A Counter-Question.

"Would you want me," the heiress asked, "if I were penniless?" "Would you want me to want you," the flabby-looking earl replied, "if I had no title?" Then they agreed to lay the matter before her father without further consideration.

A Select Assembly.

Papa: "You were up late last night, daughter." Daughter: "Yes, papa; our fresh-air club met on the verandah." Papa: "Who belongs to your fresh-air club?" Daughter (slowly and somewhat reluctantly): "Well—Jack, and—and—I."

The Difference.

Mr. Twicewed: "It's funny to me that people can ever look upon marriage as a lottery." Miss Youngthing: "How delightful to hear a man speak like that. Now, tell us why you think as you do?" Mr. Twicewed: "Why, in lotteries there are prizes."

It Had Slipped His Memory.

"She seemed infatuated with you, and yet she refused you?" "Yes." "I wonder if your declaration was ardent enough?" "Well, I told her she was the only woman I had ever loved." "You forgot that you were a widower." "By, Jove! that's a fact."

Where It Would Be Felt.

Mother: "Yes, doctor, my daughter is passionately fond of music. It is her life, her soul! You cannot keep her from the keyboard. Do you think it possible for her genius to develop madness, doctor?" Dr. Blunt: "Certainly; but in the neighbours only, my dear madam."

She Knew All About It.

Helen: "Charley Dasherway has been calling on me three months now. Don't you think it's time he proposed?" Clara: "Oh, no; it was nearly six months before he proposed to me."

Almost Related.

Miss Harcashhe: "Did you say you were nearly related to the Ponsomby family?" Miss Millions: "Oh, yes; my sister once accepted Lord Ponsomby's brother's youngest son—but the match fell through."

Disliked It.

Miss Clara: "Don't refuse in that awkward way, pet. Why don't you kiss the gentleman?" Little Pet (apologetically): "Please 'scuse me, Mr. Nicefello. I'm not so fond of tissing gentlemen as Sister Clara is."

He Had Personal Proof.

Young Wife: "Yes, father always gives expensive things when he makes presents." Husband: "So I discovered when he gave you away." And then he went into the library to draw a cheque for the monthly millinery bill.

Kissing by Deputy.

"Where is my wife, Miss Lowe?" he asked of the new governess. "She has just gone upstairs, sir." "Well, will you kindly give her this kiss for me? I've got a train to catch, and haven't time to take it to her myself."

He Wished to be That One.

She: "Well, if I can't live on my income, and you can't live on yours, where would be the advantage in our marrying?" He (thoughtfully): "Well, by putting our incomes together one of us would be able to live, at any rate."

Where the Wonder Is.

"Do you think there is anything remarkable in love at first sight?" asked the romantic youth. "Not at all," answered the cynic. "It's when people have been courting each other for four or five years that it becomes remarkable."

Ambiguous Sympathy.

Ethel (to her fiancé): "What do you think, dear? Jack Oliver proposed to me last night. I suppose he didn't know of our engagement." Her Fiancé: "Is that so—what did you tell him?" Ethel: "I told him I was sorry I was engaged to you."

A Rough Guess.

Golding (who has given his consent): "I hope, young man, that you know the value of the prize you will get in my daughter?" Young Man: "Well—er—no, sir; I don't know the exact value, but as near as I can find out it's in the neighbourhood of £50,000."

How It Came About.

He: "And so you're really going to marry that professor? You, the heroine of a thousand engagements! How did you ever come to accept him?" His cousin (a Girton girl): "Why, you see, he proposed in Greek, and when I refused him I got mixed in my negatives and accepted him, and now I'm too proud to acknowledge my blunder."

He Was Annoyed.

Young Wife: "There's a gentleman in the library, dear, who wants to see you." Young Husband: "Do you know who it is?" Young Wife: "You must forgive me, dear, but that cough of yours has worried me so of late, and you take such poor care of your health, and—and, oh, if I were to lose you, my darling?" Bursts into tears. Young Husband: "There, there, dear! Your fondness for me has inspired foolish and unnecessary fears. I'm all right; you mustn't be alarmed. But I'll see the physician, of course, just to satisfy you. Is it Dr. Pellett?" Young Wife: "No, it is not a doctor; it's a—a life insurance agent!"

Digitized by Google

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

A course of this famous remedy will, as certainly as water quenches thirst, impart new vigour to the Stomach and Digestive Organs. The Liver and Kidneys will be cleansed and regulated, the Blood purified, and the general health soundly re-established.

BEECHAM'S PILLS have done this for many thousands of suffering and distressed people; why should they not do as much for you?

BEECHAM'S PILLS are specially suitable for the ailments peculiar to Females of all ages.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

INDELIBLE DYES FOR HOME USE WITHOUT TROUBLE

Maypole Soap

WASHES AND DYES ANY COLOUR
Curtains, Frocks, Blouses, Silks, and Satins made bright & beautiful as new.
COLOURS, 4d. BLACK, 6d.
Send for Free Booklet "THE PERFECTION OF HOME DYEING" to the Maypole Co., 17 Cumming Street, London, N.

GIVEN AWAY
with next week's
HOME NOTES
(No. 536)

A PAPER PATTERN of this
NIGHTDRESS

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents
PRICE ONE PENNY.

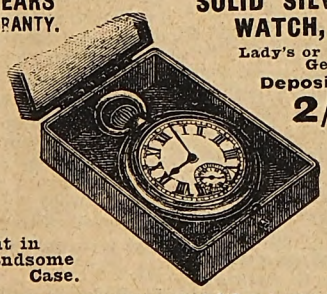
A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle at ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.
CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," "SINGERS," &c.
Their names guarantee their quality.

FROM 8/- MONTHLY.

A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6
On approval. Two Years' Warranty.
Write for Lists (Free).
EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. S3),
World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

5 YEARS' WARRANTY.



SOLID SILVER WATCH,
Lady's or Gent's.
Deposit, 2/6

Sent in Handsome Case.

After delivery of Watch, you send 1/6 each week for 13 weeks, making a total of 22/-. If you prefer to pay cash, within 7 days send balance of 16/- (making 18/6 in all).

Watch delivered only to responsible and bona fide applicants.
C. S. LAST & CO., 59 Oxford St., London, W.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted
Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

DAILY EXPRESS.
ONE HALFPENNY.

"No Better Food." —Dr. ANDREW WILSON F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's Cocoa.

PURE CONCENTRATED

300 Gold Medals, &c.

Half a teaspoonful is sufficient to make a cup of most delicious Cocoa.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Three and a Theatre.

"M. H." is engaged to Percy. Staying in the same house as "M. H."—a boarding-house—is Frank, who has been paying some attention to "M. H." The other day Frank suggested that "M. H." should accompany him to the theatre. Of course "M. H." instantly replied: "Oh, thank you, but I usually go to the theatre with my fiancé." Instead of instantly collapsing, the pressing Frank said: "How very nice. But supposing he comes with us, too? I will get seats for the three." "M. H." wants to know how such a strange invitation should be met.

* * * * *

Very simply, "M. H." As the young man seems inclined to invite an unlimited number of people to the theatre, perhaps he would not mind taking yet another, making the party four. This should be your mother, or aunt, or, if that seems too cruel, say, a girl cousin or friend. There would then be four of you, each provided with a partner. Nobody need then be jealous, and the attentive Frank would be able to turn his pressure in another direction.

Methods of Proposing.

WHAT a funny idea of yours, "J. D.," that "there is a formal ceremony in proposing to a young lady, just as there is in a wedding, but not so sacred." I never heard it put that way, but as evidently you seriously seem to believe it, perhaps there are others in the same position.

* * * * *

Of course, there is no ceremony in proposing whatever. No two people have sealed the bonds of love in the same way, as you will easily find out by asking any married man or woman or your acquaintance. After a certain period of courtship, two young people realise that they are all-in-all to each other. One day, when the man has thought matters seriously over, and has decided that he is financially able to marry, he "pops the question." It doesn't matter how he does it. He may do it by a hint, or by a chance word. It is a matter of temperament whether a man makes a flowing speech, or whether he just mutters two or three words. Propose in whatever way is natural to you. Don't believe any more in that ceremony idea.

The Modest Marriage.

"ROBERT." No properly-minded girl, engaged to a young man, would expect that in their little home she should enjoy all the good things she has been accustomed to at her father's home. What if all your knives and forks are not silver, and your ornaments not antiques, and your pictures not old masters? You are young, and no doubt the girl's father himself was in no better position when he was first married. Don't be afraid that your sweetheart will be ashamed of the home you can offer her. If she is as nice a girl as you say, she will be prepared to rough it, and to rise in the world with you. Besides, she is engaged to you, not to furniture and china.

A Strange "Gentleman."

"WHAT should I do?" asks "MARY." "A gentleman I meet in the street—whom I don't know—always winks at me as he passes. I should like your advice."

* * * * *

This is the first time, "MARY," I have heard of a gentleman who winks at strange girls in the street. He must be a new breed which I have not read of in my natural history. Take no notice of him at all, and if he should continue to embarrass you, tell your brother or father of it, and arrange that the rude man shall be taught a lesson in good behaviour. I take it, of course, that you have given him no encouragement, and that you write in an earnest manner.

A Paternal Problem.

I DO not often receive a request for advice from a stern father, but "PATER" writes to me this week: "I have been so struck with the sound commonsense and knowledge of the world shown by your answers, that I want to place the following problem before you. I am a man of private means, and shall leave my daughter a nice little income on my death. Now, I wish her to marry some young man who will not merely live on her means, but will himself be in a good position. Instead of this, my daughter is receiving attentions from a penniless young fellow, who is absolutely idle, and good for nothing. I believe he is not really in love with her, but only seeks her money, so as to save himself the necessity of working.

"Whenever I mention him to her she says, 'Father, he loves me, and I love him. We cannot part.' Now, what can I do in the matter? I do not wish to wreck my daughter's happiness, but I feel that this young man is no proper match for her."

* * * * *

As "PATER" is well-to-do, perhaps he will not mind putting himself to a little expense to rid his daughter of her objectionable lover. If "PATER" really believes that young man to be worthless, and not truly in love with his daughter, he should certainly take active steps to terminate the marriage. As harshness might defeat this object, I recommend him to take his daughter away for some time—abroad, for choice—where she will have every opportunity of meeting other people, and forgetting her present suitor. Or else "PATER" has in view a certain young man who would really suit his daughter. Such a young man might act as a very good foil to the other, and it would be well worth "PATER'S" while to try to find him. As a last resource, "PATER" should forbid the young man to visit the house, or to see his daughter. This may seem hard, but it often saves two young lives from unhappiness, if based on proper judgment.

In Defence of Old Maids.

"EDNA" is the eldest of a family of six, and is nearly thirty. She is the one old maid in the family, and is despairing of ever meeting a man to marry. She is plainer than her sisters, who have, accordingly, always received the best attentions. She is very kind-hearted.

* * * * *

Why be afraid of being an old maid? It is growing quite fashionable nowadays. Many women realise that marriage is not the best thing for everybody, and there must be certain natures which can lead happier lives freed from the cares of a household. I always think it is the right sort of girl who remains an old maid. She is well fitted to remain unmarried, as a general rule. And what a good time she often has, if she is on visiting terms with her brothers and sisters. Don't be alarmed at being left "on the shelf." Queen Elizabeth, Florence Nightingale, and some of the greatest women in history were spinsters, so why not yourself?

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS.

Will be inserted in this column at the rate of 6d. per line of 8 words or part thereof. All advertisements should be addressed to Advertisement Manager, "Short Stories," 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., 11 days prior to date of appearance.

Pawnbroker's Sale.
Gent's magnificent 18-carat gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch; jewelled movement; perfect timekeeper; 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable Curb (pocket to pocket) Double Albert, same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together sacrifice for 10/6. Approval before payment.
Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch; jewelled movement; exact timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long Watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed); elegant West-end pattern; two together, 10/6; great sacrifice; approval before payment.
Fashionable Curb Chain Padlock Bracelet, 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), in handsome case, 6/6; another, heavier quality, large and thick links (stamped); sacrifice, 8/6; approval before payment.
A Bargain—8/6—Lady's real Opal and Diamond Half-hoop Ring; solid gold; Government Hall-marked; set with four real Diamonds and three matchless Opals; approval.
Field, Race, or Marine Glass, high power, military binocular 10 achromatic crystal lenses, 40 miles' range, wide field, in saddler-made sling case; sacrifice, 10/6; approval before payment.
A. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller, 524 High Road, Chiswick, London, W.

Face Leathers, superfine quality, 1/- post free, in box.—K. Henre-Frances, Brixton Road, London.

Field Glasses.—Extremely fine pair Regulation Glasses (Army pattern) very long (30 mile) range, purchased for officer's use in Transvaal, not now required; leather case and strap; worth 75/-; will sacrifice for 11/9; approval before payment, proof of genuineness.—F. Barker (Quartermaster), Highbury, Stockwell.

A Flower Garden for 1/-.—26 Threepenny Packets Expensive Annuals—Aster, Balsam, Canary Creeper, Columbine, Lobelia, Phlox, Everlasting Pea, Ten Weeks' Stock, &c., all different, post free, 1/1½.
52 Penny Packets for 1/-.—52 different Packets of favourite flower seed, ample supply, post free, 1/1½, all different from above. 26 packets, 7½d.
Giant Sweet Peas.—20 Packets Giant Sweet Peas; exhibition strains (gold medal); 800 Seeds, post free, 7½d.
Monster Mignonette.—Sweet-scented Trees, 3ft. high, grown easily from our Pedigree Seed. Large Packets, post free 7½d.—Imperial Supply Stores, 4 to 20 Crampton Street, Walworth, London.

Old Artificial Teeth Bought.—Call or forward by post; full value per return, or offer made.—Messrs. O. Browning, Manufacturing Dentists, 133 Oxford Street, London. (Established 100 years.)

7/6 Skirts.—1/- deposit, 6d. postage, balance by instalments; Smart Tailor-made Black or Navy Cloth Serge Dress Skirts, lined throughout, and effectively trimmed with Satin Strappings; cash price 6/6 or send deposit and postage.—S. H. Dick, 209 Camberwell New Road, London.

8/6 Boots.—1/- deposit, 6d. postage, balance by instalments; Gent's Solid Leather Lined Boots (Broad Welts); Lady's superior Levant, Button or Lace; both warranted 12 months; cash price, 7/6, or send deposit and postage.—S. H. Dick & Co., 209 Camberwell New Road, London.

"Beatall" 1/3 Bargain Parcels.—White Damasks or White Cambric for Blouses; testimonials daily; lists.—"Beatall," Rushden.
Blouses Made.—Ladies' own sizes; leading materials; 3/6 only; ladies' materials made up, 2/-.—"Beatall," Rushden.

Beautiful Irish Hand-Embroidered Tray Cloth, 1/-; ditto, Afternoon Tea Cloth, 1/9; pair Embroidered and Frilled Pillow Cases, 2/6; Pure Linen Remnants in Parcels, 2/6 and 5/-.—E. Jeffers, Cromac Square, Belfast.

Photo Post-cards of yourself, 1/6; send photo, no money; pay afterwards.—May, Enfield Terr., Seacombe.

Lace Curtains.—Maker's Stock; thousands of pairs; beautiful designs; exceptional opportunity to buy at 25 per cent. below shops; catalogue free.—Milner's, 28 Hyde Park, Leeds.

Real Devonshire Cream.—The only efficacious substitute for Cod Liver Oil; absolutely pure; no preservatives; in patent air-tight tins—½lb., 1/4; 1lb., 2/4; 2lb., 4/-; including tin and postage.—Mrs. Conyers, Chagford, R.S.O., Devon.

Etiquette for Men.—A Book of Modern Manners and Customs, which should be in the possession of every reader of Short Stories; post free from 17 Henrietta St. for 1/2.

Songs Copied.—Legible as print, page, 6d.; transposed correctly, 6d. page.—Mrs. Conyers, Chagford, R.S.O., Devon. Recommended by the Marchioness of Waterford, Lady Arthur Hill, Miss Ellen Terry, &c.

Baldness Cured. Free Trial.—A French Specialist who has devoted his life to the study of Hair Diseases, having cured thousands of almost hopeless cases, will send a genuine inexpensive treatment to all who write enclosing 2 stamps. New Hair grows in 4 to 10 days.—K. Henri-Francis, Brixton Road London.

HEART DISEASE

Most folks who imagine they have heart disease are really troubled with Indigestion, "Wind," or a Deranged Stomach, for which the test proven cure is

Page Woodcock's Pills

The safe, sure, and speedy remedy with a 50 years' increasing British reputation.
Of all Chemists, etc., 1/1½ and 2/9.

SMITHS.

Thousands of ladies are riding our Cycles, sold by us at £4 to £8. Cash or easy payments. We sell to Wives, Daughters, Teachers, Nurses, Clerks, Cashiers, Typists, Bookkeepers, Factory Workers, School Girls, and others in all occupations. Circulars in plain sealed envelope free.

FOR YOU

SYMONDS' STORES, 124-128, City Rd., London, E.C.

TO CURE DRUNKARDS

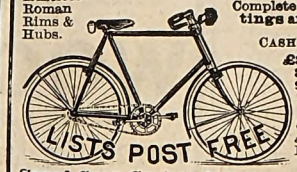
without their knowledge. Send Stamp for FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of a wonderful remedy that has saved homes. Send no money. Address in confidence: WARD CHEMICAL Co., 51 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

JUNO CYCLES

ARE THE VERY BEST.

FOR LADIES & GENTLEMEN.
Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.

Rustless Roman Rims & Hubs.



CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of
£8 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
8 8 0 „ 15/10 „
9 0 0 „ 16/8 „
9 10 0 „ 1 /6 „
JUNO Motor Cycles, 3 H.P., £34, or Monthly Payments.

JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles, £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.
Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ld., S.S. Dept., 75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

TELL COOK KEATING'S POWDER KILLS BLACK BEETLES

Tins Only 3d. 6d. & 1s.

EARN A BICYCLE

distributing circulars and taking orders from sample machine furnished by us.
Active Agents wanted in each district. Large profits easily made.
Highest grade fully warranted
BRITISH MADE CYCLES
LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6
New Departure Coaster Hubs, Best Makes Tyres, and best British made equipment throughout.
200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, good as new, £1 to £2-10
Great factory clearing sale at half factory prices. We send on approval and allow Ten Days' Free Trial on every cycle. Money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer.
Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos half prices.
MEAD CYCLE CO.*, Dept. 44e,
85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool,
19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

5/- Marvellous Offer

FOR A SHORT TIME ONLY.

CARR. FREE.

A Manufacturer's Stock of these splendid Tailor-Made Skirts, very latest design, in Black Vicuna Cloth, Strapped Mercerised Silkette. Send at once Postal Order for

5/-

With length of front and waist measurement to
WIGAN SKIRT CO.
WIGAN.
Est. 1885

FREEMAN'S

TRADE MARK

THE ORIGINAL & ONLY TRUE
CHLORODYNE
Best Remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.
Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 6s., or postage free by the INVENTOR, R. FREEMAN, 70 KENNINGTON PARK ROAD, LONDON, S.E.
RECOMMENDED BY MEDICAL MEN.
N.B.—Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Justices James and Mellish, decided in favour of Freeman's Original Chlorodyne, and against Browne & Davenport, compelling them to pay all costs.
—"Times," 24-7-73.

No. 3 of THE RAPID REVIEW NOW ON SALE.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

"MENE"

A SAMPLE ½ DOZEN OF THESE FAMOUS SANITARY TOWELS IN ASSORTED SIZES, WILL BE SENT POST FREE FOR SIX STAMPS.

NONE EQUAL THEM FOR CLEANLINESS COMFORT & ECONOMY

SOLD BY ALL UNDERCLOTHING HOUSES AND CHEMISTS.

LADIES SHOULD WRITE FOR SAMPLE TO MISS HAYNES, 55, FANN ST. LONDON, E.C.

Your Food will do you more good when salted with . .

CEREBOS Table Salt

BABY CARS.

Buy direct and save 5/- in the £. Easy Payments from 3/6 Monthly. Good discount for cash. Every Car sent carriage paid, on approval. Our Catalogue shows many lovely styles, send for it.

DIRECT PUBLIC SUPPLY CO., COVENTRY.

"BEEHIVE" WOOL KNITTING COMPETITION.

Over £50 in Prizes.

EVERY LADY SHOULD ENTER FOR THIS EXCELLENT COMPETITION

The competition is divided into eight classes, and covers every description of knitted work with "BEEHIVE" Wools, and prizes will be awarded for the best examples in Ladies' and Gentlemen's Stockings, Jerseys, Mufflers, Cardigans, Petticoats, Mittens, Gentlemen's Waistcoats, Undervests, and Shawls, &c., &c. The only condition is that "BEEHIVE" Wools (over 100 years' reputation) are used.

All Knitted Articles sent in for Competition purposes will be returned to Competitors.

Commence work at once, as Competition closes May 31st, 1904. Further particulars may be had from your Draper or Wool Stores, or apply (by letter only), enclosing stamped envelope) to MRS. ELLIOTT (Needlework Correspondent to the "Queen" Newspaper), 33 Somerset Street, Portman Square, London, W.; or Messrs. J. & J. BALDWIN & PARTNERS Ltd., Clark Bridge Mills, Halifax.

"OCEANIC" BOOTS

10/6 EVERYWHERE

MILLIONS OF PEOPLE WEAR THE

WOOD-MILNE

REVOLVING RUBBER HEEL PADS.

WHY? Because they preserve the original shape and symmetry of the Boot. They make the Boots last twice as long, and thus save one-half the Family Boot Bill. Special Quality—Ladies', 1/- per pr.; Gents', 1/3 per pr. Second Quality—10d. & 1/- per pr.

Of all Rubber Boot and Shoe Stores, and the

REVOLVING HEEL CO., PRESTON

Be careful to see the name WOOD-MILNE stamped on every pad.

FENDERS AND BEDSTEADS

of Every Description Direct from Works.

Also CURBS, FIRE IRONS, BRASSES, FIRE GUARDS, &c.

Send particulars of your requirements.

Sketches and Prices can be sent on at once.

SPARKHILL FENDER AND BEDSTEAD CO.,

B88 DURHAM ROAD, BIRMINGHAM.

WRITING COMPETITION

FOR CHILDREN UNDER 16

£6000 IN CASH AND 10,000 PRIZES

1. One Prize of	£2000	4. One Prize of	£200
2. "	£1000	5. 10 Prizes of	£40 £400
3. "	£400	6. 100 "	£20 £2000
		in all	£6000

INSURED IN ONE OF THE BEST BRITISH ASSURANCE COMPANIES PAYABLE ON ARRIVING AT THE AGE OF 21

ASK FOR POULAIN'S CHOCOLATE AND COCOA

PACKETS CONTAINING FULL PARTICULARS ON APPLICATION TO 21, MINCING LANE E.C.

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 799. Week Ending April 23, 1904. Price One Penny.

Nella was at her wits' end to know how to escape from her terrible predicament, when suddenly a man's fist shot out and felled the villain to the ground! Her rescuer was Prince Aribert!

(A Dramatic Episode from "Phantom Shadows," the Splendid New Serial just started.)

Digitized by Google

THREE GRAND

KODAK

AMATEUR PHOTOGRAPHIC COMPETITIONS.

£1,000 in Cash Prizes.

£500 For Pictures on N.C. Film (non-curling and orthochromatic).

£300 for Pictures on KODOID Plate (thin, flat, and unbreakable).

£200 for Roll Films developed in KODAK Developing Machine.

ENTRIES RECEIVED UP TILL JUNE 30th.

Ask your dealer for particulars, or write direct to Dept. 35.

KODAK Ltd., 41-43 Clerkenwell Road, LONDON, E.C.

WARNING. "KODAK" is applied to Cameras, Films, and Products made by the KODAK CO. only. Beware of inferior and experimental imitations.

Kaputine THE SAFE REMEDY

CURES IN TEN MINUTES

Headache,

Neuralgia & all Nerve Pains

One dose of Kaputine, costing 1d., cures in ten minutes the most violent nerve pain, every time.

Kaputine is not an aperient, and causes no inconvenience, but is for one purpose only—to cure Nerve Pains.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—and gives immediate relief.

Kaputine, unlike the dangerous white headache powders consisting of one crude drug, is composed of several approved ingredients having the full confidence of the Medical Profession.

Kaputine is sold by all Medicine Dealers, Packets of 18 doses, 1/-. Samples 1d. each.

Write now for samples free and post paid to

O. G. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

10,000 RUGS GIVEN AWAY!

This Phenomenal Offer is made to the readers of "Short Stories," 23/4/1904. On receipt of Postal Order for 5/-, we will forward, Direct from our Looms to your address, one of our 10/6 genuine SEAMLESS WOVEN, REVERSIBLE CARPETS, suitable for Drawing-room, Dining-room, Bedroom, &c., handsomely bordered and woven in 30 different patterns and art colourings, to suit all requirements, and large enough to cover any ordinary-sized room. These Carpets will be sold as an advertisement for our goods below the actual cost of production. They are made of material equal to wool, and, being a speciality of our own, can only be obtained direct from our Looms, thus saving the purchasers all middle profits.

OVER 200,000 SOLD DURING THE PAST 12 MONTHS.

GIVEN AWAY! GIVEN AWAY!

With every Carpet we shall Absolutely Give Away a very handsome Rug to match, or we will send 2 Carpets and 2 Rugs for 9/6.

MONEY WILLINGLY RETURNED IF NOT APPROVED.

Thousands of Repeat Orders and Unsolicited Testimonials Received.

Illustrated Bargain Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Table Linen Curtains, &c., post free.

F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.) Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants.

WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

Sale Price: 3/6 Postage 4d. extra.

Free Gifts. Sizes: 38, 40, 42.

F. HODGSON & SONS, City of Leeds, will Present Free to every reader of Short Stories, 23/4/1904.

carriage paid, on receipt of postal order for 3/6, with stamps 4d. extra, for postage, for one of our Ladies' Beautiful Tailor Made Cloth Serge Dress Costume Skirts, in Black or Navy, richly trimmed with mercerised silkette strappings, and fitted with good linenette pocket. We shall include FREE with each Skirt a Massive 18-ct. Gold Pattern Curb Bracelet, with Heart Pendant, mounted with Pearls and Turquoise, and scented with Forget-me-Nots. Cased with Pure Gold.

Money willingly returned if not approved. Catalogues of Carpets, Hearthrugs, Curtains, &c., post free.

Address: F. HODGSON & SONS (Dept. S.H.T.), Manufacturers, Importers, and Merchants, WOODSLEY ROAD, LEEDS.

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

A medicine of which the people have long known the remedial value in

BILIOUS AND LIVER DISORDERS,

SICK-HEADACHE, FAILING APPETITE,

LANGUOR AND WANT OF TONE,

caused by depressed conditions of the nervous system. In all such cases it is not too much to say that the benefit to be derived from a judicious use of is practically known all over the world.

BEECHAM'S PILLS

BEECHAM'S PILLS

are specially suitable for Females of all ages. Every woman who values health should read the instructions wrapped round each box.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1s. 1½d. (56 pills) and 2s. 9d. (168 pills).

BODLEIAN LIBRARY 20 APR 1904

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

No. 799.] Week Ending April 23rd, 1904. [One Penny.

THIS SPLENDID NEW SERIAL HAS JUST BEGUN.

A Story of Love and Crime.

By ARNOLD BENNETT.

Synopsis of First Chapters.

Mr. Theodore Racksole, American multi-millionaire, arrives at the Grand Babylon Hotel, and in consequence of an altercation with Jules, the all-important head waiter, he purchases the hotel for £400,000, with the intention of dismissing Jules from the staff.

Reginald Dimmock, English companion to Prince Aribert of Posen, dines the same evening with Racksole, who suspects that there is some sort of secret understanding between the young equerry and Jules.

The millionaire that night retires to bed very late, and is greatly surprised to see the waiter emerge from a room which he believes to be occupied by his daughter Nella.

Investigating the matter, Racksole finds that Dimmock is inhabiting the rooms, he having volunteered to change apartments with Nella, as a window of those she had intended to occupy had been broken by a stone flung from the outside. The millionaire accepts the explanation, although the circumstances of the case worry him considerably.

The next morning he learns that Miss Spencer, the bureau clerk, has left the hotel during the night, without giving any warning whatsoever.

Racksole dismisses Jules the first thing in the morning, forbidding him to enter the hotel again. Prince Aribert of Posen arrives, and Nella recognises him as a gentleman she has met in Paris as "Count Steenbock."

Dimmock is seen to drop dead in the quadrangle of the hotel. The cause of death is mysterious. More mysterious still is the way in which Dimmock's dead body disappears during the night—a coincidence being that Racksole discovers Jules in the hotel precincts.

The affair is kept very quiet, and does not leak out into the newspapers.

Prince Aribert is in great grief, and tells Nella that he has been informed that his nephew, Prince Eugen, the hereditary Grand Duke of Posen, who is almost of an age with himself, has disappeared in Ostend or the neighbourhood. Aribert imagines that Eugen is the victim of a plot, and decides to return to the Continent at once.

On the morning following the Prince's departure, Miss Spencer comes to the Grand Babylon disguised as the Baroness Zerlinski. Nella, suspicious of the woman's manner, watches her, and sees her take a note out of a cream puff that is served to her at lunch.

Suddenly the identity of the Baroness as Miss Spencer strikes Nella. Discovering that she has set out for Ostend, Nella decides to follow her, and tracks her to a house in that town. Boldly confronting Miss Spencer with a revolver, she learns various important facts about the Dimmock mystery; but by a trick, Miss Spencer eventually bests Nella.

The latter faints, and, awakening, finds herself on board a yacht.

Jules, otherwise Mr. Tom Jackson, is approaching her.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

THIS WEEK'S INSTALMENT.

TENTH CHAPTER.
At Sea.

Nella's eyes flashed as she spoke, and the contempt in them added mightily to her beauty. Mr. Thomas Jackson, otherwise Jules, erstwhile head waiter at the Grand Babylon, considered himself a connoisseur in feminine loveliness, and the vision of Nella Racksole smote him like an exquisite blow.

"With pleasure," he replied. "I had forgotten that to prevent you from falling I had secured you to the chair." With a quick movement he unfastened the band. Nella stood up, quivering with fiery annoyance and scorn.

"Now," she said, fronting him, "what is the meaning of this?"

"You fainted," he replied imperturbably. "Perhaps you don't remember."

The man offered her a deck chair with a characteristic gesture. Nella was obliged to acknowledge, in spite of herself, that the fellow had distinction, an air of breeding. No one would have guessed that for twenty years he had been a hotel waiter. His long, lithe figure, and easy, careless carriage seemed to be the figure and carriage of an aristocrat, and his voice was quiet, restrained, and authoritative.

"That is nothing to do with my being carried off in this yacht of yours."

"It is not my yacht," he said, "but that is a minor detail. As to the more important matter, forgive me that I remind you that only a few hours ago you were threatening a lady in my house with a revolver."

"Then it was your house?"

"Why not? May I not possess a house?" He smiled.

"I must request you to put the yacht about at once, instantly, and take me back." She tried to speak firmly.

"Ah!" he said, "I'm afraid that's impossible. I didn't put out to sea with the intention of returning at once, instantly." In the last words he gave a faint imitation of her tone.

"When I do get back," she said, "when my father gets to know of this affair, it will be an exceedingly bad day for you, Mr. Jackson."

"But supposing your father doesn't hear of it——"

"What?"

"Supposing you never get back?"

"Do you mean, then, to have my murder on your conscience?"

"Talking of murder," he said, "you came very near to murdering my friend, Miss Spencer. At least, so she tells me."

"Is Miss Spencer on board?" Nella asked, seeing perhaps a faint ray of hope in the possible presence of a woman.

"Miss Spencer is not on board. There is no one on board except you and myself and a small crew—a very discreet crew, I may add."

"I will have nothing more to say to you. You must take your own course."

"Thanks for the permission," he said. "I will send you up some breakfast."

He went to the saloon stairs and whistled, and a negro boy appeared with a tray of chocolate. Nella took it, and, without the slightest hesitation, threw it overboard. Mr. Jackson walked away a few steps and then returned.

"You have spirit," he said, "and I admire spirit. It is a rare quality."

She made no reply.

"Why did you mix yourself up in my affairs at all?" he went on.

Again she made no reply, but the question set her thinking; why had she mixed herself up in this mysterious business? It was quite at variance with the usual methods of her gay and butterfly existence to meddle at all with serious things. Had she acted merely from a desire to see justice done and wickedness punished? Or was it the desire of adventure? Or was it, perhaps, the desire to be of service to his Serene Highness Prince Aribert?

"It is no fault of mine that you are in this fix," Jules continued. "I didn't bring you into it. You brought yourself into it. You and your father—you have been moving along at a pace which is rather too rapid."

"That remains to be seen," she put in coldly.

"It does," he admitted. "And I repeat that I can't help admiring you—that is, when you aren't interfering with my private affairs. That is a proceeding which I have never tolerated from anyone—not even from a millionaire, not even from a beautiful woman." He bowed. "I will tell you what I propose to do. I propose to escort you to a place of safety, and to keep you there till my operations are concluded and the possibility of interference entirely removed. You spoke just now of murder. What a crude notion that was of yours! It is only the amateur who practises murder——"

"What about Reginald Dimmock?" she interjected quickly.

He paused gravely.

"Reginald Dimmock," he repeated. "I had imagined his was a case of heart disease. Let me send you up some more chocolate. I'm sure you're hungry."

"I will starve before I touch your food," she said.

"Gallant creature!" he murmured, and his eyes roved over her face. Her superb, supercilious beauty overcame him. "Ah!" he said, "what a wife you would make!" He approached nearer to her. "You and I, Miss Racksole, your beauty and wealth and my brains—we could conquer the world. Few men are worthy of you, but I am one of the few. Listen! You might do worse. Marry me. I am a great man; I shall be greater. I adore you. Marry me, and I will save your life. All shall be well. I will begin again. The past shall be as though there had been no past."

"This is somewhat sudden—Jules," she said, with biting contempt.

"Did you expect me to be conventional?" he retorted. "I love you."

"Granted," she said, for the sake of the argument. "Then what will occur to your present wife?"

"My present wife?"

"Yes, Miss Spencer, as she is called."

"She told you I was her husband?"

'Incidentally, she did."

"She isn't."

"Perhaps she isn't. But, nevertheless, I think I won't marry you." Nella stood like a statue of scorn before him.

He went still nearer to her. "Give me a kiss, then; one kiss—I won't ask for more; one kiss from those lips and you shall go free. Men have ruined themselves for a kiss. I will."

'Coward!" she ejaculated.

"Coward!" he repeated. "Coward, am I? Then I'll be a coward, and you shall kiss me whether you will or not."

He put a hand on her shoulder. As she shrank back from his lustrous eyes with an involuntary scream, a figure sprang out of the dinghy a few feet away. With a single blow, neatly directed to Mr. Jackson's ear, Mr. Jackson was stretched senseless on the deck. Prince Aribert of Posen stood over him with a revolver. It was probably the greatest surprise of Mr. Jackson's whole life.

"Don't be alarmed," said the Prince to Nella; "my being here is the simplest thing in the world, and I will explain it as soon as I have finished with this fellow."

Nella could think of nothing to say, but she noticed the revolver in the Prince's hand.

"Why," she remarked, "that's my revolver."

"It is," he said, "and I will explain that, too."

The man at the wheel gave no heed whatever to the scene.

ELEVENTH CHAPTER.
The Court Pawnbroker.

"Mr. Sampson Levi wishes to see you, sir."

These words, spoken by a servant to Theodore Racksole, aroused the millionaire from a reverie which had been the reverse of pleasant. The fact was, and it is necessary to insist on it, that Mr. Racksole, owner of the Grand Babylon Hotel, was by no means in a state of self-satisfaction. A mystery had attached itself to his hotel, and with all his acumen and knowledge of things in general he was unable to solve that mystery. He laughed at the fruitless efforts of the police, but he could not honestly say that his own efforts had been less barren. The public was talking, for, after all, the disappearance of poor Dimmock's body had got noised abroad in an indirect sort of way, and Theodore Racksole did not like the idea of his impeccable hotel being the subject of sinister rumours. He wondered, grimly, what the public and the Sunday newspapers would say if they were aware of all the other phenomena, not yet common property; of Miss Spencer's disappearance, of Jules' strange visits, and of the non-arrival of Prince Eugen of Posen. Theodore Racksole had worried his brains without result. He had conducted an elaborate private investigation without result, and he had spent a certain amount of money without result. The police said that they had a clue; but Racksole remarked that it was always the business of the police to have a clue, that they seldom had more than a clue, and that a clue without some sequel to it was a pretty stupid business. The only sure thing in the whole affair was that a cloud rested over his hotel, his beautiful new toy, the finest of its kind. The cloud was not interfering with business, but, nevertheless, it was a cloud, and he fiercely resented its presence; perhaps it would be more correct to say that he fiercely resented his inability to dissipate it.

Digitized by Google

The millionaire from his hiding-place saw Rocco engaged in a mysterious occupation.

"Mr. Sampson Levi wishes to see you, sir," the servant repeated, having received no sign that his master had heard him.

"So I hear," said Racksole. "Does he want to see me personally?"

"He asked for you, sir."

"Perhaps it is Rocco he wants to see, about a menu or something of that kind?"

"I will inquire, sir," and the servant made a move to withdraw.

"Stop," Racksole commanded suddenly. "Desire Mr. Sampson Levi to step this way."

The great stockbroker of the "Kaffir Circus" entered with a simple, unassuming air. He was a rather short, florid man, dressed like a typical Hebraic financier, with too much watch-chain and too little waistcoat. In his fat hand he held a gold-headed cane, and an absolutely new silk hat—for it was Friday, and Mr. Levi purchased a new hat every Friday of his life, holiday times only excepted. He breathed heavily and sniffed through his nose a good deal, as though he had just performed some Herculean physical labour. He glanced at the American millionaire with an expression in which a silght embarrassment might have been detected, but at the same time his round, red face disclosed a certain frank admiration and good-nature.

"Mr. Racksole, I believe—Mr. Theodore Racksole. Proud to meet you, sir." Such were the first words of Mr. Sampson Levi. In form they were the greeting of a third-rate chimney-sweep, but, strangely enough, Theodore Racksole liked their tone. He said to himself that here, precisely where no one would have expected to find one, was an honest man.

"Good-day," said Racksole briefly. "To what do I owe the pleasure—"

"I expect your time is limited," answered Sampson Levi. "Anyhow, mine is, and so I'll come straight to the point, Mr. Racksole. I'm a plain man. I don't pretend to be a gentleman or any nonsense of that kind. I'm a stockbroker, that's what I am, and I don't care who knows it. The other night I had a ball in this hotel. It cost me a couple of thousandandsomeodd pounds, and, by-the-way, I wrote out a cheque for your bill this morning. I don't like balls, but they're useful to me, and my little wife likes 'em, and so we give 'em. Now, I've nothing to say against the hotel management as regards that ball; it was very decently done, very decently, but what I want to know is this—Why did you have a private detective among my guests?"

"A private detective?" exclaimed Racksole, somewhat surprised at this charge.

"Yes," Mr. Sampson Levi said firmly, fanning himself in his chair, and gazing at Theodore Racksole with the direct, earnest expression of a man having a grievance. "Yes, a private detective. It's a small matter, I know, and I dare say you think you've got a right, as proprietor of the show, to do what you like in that line, but I've just called to tell you that I object. I've called as a matter of principle. I'm not angry—it's the principle of the thing."

"My dear Mr. Levi," said Racksole, "I assure you that, having let the Gold Room to a private individual for a private entertainment, I should never dream of doing what you suggest."

Digitized by Google

"Straight?" asked Mr. Sampson Levi, using his own picturesque language.

"Straight," said Racksole smiling.

"There was a gent present at my ball that I didn't ask. I've got a wonderful memory for faces, and I know. Several fellows asked me afterwards what he was doing there. I was told by someone that he was one of your waiters, but I didn't believe that. I know nothing of the Grand Babylon, it's not quite my style of tavern, but I don't think you'd send one of your own waiters to watch my guests—unless, of course, you sent him as a waiter; and this chap didn't do any waiting, though he did his share of drinking."

"Perhaps I can throw some light on this mystery," said Racksole. "I may tell you that I was already aware that a man had attended your ball uninvited."

"How did you get to know?"

"By pure chance, Mr. Levi, and not by inquiry. That man was a former waiter at this hotel—the head waiter, in fact—Jules. No doubt you have heard of him."

"Not I," said Mr. Levi positively.

"Ah!" said Racksole, "I was informed that everyone knew Jules, but it appears not. Well, be that as it may, previously to the night of your ball I had dismissed Jules. I had ordered him never to enter the Babylon again. But on that evening I encountered him here—not in the Gold Room, but in the hotel itself. I asked him to explain his presence, and he stated he was your guest. That is all I know of the matter, Mr. Levi, and I am extremely sorry that you should have thought me capable of the enormity of placing a private detective among your guests."

"This is perfectly satisfactory to me," Mr. Sampson Levi said, after a pause. "I only wanted an explanation, and I've got it. I was told by some pals of mine in the City I might rely on Mr. Theodore Racksole going straight to the point, and I'm glad they were right. Now, as to that feller Jules, I shall make my own inquiries as to him. Might I ask you why you dismissed him?"

"I don't know why I dismissed him."

"You don't know? Oh, come now! I'm only asking because I thought you might be able to give me a hint why he turned up uninvited at my ball. Sorry if I'm too inquisitive."

"Not at all, Mr. Levi, but I really don't know. I only sort of felt that he was a suspicious character. I dismissed him on instinct, as it were. See?"

Without answering this question, Mr. Levi asked another. "If this Jules is such a well-known person," he said, "how could the feller hope to come to my ball without being recognised?"

"Give it up," said Racksole promptly.

"Well, I'll be moving on," was Mr. Sampson Levi's next remark. "Good-day, and thank ye. I suppose you aren't doing anything in Kaffirs?"

Mr. Racksole smiled a negative.

"I thought not," said Levi. "Well, I never touch American rails myself, and so I reckon we sha'n't come across each other. Good-day."

"Good-day," said Racksole politely, following Mr. Sampson Levi to the door. With his hand on the handle of the door, Mr. Levi stopped, and, gazing at Theodore Racksole with a shrewd, quizzical expression, remarked:

"Strange things have been going on here lately, eh?"

The two men looked very hard at each other for several seconds.

"Yes," Racksole assented. "Know anything about them?"

"Well, no, not exactly," said Mr. Levi. "But I had a fancy you and I might be useful to each other; I had a kind of fancy to that effect."

"Come back and sit down again, Mr. Levi," Racksole said, attracted by the evident straightforwardness of the man's tone. "Now, how can we be of service to each other? I flatter myself I'm something of a judge of character, especially financial character, and I tell you—if you'll put your cards on the table, I'll do ditto with mine."

"Agreed," said Mr. Sampson Levi. "I'll begin by explaining my interest in your hotel. I have been expecting to receive a summons from a certain Prince Eugen of Posen to attend him here, and that summons hasn't arrived. It appears that Prince Eugen hasn't come to London at all. Now, I could have taken my dying davy that he would have been here yesterday at the latest."

"Why were you so sure?"

"Question for question," said Levi. "Let's clear the ground first, Mr. Racksole. Why did you buy this hotel? That's a conundrum that's been puzzling a lot of our fellows in the City for some days past. Why did you buy the Grand Babylon? And what is the next move to be?"

"There is no next move," answered Racksole candidly, "and I will tell you why I bought the hotel; there need be no secret about it. I bought it because of a whim." And then Theodore Racksole gave this little Jew, whom he had begun to respect, a faithful account of the transaction with Mr. Félix Babylon. "I suppose," he added, "you find a difficulty in appreciating my state of mind when I did the deal."

"Not a bit," said Mr. Levi. "I once bought an electric launch on the Thames in a very similar way, and it turned out to be one of the most satisfactory purchases I ever made. Then it's a simple accident that you own this hotel at the present moment?"

"A simple accident—all because of a beefsteak and a bottle of Bass."

"Um!" grunted Mr. Sampson Levi, stroking his triple chin.

"To return to Prince Eugen," Racksole resumed. "I was expecting his Highness here. The State apartments had been prepared for him. He was due on the very afternoon that young Dimmock died. But he never came, and I have not heard why he has failed to arrive; nor have I seen his name in the papers. What his business was in London, I don't know."

"I will tell you," said Mr. Sampson Levi; "he was coming to arrange a loan."

"A State loan?"

"No—a private loan."

"Whom from?"

"From me, Sampson Levi. You look surprised. If you'd lived in London a little longer, you'd know that I was just the person the Prince would come to. Perhaps you aren't aware that down Throgmorton Street way I'm called 'The Court Pawnbroker,' because I arrange loans for the minor, second-class Princes of Europe. I'm a stockbroker, but my real business is financing some of the little Courts of Europe. Now, I may tell you that the Hereditary Prince of Posen particularly wanted a million, and he wanted it by a certain date, and he knew that if the affair wasn't fixed up by a certain time he wouldn't be able to get it by that certain date. That's why I'm surprised he isn't in London."

"What did he need a million for?"

"Debts," answered Sampson Levi laconically.

"His own?"

"Certainly."

"But he isn't thirty years of age!"

"What of that? He isn't the only European Prince who has run up a million of debts in a dozen years. To a Prince the thing is as easy as eating a sandwich."

"And why has he taken this sudden resolution to liquidate them?"

"Because the Emperor and the lady's parents won't let him marry till he has done so! And quite right, too! He's got to show a clean sheet, or the Princess Anna of Eckstein-Schwartsburg will never be Princess of Posen. Even now the Emperor has no idea how much Prince Eugen's debts amount to. If he had——!"

"But would not the Emperor know of this proposed loan?"

"Not necessarily at once. It could be so managed. Twig?" Mr. Sampson Levi laughed. "I've carried these little affairs through before. After marriage it might be allowed to leak out. And you know the Princess Anna's fortune is pretty big! Now, Mr. Racksole," he added, abruptly changing his tone, "where do you suppose Prince Eugen has disappeared to? Because if he doesn't turn up to-day he can't have that million. To-day is the last day. To-morrow the money will be appropriated elsewhere. Of course, I'm not alone in this business, and my friends have something to say."

Digitized by Google

"You ask me where I think Prince Eugen has disappeared to?"

"I do."

"Then you think it's a disappearance?"

Sampson Levi nodded. "Putting two and two together," he said, "I do. The Dimmock business is very peculiar—very peculiar, indeed. Dimmock was a left-handed relation of the Posen family. Twig? Scarcely anyone knows that. He was made secretary and companion to Prince Aribert, just to keep him in the domestic circle. His mother was an Irishwoman, whose misfortune was that she was too beautiful. Twig?" (Mr. Sampson Levi always used this extraordinary word when he was in a communicative mood.) "My belief is that Dimmock's death has something to do with the disappearance of Prince Eugen. The only thing that passes me is this: Why should anyone want to make Prince Eugen disappear? The poor little Prince hasn't an enemy in the world. If he's been 'copped,' as they say, why has he been 'copped'? It won't do anyone any good."

"Won't it?" repeated Racksole, with a sudden flash.

"What do you mean?" asked Mr. Levi.

"I mean this: Suppose some other European pauper Prince was anxious to marry Princess Anna and her fortune, wouldn't that Prince have an interest in stopping this loan of yours to Prince Eugen? Wouldn't he have an interest in causing Prince Eugen to disappear—at any rate, for a time?"

Sampson Levi thought hard for a few moments.

"Mr. Theodore Racksole," he said at length, "I do believe you have hit on something."

Rocco was photographing the body.

TWELFTH CHAPTER.

Rocco and Room No. 111.

On the afternoon of the same day—the interview just described had occurred in the morning—Racksole was visited by another idea, and he said to himself that he ought to have thought of it before. The conversation with Mr. Sampson Levi had continued for a considerable time, and the two men had exchanged various notions, and agreed to meet again, but the theory that Reginald Dimmock had probably been a traitor to his family—a traitor whose repentance had caused his death—had not been thoroughly discussed; the talk had tended rather to Continental politics, with a view to discovering what princely family might have an interest in the temporary disappearance of Prince Eugen. Now, as Racksole considered in detail the particular affair of Reginald Dimmock, deceased, he was struck by one point especially, to wit: Why had Dimmock and Jules manœuvred to turn Nella Racksole out of Room No. 111 on that first night? That they had so manœuvred, that the broken window-pane was not a mere accident, Racksole felt perfectly sure. He had felt perfectly sure all along; but the significance of the facts had not struck him. It was plain to him now that there must be some thing of extraordinary and peculiar importance about Room No. 111. After lunch he wandered quietly upstairs and looked at Room No. 111—that is to say, he looked at the outside of it; it happened to be occupied, but the guest was leaving that evening. The thought crossed his mind that there could be no object in gazing blankly at the outside of a room; yet he gazed; then he wandered quickly down to the next floor, and in passing along the corridor of that floor he stopped, and with an involuntary gesture stamped his foot.

"Great Scott!" he said, "I've got hold of something—No. 111 is exactly over the State apartments."

He went to the bureau, and issued instructions that No. 111

Digitized by Google

The picture shows how the chef gets the better of the millionaire. The incident will be graphically described in next week's "Phantom Shadows."

was not to be re-let to anyone until further orders. At the bureau they gave him Nella's note, which ran thus:

"Dearest Papa,—I am going away for a day or two on the trail of a clue. If I'm not back in three days, begin to inquire for me at Ostend. Till then leave me alone.—Your sagacious daughter,

"Nell."

These few words, in Nella's large, scrawling hand, filled one side of the paper. At the bottom was a P.T.O. He turned over, and read the sentence, underlined, "P.S.—Keep an eye on Rocco."

"I wonder what the little creature is up to?" he murmured, as he tore the letter into small fragments, and threw them into the waste-paper basket. Then, without any delay, he took the lift down to the basement, with the object of making a preliminary inspection of Rocco in his lair. He could scarcely bring himself to believe that this suave and stately gentleman, this enthusiast of gastronomy, was concerned in the machinations of Jules and other rascals unknown. Nevertheless, from habit, he obeyed his daughter, giving her credit for a certain amount of perspicuity and cleverness.

The kitchens of the Grand Babylon Hotel are one of the wonders of Europe. Only three years before the events now under narration Félix Babylon had had them newly installed with every device and patent that the ingenuity of two Continents could supply. They covered nearly an acre of superficial space. They were walled and floored from end to end with tiles and marble, which enabled them to be washed down every morning like the deck of a man-of-war. Visitors were sometimes taken to see the potato-paring machine, the patent plate-drier, the Babylon-spit (a contrivance of Félix Babylon's own), the silver grill, the system of connected stock-pots, and other amazing phenomena of the department. Sometimes, if they were fortunate, they might also see the artist who sculptured ice into forms of men and beasts for table ornaments, or the first napkin-folder in London, or the man who daily invented fresh designs for pastry and blanc-manges. Twelve chefs pursued their labours in those kitchens, helped by ninety assistant chefs, and a further army of unconsidered menials. Over all these was Rocco, supreme and unapproachable. Half way along the suite of kitchens, Rocco had an apartment of his own, wherein he brought out those magnificent combinations, those marvellous feats of succulence and originality, which had given him his fame. Visitors never caught a glimpse of Rocco in the kitchens, though sometimes, on a special night, he would stroll nonchalantly through the dining-room, like the great man he was, to receive the compliments of the hotel habitués—people of insight who recognised his uniqueness.

Theodore Racksole's sudden and unusual appearance in the kitchen caused a little stir. He nodded to some of the chefs, but said nothing to anyone, merely wandering about amid the maze of copper utensils and white-capped workers. At length he saw Rocco, surrounded by several admiring chefs. Rocco was bending over a freshly-roasted partridge which lay on a blue dish. He plunged a long fork into the back of the bird, and raised it in the air with his left hand. In his right he held a long, glittering carving knife. He was giving one of his world-famous exhibitions of carving. In four swift, unerring, delicate, perfect strokes he cleanly severed the limbs of the partridge. It was a wonderful achievement—how wondrous none but the really skilful carver can properly appreciate. The chefs emitted a hum of applause, and Rocco, long, lean, and graceful, retired to his own apartment. Racksole followed him. Rocco sat in a chair, one hand over his eyes; he had not noticed Theodore Racksole.

"What are you doing, M. Rocco?" the millionaire asked smiling.

"Ah!" exclaimed Rocco, starting up with an apology. "Pardon! I was inventing a new mayonnaise, which I shall need for a certain menu next week."

"Do you invent these things without materials, then?" questioned Racksole.

"Certainly. I do dem in my mind. I tink dem. Why should I want materials? I know all flavours. I tink, and tink, and tink, and it is done. I write down. I give de recipe to my best chef—dere you are. I need not even taste, I know how it will taste. It is like composing music. De great composers do not compose at de piano."

"I see," said Racksole.

"It is because I work like dat dat you pay me tree tousand a year," Rocco added gravely.

"Heard about Jules?" said Racksole abruptly.

"Jules?"

"Yes. He's been arrested in Ostend," the millionaire

Digitized by Google

continued, lying cleverly at a venture. "They say that he and several others are implicated in a murder case—the murder of Reginald Dimmock."

"Truly?" drawled Rocco, scarcely hiding a yawn. His indifference was so superb, so gorgeous, that Racksole instantly divined that it was assumed for the occasion.

"It seems that, after all, the police are good for something. But this is the first time I ever knew them to be worth their salt. There is to be a thorough and systematic search of the hotel to-morrow," Racksole went on. "I have mentioned it to you to warn you that so far as you are concerned the search is of course merely a matter of form. You will not object to the detectives looking through your rooms?"

"Certainly not," and Rocco shrugged his shoulders.

"I shall ask you to say nothing about this to anyone," said Racksole. "The news of Jules' arrest is quite private to myself. The papers know nothing of it. You comprehend?"

Rocco smiled in his grand manner, and Rocco's master thereupon went away. Racksole was very well satisfied with the little conversation. It was perhaps dangerous to tell a series of mere lies to a clever fellow like Rocco, and Racksole wondered how he should ultimately explain them to his great master-chef if his and Nella's suspicions should be unfounded, and nothing came of them. Nevertheless, Rocco's manner, a strange, elusive something in the man's eyes, had nearly convinced Racksole that he was somehow implicated in Jules' schemes—and probably in the death of Reginald Dimmock and the disappearance of Prince Eugen of Posen.

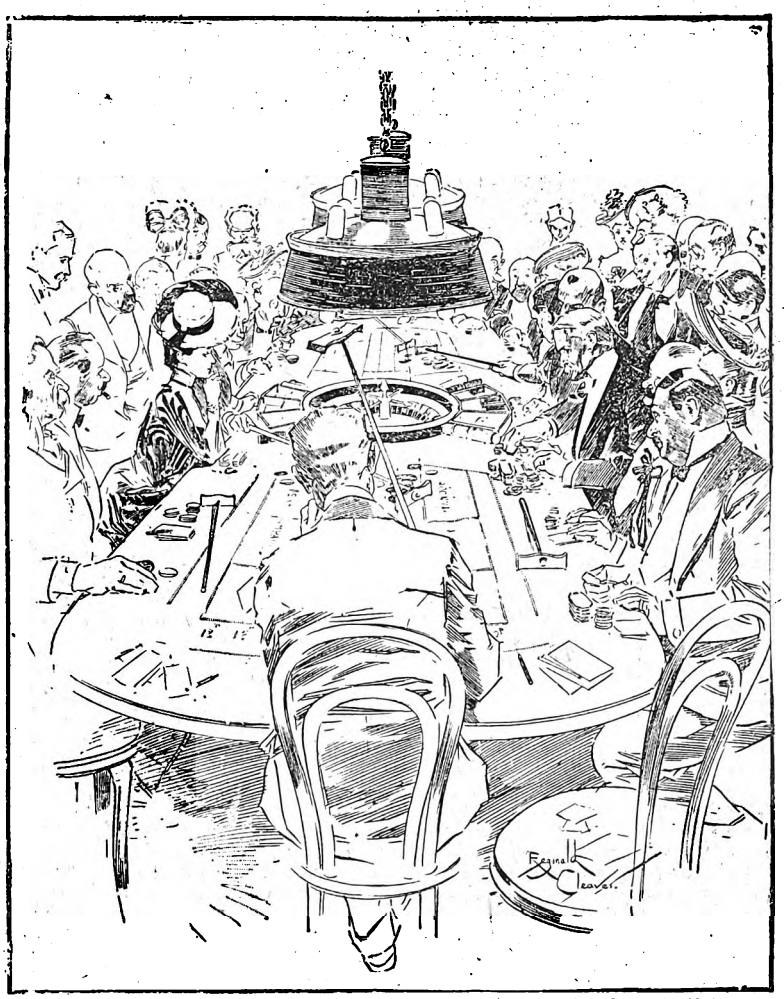
That night, or rather about half-past one the next morning, when the last noises of the hotel's life had died down, Racksole made his way to Room 111 on the second floor. He locked the door on the inside, and proceeded to examine the place, square foot by square foot. Every now and then some creak or other sound startled him, and he listened intently for a few seconds. The bedroom was furnished in the ordinary splendid style of bedrooms at the Grand Babylon Hotel, and in that respect called for no remark. What most interested Racksole was the flooring. He pulled up the thick Oriental carpet, and peered along every plank, but could discover nothing unusual. Then he went to the dressing-room, and finally to the bath-room, both of which opened out of the main room. But in neither of these smaller chambers was he any more successful than in the bedroom itself. Finally he came to the bath, which was inclosed in a panelled casing of polished wood, after the manner of baths. Some baths have a cupboard beneath the taps, with a door at the side, but this one appeared to have none. He tapped the panels, but not a single one of them gave forth that "curious hollow sound" which usually betokens a secret place. Idly he turned the cold-tap of the bath, and the water began to rush in. He turned off the cold-tap and turned on the waste-tap, and as he did so, his knee, which was pressing against the panelling, slipped forward. The panelling had given way, and he saw that one large panel was hinged from the inside, and caught with a hasp, also on the inside. A large space within the casing at the end of the bath was thus revealed. Before doing anything else, Racksole tried to repeat the trick with the waste-tap, but he failed; it would not work again, nor could he in any way perceive that there was any connection between the rod of the waste-tap and the hasp of the panel. Racksole could not see into the cavity within the casing, and the electric light was fixed, and could not be moved about like a candle.

He felt in his pockets, and discovered a box of matches. Aided by these, he looked into the cavity, and saw nothing; nothing except a rather large hole at the far end—some three feet from the casing. With some difficulty he squeezed himself through the open panel, and took a half-kneeling, half-sitting posture within. There he struck a match, and it was a most unfortunate thing that in striking, the box being half open, he set fire to all the matches, and was half smothered in the atrocious smell of phosphorus which resulted.

One match burnt clear on the floor of the cavity, and, rubbing his eyes, Racksole picked it up, and looked down the hole. It was a hole apparently bottomless, and about eighteen inches square. The curious part about the hole was that a rope-ladder hung down it. When he saw that rope-ladder Racksole smiled the smile of a happy man.

The match went out.

Should he make a long journey, perhaps to some distant



The adventure that happens to Mr. Racksole in the Kursaal at Ostend will be told in a forthcoming instalment of "Phantom Shadows."

Digitized by Google

corner of the hotel, for a fresh box of matches, or should he attempt to descend that rope-ladder in the dark? He decided on the latter course, and he was the more strongly moved thereto as he could now distinguish a faint, a very faint tinge of light at the bottom of the hole.

With infinite care he compressed himself into the well-like hole, and descended the ladder. At length he arrived on firm ground, perspiring, but quite safe and quite excited. He saw now that the tinge of light came through a small hole in the wood. He put his eye to the wood, and found that he had a fine view of the State bathroom, and through the door of the State bathroom into the State bedroom. At the massive marble-topped washstand in the State bedroom a man was visible, bending over some object which lay thereon.

The man was Rocco!

THIRTEENTH CHAPTER.
In the State Bedroom.

It was, of course, plain to Racksole that the peculiar passage-way which he had, at great personal inconvenience, discovered between the bathroom at No. 111 and the State bathroom on the floor below must have been specially designed by some person or persons for the purpose of keeping a nefarious watch upon the occupants of the State suite of apartments. It was a means of communication at once simple and ingenious. At that moment he could not be sure of the precise method employed for it, but he surmised that the casing of the waterpipes had been used as a "well," while space for the pipes themselves had been found in the thickness of the ample brick walls of the Grand Babylon.

The eye-hole, through which he now had a view of the bedroom, was a very minute one, and would scarcely be noticed from the exterior. One thing he observed concerning it—namely, that it had been made for a man somewhat taller than himself; he was obliged to stand on tip-toe in order to get his eye in the correct position. He remembered that both Jules and Rocco were distinctly above the average height; also that they were both thin men, and could have descended the well with comparative ease. Theodore Racksole, though not stout, was a well-set man with large bones.

These things flashed through his mind as he gazed, spell-bound, at the mysterious movements of Rocco. The door between the bathroom and the bedroom was wide open, and his own situation was such that his view embraced a considerable portion of the bedroom, including the whole of the immense and gorgeously-upholstered bedstead, but not including the whole of the marble washstand. He could see only half of the washstand, and at intervals Rocco passed out of sight as his lithe hands moved over the object which lay on the marble. At first Theodore Racksole could not decide what this object was, but after a time, as his eyes grew accustomed to the position and the light, he made it out.

It was the body of a man. Or, rather, to be more exact, Racksole could discern the legs of a man on that half of the table which was visible to him. Involuntarily he shuddered, as the conviction forced itself upon him that Rocco had some unconscious human being helpless on that cold marble surface. The legs never moved. Therefore, the hapless creature was either asleep or under the influence of an anæsthetic—or (horrible thought!) dead.

Racksole wanted to call out, to stop by some means or other the dreadful midnight activity which was proceeding before his astonished eyes; but fortunately he restrained himself.

On the washstand he could see certain strangely-shaped utensils and instruments which Rocco used from time to time. The work seemed to Racksole to continue for interminable hours, and then at last Rocco ceased, gave a sign of satisfaction, whistled several bars from Cavalleria Rusticana, and came into the bathroom, where he took off his coat, and very quietly washed his hands. As he stood calmly and leisurely wiping those long fingers of his, he was less than four feet from Racksole, and the cooped-up millionaire trembled, holding his breath, lest Rocco should detect his presence behind the woodwork. But nothing happened, and Rocco returned unsuspectingly to the bedroom. Racksole saw him place some sort of white flannel garment over the prone form on the table, and then lift it boldly on to the great bed, where it lay awfully still. The hidden watcher was sure now that it was a dead body upon which Rocco had been exercising his mysterious and sinister functions. But whose body? And what functions?

Could this be a West End hotel, Racksole's own hotel, in the very heart of London, the best-policed city in the world? It seemed incredible, impossible; yet so it was.

Again he remembered what Félix Babylon had said to him, and realised the truth of the saying anew. The proprietor of a vast and complicated establishment like the Grand Babylon could never know a tithe of the extraordinary and queer occurrences which happened daily under his very nose; the atmosphere of such a caravanserai must necessarily be an atmosphere of mystery and problems apparently inexplicable. Nevertheless, Racksole thought that Fate was carrying things with rather a high hand when she permitted his chef to spend the night hours over a man's remains in this State bedroom, this sacred apartment which was supposed to be occupied only by individuals of Royal Blood. Racksole would not have objected to a certain amount of mystery, but he decidedly thought that there was a little too much mystery here for his taste. He thought that even Félix Babylon would have been surprised at this.

The electric chandelier in the centre of the ceiling was not lighted; only the two lights on either side of the washstand were switched on, and these did not sufficiently illuminate the features of the man on the bed to enable Racksole to see them clearly. In vain the millionaire strained his eyes; he could only make out that the body was probably that of a young man.

Just as he was wondering what to do, he saw Rocco with a square-shaped black box in his hand. Then the chef switched off the two electric lights, and the State bedroom was in darkness. In that swift darkness Racksole heard Rocco spring on to the bed. Another half-dozen moments of suspense, and there was a blinding flash of white, which endured for several seconds, and showed Rocco standing like an evil spirit over the body, the black box in one hand and a burning piece of aluminium wire in the other. The aluminium wire burnt out, and darkness followed blacker than before.

Rocco had photographed the body by flash-light!

But the dazzling flare which had disclosed the features of the dead man to the insensible lens of the camera had disclosed them also to Theodore Racksole. The dead man was Reginald Dimmock!

Stung into action by this discovery, Racksole tried to find the exit from his place of concealment. He felt sure that there existed some way out into the State bathroom, but he sought for it fruitlessly, groping with both hands and feet. Then he decided that he must ascend the rope-ladder, make haste for the first-floor corridor, and intercept Rocco when he left the State apartments. It was a painful and difficult business to ascend that thin and yielding ladder in such a confined space, but Racksole was managing it very nicely, and had nearly reached the top, when, by some untoward freak of chance, the ladder broke above his weight, and he slipped ignominiously down to the bottom of the wooden tube. Smothering an excusable oath, Racksole couched, baffled. Then he saw that the force of his fall had somehow opened a trap-door at his feet. He squeezed through, pushed open another tiny door, and in another second stood in the State bathroom. He was dishevelled, perspiring, rather bewildered; but he was there. In the next second he had resumed absolute command of all his faculties.

Strange to say, he had moved so quietly that Rocco had apparently not heard him. He stepped noiselessly to the door between the bathroom and the bedroom, and stood there in silence. Rocco had switched on again the lights over the washstand, and was busy with his utensils.

Racksole deliberately coughed.

(Another long instalment next week.)

Digitized by Google

AUNT JEMIMA'S RING.

A Tale of Three Uncomfortable Days.

"ONLY three days ago," said my irreverent brother Harry, "we were all looking out for Aunt Jemima's knock. Now we are all looking out for her ring!"

"Oh, Harry!" exclaimed my eldest sister Margaret, who did not appreciate jokes, and, moreover, had a greater respect for our Aunt Jemima than I fear the rest of us had.

"It's not a matter to joke about," said mother seriously. Poor patient little mother! I am afraid the seven of us were somewhat of a trial to her, at times, though she loved us all dearly. As a matter of fact, there are only five of ourselves, but then Margaret and Horace, the respectable ones of the family, as I always call them, are engaged, and so we always include them.

To begin at the beginning, our Aunt Jemima, from whom I may mention we all have expectations, had come to pay us her bi-annual visit. Every six months she and her maid and her boxes and trunks, and her parrot, Peter, without whom we believed she never went anywhere except to church, swooped down upon our happy household, and for the space of a fortnight demoralised us.

We were passably well off, and lived in a big, old-fashioned house in Hampstead, but though it was big and rambling, it was almost an impossibility to get away from Aunt Jemima! She never gave any of us a moment's peace, from the hour she set foot in the house until she turned her back on us. And when that time came, I fear that every one of us, from mother down to the scullery maid, gave a sigh of unmitigated relief. She was one of those fussy old maids who, having no business of her own to look after, filled up her time by interfering in that of everybody she came into contact with.

She lectured mother about the house, the servants, her extravagance, and our impertinence. I am afraid the latter there was some reason for.

She ordered cook about so, that that dear old thing, who had been with us twenty years and had seen us all grow up from babies—I am the baby, and she was with us when I was born—invariably gave mother notice before Aunt Jemima had been in the house a day or two, and of course had to be implored to stay.

She—I mean Aunt Jemima, not cook—read us all lectures on a variety of subjects, from keeping our tempers to keeping a house clean, lectures which we listened to meekly, and laughed at afterwards. Poor Aunt Jemima! She meant well, but she would fuss!

And now her ring was lost—a very valuable marquise ring, a family heirloom for I don't know how many generations. We, as well as Aunt Jemima, were all positive she had had it on her finger at dinner the night before, because we had all been admiring it, Margaret's lover, Dick Marchmont, especially.

Aunt Jemima vowed she remembered taking it off at night; but at morning it was missing. Aunt Jemima was, as you can believe, furious; we were—well—uncomfortable, and poor little mother miserable.

Well, the house was ransacked from roof to basement. My brother Harry said it was worse than spring-cleaning, because then only the girls did the work, but in this case the boys had to help! But the ring could not be found, though we searched high and low.

"There's a thief in the house, and it's that cook of yours, Janet; all cooks are thieves—more or less," said Aunt Jemima. At this even mother bridled up.

"That is an unfair thing to say, Jemima, and you know it. I would trust cook with untold wealth. Think of the years she has been with us. You must be out of your mind to suggest such a thing!"

"Bravo, mother, give it to her," said Harry under his breath. Aunt Jemima looked both sour and surprised at mother's sudden spirit, and said no more about poor cook, who had always been in her black books.

"Well," she said, "all I know is that it will have to be found, and I shall stay in this house until it is!"

"Cheerful prospect!" murmured my brother Harry.

We were all in the morning-room in solemn conclave, Aunt Jemima bolt upright in the most uncomfortable chair she could find. At this moment my sister Margaret rushed in, with a troubled face.

"Oh, mother," she said, "a terrible thing has happened."

Mother turned pale, and rose from her chair.

"What is it?" she exclaimed.

"You know Jane went out this evening for an hour—a policeman has just called to say that she has been run over by a cab, one of her legs broken, and she has had to be taken to the hospital."

"Good gracious!" murmured poor little mother. I slipped to her side, and put an arm round her. I was the youngest and her favourite, though perhaps I should not say it.

"She is the thief, and this accident is a judgment upon her!" exclaimed Aunt Jemima promptly.

"Nonsense, aunt," my sister Celia cried, "how absurd you are!"

"Absurd, indeed!"

"Yes," said Celia boldly, "absurd!"

"Hush, children," said mother, in the quiet voice that we all loved so—"you forget your aunt has lost a very valuable possession and is naturally somewhat anxious and upset. Someone must go at once, see about this terrible thing, and, if possible, question Jane about the ring."

"Certainly!" snorted Aunt Jemima.

"She may," continued mother, "have put it away for safety, seeing it lying about. It was taken off your finger at the dinner-table last night, you recollect, Jemima, and you wear so many rings, you would probably not miss one.

Digitized by Google

and Jane may have found it there, and forgotten to tell us."

"A likely tale!" exclaimed Aunt Jemima.

"No doubt she can explain it all."

"I'll go over at once," said Harry, "and see what she says." And he was off like a shot on his errand. We waited for his return with some anxiety, but Aunt Jemima could not forget to remind us that her belief was that Jane had stolen it, and this was her punishment.

"What a miserable evening!" said Margaret to me in a whisper.

"What a miserable day," I said. "But where is Dick to-night?"

"Gone to Manchester for three days," said Margaret, somewhat dolefully, for, in spite of her calm and dignified manner, she was devotedly attached to her lover — who was in every way worthy of her. I hope when I have a lover—a real lover—I mean, that mine will be as good and as honourable.

"What a pity!" I murmured; "he would have so comforted us all."

"I must write to him."

"I shouldn't tell him about the ring," I suggested, "it will only worry him for nothing, and he can't do anything all that distance off."

"I don't think I can," said Margaret, "it has been nothing but Aunt Jemima's ring all the day. I shall dream of it!"

In due course Harry came back.

"Well," demanded Aunt Jemima, "have you got it?"

"No!" said Harry fiercely.

"Harry, Harry!" It was dear mother's gentle voice. Harry went cool in a moment. We all love her so.

"Forgive me, aunt, and mother!" he said, more softly. "I saw the doctor who took in the case, and he told me she was suffering from a very severe shock, as well as the broken leg, and must not be questioned. In fact, she had been given a sedative, and to awake her would be dangerous. She was identified by one of the tradesmen's books she had gone to pay, our name and address of course being in it."

"Poor Jane," sighed my mother.

"Never mind, mother," said Celia, "we will all three take it in turns to be servant."

"And I'll help," said Harry. "Jane will be all right if she is kept perfectly quiet for two or three days, the doctor says."

"Most unfortunate," sighed mother.

"I consider it most providential," said Aunt Jemima.

"If she is the thief," said mother, "which I do not believe for one moment."

Truly it was a dismal evening, and the next day was as bad, if not worse, for Aunt Jemima the first thing in the morning instituted another search even more exhaustive than the previous one; under carpets, behind the piano, and every other piece of furniture in the house. At noon Harry put on his hat, and avowed his intention to go out and stop out until midnight.

Margaret, Celia, and I—we had resolutely declined to let mother help—were tired out. Horace, of course, was in the City—only Aunt Jemima seemed indefatigable. But our efforts were fruitless. No ring could be found.

To add to our discomfort, cook came up, and, as usual during Aunt Jemima's visit, gave poor mother a month's notice. Aunt Jemima had found time to go down into the kitchen, and, as cook said, had as good as charged her with stealing the ring.

"What should I want to steal her ring for?" exclaimed cook vehemently. "I, with a good place that I have had for twenty years and never a misword, a good mistress, and money in the post-office!"

Then for once mother, aroused, put her foot down, and spoke to Aunt Jemima more determinedly than any of us could have believed it possible. As a consequence, Aunt Jemima subsided into a fit of the sulks, and would not speak a civil word, or an uncivil one for that matter, to anyone. In short, it was about as disagreeable and unpleasant a day as it has ever been my fate to spend. I began to pity Aunt Jemima's maid with all my heart.

That was the second of our uncomfortable days on the occasion of this visit of Aunt Jemima. The morning of the third day, she arose with a new suspicion.

"Where," she demanded at breakfast, "was Mr. Marchmont?"

Aunt Jemima had a peculiar habit of springing surprises upon one, making unexpected remarks which would never have occurred to anyone but herself.

"In Manchester," said Margaret, assuming that the question was addressed to her.

"I wonder," said Aunt Jemima, "if he can clear up the mystery of this ring."

Margaret almost sprang from her chair.

"Do you mean to imply that he has stolen your miserable ring?" she cried. "Who on earth next will you try and fix the blame upon, Aunt Jemima?"

"Pardon me," said Aunt Jemima in her most acid manner, "it is not by any means a miserable ring, but an exceedingly valuable one, and very dear to me from its associations."

"Ring for breakfast, ring for tea, ring for dinner," murmured Harry, but Aunt Jemima heard him and literally withered him with a glance.

"Have you been to question Jane?" she demanded, in her most tragic tones.

Harry confessed that he had not, but would go after breakfast.

"Please do. This matter must be cleared up."

Then, though half afraid, I ventured to put my little spoke into the wheel of the conversation.

"What about Anne, your own maid?" I remarked. It was a thunderbolt out of the blue with a vengeance. Aunt Jemima turned upon me with—was it Sheridan in the play who said it?—such a "disinheriting countenance"?

"Anne!" she ejaculated, "Anne is the soul of honour!"

"'So are we all—all honourable men,'" quoted my brother Harry under his breath.

"I am astonished at you, Felicia, for one moment suggesting such a thing!" pursued my Aunt Jemima, eyeing me malevolently.

"But everyone else appears to be under suspicion," I said boldly, "so why not Anne?"

"Anne! Anne, indeed!" and Aunt Jemima drew herself up "pokerback fashion," and glared at us in turns.

Then dear mother's gentle voice broke in:

"You forget, baby dear, that your aunt has had Anne for so many years, so she knows her fidelity."

I am not quite sure, but I believe my mother was sarcastic; if so, it was for the first time in her life. I lifted my eyes to hers, and in a glance, was forgiven.

"Calling Felicia that tomfool name!" exclaimed Aunt Jemima, "you ought to have more sense!"

Harry stepped into the breach, as he invariably did.

"I'm going over to see Jane," he said, "and I'll come straight back and tell you all I learn." And off he went, with a grimace at Aunt Jemima which, fortunately, she did not see. In less than an hour he was back again.

"Well?" demanded Aunt Jemima.

"She knows nothing of the ring and is very hurt and upset that you should imagine that she should," said Harry.

"What did she say?" said Aunt Jemima.

"It would be a bit more kind, to say nothing of more womanly, if you asked how she was!" replied Harry, who had evidently had a bad quarter of an hour. "To tell you the plain truth, she was so hurt at your suspicion that she nearly went into hysterics. I was bundled out of the place, and it's the last time I go there, for you or for anyone else!"

"I will go myself," said Aunt Jemima.

"No, you won't."

"And why not, pray?"

"Because before I left I gave them instructions you were not to be admitted under any circumstances!"

I, who, excepting Celia, was the only one present, stared at Harry aghast. So, for that matter, did Aunt Jemima.

Digitized by Google

She was too petrified to speak. Before she recovered, Harry had gone. But he found time to whisper to me :

"She's lost it herself, the old fool. Back to dinner at seven. Hope Dick will turn up. He'll tackle her, if anyone can."

And no one saw any more of Harry for that morning and afternoon. The third uncomfortable day passed by with leaden feet. Lunch was a dismal "ceremony." It is the only word I can think of in the least appropriate. I went out. Celia was busy. Mother went to lie down. Aunt Jemima, I believe, started to watch her maid pack her belongings, thought better of it, and ordered her to unpack again. I don't think a thousand a year would have tempted me to be Aunt Jemima's maid !

About five minutes to seven I heard Dick Marchmont's knock and ring at the door. I knew it, and as I knew also Margaret was not ready—some callers had delayed her—I, being ready, ran down and met him.

"Come into the drawing-room," I said breathlessly, "and do, for gracious' sake, see if you can explain away our troubles."

"Whatever is the matter ? Margaret ? "

"No, no, she's all right, and will be down in a moment. It's Aunt Jemima ! "

"Oh ! " said Dick Then his face changed. "Great Heavens," he cried, "that reminds me ! "

"What of ? Oh, but never mind that—let me tell you, Dick. She's lost a valuable marquise diamond ring and——"

"I know she has," said Dick coolly, "and here it is ! " And he produced it from his vest pocket.

I gasped.

"You recollect she—but, oh, Margaret "—and Dick turned to embrace his sweetheart, leaving me dumfounded, ignoring even my very presence.

"Baby, I will explain all over the dinner-table."

This was a dismissal, so I ran away, leaving the lovers very near each other. I just had time to tell mother all was right, when the dinner-gong went.

Aunt Jemima, very dignified, met Dick with a haughty bow, which I think more amused him than hurt him. But as soon as we were all seated, he addressed her.

"Miss Verrinder, I think I have an apology and an explanation to give you. You will remember, three evenings ago, showing me this ring ? "

Aunt Jemima stared.

"Then you——" she began.

"Oh, dear no, I am not a thief ! "

This was, in all innocence, such a very apposite remark that we all laughed, much to Dick's mystification. And Aunt Jemima went red.

"I admired it greatly," Dick went on, "but I returned it to you. When I came back here for my cigarette case, which I had left, I saw it on the floor beneath your chair. I put it in my pocket for safety, and, I must admit, forgot it. This evening, when dressing—I have been to Manchester, as Margaret can tell you, on business—I discovered it. Will you allow me to return it to you, with many regrets and apologies if I have put you to any pain by my forgetfulness ? "

I confess I have never seen Aunt Jemima so absolutely dumfounded. She put the ring on her finger without a word. But I didn't enjoy my dinner at all—I was so eager to tell Dick about our three uncomfortable days.

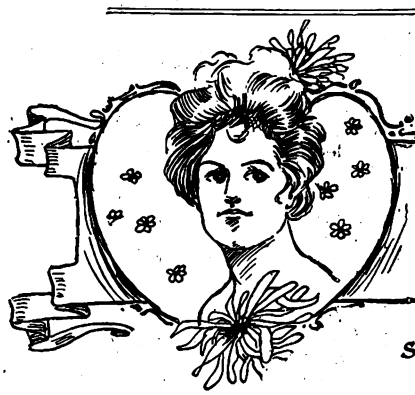
When Margaret and Celia and I did tell him later, he was very vexed.

"I must have been thinking of Margaret," he said.

"Or Manchester ! " said my sister tenderly.

I have a Dick of my own now, only his name is something else—never mind what—so I understand these things better, and Aunt Jemima has not been to stay with us for over a year !

Clifton Bingham.



A Satisfactory Arrangement.

Showing that What is Sauce for the Goose is Sauce for the Gander.

"And this is the girl that my nephew Paul has married ! " said old Major L'Estrange to himself. "Why, she is nothing but a child ; and a lovely child, too."

The soft, yellow twilight was enfolding the drawing-room in its enchanted glamour ; and Dolores, rising from her piano, stood with large eyes and heightened colour to receive her new uncle. She was only seventeen, but as she stood there in a gown of the purest white she looked a gem of womanhood.

Young L'Estrange looked first at his wife and then at his uncle with natural pride.

"Here she is, sir ! " said he. "My little Dolores ! "

And the old gentleman courteously advanced, holding out one slender, aristocratic hand.

"I am very glad to see you, my dear," said he courteously, and not without a tender accent of affection.

And from that moment all Dolores' secret fear and dread of her husband's uncle vanished.

"I am so glad you are not a cross old crab," she said impulsively.

Has Paul given me such a bad character as that ? " said the old gentleman smiling.

"Oh, no, no ! " cried Dolores. "But he always says : 'My uncle will like this—my uncle will disapprove of that, until, don't you see, I have learnt to be afraid of this unseen potentate ! But," with a shake of the blue-black curls, "I am not afraid now ! Oh, I am sure I shall love you very, very much ! Might I kiss you, please ? "

"You might try," said the Major, looking very much pleased ; and from that moment Major L'Estrange and his niece-in-law were sworn allies and firm friends.

"And you love him very much ? " said the Major, speaking, of course, of the one Prince Charming.

"Oh, yes ! " cried Dolores. "I am sure, Uncle Gerald, that there is no one like him in all the world. No one ! "

"And he is good to you ? "

"Yes, always."

"And you are happy ? "

"Yes, and—except——"

"Hallo ! " said Uncle Gerald, "here's a flaw in the diamond—a crumple in the rose-leaves ! There ought to be no such thing as an except ! "

"There isn't," stoutly maintained Dolores. "Only——"

Digitized by Google

"It's the same thing," said Uncle Gerald, shaking his head. "An 'only'! Come, Dolores, what is it? Open confession, remember, is good for the soul. What is the meaning of this mysterious 'only'?"

Dolores hung down her head; the ink-black lashes dropped over her peach-blossom cheek.

"It isn't anything at all, Uncle Gerald," said she. "Only—I should like a little money to spend sometimes."

"Eh!" said the Major. "Why, how is this? Paul isn't a miser, I hope."

"Not in the least!" cried Dolores. "But—but—I hardly know how to explain myself—he thinks I ought to come to him for every penny I spend. He thinks I should keep within a certain limit. Of course, he's right; but it is a little hard sometimes. There's no need for a woman spending money, he says."

"Ah!" commented the Major.

"And I wanted some chocolates dreadfully yesterday," said Dolores, laughing and blushing. "Of course it's ridiculous—a grown woman like me wanting chocolates like a child; but, indeed, Uncle Gerald, I couldn't help it; and I was ashamed to ask Paul for money to buy candles with; and if there's an organ-grinder or a beggar or a poor woman selling buttons and boot-laces, why, I have my rings and my ribbons and my bracelets, but nothing else."

The Major smiled, and stroked his moustache as he sat there in the shadow of the twilight.

"It is a hard case," said he.

"Yes, isn't it?" cried Dolores earnestly. "I told Paul he ought to give me a regular sum for pin-money, but he only laughs at me, and says I am a little goose. How would he like it himself, I wonder?"

"Ah!" said the Major, "how indeed?"

"And flowers!" cried Dolores, clasping her hands. "There was a flower-girl along yesterday with the sweetest lilies and tube-roses, and I could not buy one. Oh, Uncle Gerald, I did so want those flowers! But Paul says it makes a woman extravagant to have all the money she wants! Would the lilies have been extravagant, Uncle Gerald?"

"No," said the old gentleman, looking at the beautiful speaking face. "I don't think they would. But now, little Dolores, there comes your pony up the drive. Go away, and leave me to sleep."

But the Major did not sleep at all. He meditated. He faced the financial problem of the L'Estrange household, and resolved to conquer it.

Paul L'Estrange came home that evening in excellent spirits.

"My dear uncle," he said, "I shall have to call on your generosity once again. Only fancy my meeting Hall and Ovington on the Parade this afternoon! And they tell me that Colonel Praed and young Jennings are in town also. So I have just ordered a little bachelor supper at the club for to-morrow evening."

"Ah!" said Major L'Estrange.

"I looked at that chestnut mare, sir," added Paul. "She is simply perfect, so I told the man to bring her up here. I am to have her for seventy-five pounds. It's a bargain!"

"Indeed?"

Paul L'Estrange turned quickly round and looked at his uncle

"Is anything the matter, sir?" said he.

"The matter? No. Why should there be?"

"Only your tone was so peculiar—that is all."

"Well, to tell the truth, I was thinking," said Major L'Estrange.

"Of what, sir?" questioned Paul.

"Of where you meant to get the money to pay for all these things," drily answered the old man.

"Why, from you, of course!" said Paul, half puzzled, half amused. "You have always given me all the money I wanted."

"But that is no sign that I shall always continue to do so," deliberately remarked the old gentleman. "Look here, Paul, I am thinking of turning over a new leaf."

"I don't understand you, sir!"

"Don't you? Then I must endeavour to elucidate my meaning a little. The money is mine, isn't it?"

"Most assuredly it is!" Paul answered, with knitted borws.

"Well, then, I have a right to deal it out as I please. And I am seriously thinking of stopping your allowance!"

"Of stopping my allowance, Uncle Gerald?"

"Yes. If you want anything you can come to me for it, you know."

"Like a schoolboy, Uncle Gerald!" cried the young man, with crimsoning temples.

"Why not?" serenely questioned the old gentleman. "Do you know, I've an idea that it makes a man extravagant to have the handling of too much money. That, I believe, is your opinion also."

"Mine, eh?" echoed Paul.

"It is what you tell your wife," said Uncle L'Estrange, with a twitch of the corners of his mouth.

Paul looked puzzled.

"But she is a woman, sir!"

"And, therefore, she has no wants? Is that logic, my boy?"

"I am always ready to give her anything she wants!" exclaimed the young man.

"Exactly the platform which I occupy in respect to you," said Gerald. "And yet you don't seem satisfied with the arrangement I propose. Come! Let's be judicial, my boy. Let us be perfectly impartial. If my niece's money is to be dealt out to her a penny at a time, so must my nephew's!"

"My dear uncle," cried Paul, jumping up, "I never looked at the thing in that light before! My poor little Dolores! What a sordid old miser I must have appeared to her! Why didn't someone do me the favour to tell me what an egregious idiot I was making of myself? What shall I do, Uncle Gerald? Shall I make her a regular allowance—so much a week?"

"I dare say we shall find some satisfactory method of adjusting the balance," said Major L'Estrange, with a smile. "It was a real trouble to little Dolores, and so I thought I would just hold up a looking-glass to you, Nephew Paul. But don't look so grave: you shall have your supper at the club, and your chestnut mare, and all those other little luxuries of life which have grown to be necessities to you. But Dolores must have her chocolates and flowers and other such things also."

"With all my heart, uncle," said Paul, laughing.

And so little Dolores won her cause, after all. She came to her uncle the next day.

"Oh, uncle," said she, "I am so sorry I told you that about Paul."

"Why, my dear?" asked the Major.

"Because we have talked the matter all over," said Dolores, "and he is so good. I am to have a regular allowance all of my own. Isn't he splendid? And I wouldn't have him think I complained of him for all the world!"

"Don't be afraid, my dear," said the Major. "It shall be a State secret between us two for ever and a day. And you are sure you're quite happy now?"

"Oh, yes, quite," declared Dolores, with emphasis.

But she did not know that Uncle Gerald was the magician who had wrought this wonderful change.

Carrie Smith.

Digitized by Google

Bertha's Trial.

Telling How She Successfully Passed Through It.

"And so you are going to America, are you, Phil?"

"Yes, I'm off next week."

"You are a foolish fellow in my opinion, Travers. With a good situation here, in a safe house, a good reputation, and a first-rate chance to rise. You are going to throw it up for a mere chance."

"Yes, but, Richards, what is a fellow to do? I might manage very well as a single man, but you see I'm in love, and want to marry."

"Then why, in the name of common-sense, don't you marry? You could keep house decently enough on three hundred pounds a year. And if your lady-love is made of the right kind of metal, and loves you, she would much prefer to do so to having you run a great risk in America."

"So she would, bless her loving heart! But I'm not going to permit her to do any such thing. She has been used to comparative luxuries, though her father has nothing but his good income, every penny of which is absorbed in his style of living. No, no! Bertha Clark is to be my wife—not my maid-of-all-work, nurse, seamstress, and washerwoman—so long as I have health and strength."

"But suppose you don't succeed?"

"I shall succeed. I feel perfectly sure of it. I shall come home, before long, in good health, and the possessor of a fortune."

"Well, I'm glad you feel so sanguine, old fellow, and I heartily bid you God-speed. But are you sure that Bertha will wait for you?"

—"Sure of her as I am of myself."

"Maybe you're right; but if it was my case, I wouldn't trust a girl in such a matter. I should expect her to accept the first good offer that came to hand."

Philip Travers had never had a doubt of Bertha Clark's love for him, nor any reason to doubt her constancy; but still, the remark of Richards disturbed him.

What right had he to expect a woman to wait for him, when his fortunes were so uncertain? Could he blame her, if, after a reasonable time, she should accept "the first good offer that came to hand"?

* * * * *

"Bertha, you have not heard from Phil lately?"

"No, papa."

"And what do you expect to do? You have waited for him now two years, and none of his letters have been at all encouraging."

Bertha twirls her empty tea-cup in her saucer, to charm the tea-leaves into the right position to tell her fortune.

"Rome was not built in a day, you know, papa."

"But, Bertha, you don't know what you're talking about. Girls are always unreasonable. Here you are, past twenty-three years old, and with less and less prospect of marrying. Constancy is all very well, but there can be too much of a good thing. Remember how many good chances you have thrown away since Phil left you, on that wild-goose chase of his and now you do not even know whether he is alive or not."

"Yes; but papa——"

"There is Mr. Grainger, now, who would be glad to marry you, and put you in a better position than either of your sisters is in. A most respectable man, too, by all accounts, if he is not young. He spoke to me on the subject yesterday—said he should have offered himself before this if you had not been so shy and cold. It would be a shame for you to refuse him if he did ask you."

"I certainly shall refuse him, papa. A pretty husband he would make for me—fifty years old at least, and a pretty wife I should make for him—marrying him for nothing but his money! I'm not afraid of being an old maid. I can earn my own living!"

"You're very silly, Bertha Clark!"

"Dear papa, you don't compliment yourself when you call me very silly; everybody says I resemble you in every respect."

And she imprinted a kiss upon her irate father's cheek, and left the room.

* * * * *

"Well, James, what is it?"

"A gentleman in the drawing-room, miss, asking to see you."

"Who is it, James?"

"That oldish gentleman, miss—Mr. Grainger!"

"Mr. Grainger? What a bore! I know papa has encouraged him to this!" said Bertha, to herself, much annoyed. "But, after all, the man is entitled to decent treatment, I suppose? I'll go down, and if he asks me any questions, I can but answer them and end his suspense."

So she tripped down to the drawing-room, where she found her visitor alone.

She had never found herself tête-à-tête with him before. She had never noticed how gentlemanly and even winning he was in his manners. She should like him extremely well, she thought, but for the fact that he had proposed for her to her father. He talked a good while upon indifferent subjects, displaying much tact and good sense, as well as general information.

Bertha began to hope that the dreaded question was not to be asked her. In the course of the conversation, he alluded to his having lived in the United States. As he spoke the name a slight blush came to her face, which he evidently noticed.

"By-the-way," he said, "I met a young man in America, a friend of your father's—Philip Travers."

Digitized by Google

"Did you indeed?" she asked, trying to conceal the interest she felt under the mask of indifference.

"Yes," he replied. "A very fine fellow, but not very successful. Only about one in a hundred succeeds out there."

He seemed to her to watch her face as he said this, to mark the effect of his words. Her papa, she thought, must have told him something.

Presently he said, moving his chair nearer her own:

"Miss Clark, I am a comparative stranger to you, but I have every means of proving, and have proved, to your father, my respectability. I am rich—so rich that it is impossible for me to enjoy my riches without someone to spend them with me. I could not reasonably ask a young and pretty woman like you to fall in love with an old, grey-headed fellow like me, but if you could like me well enough to marry me, I should treat you so well that I believe love might come afterwards."

She looked at him gratefully.

"Your offer is one that commands my thanks," she said; "but though I like and respect you, I cannot accept it. I could not marry one whom I did not love."

"And you do not love me the least bit in the world—you are quite sure?"

His manner of putting the question was rather impertinent, after what had passed, for he came and took her hand, and pressed it warmly. She flushed scarlet, and withdrew her hand quickly from his, saying:

"A gentleman generally takes 'no,' for an answer."

"But I'm not going to take 'no,' for an answer!" In a moment a grey wig, and a false nose lay on the carpet at her feet, and Phil Travers stood before her. "And yet, I think I'm a gentleman."

"Oh, Phil, how could you?"

"I wanted to try you a little, Bertha. I wanted to be sure that you loved me still—poor as I might be."

"What do you suppose I care for your poverty? Was your faith in me so slight as to need confirmation of this kind?"

"Bertha, don't be angry; but tell me that you love me, and forgive me," he pleaded.

"Of course I love you, miserable doubter! And, of course, I must forgive you! So you have come back as poor as you went?" she said, stroking his black hair, and smiling.

He returned her smile, with interest.

"We can work together, can't we, Bertha?"

"Of course we can."

(Interval for kisses.)

He sat and held her hand in silence for awhile, looking into her happy eyes. By-and-by he said:

"What a pity this lily hand should be soiled by labour!"

"That is what hands were made for, I take it," said she gleefully.

"Not such a hand as this," said he, kissing it. "Such hands were made to wear diamond rings."

Suiting the action to word, he put a magnificent jewel upon her finger—a diamond worth a small fortune.

"Phil, what does this mean?" she asked, turning pale.

"It means, dear love, that I am rich—so rich that it is impossible to enjoy my riches without you to spend them with me. I have been fortunate in America. Will you love me just as well, knowing that I am almost a millionaire?"

"I'll try." Mabel Varney.

Walter: "If you were going to propose to a girl, what is the first question you would ask her?" Wilter: "If we were alone."

She: "Why should the average woman lead people to believe she's younger than she really is?" He: "She doesn't. She merely tries to."

"Jack says this new horse he has bought is a bargain." "Then it is a safe horse for a lady?" "Why?" "Because a woman can always drive a bargain.'

Your Editor Chats.

A Last Warning.

You have just got time to enter our great signature competition, full particulars of which were given in last week's number.

Numerous valuable cash prizes were offered, and the form of the competition was such as to enable anybody, irrespective of their age or station in life, to enter it.

In the preceding six numbers of this paper were reproduced a variety of people's signatures, which were more or less difficult to decipher. What you are required to do, if you wish to make an attempt to win a handsome cash prize, is to print in the space reserved the name which you think the signature represents. You will derive great amusement in the course of your endeavours. All attempts must be posted so as to arrive at these offices not later than by first post on Tuesday next, April 26th, so you will see that you have no time to lose. Copies of Short Stories containing the signatures can be obtained from any newsagent for a penny each, or direct from these offices, for 1½d. each post free.

Rally Your Friends.

All of you, I am sure, are following with keen delight the story of the combat for supremacy between Jules and his associates on the one hand, and Theodore Racksole and his staunch allies on the other, as related by Mr. Arnold Bennett in that splendid serial "Phantom Shadows." But are you giving your friends and acquaintances the chance of enjoying it also? If not, why not? Do them and, incidentally, myself, a favour by passing this copy on to them, so that they can commence reading "Phantom Shadows" at once. As it proceeds, you will find that the story increases in power, right on until the last word is told. There will continue to be profuse illustrations by Reginald Cleaver, which will add great interest to the relations. Next week's cover, however, will not depict an incident from the serial, but will illustrate a dramatic episode in a particularly exciting short story, contributed by one of your favourite authors.

The Twelfth Unsolved Love Problem.

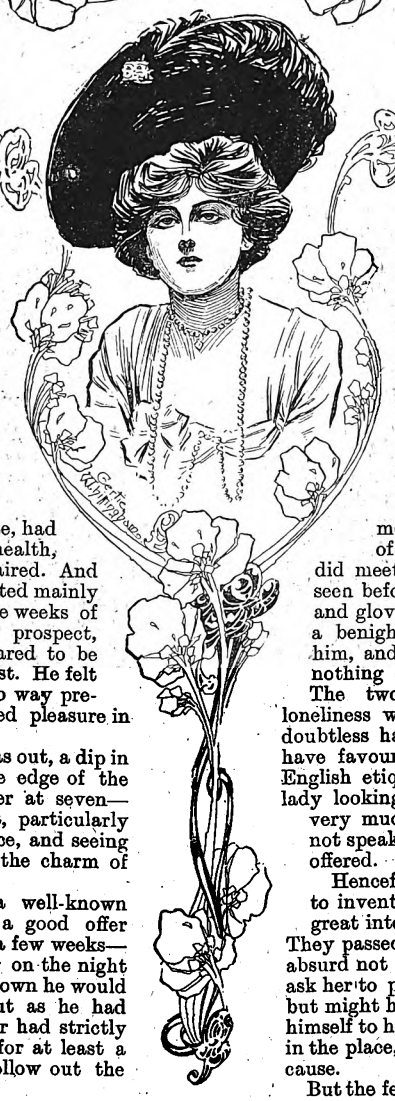
Those readers who have never yet tried to win a guinea in an Unsolved Love Problem contest, and those that have, will be afforded another opportunity to do so next week, when the final problem, entitled "The Test of Ruth Lawson," will appear. I think that every single reader will like this story, for it is an exceptionally awkward plight in which Ruth Lawson finds herself.

By-the-way, remember that attempts to solve the eleventh problem, "Brian Cresswell's Choice," must reach these offices by Friday, April 22nd.

Your Editor.

Digitized by Google

BOLTON'S CHANCE.



Relating the Use He Made of it.

A STEADY drizzle had set in towards evening, and very melancholy the little watering-place looked with its gardens deserted, the bandstand shut up, and the sea parade stretching away in dreary perspective into the distance.

But a solitary visitor had braved the weather, and, wrapped in waterproofs, was pacing the deserted parade, sniffing the salt breeze with an air of evident satisfaction, despite the melancholy aspect of the surroundings.

Jack Bolton, the latest arrival at Oldgate, had been ordered down for the benefit of his health, and was forbidden to leave until it was repaired. And as over-work and long hours had contributed mainly to his illness, the mere idea of having some weeks of leisure before him was a very pleasant prospect, although Oldgate out of the season appeared to be one of the dullest places on the English coast. He felt it a luxury to be an invalid when it in no way prevented bodily activity, and so he anticipated pleasure in his loneliness.

A gallop along the sands when the tide was out, a dip in the sea, a cosy nook, and a novel on the edge of the cliff, and a comfortable, if solitary, dinner at seven—what more could a man want, he thought, particularly one who had been toiling for a bare pittance, and seeing so many people that solitude had all the charm of novelty.

He had given up an engagement on a well-known journal, and had been obliged to refuse a good offer which had been made him; and when in a few weeks—so he cheerfully meditated over his dinner on the night of his arrival in Oldgate—he went back to town he would have to find something else or starve; but as he had thirty pounds in his pocket, and the doctor had strictly forbidden him to think about the future for at least a month—why, he just meant to strictly follow out the doctor's orders.

A month is a long time to a happy-go-lucky nature, particularly when one is young, and Bolton was only three-and-twenty. So for a week his contentment and enjoyment were great, galloping a refractory mare over the splendid stretch of sand; swimming out to the buoy-bell, a quarter of a mile out at sea, that chimed dolorously night and day; devouring novels and minor poetry, chatting and smoking with the old fishermen on the jetty, and sometimes sailing out with one of them into the Channel, with a delightful sense of freedom amidst the seething green waves. But at the end of a week he felt that something more was needed. The grey autumn evenings were lonely, and solitude was no longer a luxury. Novels palled on his taste.

Then he bethought himself of the inhabitants of Oldgate, and wondered if their society was worth courting. And then one evening he had a mental vision of a solitary girl, dressed in black, whom he was conscious of having seen about the place a good deal; and though he had not critically noticed her, he seemed to be dimly conscious that she had a graceful figure and an abundance of yellowish hair, very elaborately done for such an out-of-the-world maiden.

It was odd that the thought of her should take possession of him all at once like this, but it did, and before he went to bed he resolved to see what he could do towards making her acquaintance. "For," he said to himself, with disinterested benevolence, "she must be very dull."

Next day he actually gave up his morning ride and swim for the chance of meeting her on the cliff or parade. He did meet her, and wondered why he had not seen before that she was pretty, and wore dress and gloves in a style that seemed lost on such a benighted place as Oldgate. So she passed him, and he felt interested; but beyond that nothing occurred.

The two had the place to themselves, their loneliness was common to both, and both would doubtless have felt grateful to anyone who would have favoured them with an introduction. But English etiquette being as it is, and this young lady looking very much a lady, and Bolton being very much a gentleman, he saw that he could not speak to her unless some reasonable excuse offered.

Henceforth the whole object of his days was to invent or find such an excuse, and this added great interest to his stay for several days. They passed one another constantly, and it seemed absurd not to go up to her and just lift his hat and ask her to pardon the impertinence, if such it was; but might he do himself the honour of introducing himself to her, as they seemed to be the only people in the place, and ought, therefore, to make common cause.

But the fear of a snubbing, together with the other reasons to which I have referred, kept him from doing this, although it was very aggravating, as day after day went by and nothing happened to give him the chance he wanted.

One evening, before the dusk of a sad, grey day, when the sea was mourning dolefully on the sand, Bolton wandered down the gardens smoking a big cigar to comfort his lonely heart, when he heard a rustling noise among the shrubs at the side of the walk. He hit them with his stick, and a little spaniel ran out, and then round a bend in the path came the girl in black, panting and hurried.

This was the opportunity Bolton had prayed for.

"You are trying to catch your dog?" he asked.

"Oh, yes; have you seen him?" she panted.

"Yes, there he goes; I'll catch him for you," and off he started.

For ten minutes there was a great havoc done amongst the dripping rhododendrons, and much yelping from an extremely obstinate little dog, and then Bolton, wet, dirty, and hot,

Digitized by Google

came forward, holding by the scruff of its neck the snarling little King Charles, also wet, dirty, and hot.

"Have you a chain or string?" gasped Bolton; "you want to lead him, I suppose."

"The string broke and I've lost it," she explained. "Thank you so much, I'm afraid it has been a lot of trouble to you."

"Not at all," I say; "I'm afraid I haven't any string, either."

"Oh, never mind!" she said, holding out her arms, "I'll carry him home."

Bolton looked doubtfully at the bedraggled little beast. He was about to offer his handkerchief as a leading string, when a better idea presented itself.

"Oh, no," he said decidedly, "he's much too dirty for you to carry; I'll carry him home for you. I don't mind being dirty."

"I don't like to put you to so much trouble," she protested.

"I sha'n't mind it a bit," he said. "Which is your way home?"

Then they started. Bolton broke the silence first.

"We seem to have the place very much to ourselves, don't we?" he said.

She laughed. "I think you are the only visitor here."

"Then she is a resident here," thought Bolton; "poor girl!" The spaniel wriggled up in his arms and tried to snap at his chin.

"Yes," he said, "I think I am, and I have found it a trifle lonely; but after this little episode I hope I may have the pleasure of your acquaintance. I have been grumbling to myself for some days past at the laws of etiquette that kept us strangers. In fact, I had been thinking," he said frankly, "what excuse I could possibly offer for introducing myself to you, and I feel quite grateful to this disreputable little dog of yours, although he is trying to bite my chin. May this stand in place of a formal introduction?" he asked.

She smiled. "I don't think we need be formal here; and I am really under a great obligation to you."

"I am more than rewarded," he said. "Oh, is this your house?" as they stopped in front of a white house with wide bow windows.

"You'll come in and let me introduce you to mamma?"

"In my present state I'll ask you to excuse me. May I call to-morrow?"

"Oh, to be sure," she said, as he deposited King Charles on the doormat inside. "Come whenever you like; mamma is not particular about times and seasons."

He promised to call on the morrow, and there was an unusual briskness in his walk as he made his way lodgingwards.

"What eyes she has!" said he to himself, and this ejaculation was not called forth by the spaniel's charms. "What on earth can they do in this benighted place all the winter?" he mused; and then he went to his dinner, very well satisfied with his day's work.

Next morning Bolton called on his heroine's mamma, and after much polite conversation, was invited to dinner.

It was a bright, cheery room that he was ushered into that evening, glowing in the light of a blazing fire, and contrasting delightfully with the churlishness of the scene outside.

The room was cosy, and possessed an abundance of pictures and books, but the faded window curtains and the carpet, old and shabby, bore witness to slender means.

A sword and a portrait of an officer in scarlet, the late Major Meade, his heroine's father, hung over the fireplace. Her mother and her aunt, who lived with them, addressed the young lady as Kitty, and Bolton, who had known many of that charming name, thought he had never seen one so worthy of it before.

The next few days were certainly much pleasanter for Kitty's companionship. She wasn't very clever, perhaps, and she wasn't very modern, like most of the young ladies Bolton knew in town; but her prettiness, her quiet friendliness, and the loneliness of her way of life, drew him to her. She had a beautiful voice, and sometimes of an evening would sing to him, and Bolton would often watch her sitting in the low, homely drawing-room, in the firelight, her beautiful head bending over the keys, and then he would look out into the night and watch the long, white lines of foam gleaming in the darkness, and the flashing light from the lighthouse tower, and find himself unconsciously and passionately wondering why Fate had made him so poor.

Now that he had been nearly a month from town, the shrinkage of his money and the gloominess of his future prospects began to worry him. One morning, however, just at the expiration of the month, he received a letter from one of his town chums:

"Dear Bolton,—I have an offer to make to you. Old Nuggetts was going to put in an ad. the other day for a man to do some special work in Ireland, when I bethought myself of you, and mentioned your name to him as a likely sort of man. He said at first he thought that you were too young and inexperienced, but I reminded him that you had had your nose to the grindstone for some years now, and knew the routine of the whole business pretty well, so he commissioned me to write to you straightway. If your doctor will let you take it up, I should advise you to do it. It's not permanent, of course, but it means five pounds a week and expenses paid for a few months at least, and it may lead to something better. We should not want you to come here for instructions for a fortnight yet, so you will have time to think it over. I hope you are mending fast.—Yours sincerely,

"J. Dowley."

Bolton wrote off a letter full of gratitude, accepting the offer. To act as special correspondent was such an alluring prospect to him that he quite forgot to consult the doctor about it.

And now only a fortnight of Kitty's companionship remained, and this passed all too quickly. At last the parting came. A day or two before the expiration of the fortnight, Bolton received a telegram bidding him come up for instructions at once. He went and paid a formal farewell to Mrs. Meade and her sister. Kitty was out. He did not mind this, as he wanted to say good-bye to her alone. On the seafront he saw the familiar figure in black coming towards him. "I have had a telegram," he said, "ordering me up to town this afternoon." He thought she turned a shade paler.

"Then you're going?"

"Yes, I'm on my way to my lodgings now, to pack."

The tone of conversation on both sides was polite, almost distant. Perhaps both wanted to hide what they felt.

"Oh! don't let me stop you, then."

"I'm so sorry I'm going; I've got quite to like this place."

"Really? I'm afraid you've found it dull."

"I did at first, but it's quite a wrench to leave it. I hope I shall see something more of you."

"You'll come and see us if you're near at any time."

"Of course I will."

"I hope you'll get on well in Ireland."

"Thank you. I shall have to work hard, I expect. There, I must be off!"

"Good-bye!"

"Good-bye!"

He pressed her hand and seemed as if about to say something more as she turned from him. He walked on a little way, and then turned and looked after her. Her wistful look haunted him.

He thought of the dreary winter before her, and wondered if he had been more to her than he had thought. Perhaps the autumn days had been brighter to her for their friendship. And as he watched her solitary figure receding, he felt a sudden pity for her, a strong desire not to leave her like this. Soon he was at her side, telling her in hurried, passionate words how his life's happiness depended upon his love being treasured and valued by her. There were at least two happy people in Oldgate that evening, and as Bolton hurried to the train, there seemed a note of joy even in the wild moaning of the sea.

Digitized by Google

"I say, Tomkyns, who's that Johnny with Miss Alwyse?"

"Oh, that's Bolton. The famous Bolton, you know."

"What's he done?"

"Blest if I know."

"I say, Freddy, what has the famous Bolton done? Tomkyns here doesn't know."

"Oh, he wrote a political pamphlet or something. I heard some fellows at the club say it was awfully smart. I say, what a mob there is here. Come down and try the champagne cup, it's first rate."

Meanwhile "that Johnny" was deep in conversation with the beautiful Miss Alwyse.

"Oh, Mr. Bolton," she said, "do call. We are at home on Wednesday. Papa enjoyed your pamphlet so much. He said it was the best bit of satire he had read for years, and then they whirled off into the crowd of dancers.

Bolton walked home to his lodgings that night in a very sanguine frame of mind. The daughter of a Cabinet Minister had flattered him with an account of her august papa's appreciation of his work, and he was to call at the great man's house.

Some eight months had passed since he left Oldgate, a time of many ups and downs, mostly downs, but a pamphlet of his had taken the public fancy and had given him some little social distinction, though it did not make much difference in his banking-account.

Arrived at his rooms he sat and thought for awhile.

"There's something in Shakespeare," he mused, "about a tide in the affairs of man which taken at the turn will land him—I forget it, but it means that every man has one chance in his life and if taken, it will give him success. My chance has come, unless I'm mistaken," and, with a yawn, he went to bed.

Two days later he presented his card at the Cabinet Minister's house. He was received very kindly by the great man's wife, and in due time received an invitation to dinner.

The Right Hon. James Alwyse was genuinely interested in the young author, and being in want of a private secretary thought to himself that here was his man. "But I have half promised it to Bertie," he confided to his spouse, and as Bertie was his nephew, Bolton's chance of the post was small.

"Hallo, Bolton," said one of his acquaintances a few weeks later as he entered an eating-house in Fleet Street, "we don't see much of you here nowadays. You've been among the nobs, I hear. Mackay told me so, he knows everything. Look here, man, do me a good turn; let me make a par out of it for Society Scandal. How does this sound? 'The talented young author of "Tricks and Travesties" is a frequent guest at the table of the Right Hon. James Alwyse, M.P. It is no secret that Miss Alwyse, who possesses beauty of a high order, possesses also £60,000 of her own!' How does that sound, eh?"

"There doesn't seem to be much connection between the two sentences of your paragraph," said Bolton, as good-humouredly as he could.

"Ah! my boy, that's all very fine. Waiter, take this chop away and put it on the grill three minutes longer!—that's all very fine. I tell you what"—folding a pair of unwashed hands on the cloth before him, and leaning over to Bolton—"you keep it up, go in and win; that sort of thing pays better than hard work. You're a lucky beggar."

"You very rightly call me a beggar. I refused a dinner last night because I couldn't afford a shirt."

"Never mind; you'll be giving your own little dinners next summer. I heard from Mackay that you were dancing with Miss Alwyse on Friday, and again on Monday, and——"

"Look here, Mackay is a fool!" cried Bolton impulsively.

"Yes, my dear boy, I've often told him so myself, and I say, Bolton, Mackay says the girl's money is very well invested—5 per cent.—that's over three thousand a year. Old Alwyse used to dabble in finance once. He must be worth a pile. That girl is worth winning, Bolton."

Bolton came forward, holding by the scruff of its neck the snarling little King Charles.

When Bolton left he knew every detail of the case, together with Mackay's ideas about it, and much edified he felt in consequence.

But he was not easy in his mind. There was a substratum of truth in his friend's observations; he was undoubtedly a welcome guest at the Minister's table, particularly to one member of the family. And away in the little village in the west was Kitty—Kitty who was so proud of his success and so hopeful for the future—Kitty to whom he was all in all, and he in the turmoil and stress of his life had almost lost his longing for her. Seeing hundreds of fresh faces daily, ever bent on advancing his worldly prospects—at first for Kitty's sake, and then more selfishly—what wonder if new hopes, new desires had found their way into his head; nay, within the last few weeks had not a new love been springing in his heart?

But he resolved to abide by his promise. Kitty should know nothing of this; and if his letters to her were shorter than formerly, he excused it by pleading the stress of his work.

To be befriended and favoured by a girl so womanly and lovable as Miss Alwyse, with wealth and bright surroundings to set off her charms, could only end in one way.

Sometimes he rebelled against his better self; he told himself he had no right to sacrifice love at the altar of pity, and his fondness for Kitty sprang from that. Miss Alwyse had no idea that he was engaged. He had no intimate friends to whom he had spoken of his engagement, so no rumours of it had reached her ears. If he had been in love with Kitty, doubtless Miss Alwyse, with a woman's quick instinct, would have found it out, but, alas, he was not.

Digitized by Google

And now one night he found himself dancing with Miss Alwyse for the last time of the season.

"Mamma has asked you to come and stay at Holmhurst?" she said to him.

"Yes; it is very kind of her."

"I hope you mean to come. Are you fond of the country? We have such a wonderful avenue; it's the envy of the country."

"I think I shall be able to shake the dust of town off my feet for two or three days after next week."

"I'm so glad. You look quite pale, you know; you're working too hard."

"I am working hard." It was quite delightful to have so charming and wealthy a woman so solicitous about his health.

And a letter of Kitty's was in his dresscoat-pocket. He had thrust it in while dressing, and meant to have read it in the cab, but he had forgotten it.

As he put Miss Alwyse in her carriage she pressed his hand.

"It is good-bye till the tenth, then?"

"Yes, yes, till the tenth; I shall count the hours, I believe."

A low, musical laugh, and the carriage bowled away. He stood there light-hearted and gay till he remembered the letter in his pocket.

Ten days later he was smoking in his sitting-room and packing his things preparatory to departing on the morrow for Holmhurst. Three days in a country house with a girl who obviously cared for him, and a Cabinet Minister who, he had reasons to believe, meant to offer him his private secretaryship; this surely was his chance. His advancement had been slow, but the tide had turned now—and Kitty kept him back from going on and winning the full measure of possible success. Should he write and ask her to release him; should he confess all—his new love? It was a terrible situation to be placed in.

At this juncture a telegram was handed to him:

"Kitty is very ill, and asks for you. Come at once. — M. Meade."

He sat as one paralysed. Then he broke out into an imprecation. "Now, of all times I can't go! I can't get away again for a month. It's bitterly cruel!" "Kitty is very ill and asks for you—asks for you." "Poor little Kitty!" He began throwing out from his bag things that he wouldn't need now. "There's a train to-night," he muttered, "Fate is against me always."

He snapped the lock of his bag and rang for a cab.

Two hours later he was walking along by the side of the sea to Mrs. Meade's house. The scene brought back some of the old tenderness for Kitty. "But my love for her is dead. It is a ghost of a passion now—a ghost!" he kept repeating.

He came in sight of the familiar bow windows—how his heart beat when he came in sight of them six months ago, when he snatched a few happy days' holiday at Christmas. And then the moon came from behind a cloud and he saw something that smote like a dagger in his heart—straw in the street.

"My poor little Kitty!" he groaned, and tremblingly rang the bell.

Mrs. Meade herself opened the door.

"Oh, I'm so glad you've come!"

"Is she——?" he could get no further.

"She will know you now. She has been delirious all the afternoon."

He entered the dark room.

"Is that you? Oh, Jack, Jack!"

"My darling!" he said, bending over her and kissing her passionately.

He sat with her for an hour—a year it seemed—and she was so glad he had come. And, outside, the low wash, wash of the waves sounded. It had been music to him once; he has never heard it since without thinking of that dark room. At last the doctor came. "Go downstairs a few minutes, old man," he said kindly. Noiselessly he went into the dining-room. There was the piano, and her music on the top—a song he had written on the music-holder. Poor Kitty, she would never touch those keys again.

He went to the window and looked out at the lighthouse light and the lines of foam. A bowl of roses scented the room. He seemed to have resumed his life where he had left it off when he last left Oldgate at Christmas.

The time between—London, Miss Alwyse, his future hopes and plans—all were nothing. Three hours ago he was reviling the Fate that sent him down here, and now, now everything was nothing except Kitty. "Oh, my God, spare me her and take everything else," he groaned, and bowed his head on the table, and sobbed as only a man can. The doctor came softly down. "Old fellow, it's kinder to tell you the worst, she can't live through the night; you had better go to her again," he said huskily.

Choking down his sobs, Bolton went to her bedside.

Two hours later he was kneeling by a lifeless form that he now realised was more to him than anyone dead or living.

When he re-appeared in London someone said to him: "Why, Bolton, you've lost a good thing. Alwyse meant to offer you his private secretaryship, and now his nephew has got it. I say, old man, who's dead? What! Were you engaged? I am so awfully sorry for you. There, I won't say any more, I know words are of no use at such a time."

Miss Alwyse heard why Bolton had not fulfilled his engagement, and cried a good deal in the privacy of her room.

Bolton is still in harness, but his ambition is dead. His editor, however, has a high opinion of him, and has promised him the war-correspondentship of his paper when the opportunity occurs. And, Bolton, whose only hope is work, absorbing work, that gives no time for thought, prays daily for war.

Douglas Montgomery.

The Groom (at the first stopping place): "It's no use, Clara; we can't hide it from people that we are bride and groom." The Bride: "What makes you think so, George, dear?" The Groom (dejectedly): "Why, here the waiter has brought us rice pudding."

Nellie: "Why are you crying, love? I should think you would be very happy engaged to such a nice young man as he is!" Annie: "Oh, I'm afraid he won't be true to me!" "Why, he's very, very good, isn't he?" "Yes, but I'm afraid he's too good to be true!"

Harry wanted to give Lucy a birthday present, but couldn't make up his mind what it should be; so the next time he called he frankly told her the difficulty under which he was labouring. "Want to make me a present, Harry?" exclaimed Lucy, in well-counterfeited astonishment. "Why, Harry, you forget yourself!" Harry took the hint, and offered himself on the spot.

Stranger (at the door): "I am trying to find a lady whose married name I have forgotten, but I know she lives in this neighbourhood. She is a woman easily described, and perhaps you may know her—a singularly beautiful creature, with pink-and-white complexion, sea-shell ears, lovely eyes, and hair such as a goddess might envy." Servant: "Really, sir, I don't know——" Voice (from head of stairs): "Jane, tell the gentleman I'll be down in a minute."

Caller: "Why are you waving your handkerchief so wildly?" Muriel: "Since papa has forbidden Jack the house we have arranged a code of signals." Caller: "What is it?" Muriel: "When he waves his handkerchief five times, that means, 'Do you love me?' and when I wave frantically in reply, it means, 'Yes, darling.'" Caller: "And how do you ask other questions?" Muriel: "We don't. That's the whole code"

Digitized by Google

The Match-makers.

Relating how Things Worked Out in a Different Manner than as They were Arranged.

A low, rambling cottage. Quaint porticos nearly covered with climbing roses, and a long verandah shaded with ivy, gave a cool, inviting look to this little home. From one of the verandah columns and a large tree a few feet away swung a gay hammock. Half reclining in this was a young girl—a sparkling, dark-eyed brunette. One elbow rested carelessly on an open magazine, while a bit of embroidery lay at her feet. Her eyes were absently fixed on the stately house which could be seen through the intervening orchard.

"What a pity it is Mr. Browning is such a confirmed bachelor!" mused she. "If he would marry some nice young person, how much comfort we might take with her. His sister told me herself not long since that she wished John would marry. Then she could go to her daughter in London."

Here Miss Muriel bestowed a very disapproving frown upon the aforesaid house. Evidently its owner's shortcomings did not disturb its equanimity. It never flinched.

Muriel's face cleared, and she sat erect.

"I have it!" she exclaimed half aloud. "Cousin Winnie! She's the very one for him! I will invite her up to spend a few weeks with us, and if her big blue eyes do not melt his heart, I shall conclude it is made of stone. We'll have him to tea often while she is here. I will get up a picnic in their honour. It will be a fine match for Winnie, and I shall take a great deal of credit to myself for having brought it about."

The magazine fell to the ground. The hammock gave a backward lurch, and Muriel was half way up the steps, stooping to pick a rose as she passed.

"Mamma, mamma! Where are you?" she called, as a hasty glance showed the little sitting-room opening from it to be without an occupant. "Robert," she called to the gardener, "have you seen Mrs. Gilday?"

"She's gone to see Mrs. Dake, miss, I think," replied Robert, with a nod of his head towards the neighbouring house.

Muriel returned to the sitting-room.

"Mother and Mrs. Dake seem to have become quite intimate of late," she thought. "Mrs. Dake was here yesterday. Perhaps mamma wouldn't be pleased to have Mr. Browning marry and his sister go home. I will not say anything to her of that brilliant idea of mine. She will be pleased, however, to have Cousin Winnie here for a visit, so I'll write to her at once."

A dainty, perfumed envelope, addressed in flowing characters, soon lay upon the hat-rack in the hall.

The side door opened, and Mrs. Gilday entered. One looking at her sweet face and shining bands of brown hair would hardly suspect how tragical had been her married life. At twenty a bride, at twenty-five a widow. How much of sorrow, suffering, and humiliation had been crowded into that brief time it would be hard to estimate.

Only once had Muriel ventured to ask of her father. She had not forgotten the look which came over her mother's face.

"He died when you were a baby, dear," was all she said.

Years after Muriel heard from an old nurse who visited them that her father was a gambler who had spent most of her mother's fortune and died from the effects of drink.

Ever since she could remember they had lived in this pretty cottage at Glen Park. Her mother had given music lessons and superintended the care of the orchards. A small legacy had been left her, sufficient to keep her daughter and herself from poverty.

"Hallo, mamma!" cried Muriel gaily, as her mother entered. "You look as young and blooming as a girl of sixteen. Someone inquired the other day if we were sisters, and methinks I shall soon be asked if you are my daughter! You needn't blush! It reminds me of my own inability in that line.

Mrs. Gilday smiled at Muriel's nonsense.

"Have you been writing?" she inquired. "I notice your desk is open."

"Yes, to Cousin Winnie; asked her if she could come out for a visit. She must be dreadfully tired of sewing. It will do her good to take a holiday. Don't you think so, mamma?"

"Yes, certainly. I had thought of getting her to sew for us after a bit, but she shall have her visit first—that is, if she can so arrange it."

The Fates seemed to favour Muriel's little scheme. Cousin Winnie wrote:

"What a kind-hearted little person you are! I am tired of sewing. Shall be only too glad to accept your invitation."

About this time Mr. Browning gave up his daily trips to London and took to making frequent calls at Mrs. Gilday's cottage. They were all business calls. A letter to deliver; some inquiry in regard to the care of poultry or his garden. Mrs. Gilday was an authority on such subjects. Or perhaps Mrs. Dake sent compliments, and would they all come over to tea that evening?"

Winnie noted with great complacency that he never seemed in any haste to terminate these calls. On one occasion he lingered all the afternoon when he had merely "dropped in to borrow Mrs. Gilday's pruning shears." Surely Cousin Winnie's blue eyes and pretty, quiet ways were producing the desired effect.

Digitized by Google

There was another affair which seemed to require a share of Muriel's notice at this time. The attentions of a certain young man whose name was Frank Evans were evidently becoming somewhat too pronounced. He and Muriel had been to school together, carried their dinner in the same basket, and quarrelled as to who should take the basket home again. Later on he had escorted her to parties, picnics, and other merry-makings. She still exercised the sisterly right, which she had always claimed, of telling him her opinion of his actions. So now, when he took to lingering on the pleasant portico in the early mornings when she knew he had started for his father's office, she showed her disapproval, and on one occasion told him plainly that he "ought to be at work."

He started on, laughingly protesting, while after his departure Cousin Winnie said deprecatingly:

"Now, Muriel, that was too bad to drive him off in that way. What would your mother say if she had heard it?"

"Haven't any idea," replied Muriel, carelessly. "It's the truth I told him. He is not rich, and he ought to be at work instead of dawdling his mornings away here." To herself she added, "I hope he isn't going to get spooney; that will spoil him entirely. He is nice enough to take one about, but when I marry it will be——" And she was lost in a reverie in which a tall, fair-haired hero with a military bearing was metaphorically dying to have her accept his name and fortune.

The weeks sped by, each filled with an unusual number of drives, afternoon teas, and tennis parties. Muriel was very busy in these days. The frequent tête-à-têtes enjoyed by Winnie and John Browning were brought about by the tact of our enterprising heroine.

Winnie had announced that she should return to town the following week. The long-talked-of picnic was arranged for the Thursday previous to her departure.

The day, like its predecessors, dawned calm and cloudless. The occupants of house and cottage were astir at an early hour. Everybody was going. At half-past nine, various traps filled with young and old, all in gay spirits, could be seen wending their way down past the park to the foot of the neighbouring hills.

At last the appointed place was reached. Here the horses were tied, and the party began explorations for a suitable place for dining. After that most important feature of a picnic was over, the younger members of the party declared their intention of pushing on to the top of the wooded hills. To Muriel's disappointment, John Browning counted himself among those who were "too old for such a scramble."

Muriel, Frank Evans, and Winnie started on as leaders of the party. The two former were quite accustomed to climbing hills, but Winnie was not, and before half the distance was accomplished seated herself on a fallen tree, declaring that "she could not go another step." Frank gallantly offered to keep her company while the rest went on.

Muriel clambered on, out-distancing the others. When the stragglers overtook her they said that Frank and Winnie had decided to come on; so on their return Muriel sat down behind a clump of bushes, intending to wait for them. Soon she heard their voices, but did not at once retrace her steps to join them. Just then she heard Frank say:

"I have loved you, Winnie, ever since you were here a year ago."

"Good Heavens!" exclaimed Muriel to herself. "Is that possible?"

Of Winnie's reply she only caught the word, "Muriel?"

"Nonsense!" said Frank. "I have only a brotherly interest in her."

"My sentiments, too," thought Muriel. "Shall I rush out? No, that will only startle them. It will be embarrassing enough for Winnie to have to refuse him."

But the next words she heard were a double surprise. Winnie had accepted Mr. Evans.

"How can she think of him?" groaned Muriel. "He is not to be compared with Mr. Browning. Young, poor, and—such a tiny moustache! Poor Mr. Browning! What will he do now? Such a nice man, too!"

With these and similar reflections, Muriel left her flowers on the stones where they had fallen from her hands and hastily emerged from behind the bushes. Frank and Winnie had passed on, utterly oblivious of everything but themselves. Muriel hastened on, joining the party she had left a few moments before.

That evening, to Muriel's surprise, John Browning stopped to tea with them. After that was over he sauntered out to the verandah to enjoy the moonlight and a cigar. Winnie excused herself on the plea of "packing," and went to her room.

Mrs. Gilday and Muriel remained in the drawing-room to unpack the hampers and set things to rights.

"My dear," began Mrs. Gilday, emptying the contents of a saltcellar into the sugar bowl. "My dear, I have something to tell you. Perhaps I ought to have told you before."

Here she dropped the saltcellar on the floor. Muriel looked at her mother in surprise. Never had she seen her show such evident embarrassment.

"I hope you will not be displeased," she went on, "but I have promised to marry Mr. Browning."

Muriel gave a little gasp.

"Dear mamma, I am so glad!" she firmly ejaculated.

"Are you really?" said Mrs. Gilday, with a relieved expression. "I was afraid you might not be pleased."

"I am—quite pleased—and surprised."

Here Muriel dropped into a chair and began to laugh hysterically.

"What a matchmaker I am, to be sure!" she thought. Then she exclaimed aloud:

"Mother, I have found my vocation—the management of a Matrimonial Bureau!"

K. Porter.

HANDS & HOW TO READ THEM.

By E. RENE.

Bound in Cloth, price 1s.; post free 1s. 2d.

Some of the contents of this book are:

The different types and what they indicate—Short and long-fingered people—Fingers as the indicators of talents, etc.—Evidence of will power in the thumb—How to judge of temper by the nails—Indications of health on the nails—Hands devoid of lines and covered with lines—Principal lines and their meanings—Signs of marriage—Influence lines—Ambition—Intemperance—Rules for reading the hands—Straight and crooked fingers—On training youth and choosing a profession—Hands of a lawyer, clergyman, artist, musician, actor, diplomatist, soldier, sailor, author, and other occupations—Hands of the working classes.

ORDER FORM.

To Book Publisher, 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Please send me a copy of "Hands and how to read them," for which I inclose 1s. 2d.

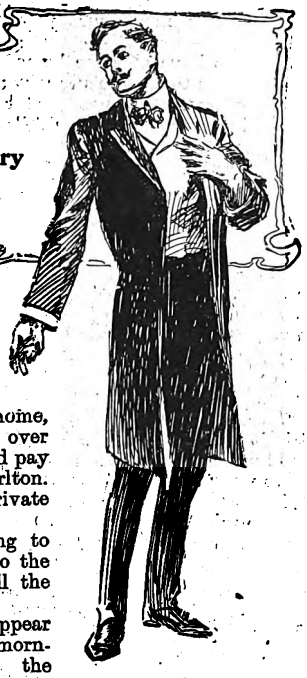
Name.....

Address.....

Digitized by Google

AN AFFECTION OF THE HEART.

Explaining the Love Story of a Man who was very Dense and Stupid.



SILENTLY and swiftly it flows, the strong tidal river. On past fields and pasture-lands, smoothing rugged corners, winding in and gliding out, until, taking a bend by an old farmhouse, it splashes across some ancient boulders, and escapes to the sea, there to await the returning tide.

Away in the distance the shining harbour may be seen, with small craft dancing on the sunlit waves, while every here and there rise the tall masts of some foreign barque, hoisting sails for a morning departure.

Spring is sweet, and Spring is fair, and a maiden's thoughts may soon be lost in reverie when she wanders amongst the apple-blossom in a quaint Cornish orchard.

Gladys Charlton wends her way down the daisied slope to a low wall, past which the brimming water hurries in its haste to be gone. Here she finds a seat, and gives herself up to the enjoyment of a quiet hour with the birds, flowers, and sunshine. She realises an ideal restfulness, and wonders how it can be that only yesterday she was right in the heart of the Metropolis.

Gladys is studying to be a doctor. Do not frown, and say: "I disapprove of her; women-doctors are a delusion"; for her motives are of the truest and best.

Her own mother had died when Gladys was eleven years old, and in less than three years Mr. Charlton married a second wife—a peevish, jealous woman, who made her little step-daughter's life so unbearable that her father sent her away to school; and from that time the girl ceased to have any love for her home, though formal relations were duly observed between herself and Mrs. Charlton.

When school-days were nearly over, Gladys dreaded the prospect of an existence in Cornwall, and sought for some loophole by which to escape from such a dreary life. She frequently visited at the house of a kindly old doctor and his wife at St. John's Wood, and perhaps all she saw and heard there induced her to choose the medical profession as her vocation.

Mr. Charlton gladly gave his consent, for he, too, had misgivings as to how things would be when his daughter came home. And though Gladys had her faults, she was well fitted for her work, being strong, energetic, gentle, and clever withal.

It is now the mid-term recess, and Gladys is free for three weeks. Her thoughts are happy ones while she queries with herself as to how she shall pass the time; then her mind wanders back to London, and she becomes unconscious of everything, save a labyrinth of questionings concerning the future, the good she will strive to accomplish, and I know not what besides, for the damsel had so many beautiful ideas.

But the most ethereal dreams have a practical ending, and the "young girl-graduate" is disturbed in the midst of her solitary musings. Someone discovers her retreat, and Gladys rises to meet the newcomer.

"Roy?"

"Yes; why not? Jack told me you were at home, so I thought I would come over here this lovely morning and pay my respects to Dr. Charlton. What is the fee for a private consultation?"

"Now, Roy, I'm not going to be teased. Let's go down to the beach, and I'll tell you all the latest news."

But Royland does not appear to care about anything this morning unless it concerns the narrator, and simply grows more and more abstracted. At last Gladys gets cross, and says impetuously:

"Really, Roy, you are terribly dense and provoking! Ten minutes ago I told you that Hermann Sternberg had taken his degree; and now, when I speak of his large practice, you say: 'S-tern-b-berg? Has he left college?' You are so stupid!"

"I was wondering about your future, Gladys dear. Don't be vexed because I seemed stupid. But do you really think that you have chosen wisely?"

"Of course," is the somewhat scornful reply. "But I don't like you to call me 'dear' now I'm grown up—it's silly!"

And then Gladys grows more gentle as she relaxes into her old manner with Roy, and unfolds her wonderful plans for the benefit of the human race.

Her listener remains silent for a while, and then says smilingly:

"But, Gladys, couldn't you carry out some of these nice ideas now? You say that when you are duly qualified you will have a regular supply of cream and flowers sent up for the Children's Hospital. Wouldn't it be easy to pack a few hampers and send them off during the recess? Why wait until you are settled and have a row of letters after your name?"

Miss Charlton looks a little crestfallen, and answers slowly:

"I never thought of it. You think of everything, Roy."

"In spite of my stupidity," is the laughing retort. "But now I must give you some information. Uncle Kenneth is dead, and has left me his money, so, unless I choose, there is no need for me to go on studying for the Bar. What would you advise me to do—give up, or go on?"

"Why, give it up, Roy. I always thought it a pity that you should choose such a profession. You are very good, but not a bit clever. You must go and travel; it will enlarge your ideas. I think this money is a providence."

"Would you miss me?" asks Royland thoughtfully.

"Perhaps a little—that is, when I'm at home; but, you know, my life is too busy to miss people much."

* * * * *

The birds sing their evensong; trees rustle to the sweet tune which the gentle breeze is playing; and blue mists rise from the neighbouring valleys as the day's work is ended.

Digitized by Google

The kine have all gone home, and the flowers close their tender petals to Nature's lullaby; but the air is scented with their perfume. An enchanted hush comes over the land; everything says, "Good-night."

Gladys Charlton will never forget how she stood gazing across the sea that evening.

Suddenly a voice broke the stillness, and Royland Rivers stood beside her.

"Will you wish me a prosperous journey, Gladys? I have taken your advice. I shall be gone a long, long while before you see me again, for I am not quite clumsy enough to stay and plead my cause in vain. I know now that it would be useless to ask for more than friendship. Someone more worthy than myself will cross your path in days to come, and try to turn it into his. If so, believe that I shall wish you all happiness. Forgive me if I ask you not to trust to ambition; but grand ideas are useless without everyday patience and heroism. There, don't be bothered, Gladys dear; it isn't your fault, only my big mistake. I know I'm stupid and blundering; but say good-bye. I must go."

No reply— the girl is so taken by surprise.

Roy has a true man's heart, and it resists the strong temptation to take one last kiss; so he raises two cold hands from the fence upon which they are clasped, presses them to his lips like a knight of old, and, ere Gladys can frame a single sentence, he has gone.

But the air seems burdened with sadness, the gloaming s less pleasant, and a feeling of oppression lingers behind. Gladys is glad to return to London.

* * * * *

Five years have passed since Royland Rivers said good-bye to Gladys Charlton. She has never heard anything of him since, though at first she half expected he would write. Now, however, new faces and fresh hopes engross the lady doctor. Roy's prophecy appears likely to come true. Gladys is already practising, but rumour says it will not be for long; and the busybodies are gossiping about her and another doctor, "wondering when the wedding will come off," whether Dr. Sternberg clears more than a thousand a year, how they will manage about Gladys' patients, and much more besides, though Hermann and Miss Charlton have not yet breathed a word of love to each other.

Early summer is looming in the purple haze of distance, everyone longs for something fresh or suggestive of the country, and Islington flower-girls, who stand where the pathway of Upper Street is broad and shady, find a ready sale for the clustering bunches of Lent-lilies, violets, and snowdrops.

Dr. Gladys has just been requested to visit a sick child, and pauses to buy the little one some primroses as she hurries along in the morning sunshine.

"Please, mum, I'm sure I'm that sorry; but a lady wot's been here a visitin' have sent her doctor for to see our little un," said a poor woman who opened the door at No. 23 Back Court, in response to Dr. Charlton's summons.

"Well, never mind," is the cheery reply; "just ,give Lina these, Mrs. Hemming, please, and say that I'll run in to-morrow. How is she?"

"Rather less feverish," says Hermann Sternberg, M.D., as his tall figure appears in the doorway. "Good-morning, Miss Charlton; I suppose I must abdicate in your favour?"

"Oh, no; I haven't any desire to interfere. Lina and I are excellent friends; but I'm going into Cornwall next week for a few days, and I shall be glad if you will attend well to her interests; she's such a nice child, and her mother is so poor," continues Gladys, as she and Dr. Sternberg walk away together.

Miss Charlton has a great idea of her friend's wonderful abilities; almost unconsciously he dwells in her thoughts a good deal, and she mentally raises him to a standard-point far beyond his fellows. At every dinner-party, on every possible occasion, Hermann has singled her out from all others. She is proud to be his confidante, and this morning his manner suggests that he hopes she will become something dearer still. Gladys can scarcely tell the reason why, but she feels that it is so, and grows shyly glad at the thought.

The same evening an exquisite bunch of white flowers is left at Dr. Charlton's door, with Dr. Sternberg's "kind regards." There is a small note attached, which is evidently gratifying to the lady doctor, for, after reading it she leans back in her chair and looks anything but professional. Something softens her eyes, and a gentle expression comes over her face. Cupid smiled and said: "Ah, it may have taken months of my skill, but I have surely aimed aright."

Some folks think that women-doctors are minus feeling; just a bundle of nerve and learning—let them dismiss the idea. Gladys Charlton neither adopted man-like airs, strode heavily, nor smoked. She had boarded with girls who did all three, but her life and bearing remained free from anything approaching the masculine style.

* * * * *

When Dr. Charlton returns to town she is very busy, and does not see Hermann Sternberg for three or four days. However, after once meeting him, she makes inquiries concerning the little patient in Back Court; but he evades a direct reply.

"But, tell me," insists Gladys, "how you really think she is going on?"

"Why, to tell you the truth, Miss Charlton—you know I wasn't properly her doctor—it isn't a monetary case; and I've been so very busy that I've really had no time to go. Do you know that Lady Mayborough has called me in to attend her children? They're down with scarlet fever."

But only scorn meets this piece of information. Gladys looks white and angry; she treats Hermann with contempt, as she exclaims:

"Thanks for your candour, Dr. Sternberg; I will never ask you to spare one moment from your monetary patients again. I thoroughly despise such meanness. For the future, I beg that you will kindly leave that poor child to the tender mercies of a woman! Pray do not stand a minute longer. Lady Mayborough's children may be requiring your valuable services. Good morning."

It cost Gladys an effort to say this to the one person for whose good opinion she had learnt to care the most; and there was a feeling of terrible aching and disappointment for many days afterwards. It is poor comfort when people say at such times:

"Well, he's not worth troubling about; you may feel thankful you've made the discovery in time."

And you may be thankful in one way; for when your friends die suddenly, you may express your thankfulness that they were spared a long illness and lingering death; but it does not make your grief grow less; you experience sorrow just the same, and the shock is even greater.

Dr. Charlton hides her trouble from the curious gaze of the world and expends her spare energy in an increase of work.

Digitized by Google

* * *

Little Lina is dying; her face grows wee and wan, in spite of its unusual loveliness, and when Gladys asks what she would like, the only reply is:

"I wants him; I fink he could make me better; I wants him to tell Lina more 'bout ickle lambs."

"To whom does she refer?" queries Dr. Charlton.

"She means our Sam's master, miss," interposed Mrs. Hemming; "he's sent her lots o' fruit and things; he's bin here himself, too; she's allers a-callin' for him; he's such kindly ways wi' children."

Just then there is a knock at the door.

Surely Gladys has heard that voice before—but what nonsense! Yes, it must be he, and Royland Rivers comes into the room.

He starts a little on seeing who is there; but soon calms, and says very quietly:

"Good-evening, Miss Charlton; how is your patient?" and then turns to the sick child, who brightens at his approach. Can this tall, dignified man, with firm and resolute face, be the Roy of long ago? And, if so, why has Gladys never met him until now? But this is no time for such wonderings.

Together they watch beside the little one, as daylight fades and evening shadows fall across the old city. The small face is full of pain at first, but gradually it wears away and all is still, save for the distant murmur of the multitudes who throng the outer street, little heeding that angels are hovering in the twilight air.

"She is conscious to Someone above, though not to you," says Royland, to the weeping mother. "Do not fear; there is no dark river for children—only a brook, with easy stepping-stones. Lina will soon be in the Homeland."

And as he spoke the frail spirit passed away.

* * * * *

"Why did you never write to any of us, Roy?" asks Gladys, as they walk along Highbury Place, an hour later.

"Where was the use? Besides, Gladys, I didn't do altogether as you wished. I came to London, after being on the Continent for a few weeks, and continued my studies."

"You did? No; you cannot mean it. I should have seen your name somewhere."

"Hardly," rejoins Roy; "Uncle Kenneth wished me to take his name with the property."

"What! Are you the clever barrister, Kenneth, whom everyone is talking about?"

"The same," answers Roy, indifferently; "but we won't discuss such a 'dense' individual as myself."

Miss Charlton feels uncomfortable.

"Gladys, is something I heard to-day about you and Dr. Sternberg true?"

She thinks he refers to their quarrel, and answers:

"Yes."

All through that long summer night Gladys lies awake reviewing the past. Since she has discovered Hermann's true character she has been very wretched, and has looked upon her idol as shattered.

The gold had worn off with nearer acquaintance, the basis was dross. Surely this is not the case with Royland Kenneth. His life has only become truer and better with the world's "wear and tear." Gladys knows that he inspires her with a slight feeling of awe. His power is the greater now. He can stand a test.

As the weeks pass on, however, Mr. Kenneth and Dr. Charlton meet very seldom, and he grows more distant each time.

Gladys asks him the meaning of it once, and says she thinks that he means to retaliate and make fun of her, because she used to be thoughtless and conceited in her younger days.

"Cannot we ever be friends?" she pleads, as they part one evening at the house of a mutual friend.

But the answer is cold enough.

"Our lives are too widely separated now, Gladys. Besides, I am really so 'intensely provoking,' you know. I wonder that you care to ask such a question."

And then Roy turns away to assist a pretty girl, with whom the "people" say, he is greatly taken.

Poor Gladys! It is very hard. Why do things always go contrary? Why are the "tables turned," so to speak? Once Roy loved her, now he does not; but she cares for him. Oh, dreary suspense! Why, if he loves this pretty Gwendoline Maynard, does he not marry her? And why is she, Gladys, doomed to see her friends grow faithless?

* * * * *

Another Spring comes round, and Dr. Charlton is at home. She looks weary and worn; but restlessly seeks all the dissipation which a country life affords.

There is a picnic to Marazion. Royland Kenneth is present, and tries to get near Gladys in the waggonette, but she avoids him; and when the rest all climb to the castle, intending to mount as high as "Arthur's Seat," she finds a cosy corner, halfway up St. Michael's, and; resting amongst the grass-grown rocks, considers herself free from intrusion.

Below her lies the little jetty, and a few cottages; then comes a stretch of blue-green water between the Mount and Marazion, while tiny steamers sail to and from Penzance.

Gladys is pondering over Hermann Sternberg's marriage. She had seen it announced the day before, and the bride was Gwendoline Maynard! She feels quite sorry for Roy, and yet——

Mr. Kenneth himself disturbs the reverie, as he had done some six or seven years previously, all amongst the apple-blossom. He refers to Hermann's marriage, and gently expresses his sorrow and sympathy.

"Why?" is the reply; "unless losing Gwendoline has made you more feeling for others?"

"I lose Gwen! What do you mean?"

"That I never really cared for Hermann," says Gladys.

"But you told me—that is, when I asked you——"

* * * * *

Once more they stand together by the brimming river, once more the dews fall and the mists rise over the sea; but this time two foolish folk have learnt to understand each other, and this time also the little birds peep over their nests and whisper: "See, those are happy lovers!"

But they must have found themselves in a practical world, after all, for, as their voices die away in the distance, we hear Gladys say:

"After all, Roy, you must have been 'terribly dense' not to have understood this before."

What was "this?"

* * * * *

The result of "this" was that Dr. Charlton sold her practice to another lady, and became Mrs. Kenneth.

They live in London, but go to Cornwall every other year to "sentimentalise" for a month, as Roy says.

R. Foxgrove.

Digitized by Google

A Logical Query.

Edith: "I thought you and Mabel were fast friends." Nellie: "We used to be." "And you are not now?" "No." "What's his name?"

She Was Willing.

Gus: "If you don't give it to me at once I'll kiss you." Madge: "And if I do give it to you will you let me alone?" Gus: "Certainly." Madge: "Well, you can't have it."

Hubby Before Everything.

Hubby: "Yes, dear, you look nice in that dress; but it cost me a heap of money." Wife: "Freddie, dear, what do I care for money, when it is a question of pleasing you?"

True Love.

"Henry, you do not love me." "How can you say such a thing, when I've kissed you thirty times in ten minutes?" "If you really loved me you would not have counted the kisses."

Mercenary Papa.

"Did you tell papa how tender your love is for me, darling?" "I did, sweetheart, but he only laughed, and said that it was legal tender he wanted to see before we could do business."

Lost, Stolen, or Strayed?

Lena: "Fred didn't blow his brains out because you jilted him the other night; he immediately came and proposed to me." Maud: "Did he? Then he must have got rid of them in some other way."

A Cutting Rebuke.

Author: "And how do you like my novel?" Lady: "Oh, you ought to write in a more popular vein, so that even the ignorant can understand it!" Author: "What is there about it that isn't clear to you?"

Putting His Foot Into It.

Miss Highflier: "Oh, Mr. Sappy, how nice it was of you to name your new hunter after me! What is she like?" Young Sappy: "Well, she's a regular stunner, Miss Highflier. Not much to look at, don't-cher-know, but very fast." (And he cannot make out why she is so cool to him now.)

Under Certain Circumstances.

"Gertrude," he said, fixing his intense gaze upon her downcast brow, "would you object if I should pass my arm about your waist?" "Yes, George," she replied, gazing at his manly feet. "I should object, but I might yield to pressure."

A Hint to Employés.

Bob: "How do you stand with your employer so well, Tom; you never laugh at his jokes?" Tom: "No; but I dine at his restaurant, and, pretending not to see him, I re-tell all his stories, saying loudly, 'I can't tell it as well as he can, but here's a rattling good yarn Mr. Davidson told us this morning.' I've been promoted three times this year."

A Dead Certainty.

Friend: "Do you think you will marry a rich girl?" Poet: "I'll have to if I keep on in this business."

Asked and Answered.

Miss Rickets: "Why don't you marry Mr. Munn? Are your parents opposed to it?" Miss Giddy: "No; but Mr. Munn seems to be."

A Secret.

Maud: "Miriam is trying to keep her engagement a secret." Martha: "How do you know?" Maud: "She told me so."

Then He Did Feel Happy.

Mr. Waife (trying to entertain his lady-love's six-year-old sister): "Do you know who I am?" Flossie: "Yes! Papa says you're Edith's last chance."

He Assented Cordially.

Mrs. Wobbles: "I shall never forget, dear, how idiotic you looked when you proposed to me." Mr. Wobbles (with emphasis): "I was idiotic."

He Wasn't at Home.

He: "And did you see Monte Carlo while you were at Nice?" She: "No; papa called on him, I believe, but from his disappointed appearance when he returned to the hotel, I think Mr. Carlo must have been out."

A Little Encouragement.

"If I thought any girl would marry me," remarked Mr. Linger, "I'd propose to-morrow." "If that is how you feel," replied Miss Spokes, with a glance at the clock, which indicated 11:45, "you need not wait very long."

His Declaration.

Mrs. Rusher: "Has Mr. Goldcoin, with whom you have been dancing all the evening, at last declared his intentions, Mabel?" Mabel: "Yes, aunt." Mrs. Rusher: "I am so glad! And what did he say?" Mabel: "He declared he would never marry."

Comparisons Were Odious.

"Are your coats padded?" asked Angelina, as her head reposed gracefully on William's manly breast. "No. Why do you ask?" he inquired fondly. "Because they are so much softer than Martin's coats, or John's either, for that matter." The engagement is now off.

She'd Find Out.

"They say that stolen kisses are the sweetest," he said, as they sat on the seat looking at the moon. "Indeed?" she said. "Yes. What do you think about it?" "Oh, I have no opinion at all; but it seems to me, if I were a young man, I wouldn't be long in doubt as to whether they were or not."

One For Algy.

Algy (who is not as big a fool as he looks): "Did you give my cawd to Mith Bondclipper?" Servant: "Yes, sir." Algy: "What did she say?" Servant: "She told me to tell you, sir, that she was sorry she was not in." Algy: "Ah, indeed! Please tell your mithtress that I thaid I wath glad I didn't call."

A Lost Opportunity.

Mrs. Hunnemune (as the train emerges from a long tunnel): "Dear me, John, did you kiss me just now in the dark?" Mr. Hunnemune (glancing round to find the perpetrator of the outrage): "No, indeed! I wonder who dared to!" Mrs. Hunnemune (simply): "Nobody. But you missed a splendid chance, John."

The Sacrifice.

"George," said she, in a low voice, "would you make a sacrifice for my happiness?" "Certainly," he replied. "Would you give up smoking for my sake?" "Give up smoking for your sake!" he repeated. Then, after a silence, he exclaimed hoarsely, "I can refuse you nothing. I will do so. Hereafter when I smoke it will be for my own sake."

Digitized by Google

A BROKEN DREAM.

Telling How a Goddess Suddenly Became Mortal.

"Look out, Fred! Have we toilers on foot no rights a plough-driver is bound to respect?"

"Good Heavens, Millie! Did I touch you? You seemed deeply absorbed gazing into the misty beyond."

"I was watching that brilliant equipage, so unlike the carts and hay waggons of these parts, and I see it has turned down our lane. Go to work, Fred, as I do, and don't dare pretend you are anything else but a toiling farm hand if they should stop to speak to you."

Mildred Avery pulled her blue sunbonnet over her face, and grasped her light pitchfork with energy. Her strong, graceful form seemed fully equal to her work of piling up the fragrant hay. Fred Lorimer, a young collegian home for his summer's holiday, a ward of Mildred's father, evidently thought she looked the picture of health, for even while industriously continuing his task, his eyes wandered constantly towards the fair young hay-maker.

Up the green lane a carriage, drawn by a fine pair of black horses, rolled noiselessly on until it stopped by Lorimer and Mildred Avery. Two handsome, stylish young fellows occupied it; one of them sprang out and approached the hedge. Mildred, apparently unconscious, as Fred wheeled the horse about on his return trip, stolidly pursued her work.

"Heigh! You girl, there!"

Mildred turned towards the young man.

"Well, sir?"

"Can you direct us to the house of Alfred Avery, somewhere in this vicinity?"

"Drive on to the end of the lane—you'll see the house then—a big white one in the middle of a lot of trees."

The young man was evidently surprised, for Mildred could not render her voice unmusical; he did not immediately turn away.

"Ah, thanks! We are very uncertain, you know. Glad to find ourselves so near our journey's end, you know."

Mildred worked on, making no answer. Her father, in his shirt sleeves, was at that moment balancing himself on the top of a load of hay at the other end of the field.

As the young man was hesitatingly moving away she called out:

"Do you want Mr. Avery?"

Perhaps this irritated the seeker after information, for he replied:

"Can't see that it concerns you, my pretty maid. But I don't mind telling you that we do want Mr. Avery, and perhaps his handsome daughter as well. So, fair maiden, are you satisfied?"

Before the astonished Mildred could think what to do, Fred had jumped from his seat and was striding fiercely towards the hedge.

"Look here, young fellow, you need to be taught manners. We don't speak to young ladies in that fashion in the country."

The man retreated from the advancing farmer in dismay.

"Dear me! What impetuous creatures these country boys are, to be sure! I assure you, I meant no harm. I beg the young person's pardon if what I said was disagreeable to her."

"Young lady, you mean!"

"Young lady—oh, very well, if she likes to be called so,"

"If she grants it you may count yourself lucky to get off without punishment. If not, I'll come and thrash you till she's satisfied."

"Oh, come, Gray," exclaimed the young man in the carriage; "don't get into a controversy with Squire Avery's farm hands—it wouldn't be policy, you know. Apologise as meekly as is necessary and come on."

"Sorry, I assure you—no offence meant—hope you'll excuse me," said Gray, backing before the gleaming eyes of the athletic harvester.

"Come back, Fred. It's all right," Mildred exclaimed in a strange smothered sort of voice, and Fred rejoined her as the carriage wheeled swiftly away. "I know them, Fred—at least, I know the one in the carriage," she said softly, with cheeks that were rosier than even the heat warranted.

"Oh, do you? And am I to apologise, then?"

"No—at least—I don't know how we shall meet them. It is Leo Maynard and his friend, Carroll Gray. I met Leo frequently when I was at my Aunt Margaret's in London last winter."

"Humph! And I suppose he has come out here to see you?"

Mildred made no reply. She stood with one hand on the handle of her fork, gazing dreamily towards the dim forest in the distance. She was thinking of the time she had last met Leo Maynard. It had been in a crowded ball-room, where the pulsations of an enchanting waltz, the fragrance of rich flowers, the soft glow of little lights, the graceful rhythmic motion of beautiful women and men around them, all combined to intoxicate the senses and make living seem a delicious enchantment. Nothing had seemed real in such a moment. She had felt herself the exquisite being Maynard's manner seemed to imply; he was a knight of olden time—romantic, mysterious, chivalrous—both were fascinated and under a spell; and since then to each the other existed only as the central star of a beautiful dream—real nowhere but in mthe emory. To-day they would meet again for the first time since that night.

"Fred, let's go home. We can slip in the back way, go to our rooms, and appear at the proper time, clothed and in our right minds. You see, we cannot send the servant down with a not-at-home message; having come so far, the traditions of the country demand that they be fed, entertained, and refreshed before they depart."

Digitized by Google

Fred groaned.

"I don't fancy the prospect. Let's run away to the woods, and follow the brook to the coolest, greenest nook we can find, and pretend we never saw them. You know we are only Squire Avery's farm hands."

"You lazy fellow! You want to shirk your duties in either character. Come, call someone to take the horse, and let's get along."

It was high noon when Mildred descended the wide staircase of the roomy old farmhouse, dressed afresh in soft, creamy drapery, with a dash of colour about her head and neck, and half a dozen roses in her hand. Dark, soft waves of hair fell away from a broad white forehead, and a new animation glowed in her deep hazel eyes and well-rounded cheeks. She could hear the men from the hayfield laughing and joking with each other as they dashed the cool water over their moist faces; the savoury steam of substantial edibles floated through the rooms, and the clatter of dishes sounded from the long dining-room. The doors of the cool, spacious room stood open, and men's voices came to her from the room.

"Ah, here is my girl at last!" exclaimed Squire Avery, heartily. "Come in, Millie. I suppose you know one of these young gentlemen—ah!"

Both young men sprang to their feet, both had advanced to greet her. But Carroll Gray stopped in dismay, his face turning a mottled pattern of white and red.

"Bless my soul! It's the fair maiden herself!"

Leo Maynard turned pale.

"And I called you one of Squire Avery's farm hands!"

"Good gracious! What a dreadful mistake! Miss Avery—dear me—can you ever forgive me? No, I suppose you can't, you know. I—I—whatever is a fellow to say under such an awful combination of circumstances?"

Mildred laughed merrily.

"Say nothing. It was a very natural error. Mr. Maynard, I am glad to see you again. Mr. Gray, pray be seated. You are fully forgiven—Squire Avery's farm hands are not such very formidable people when you become accustomed to them."

Both men plunged again into a sea of abject apologies. A great clanging dinner bell clashed out noisily at the moment, and Mr. Avery recovered his usual genial tone.

"Heigho—dinner is ready. Millie, here, would not let us change our custom in haying time of eating altogether—saves time and work, you know, for people that are hurried to death. Come out—come and partake of a good, plain, old-fashioned dinner, served as farmers serve it." And the group, with the genial, prosperous farmer at the head, moved out to the dining-room.

A long table extended the length of the room, and a small throng of well-washed labourers were gathering round it. At the upper end the family were grouped, and here Mr. Avery led his visitors and introduced them to his wife and other members of the family. Carroll Gray sank into the abject sea again when he saw Lorimer, where he floundered hopelessly until Millie helped him out. They were all seated at last, presenting in modern guise a fair picture of ancient feudal customs. Two sturdy girls waited at the table, but Mrs. Avery and Mildred divided many duties between them.

It was all new and strange to Leo Maynard. He thought of dinners partaken under softly-masked electric lights, where rare flowers heaped up, and magnificent table furnishings, almost hid the guests from one another's view; where low delicious music from concealed players lulled the senses to a sweet quiet; where wine sparkled, and delicate perfume mingled with every breath; where noiseless servants moved about with skilful unobtrusiveness; where Mildred sat beside him in silken evening dress, rich flowers on her bosom and jewels in her hair and at her white throat; when she had seemed to him so fair, so exquisite a creature that all these had seemed too poor and plain for her.

And now—this homely meal in the glare of noonday, Mildred herself sitting down with a dozen dusty working men, and even administering to their greedy wants—what a contrast! How this goddess had become mortal in a moment! He had seen her, too, dressed as a servant and toiling like one. Where was all that delicate charm which had made her seem so unlike ordinary girls? His was not the nature to grasp the beauties of the practical, to appreciate the strength and helpfulness of this true woman. The magic spell, woven in hours of sensuous luxury once broken, he felt only affright and wondering dismay. He longed to get away from a scene the effect of which upon his senses he couldn't understand.

As soon as they reasonably could do so, the young men made their excuses and rose to go. Maynard's face was sad and dejected, and his lips refused to utter the suave, flattering words usually so ready to spring from them. He took Mildred's hand and looked into her grave, frank, brown eyes; but no tender tones, no plans for the future, no hopes for a brighter meeting were uttered by either. It was a simple, serious "Good-bye" over a broken charm, a faded dream, and both knew it was the last.

And years afterwards, when Mildred was the wife of the rising young lawyer and politician, Frederick Lorimer, Leo Maynard was a name forgotten in her memory, and unknown out in the great world of which she was an active part.

Stanley Hammond.

"Your friend, Mr. Barlow, isn't a very polite man. He was positively rude to me last night," said Maude. "That's Henry's great fault," said Ethel; "he has very little respect for age."

Tomlinson: "Good-bye, Miss Elenora." Miss Elenora: "But you have already said 'good-bye' to me, Mr. Tomlinson." Mr. Tomlinson (who is always ready with some pretty speech): "Have I, really? One can't do a pleasant thing too often, you know."

Jack: "I never kissed a girl in my life until I met you." May Ketchum: "I've heard that from others." Jack: "Who told you?" May Ketchum: "Ever so many; it's an awfully old lie."

"Well, old man," says artist number one, "how's business?" "Splendid!" says number two. "I've just got a commission from a millionaire. He wants his children painted very badly." "Good! I congratulate you, my boy. You're the very man for a job like that."

Son: "What is the meaning of a 'single' woman, dad? I've never heard of a 'double' one." Father: "A single woman, my boy, is one that has only a single idea in life, a single ambition, a single desire." Son: "And that is——" Father: "To get married."

ARE YOU GENEROUS? ARE YOU MEAN?

ARE YOU CLEVER? ARE YOU DULL?

Whatever you are it is as well to know other things concerning yourself, so send a specimen of your handwriting, together with six penny stamps and a stamped addressed envelope to Ranee, 23 Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C. A reliable delineation of your character will reach you in return—this will give you the required information.

Digitized by Google

Not in Vain.

Telling of a Love that Passed Understanding.

MR. VAIDEN paced the room nervously. At each turn he glanced at the clock on the mantel, and many times he paused at one of the large windows, and, pushing aside the heavy crimson curtains, looked out anxiously into the white December night.

The cloth had been laid for a late supper, but the table had not been set. Evidently Mr. Vaiden was expecting a guest. When the clock's slender golden finger pointed to nine, he gave an impatient sigh and flung himself into an easy-chair before the glowing hearth. There was a large portrait of himself hanging above the richly-tiled mantel, but at this moment he did not resemble it in the least.

The portrait showed a man of probably forty years; with a kind and benevolent expression, earnest, gentle eyes, a white, high brow, with heavy, brownish hair waving away from it, and curling, brown moustache. It was the kind of face and the expression that belong to philanthropists and to men who unselfishly give up all they value in life for others.

The man sitting before the grate had the brown, waving hair and heavy, curling moustache, the white, blue-veined brow, but there was no trace of benevolence in his eyes or general expression.

Mr. Vaiden was alone, shut in by oaken doors and heavy curtains from the eyes of the world that adored him and trusted him, and his inner soul—his real self—looked out from his eyes.

"So," he said slowly, his lips showing bloodless beneath his moustache, "I have worked and schemed all these years for nothing, have I? I have played the public benefactor; I have crushed down all my own desires for a different, a freer life, just to mislead my brother into the belief that I was a saint, with the hope and trust that he would disinherit that roving young scamp and leave his millions to me! And all this for nothing, eh? Well, we shall see! The lawyer dead, one of the witnesses dead, and the other—but confound that Ratcliffe! I fear him as I fear nothing else on earth, man or monster! For there is always the girl. I dare not do anything that might arouse her suspicions, for I would lose all these thousands ten times over rather than lose her!"

There was a terrible passion in his face now.

"She is not his daughter, but the old man worships her; and, mean as he is to everyone else, he is good to her. So, because of her, I am afraid of him, and have to be careful—careful! I must bargain with him, instead of—silencing him. Oh, it is like walking over dynamite with a lighted torch in your hand! It is wearing me out, body and soul!"

He rose and paced the room again, one hand clasped with nervous force over the opposite wrist. His brow showed deep furrows now, and his temples beat fitfully. He looked old and haggard. Presently his eyes turned with the look of a desperate, half-crazed animal towards an old-fashioned desk in one corner of the room.

"If I only dared burn it!" he muttered. "Now—before he enters this house. But that old John Ratcliffe—I dare not—I dare not!"

There was a sound of wheels coming up the drive, and his expression changed instantly. He took several rapid turns to compose himself, and when his guest entered, five minutes later, he was received with outstretched hands by the original of the portrait—by the Mr. Vaiden of the gentle, earnest eyes that met yours so squarely, the Mr. Vaiden of the benevolent expression.

The guest was a young and handsome man. One saw at a glance that he was of a proud and passionate nature. There were passion and high spirit in his flashing, dark eyes, in the lines about his mouth, in his fine nostrils—aye, in every movement. Coming in out of the cold, his face was white, and there were flecks of snow on his clothing, but his eyes burnt like fire.

"My dear boy!" exclaimed the elder man, with affection, "you are welcome!"

"Uncle," replied the young man, coldly, giving, and immediately withdrawing his hand, "it would be an odd circumstance were I not welcome in this house."

"It would, indeed, Arthur," said Mr. Vaiden cordially. "Come to the fire, while I ring for supper. I have been waiting."

"I am sorry to have kept you waiting," said the young man, "especially as I have dined on the train. And, uncle, if you can postpone your supper, I will detain you only a few minutes in this interview, as I wish to catch the next train back."

"What, Arthur! Do you mean that you will not be my guest?"

"I shall neither break bread nor sleep in this house until it is mine by law, as it is now by right."

There was silence for a moment. Then Mr. Vaiden said, in a tone of deep emotion:

"My dear boy, you grieve me to the heart. That you should feel hurt—aye, that you should feel bitter—that my brother should have left you only a hundred pounds, is to be expected. Were I in your place, I should feel the same. But I have sent for you for the sole purpose of making you what I consider a generous offer. My brother, out of charity, adopted you and treated you as a son, and I believe that he would have made you his heir, had not your course—your passion for wandering—displeased him. Heaven knows," his voice trembled with emotion, "so far as I am concerned, you were welcome to all his fortune and lands, for my wants are few. But, Arthur, he left his wishes in his will, and they must be respected."

"And your generous offer, most noble uncle?" said the young man, his lips curling in a fine scorn.

Digitized by Google

"Arthur, I wish to make over to you—absolutely — twenty thousand pounds."

For a moment the younger man was speechless. Then he laughed; but almost instantly his face darkened, his nostrils swelled and his eyes fairly flamed. One hand closed convulsively, and he flung out the other in a violent gesture of unrepressed anger at his uncle.

"Now, listen!" he cried, in a tone that commanded obedience. "Your brother was my own father! He was separated from my mother—a poor Italian singing-girl — by you, because you wanted his money, and she died in wretched poverty and misery; but he loved her to the day of his death. Me he would not give up, although you did persuade him to disown me. I have seen his marriage certificate, and I believe that it still exists! I believe, too, that he meant for me to have all that he possessed, and that the will which gives it to you is your own forgery. You, sir, I believe to be a traitor, an impostor, and a forger! I am an open enemy. I accept no hospitality from any man in my own home, nor do I accept from you twenty thousand pounds of my own money. But this I will do. When my father's fortune is lawfully mine—as, sir, it will be—I will remember your offer and return your generosity. If you wish to confer with me at any time, you will find me up at the mountain village. I am staying for the present with Mr. John Ratcliffe, in the village——"

"What!" cried Mr. Vaiden, taken completely by surprise and turning deadly pale. "You are staying there—there? How did that happen? I—I had not heard."

"It was not necessary that you should. Sir, I wish you a very good night."

For a long time Mr. Vaiden stood with bent head in the centre of the room. But, when a train went rushing by, he walked to the window and watched it climb round the mountain-side above his home, and so on to the town of Bingley, a distance of half a mile.

"So he is staying there!" he muttered, with evil eyes. "If he should take her from me—so help me Heaven! I would stop at nothing!"

Suddenly the burly, black form of a signalman became visible, etched against the snow on the mountain-side and the red glow from his own fire. He had stepped aside for the train to pass, and was standing, evidently lost in thought, his pipe in his mouth, his flag under his arm, and his hands thrust deep in his pockets.

"Ah!—I have a thought——"

But the blackness of the thought made him shudder and drop the curtain, shutting out that figure.

* * * * *

The good people of the tiny Scottish village hanging under the brow of that rugged mountain had never ceased to puzzle over the domestic affairs of old John Ratcliffe. Why he, so much superior to them all in every respect, should have come to such a retired place, and dwelt there so many years with the beautiful girl whom he called Gertrude, all this was a mystery to the good folk.

Gertrude was the deepest mystery of all. She was not John's child, but that was all anyone knew. She was eighteen at the time my story begins, with the wild, strong beauty of a thorough-bred racer. Her hair and eyes were warm and black, her skin white as milk, but the rich blood glowed like wine in cheek and lip. Her throat was round and strong and beautiful; her well-formed arms and hands, her delicate nostrils, her superb figure—all had the same look of strength. She was like the winds and wild seas and lashing rains in her passions of delight or rage.

"She's not like our girls, Heaven be praised!" the simple villagers said. But Mr. Vaiden loved her, and had determined to move Heaven and earth to win her.

"When once she is mine and under my influence——" He thrilled in contemplation of the hour when she should be his.

Gertrude possessed a remarkable influence over old John Ractliffe, whose stubborn will no one else had ever been able to bend or break. Many a conflict had those two wills, the old one and the young one, had. The last and most violent of all had been when the old man was sitting on a bench in front of his pleasant cottage, smoking his long-stemmed pipe. Gertrude came out with a pitcher, on her way to the dairy to get cream for supper. She paused near him.

"I have taken a lodger," she said quietly.

"What?" almost shouted the old man. "I'll have no lodger in this house!"

"Oh, yes, you will," replied the girl. "He is already in the house. I have given him my room, and I'll sleep in the attic."

"You'll do nothing of the kind!" roared the old man. "He shall not stay here!"

"He shall!" said Gertrude, with flaming eyes. "If I choose to do the cooking and extra work, it is nothing to you. I have told him he might stay—there is no accommodation in the village; he is in the house now, and if you dare to put him out"—she dropped her bare, lovely arms to her sides and looked steadily into his eyes, uttering each word slowly and distinctly—"I also shall leave the house in which I cannot be mistress!"

He knew she meant it. He smoked a moment, and then said, in a different tone:

"What is his name?".

"Arthur Vaiden."

He almost leapt off the bench, uttering a fierce ejaculation. Almost immediately, however, he composed himself, and gruffly bade the girl go on after the cream.

"So," he muttered, "the jade will have her will. But the uncle must not know he is here."

That was a month ago, and to-night the girl stood at the kitchen window, watching the head-light of the train that bore Arthur Vaiden back to his mountain refuge. It was midnight, and the old man had gone to bed; but the girl waited. She could not sleep while the train climbed the perilous mountain-road. There was a feverish crimson in her cheeks, and her eyes had the fire of a hungry animal's, as she watched the light growing nearer.

"He is coming back," she whispered—"he is coming back! Oh, Heaven, I don't know what to pray!" She fell on her knees on the bare floor and put her hands over her hot face. "Oh, Father, only be with him along that dangerous way!"

She knelt there, sobbing that simple but eloquent prayer over and over for an hour. Then the outer door opened suddenly. He came in, covered with snow. She leapt to her feet, but not so quickly but that he saw the attitude, the agitation, the tears. He went to her and took her hands warmly.

"Why, child," he said, "you have waited for me? Why did you do that?"

He stooped and kissed her forehead gently, respectfully; but, at touch of his lips, she burst into sudden convulsive sobbing. Taken by surprise, he drew her to his breast as he would a child.

"What is it?" he asked, laying her face against his and soothing her—aye, and feeling his own pulses beat more full and strong against the tumultuous throbbing of hers. She looked at him with those eager, beautiful eyes, leaning a little from him and yet clinging to him.

"What is it?" she repeated. "Did you think I could go to sleep while you were on that dangerous road?"

Was the road more dangerous than this sweet beating of his pulses ? the young man wondered vaguely, as he drew her closer to him.

Digitized by Google

"You must not worry about me, child," he said, awkwardly; "you,—you must not care."

"Not care ? " she said, putting one white, strong arm up about his throat, and speaking with lips that curled like a crimson seashell. "Why, did you not know, if anything happened to you, or—or took you from me, I should not live ! "

He turned very pale. He remembered a portrait upstairs in his trunk of a cold, proud woman, and a line that ran across beneath the face: "From your promised wife." He knew now that he had never loved her—that he had never been loved as this girl loved him, with all the passion of her warm, untrained nature. There comes a moment sometimes, to the strongest man, when his strength leaves him.

"She is like an opal," he thought, trembling a little; "she is gorgeous as the rainbow, and she loves me ! "

He bent his head and laid his lips on hers in a long kiss, from which the girl at last broke away, her beautiful throat swelling with sobs born of the exalted ecstasy of her love.

"I love you !—love you !—love you ! " she sobbed; and then fled away up the stairs to her attic, and, flinging herself face downwards across her white bed, lay there motionless some time.

Gertrude's love was so great and terrible a thing that it completely filled her soul, to the exclusion of all other passions. There was a wearing doubt in her mind that such happiness could last, so she prayed always that it might continue. If he kissed her, she ran from him, sobbing; if he went away, she paced her room for hours, pausing only to fall on her knees and stammer the prayers that struggled from her excited breast.

"It hurts—it hurts to love so ! " she said, over and over again. "But I would not have it different; suffering for him is happiness."

And the month passed, and still she loved him dearly, and still she prayed.

One day, when he was away, his uncle came by the afternoon train and remained through the night. He attempted to press his suit with the girl, but she did not even understand him; and at last he gave up in disgust, and retired to the guest-chamber.

Gertrude went to her room, and, worn out with the feverish unrest of her love, fell asleep on the floor beside the low chair at which she was praying. She looked very beautiful in her dark red bodice and light skirt, with her arms bare to the elbows.

And in her sleep she beheld a vision. She saw Arthur Vaiden in a dimly-lighted room, which she recognised as his uncle's private study. He was standing before an old desk, fitting a key in the lock, quietly and boldly. The outlines of his figure stood out against a light screen behind him; his eyes were fixed full upon the door, as if prepared for any comer.

She awoke, shuddering. She seized her lamp and went to the door of his room. It was empty. She entered and set down the lamp. It was snowing; and there was a high wind; t beat at the doors with terrible force and rattled the casements. It was eleven o'clock.

"He has not come yet," she whispered, and fell on her knees to say a prayer for him. Something was lying on the floor, which he had dropped and forgotten to pick up; the portrait of a pale, cold woman, with "From your promised wife" traced beneath it.

It seemed but a few moments, but it was in reality an hour, that she knelt there motionless. Then she got up slowly, unconscious of her suffering, and set her sharp heel on the woman's face.

"The month is up ! The month is up ! " she cried, running like a wild thing from the room. "And now to die—to die ! "

She ran noiselessly, bare-headed and bare-armed, down the stairs, but paused at Mr. Vaiden's room. His door was ajar, and he and old John were talking in low, earnest tones.

Two Hours in a Cell.

"I wonder how a fellow feels locked up in there ? " said the writer to the Governor of a big prison as we were peeping into a cell through the grated iron door.

"If you want a taste of it, I'll lock you up for a couple of hours," answered the Governor pleasantly.

"All right, go ahead ! " I stepped inside and he locked the door with a clang, and left me. No sound, no view, nobody to talk to. I lay down on the iron cot and wondered when they would take me out and hang me; or whether I was likely to get a new trial. At the end of the second hour the Governor released me. "Had enough ? " he asked.

"Quite enough," I answered.

And yet I would rather take a month of that sort of thing than the long confinement Mr. George Robinson got—in his house, mind you—after the fashion he told of in a statement signed on August 24th, 1899, at his home, Rawcliffe, R.S.O., Yorks.

"I was laid up for eleven weeks with acute dyspepsia and the maladies that are part and parcel of it," he said. "The trouble began back in 1888. The first of it was just weakness, loss of appetite, and a low, miserable state of feeling. Then there was pain at the chest and stomach after eating—time when well people are at their best. After that I couldn't sleep of nights, except by naps and catches, when I got completely tired out. So the complaint went on, getting worse and worse, until I was laid up for eleven weeks. My doctors didn't seem able to relieve me for more than a day or so at a time.

"On a neighbour's word I tried Mother Seigel's Syrup, and began to mend almost at once. My breathing and appetite both improved, and in a few weeks I was in sound health."

It is five and a half years ago since Mr. Robinson made that declaration, and over fifteen years since he began to suffer, as he has described. On February 25th this year at his home, still at Rawcliffe, he made another declaration and signed it, in which he says to us: "Since I wrote to you, nearly five years ago, concerning my almost miraculous cure by Mother Seigel's Syrup, I am pleased to say that I have continued to enjoy good health. All the old weakness and depression are gone, seemingly for good, and I feel as strong and well as a man could wish to be. I had been prostrate eleven weeks when I got my first bottle of Mother Seigel's Syrup. Several doctors had attended me, but I got no better until I commenced on Mother Seigel's Syrup. Almost from the first I began to mend, and in a few weeks was as well as ever. As I have said, my cure was almost miraculous."

Disease, and debility resulting from disease, are the cruellest of gaolers—they will never voluntarily release their victims. But let the prisoners cry out for help to Mother Seigel, and she will give them quick freedom from their toils, with health and strength into the bargain.

Indigestion and Dizziness.

Six Months' Suffering ended by

"Whatever I ate," says Mr. Morgans, of 2 Wellfield Terrace, Dola, Llanharran, Glam., "gave me terrible pain. Severe headaches and dizziness often compelled me to abandon my work. After suffering for six months without relief, I found my cure in Mother Seigel's Syrup. I have remained well and not lost a day's work since.

MOTHER SEIGEL'S SYRUP.

Price 1/1½ and 2/6 per bottle.

Digitized by Google

"Let him break into the house like a thief, if that is his errand," Mr. Vaiden was saying, biting his nails nervously. "If we can depend on the train being wrecked, he will never reach the top of this mountain again. But I cannot believe that even he, bold as he is, would break into the house to look for the will. If I had thought that, John, I should have destroyed the will, in spite of your superstitions."

"Those that destroy wills," muttered the old man, shaking his head, "always seem to get found out. Better destroy trains. Where will it be?"

"At the curve. There is a precipice just where I tore up the line——"

The kitchen door creaked.

"It is the wind," said old John.

"Oh, Heaven, let me be in time—let me be in time!" cried the girl, as she sped through the cruel night towards the mountain-side. "Let me save him, even for her—and then let me die—only die!"

Her hair was streaming down her back, her head and arms were bare, her feet in slippers; but she felt nothing, cared for nothing.

Only to save him, and then to die! Those were the only thoughts in her mind. No anger with him, no reproach, no sense of personal wrong affected her. She had felt all the time that something must happen.

The girl had never loved anybody or anything before; therefore she was not to be judged. She was wholly untrained, uneducated. She knew every tree and rock on the mountain, every wild flower, every fern; she knew what the winds and the rains and the terrible storms said; she knew the music of the brooks; and, at a wild bird's first note, she knew whether it was nesting, singing to its young, or grieving for a lost mate. But she knew nothing of the world, and she had no creed beyond her simple prayers.

She knew a place on the mountain where a dangerous track wound down to the bottom of the valley where the railway ran. She sped to this place—to the very edge of the precipice. She grasped the limb of a tree and leant over—far over. Would she have time to descend that perilous path and stop the train? She would try; at least she would die trying to save him—for her!

Then, all in a second, as she hung over that brink, round a curve—close, close—burst the bright head-light of the approaching train. She flung out her free arm with a terrible cry. Merciful Heaven—the train! And the curve only a quarter of a mile beyond the place where she stood! Too late! too late! too late!

A thousand noises sung in her head, a thousand lights dazzled her vision, a thousand thoughts crashed through her brain. Then one thought took shape and stood out clear, distinct; at least, she could die with him. What! with him? No, no—for him. Her body on the line would stop the train.

"Oh, Heaven!" she cried—poor child, her last prayer—"let it not be in vain! Let me die, but save him—through me—for her! And, oh, forgive him, as I forgive him!"

Then, without one instant's hesitation, without one shrinking fear, she cast her beautiful young body out from the precipice, and it sunk like a spent arrow, down, down, through the midnight to the track below.

Arthur Vaiden was sitting half asleep, but with one hand on the pocket containing his father's will, as the train climbed the mountain. Some days before, an old and trusted servant of his father's had found, among some clothing willed to him by his late master, a sealed envelope, marked, "For my dear son, Arthur Vaiden." This he turned over to the young man, and it was found to contain a key and these feebly written lines:

"This key opens right top drawer—old desk—study. My will and marriage certificate there. Leaves all to you. If ever a woman loves you as your mother loved me, be good to her. I am watched. "Your Father."

Arthur Vaiden had made a bold move, and the will was his.

Suddenly came a succession of alarm cries from the engine, almost human-like in their distress and appeal. The sleepless eyes of the engine-driver had discerned a figure on the track. It was a close shave, but it was a steep up-grade, and he managed to stop the train within three feet of the girl.

"She has fallen from the cliff," those brave men said, turning pale as they bent over her.

She was not dead, but dying. She spoke his name with difficulty. The men passed it along wonderingly, and presently the crowd parted and he came to her, white as the death-white of her own poor face. A great and glorious light transfigured that face now.

"It was not too late," she said, slowly and faintly. "I have saved you—for her. You see, I found her portrait and knew all. I could not live then. I am so glad to die! Do not grieve—I forgive you! At least, I had one month of your love! If she loves you, she will not begrudge me that."

Then she struggled up.

"I forgot!" she cried. "He has torn up the line by the curve——"

In speechless grief the young man lifted her and laid her against his breast. Those beautiful eyes, dimmed by pain, were still able to thank him.

"You have been so good to me always," she whispered, "and I have had a whole month of your love. It was all I prayed for. I am satisfied."

He laid his face upon hers until Death came and took her into its own all-powerful arms.

"It is best," he said, with a strong sob, as he laid one last kiss on her lips. "I could never have married her, and, in either event, she would have died. A love like hers—so pure, so strong, so exalted, so unselfish—is more suited to an angel than to a woman."

Then his father's words came to him: "If ever a woman loves you as your mother loved me, be good to her." He shuddered. "I was not good to her," he mused, deeply moved. "But no man can be good enough for a woman who loves like that. No man can even understand such love. She had the purity and the very strength of these wild cliffs in her nature. She was a very passion-flower of the mountain."

Edward Harris.

Mother (angrily): "Did he dare kiss you more than once?" Daughter (evasively): "Well, mamma, I know it wasn't less than once."

The Actress: "The manager seems to think that some day my voice will break the record." Jealous Rival: "Perhaps—if you sing in a phonograph."

Lottie: "I'm afraid Fred doesn't care for me as much as he did." Edith: "Nonsense! What makes you think so?" Lottie: "I got a letter from him to-day, and there were at least three places where he might have put in a 'dear' or a 'darling' and didn't."

"I don't care much for that man Blithersley," said the proud papa. "Why?" asked the proud mamma. "I listened to him for an hour to-day while he told me about what his baby had said, or tried to say, and just as I was about to tell him about ours he left me, saying he had to catch a train."

He (after popping the question): "Why do you cry, my angel? Did I offend you by my proposal?" She (still sobbing): "Oh, no, dear, it is not that. I am crying for joy. Mother always said to me, 'May, you are such an idiot that you would not get even a donkey for a lover,' and now I have got one after all."

Widow: "Do you think marriage is always a failure?" Bullfinch: "Always a failure! Well, I should say not. Why, I know a case where a wife fairly idolises her husband, and he—why he can't keep away from her a minute." Widow: "Bless me, how long have they been married?" Bullfinch: "Nearly a week.'

Digitized by Google

J. G. GRAVES' CYCLES

J. G. Graves' 1904 Price List contains Illustrations and Particulars of carefully selected High-Grade Machines, suitable for every class of rider.

Accounts may be paid by EASY MONTHLY INSTALMENTS, or DISCOUNT ADVANTAGES offered to CASH PURCHASERS.

Ladies' Cycles a Speciality. Illustrated Catalogues Free.

AGENTS WANTED. GOOD PAY. NO RESPONSIBILITY. WRITE FOR TERMS.

J. G. GRAVES, 169 Division Street, SHEFFIELD.

GIVEN AWAY
with this week's
HOME NOTES
(No. 536)

A PAPER PATTERN of this
NIGHTDRESS

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents
PRICE ONE PENNY.

"No Better Food."—Dr. ANDREW WILSON, F.R.S.E., &c.

Fry's PURE CONCENTRATED Cocoa

"Strongest and Best."
—Health.

TRY ALSO FRY'S MALTED COCOA

A Combination of Fry's Pure Cocoa and Allen and Hanburys' Extract of Malt.

Strongly recommended by the "LANCET" and "BRITISH MEDICAL JOURNAL."

From 6/- Monthly. Special Offer. 500 New Cycles £3 10s. 500 Genuine B.S.A. £6 10s. Sample Victory Motor Cycle £26. Sent carr. paid before payment. Agents Wanted. Dereham Rd. Cycle Co., Norwich

Icilma.

ICILMA Natural Water, Soap, and Cream can alone give a clear, healthy, complexion, proof against hard water, sun, wind, smoke, or dust. ICILMA vitalises the skin and preserves it from blackheads and irritations. Cooling and refreshing. Cures immediately nettlerash, mosquito, and insect bites. (Samples Soap and Cream, 2d.) Icilma (Dept. 127), 142 Gray's Inn Road, London, W.C.

REAL HEALTH.

It's always a pleasure to meet a woman with a lovely complexion and bright spirits. But you cannot enjoy the best of health unless your system is in faultless order—every organ doing its appointed work and doing it regularly and well.

TOWLE'S PILLS

have brought health to thousands of ailing women the wide world over, by relieving distressing complaints, and giving tone to the system generally. Avoid injurious imitations.

In Boxes, 1/1½, 2/9 and 4/6.

The 2/9 boxes contain three times the quantity of the 1/1½ size.)

Of all Chemists, or Post Free for P.O. only for 1/3, 2/10, and 4/7 from the Sole Proprietors:

E. T. TOWLE & Co., Mfging. Chemists, NOTTS.

VARICOSE VEINS.

Bad Legs, etc., are completely Cured with inexpensive home treatment. It absolutely removes the pain, swelling, tiredness, and disease. Full Particulars on receipt of two stamps. S. S. Roberts, 45 Henley Road, Southsea.

TO CURE DRUNKARDS

with or without their knowledge. Send Stamp for FREE TRIAL PACKAGE of a wonderful remedy that has saved homes. Send no money. Address in confidence: WARD CHEMICAL Co., 51 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

Digitized by Google

Conducted by CYNTHIA.

[In this page are answered any letters from readers dealing with affairs of the heart, tangles in domestic life, or points of etiquette. All communications must be addressed to Miss Cynthia Hamilton, c/o the Editor of SHORT STORIES.]

Concerning the Trousseau.

No, "KITTY," the trousseau of a young lady about to be married does not include her household linen, knives and forks, antimacassars, and china, as you seem to think. The trousseau is a girl's personal equipment, those things which she requires for her own use, not for the household. At the same time, articles such as you mention are usually provided by a fond parent, though they do not come under the heading of "trousseau."

A Tact Trifle.

"HOSTESS" is at home two days during the month, and generally has a good many callers. She asks my advice as to how to tactfully get out of the following predicament: She is engaged in a very interesting conversation with one guest, when a fresh caller is announced. Should she leave off the conversation and devote herself to the new caller? While this would be strict etiquette, would it not be rather hard on the person with whom she was talking, to suddenly leave her?

* * * * *

I think a little tact would soon put the matter right. On the new guest arriving, "HOSTESS" should exchange a few well-chosen remarks, nice and to the point, should see that tea was given her, and, if possible, that she was left talking to some other guest, and then return, with an apology, to the guest with whom she was talking. To leave the latter for any length of time would be in bad taste, though only too many hostesses offend in this particular, out of supposed adherence to etiquette.

Teaching Him Manners.

"JESSIE" is in sad trouble. She recently met "FREDDIE," to whom she took a great fancy. This she told her friends. Now, "FREDDIE," though a very nice boy, has the very slightest knowledge of good manners. Whenever "JESSIE" meets him she bows very nicely, but "FREDDIE" never raises his hat. This has gone on for such a long time that "JESSIE" asks my advice as to how to convey to "FREDDIE" his proper duty when meeting a lady.

* * * * *

Let "JESSIE" go out with her brother, or cousin, or male friend, and when next they meet "FREDDIE," and she recognises him, let her request her escort to raise his hat in a very conspicuous way. If "FREDDIE" does not see from example what is the proper thing to do, then he must be lacking in intelligence as well as knowledge of good breeding, and would scarcely be a nice man for "JESSIE" to wish to cultivate.

A Lover Who Won't Write Love-Letters.

WHAT is to be done with a lover who will not write love-letters? This is the trouble of "BLUE EYES." "I have known mine for eighteen months," she writes, "but as he does not stay in the same town as I do, and his business at times takes him further away, we do not see much of each other. When he is away, he seldom writes to me, and sometimes a month has elapsed without any news of him. I have asked him about this, but he only says he has not much time, and does not like writing love-letters. He seems to love me very much, and is most affectionate and loving when we are together."

* * * * *

Many people, "BLUE EYES," dislike committing their thoughts and feelings to writing. In many cases, this is because they have not the gift. It is usually a good sign, as we know how often a love-letter is a mere essay in beautiful writing, meaning little or nothing. The most deliberate flirts write the best love-letters, and often write them to many different girls. You should take consolation in the hope that all your young man's best feelings are reserved to be poured into your ear alone.

Should He Break It Off?

"A. C. A." (Brighton) writes: "For two years I have been 'keeping company' with a young lady, and honestly I say that I really love her. For a fact, I know she also loves me, and regards me as her future husband. But my future prospects are so poor, that I cannot ask her to marry me. Shall I be doing wrong if I ask her to think no more of me, at least until such time as I shall be able to woo her again? Her parents and mine know of our engagement."

* * * * *

I do not see why you need break off the engagement. Surely, if she loves you and regards you as her future husband, she will not mind waiting until your prospects improve? In any case, tell her the whole truth about your prospects, and leave it to her to decide as she thinks best. If she wishes the engagement broken off because you are too poor, then you should do so, but not otherwise.

A Speechless Swain.

"I HAVE a very awkward affliction," writes "SOUTH AFRICAN." "I cannot keep up a conversation with ladies, and sometimes have to sit with 'my mouth stuffed with teeth,' as they call it out here, and listen. I cannot think of anything to talk about—that is to say, anything suitable to ladies' society. I am twenty-three, and have not been very much in ladies' society."

* * * * *

This is a very frequent complaint, and often affects people who are far from deficient in brains. I think it often arises from the mistaken idea that ladies expect a special brand of conversation served up to them, that the speaker must be always sparkling, or intense, or something unusual, and that unless one can shine in this way, one had better keep silent. It is not really the case. A lady likes the man in her society to talk in the way most natural to him. Little daily adventures, troubles, experiences, opinions, anything, so long as the speaker is natural, are liked. Sometimes, if the speaker cannot do anything better, he should not be ashamed to make a remark about the weather. Silly as it may seem, perhaps the lady will make some comment which will enable the gentleman to start an interesting story or discussion. I have known the most delightful conversations—sometimes blossoming into very intimate talks—spring from some such remark.

Cynthia

Printed by HORACE COX, Bream's Buildings, London, E.C., and published by C. ARTHUR PEARSON LTD., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

MISCELLANEOUS ADVERTISEMENTS.

Will be inserted in this column at the rate of 6d. per line of 8 words or part thereof. All advertisements should be addressed to Advertisement Manager, "Short Stories," 17 Henrietta Street, London, W.C., 11 days prior to date of appearance.

Pawnbroker's Sale.
Gent's magnificent 18-carat gold-cased Chronograph Stop Watch; jewelled movement; perfect timekeeper; 10 years' written warranty; also fashionable Curb (pocket to pocket) Double Albert, same quality (stamped and guaranteed), with handsome seal attached; three together sacrifice for 10/6. Approval before payment.
Lady's handsome 18-carat gold-cased Keyless Watch; jewelled movement; exact timekeeper; 10 years' warranty; also fashionable long Watch-guard, same quality (stamped and guaranteed); elegant West-end pattern; two together, 10/6; great sacrifice; approval before payment.
Fashionable Curb Chain Padlock Bracelet, 18-carat rolled gold (stamped), in handsome case, 6/6; another, heavier quality, large and thick links (stamped); sacrifice, 8/6; approval before payment.
A Bargain—8/6—Lady's real Opal and Diamond Half-hoop Ring; solid gold; Government Hall-marked; set with four real Diamonds and three matchless Opals; approval.
Field, Race, or Marine Glass, high power, military binocular 10 achromatic crystal lenses, 40 miles' range, wide field, in saddler-made sling case; sacrifice, 10/6; approval before payment.
A. DAVIS, Pawnbroker and Jeweller,
524 High Road, Chiswick, London, W.

Drunkenness Cured.—It is now within the reach of every Woman to save the drunkard. A free trial package of a marvellous home remedy posted to all who write for it. Can be given in tea, coffee, or food, thus absolutely and secretly curing the patient in a short time with or without his knowledge.—Address, in confidence, Ward Chemical Co., 130 Century House, Regent Street, London, W.

"Cecil" Lotion for beautifying the complexion. Trial bottle, post free, 2/3. Worth a guinea. Toilet list free.—Mrs. Cecil, 196F, Temple Chambers, E.C.

"Beatall" 1/3 Bargain Parcels. White, Fancy, or Best Fast Colour Cambrics for Blouses. Blouses made to ladies' own measurements, 3/11. Lists free.—Beatall, Rushden.

3/6 Boots.—1/- deposit, 6d. postage, balance by instalments; Gent's Solid Leather Lined Boots (Broad Welts); Lady's Superior Levant, Button or Lace; both warranted 12 months; cash price, 7/6, or send deposit and postage.—S. H. Dick & Co., 209 Camberwell New Road, London.

A Flower Garden for 1/-.—26 Threepenny Packets Expensive Annuals—Aster, Balsam, Canary Creeper, Columbine, Lobelia, Phlox, Everlasting Pea, Ten Weeks' Stock, &c., all different, post free, 1/1½.
52 Penny Packets for 1/-.—52 different Packets of favourite flower seed, ample supply, post free, 1/1½, all different from above. 26 packets, 7½d.
Giant Sweet Peas.—20 Packets Giant Sweet Peas; exhibition strains (gold medal); 300 Seeds, post free, 7½d.
Monster Mignonette.—Sweet-scented Trees, 5ft. high, grown easily from our Pedigree Seed. Large Packets, post free 7½d.—Imperial Supply Stores, 4 to 20 Crampton Street, Walworth, London.

7/6 Skirts.—1/- deposit, 6d. postage, balance by instalments. Smart Tailor-made Black or Navy Cloth Serge Dress Skirts, lined throughout, and effectively trimmed with Satin Strappings; cash price 6/6 or send deposit and postage.—S. H. Dick, 209 Camberwell New Road, London.

Baldness Cured. Free Trial.—A French Specialist who has devoted his life to the study of Hair Diseases, having cured thousands of almost hopeless cases, will send a genuine inexpensive treatment to all who write enclosing 2 stamps. New Hair grows in 4 to 10 days.—K. Henri-Francis, Brixton Road London.

Beautiful Irish Hand-Embroidered Tray Cloth, 1/-; ditto, Afternoon Tea Cloth, 1/9; pair Embroidered and Frilled Pillow Cases, 2/6; Pure Linen Remnants in Parcels, 2/6 and 5/-.—E. Jeffers, Cromac Square, Belfast.

Photo Post-cards of yourself, 1/6; send photo, no money; pay afterwards.—May, Enfield Terr., Seacombe.

Lace Curtains.—Maker's Stock; thousands of pairs; beautiful designs; exceptional opportunity to buy at 25 per cent. below shops; catalogue free.—Milner's, 28 Hyde Park, Leeds.

Face Leathers, superfine quality, 1/- post free, in box.—K. Henri-Frances, Brixton Road, London.

Old Artificial Teeth Bought.—Call or forward by post; full value per return, or offer made.—Messrs. O. Browning, Manufacturing Dentists, 138 Oxford Street, London. (Established 100 years.)

Field Glasses.—Extremely fine pair Regulation Glasses (Army pattern) very long (30 mile) range, purchased for officer's use in Transvaal, not now required; leather case and strap; worth 75/-; will sacrifice for 11/9; approval before payment, proof of genuineness.—F. Barker (Quartermaster), Highbury, Stockwell.

TEN DAYS' FREE TRIAL

Allowed on every cycle bought of us. Your Money with carriage charges refunded without question if not perfectly satisfactory.
Highest grade fully warranted
BRITISH MADE CYCLES
LATEST MODELS £2-10 to £6
New Departure Free Wheel and Hub Brake, Best Makes Tyres, and best British-made equipment.
200 SECOND-HAND CYCLES all makes, good as new, £1 to £2-10
Factory clearing sale at half prices.
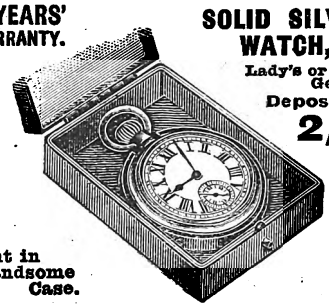
EARN A CYCLE taking orders from sample machine furnished by us. Active Agents wanted in each district. Large profits easily made. Write at once for free catalogues and our special offer.
Tyres, Sundries, Sewing Machines, Phonos half prices.
MEAD CYCLE CO. Dept. 44E,
85-97, Paradise Street, Liverpool,
19, Charing Cross Road, London, W.C.

---

5 YEARS' WARRANTY.

SOLID SILVER WATCH,
Lady's or Gent's.
Deposit, 2/6



Sent in Handsome Case.

After delivery of Watch, you send 1/6 each week for 13 weeks, making a total of 22/-. If you prefer to pay cash, within 7 days send balance of 16/- (making 18/6 in all).

Watch delivered only to responsible and bona fide applicants.

C. S. LAST & CO., 59 Oxford St., London, W.

TELL COOK
KEATING'S POWDER
KILLS
BLACK BEETLES
Tins Only 3½ 6½ & 1/-

FREEMAN'S
TRADE MARK
THE ORIGINAL & ONLY TRUE
CHLORODYNE
Best Remedy for Coughs, Colds, Asthma, Bronchitis, etc.
Of all Chemists, 1s. 1½d., 2s. 9d., 4s. 6d., and 6s., or postage free by the INVENTOR, R. FREEMAN, 70 KENNINGTON PARK ROAD, LONDON, S.E.
RECOMMENDED BY MEDICAL MEN.
N.B.—Lord Chancellor Selborne, Lord Justices James and Mellish, decided in favour of Freeman's Original Chlorodyne, and against Browne & Davenport, compelling them to pay all costs.
—"Times," 24-7-73.

A Good Cycle

At a FAIR price is cheaper than a poor Cycle at ANY price. Buy the best and avoid risks.
CENTAURS," "COVENTRY CHALLENGE," "HUMBERS," "PREMIERS," "ROVERS," "SWIFTS," SINGERS," &c.
Their names guarantee their quality.

WITHIN YOUR REACH
FROM 8/- MONTHLY.
A HIGH-GRADE COVENTRY CYCLE FOR £6
On approval. Two Years' Warranty.
Write for Lists (Free).
EDWARD O'BRIEN Ltd. (Dept. S3),
World's Largest Cycle Dealers, COVENTRY.

Ask your grocer for

EPPS'S
(The most nutritious)
COCOA
And take no other.

JUNO CYCLES
ARE THE VERY BEST
FOR LADIES AND GENTLEMEN
Complete with All Fittings and Carriage Paid.
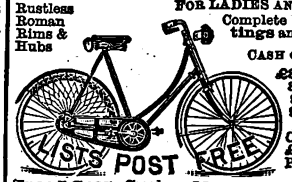
CASH OR 12 MONTHLY PAYMENTS of
£3 0 0 „ 15/- ea.
3 8 0 „ 15/10 „
3 9 0 „ 16/8 „
3 10 0 „ 17/6 „
JUNO Motor Cycles, 3 H.P., £34, or Monthly Payments.

Rustless Roman Rims & Hubs



JUNO Two-Speed Gear Cycles £12 12s., or 12 Payments of 23/4 each. Write for New Season's List of JUNO Cycles and Accessories; over 130 pages and Hundreds of Illustrations, sent post free.
Metropolitan Machinists' Co. Ltd., S.S. Dept.,
75 Bishopsgate Street Without, London, E.C.; and Piccadilly Circus, London, W.

Parts I. to VI. NOW READY.
Part VII. Ready April 27th.

Pearson's . . Home . . . . Management.

EDITED by "ISOBEL" of "HOME NOTES."

Containing Contributions by all the leading Authorities on Cookery, Housekeeping and Domestic Economy.

Each part contains Six full-page Illustrations (one Coloured.)

Price 7d. Net. per part.

To be completed in 12 FORTNIGHTLY PARTS.

At all Newsagents and Railway Bookstalls.

A Specimen Copy of Part I. will be sent on receipt of 7 stamps from the Publisher, C. ARTHUR PEARSON Ltd., Henrietta St., London, W.C.

Digitized by Google

ANÆMIA AND SKIN ERUPTIONS.

I HAD NO LIFE IN ME

PALE FACE, pale gums, loss of appetite, weakness, palpitation after slight effort, breathlessness, a constant tired feeling, and sometimes fainting. These signs spell Anæmia. A certain cure is a course of Bile Beans. Anæmia is a woman's complaint. Bile Beans are a woman's medicine. Anæmia is really deficiency in quality of the blood, due to deficient action of the liver and digestive system. Bile Beans correct all irregularities and weaknesses of the liver and stomach. In doing so they cure Anæmia. This is illustrated in the case of Miss A. Thomlinson, of Eliza Ann Street, Rochdale Road, Manchester. "I had no life in me," said Miss Thomlinson to a Manchester Chronicle reporter. "My blood seemed to have turned into water, and the colour of my skin was almost green. I was more dead than alive, and I could not possibly have kept my place had it not been for the willing assistance of my companions, who lost no opportunity of helping me in my work. I began to loathe my food; it was labour for me to stand up, and my face became disfigured with dark red spots, as large as a sixpence. I kept taking the prescription of my medical attendant with little relief. I went to Blackpool for a week, and the change did me a little good, but after I came back home I was as bad as ever. Work was now out of the question, and my face became so bad with the blotches that I was ashamed to go into the street. The languor was so overpowering and the shortness of breath so distressing that I thought the end must be very near.

"At this time Bile Beans were brought under my notice, and I sent for some. The first box did me some good, so I bought more. Slowly the disfigurement disappeared, my appetite returned, and my blood became richer I persevered with the medicine, and I steadily regained my strength, until I was well and hearty and delighted in my work. My recovery is solely due to Bile Beans. They have restored me when at death's door, and I shall never cease to be grateful to them for my cure."

BILE BEANS FOR BILIOUSNESS

are the safest family medicine, and a speedy and permanent cure for Headache, Constipation, Piles, Colds, Bad Breath, Indigestion, Flatulence, Loss of Appetite, Sleeplessness, Dizziness, Buzzing in the Head, Blood Impurities, Pimples, Skin Eruptions, Spring Ailments, Debility, Anæmia, and all Female Ailments. Of all Medicine Vendors, or post free from the Bile Bean Co., 4 Redcross Street, London, E.C., on receipt of price 1s. 1½d., or large family size, 2s. 9d. (2s. 9d. size contains three times 1s. 1½d.)

FREE SAMPLE BOX.

All may test Bile Beans absolutely free of cost by applying for a sample box and enclosing a penny stamp for return postage. Address such requests to the Bile Bean Co.'s Central Depot, Leeds.

FREE MEDICAL ADVICE.

A fully-qualified medical staff deals carefully and confidentially with all requests for medical advice. In writing mark your envelope "Private," and address Medical Department, Bile Bean Co., Leeds.

BILE BEANS FOR BILIOUSNESS

Digitized by Google

SHORT STORIES

Down, down the stairs he rushed! He did not see the abyss at his very feet, and Lucilla was powerless to utter a warning cry.

(A Thrilling Episode from the Dramatic Story, "The Sins of the Fathers." See inside.)

No. 800. Week ending April 30, 1904.] [PRICE ONE PENNY.

Digitized by Google

. . . You'll want a . . .

KODAK

. . . . for your Holidays. . . .

Kodak N.C. (Non-Curling and Orthochromatic) Film

To put in it.

Kodak New Developing Machine

To develop your Exposures on the spot.

Kodak Self-Toning Paper

To Print your results on.

WITH THIS COMBINATION THERE IS NO CHANCE OF FAILURE.

Ask for the Kodak Catalogue. Of any leading Dealer, or of

KODAK Ltd., 41-43 Clerkenwell Road, London, E.C., & Branches

J.G.GRAVES'

TOOLS AND MACHINERY.

Send for ILLUSTRATED CATALOGUE of TOOLS for ALL TRADES; or for MACHINERY CATALOGUE. Machinery of every description. Approval before purchase. Terms to suit customers' own convenience.

Agents Wanted. Good Pay. No Responsibility.

J. G. GRAVES, 169 Division St., SHEFFIELD.

GIVEN AWAY

with next week's

HOME NOTES

(No. 538)

A PAPER PATTERN of this

BLOUSE with CAPE

Of all Bookstalls and Newsagents

PRICE ONE PENNY.

WORTH A GUINEA A BOX.

BEECHAM'S PILLS.

Nothing has been found to equal them as a general restorative and renovator of the human system. Bear in mind that BEECHAM'S PILLS will do what is claimed for them because—they are a special preparation of purely vegetable extracts, highly concentrated, finely balanced, and carefully compounded to suit the needs of the generality of men and women.

THEY CURE DISEASE BY REMOVING THE CAUSE OF IT.

Sold everywhere in Boxes, price 1/1½ (56 Pills) and 2/9 (168 Pills).

ONE DOSE of

Kaputine cures in Ten minutes the most violent Headache or Neuralgic Pain no matter what the cause of the attack.

KAPUTINE is not an aperient, but is for one purpose only—to cure Headache and Neuralgia.

KAPUTINE

Cures in Ten Minutes.

Kaputine goes right to the seat of the trouble—the Nerves—it puts the Nerves right, that is why it cures almost instantly

Headache or Neuralgia.

Refuse dangerous white Headache Powders, such as have been condemned by the press. Demand Kaputine, the remedy that is backed up by medical testimony—the Safe Remedy.

Packets of 18 doses 1s.; Samples 1d. each. Of all Medicine Dealers.

Samples Free from Proprietors:

C. G. Kaputine, Huddersfield.

Advertisements should be sent to "Short Stories" Advertisement Department, Henrietta Street, London, W.C.

28·4·1904 LIBRARY

Digitized by Google

Short Stories

No. 800.] [One Penny.

For the Week Ending April 30th, 1904.

THE SINS OF THE FATHERS.

The Tale of a Deep-Laid Scheme of Revenge.

Containing the incident depicted on the cover.

The night was very dark. Even the feeble light of the crescent moon had been blotted out by great, grim masses of black cloud—sure heralds of the coming storm. The salt sea whispered weirdly, and the narrow strip of foreshore that separated it from the great cliffs hard by scarce showed the silver of its fine sand through the all-pervading darkness. Under the cliff stood a knot of men, talking in earnest whispers, and with heads close together. The deep, awesome stillness that heralds a storm made it expedient that their voices should be low. For the work they had to do demanded caution.

"They're late in coming," muttered the leader of the party. "Surely my information was correct."

He peered out to sea—a dark, determined face, with black eyes and square chin. But neither sight nor sound reached him. Minute after minute sped by, and still no sign of that for which they waited. But Preventive Officers were used to long night watches in those days, and Luke Rutherford and his men were regarded as one of the most vigilant and determined little bands along the coast.

A soft plash of muffled oars, followed by the sharp grate of a boat's keel upon the dark shore told the watchers their work was at hand. Each man looked to his weapons. There was a flash in the black eyes of Luke Rutherford that was not wholly due to his zeal in the service of King and Country. Another force was stirring within him to-night—a hope he dared not breathe to living man. Setting his teeth, he bade his men wait the signal of his first shot, and moved stealthily out from the black shadow of the overhanging cliff.

Four dark figures were bending low over the boat. No word was spoken. No sound broke the ominous stillness of the night.

As each figure rose erect some huge cask or bundle was lifted from the boat. But as yet no man moved. Each waited till his fellows had lifted their burdens from the boat.

Nearer and nearer crept Luke Rutherford, straining his eyes to catch a glimpse of the men as their faces showed through the brooding blackness. There was but one face of the four for which his dark eyes sought hungrily, greedily, revengefully.

Presently he saw it, and deliberately lifted his weapon to his shoulder. There was a flash, a cry of alarm from the surprised smugglers, an answering cry from the little band of Preventives in the dark shadow of the cliff, and—confusion!

Resistance was useless. The smugglers fled over the sand, pursued by the eager officers of the law, and amid a rattle of shots from the latter's rifles.

But Luke Rutherford remained behind. He had other work to do—work that was deadly, dastardly, fiendish—and he meant to do it.

Stepping down to the boat's side, he knelt on the dark sand by the prostrate figure of a man—the man he had shot. A bullet wound was in his chest—a wound that might or might not have been fatal. It was that doubt which Luke Rutherford meant to decide.

"Well," said he grimly, "so the time has come at last, Sam Snow! I warned you it would come."

The wounded man opened his eyes. He was a handsome young fellow, with a certain air of dash and recklessness that had won him the open admiration of many a fair inhabitant of Greycliffe. Even now, lying between life and death, the sound of a light laugh trembled on his lips.

"Oh, it's the fortune of the game," he said gaily, though the wound in his breast gave him great pain. "Besides, it mayn't be my last cargo after all, you know. I don't think it's incurable."

Luke Rutherford was reloading his gun. When he had finished, he let his eyes wander furtively around him. Finally they came back to the man on the sand.

"I'm going to make sure of that," he said hoarsely, and stood upright, his loaded weapon pointed at the man's heart.

Samuel Snow uttered an involuntary exclamation.

"In cold blood?" he gasped.

Luke Rutherford nodded.

"You hound!" muttered the helpless wretch. "Surely the law is satisfied!"

"Yes. But I am not."

"You!"

"Yes—I. For more than a year we two have had a hard and bitter fight for the love of Lucy Langton, and at last she has chosen you. I have never been thwarted in my life, and I will not be now."

There was a quick flash in the darkness, and the life of Samuel Snow, gay, careless, reckless, defiant, went out to meet the coming storm. Luke Rutherford moved away to meet the returning officers.

All rights reserved.]

Digitized by Google

"I can easily account for the second shot," he muttered, "by affirming that he tried to stab me. He had a knife in his hand."

As he disappeared a dark form rose from the sand on the other side of the boat. It was the figure of a man, and came cautiously round and knelt down by the body of the dead man.

"So he killed my brother in cold blood!" he muttered hoarsely. "Well, his reckoning shall come too. And if my vengeance falls not on him, it shall fall upon his children in the time to come. It's lucky I dropped down unseen by the side of the boat, or this deed might have gone unrequited. Oh, that I had had a weapon with which to strike him to the earth in his cold-blooded, murderous purpose! But he shall pay the penalty. And if I find no way to avenge you, my brother, I will teach my sons to hate his sons, till some time the day of reckoning will come and you shall be avenged."

The sound of voices reached his ears and he crept stealthily away over the dark sand and was lost to view.

* * * * * * *

David Snow, house and estate agent in the town of Greycliffe, sat moodily gazing into the fire that blazed on the broad hearth in his well-furnished sitting-room. He was a prosperous-looking, middle-aged man—dark almost to swarthiness, and with a vague indication of something in his clean-shaven face that made him feared rather than loved.

The door opened and his son entered the room. A greater contrast could not have been imagined than was presented by these two. For Sydney Snow was fair, with frank, open brow and clear blue eyes. His cheery, genial smile was as ready as his quick wit and gaiety of heart. But to-day the world had gone awry, and a shadow saddened the generally genial face. His father noted the look and rallied him upon the fact.

"Why so sad, Sydney?" he said banteringly. "If I didn't know you better, lad, I should imagine you had been crossed in love."

Sydney threw himself into a chair.

"You've hit it!" he said, with an attempt at a laugh. "That's just the trouble. And the worst of it is, there's no help for it."

David Snow started. There was a queer light in his dark eyes that was not intelligible to his son.

"Who's the girl?" he asked shortly.

Sydney hesitated for just one moment. Then he answered the question.

"Lucilla Merton."

He was looking out of the window now, and did not see that the look on his father's face had deepened to an expression of bitterest hatred. And when he turned his head again the look had vanished.

"Ah," murmured David Snow, and the ejaculation seemed to come from between set teeth. "The fair guest of Mrs. Rutherford and her son Rex. Blows the wind in that quarter, my son? Well, I'm sorry. But don't despair."

Sydney made a wry face.

"That's the worst of it," he said, affecting a carelessness of tone he did not feel. "It's Rex Rutherford who has cut me out."

David Snow's dark face was now well under control.

"Quite so," he said coolly. "It's not the first occasion of the two families coming into collision. My uncle Samuel and his grandfather were rivals. The former was a smuggler, the latter a Preventive Officer, and—well, my uncle was accidentally shot one dark night down by the shore. My father was present, and he related the incident so graphically to me on his death-bed that I have never forgotten it. So once more the old rivalry springs up, and the feud is renewed! Truly history repeats itself."

He rose from his seat and laid his hand affectionately on his son's shoulder. The hand was firm and steady as a rock.

"Don't lose heart," he counselled. "There's many a slip 'twixt the cup and the lip, you know."

But Sydney found little comfort in the old adage, and, turning abruptly, he left the room. His father watched him as he went out. When the door had closed, his face again darkened, till its aspect was truly terrible.

"Not yet," he muttered, "not yet is the murder of my uncle avenged! But the hour is drawing near. I have waited—waited to see if I were destined to mete out justice to his race—the race of that cold-blooded murderer, Luke Rutherford. And Fate is answering me. Upon me the duty devolves. This rivalry is but a trivial thing, but a straw shows which way the wind blows. It is not for my son—though God knows how dear he is to me—that I take this duty to myself.

"My father made me swear that, should Fortune favour me and circumstances lead me on, I would avenge the murder of his dead brother. And now—now—all things point to the execution of that vengeance. I have plotted for it—schemed and worked to bring it about.

"The trump card is now in my hand. For Rex Rutherford and his mother live in the very house wherein my father and his men were wont to conceal their contraband goods. He deemed me a fool for letting the house so cheap. But he little dreams how significant was the apparently benevolent smile with which I answered his unspoken surprise."

He was smiling now. But the smile was not indicative of benevolence. The black eyes were flashing, the swarthy face dark with revengeful menace. But the white, strong hands were steady and firm. It was clear that, once imbued with a set resolve, David Snow was not the man to waver or falter in fulfilling that purpose to the very uttermost.

* * * * * * *

The Rutherfords were at breakfast. The household was a small one, consisting only of mother and son. Lucilla Merton was their guest, and Sydney Snow's suspicion that she was not wholly indifferent to handsome Rex Rutherford was not very wide of the truth.

Mrs. Rutherford was the daughter of the famous Preventive Officer. She had married a cousin, thereby retaining her name, but was now a widow. Rex was her only son, and she loved him with all a mother's fondness. Her eyes were not shut to the secret of the two young people—a secret which, as yet, had not been verbally confessed—and the knowledge pleased her not a little. For she loved this sweet girl almost as dearly as she did her own son, while Lucilla warmly reciprocated the feeling.

"Where are you young people going this morning?" inquired Mrs. Rutherford, beaming upon them in turn. "It is such a bright, sunny day that it seems positively sinful to remain indoors."

"Then why not come with us?" asked Rex.

But Mrs. Rutherford shook her head. Her intuitive sense of perception advised her to decline that pleasure.

"No," she said decisively, "I have so many things to do."

Lucilla looked up.

"Then let me stay and help you," she said.

But Mrs. Rutherford only smiled and shook her head.

"My dear," she said, "when you are as old as I am, you will have discovered that you cannot intrust certain little domestic tasks to the care of even the dearest friend in the world. It is the ultra-preciseness of mature years—and—and it is silly—silly and conceited. Yet there it is, and what is one to do ? "

Digitized by Google

She sighed with a comic assumption of injury, at which both Rex and Lucilla laughed.

"Well," said Rex, as the two ladies rose from the table, "I thought of taking Miss Merton to see the ruins of Dane's Castle. The drive will be delightful."

He turned inquiringly to Lucilla.

"Oh, that will be lovely ! " she said enthusiastically. "I have often wanted to see the old castle."

So Rex went off to see about the dog-cart, and in less than a quarter of an hour he was round at the front door, the reins in his hand, waiting for her to come out. She looked very sweet and charming as she stood on the steps by the side of his mother. One little foot on the step of the dog-cart, one little hand tightly clasped in his, and she was up on the seat beside him. His mother was smiling at them as they drove away, and the soft Spring air fanned their faces with its perfumed breath.

The drive was a long one, yet all too short. And when it ended, they wandered among the old, time-worn ruins and let their recollections glide back to old historic days, when the now crumbling castle was tall and stately and impregnable. But when they left the ruins and wandered out among the shady woods the present came back to them anew, and they looked into each other's eyes. The look was a revelation to both, and Rex stood still.

"Lucilla," he whispered, "is it possible ? Is there any hope for me ? Will you be my wife ? "

And Lucilla's eyes drooped as she breathed the answer :

"Yes."

Rex took her two hands and pressed them to his lips.

"Oh ! " he whispered rapturously. "And I thought you were getting to care for Mr. Snow ! "

Lucilla smiled.

"He was not so short-sighted," she said. "He is a nice young fellow, and I like him very much—as a friend. But ——" And once more she lifted those eloquent eyes to his face.

"And you loved me all the time ? " he persisted, drawing her nearer to him under the great shady trees.

Lucilla pouted.

"You are very inquisitive, sir," she said.

But Rex had caught her in his arms and was raining kisses on the red, ripe lips.

"If only you love me one half as dearly as I do you," he said passionately, "I shall be more than content."

It was dusk when the dog-cart took them home to Greycliffe. And once more the drive was long, yet tantalisingly short. For time flies quickly when love is near.

* * * * * * *

Once more the night was very dark. The lapse of sixty years had made no appreciable difference to sea or cliff. But to-night the wind was high and the rain descending in hissing sheets that mingled with the salt spray of the broken white surf and dashed against the rocky walls of Greycliffe. It was a night to seek the shelter of one's own fireside.

Yet one was out in that whirling tempest of wind and sea and rain—a man, fighting the elements, and groping his way along the dark wall of the cliff. Ever and anon he paused and touched with his hand the black rock beside him, as though searching in the dense darkness for something he knew to be there.

At last he touched a great square ledge, upon the soil of which grew a few stunted tufts of grass. The cliff was less perpendicular here, and he mounted the ledge, with his face to the wall, and felt still farther up for a projecting spur of rock. Finding it, he put forth all his strength and drew himself up by it till again his free hand touched something in the cliff side. An iron ring this time, concealed by rank grasses, and once more he drew himself up. Not without care had he studied the old map of the cliff handed down to him by his father.

Sixty years before many had whispered that the Greycliffe smugglers carried their contraband wares to a great cave in the cliff side. But none had ever discovered it, and the rumour had been discredited. But the cave did exist, and David Snow knew the track by which it might be reached.

Slowly and painfully he toiled up the steep cliff side, his hands bleeding, his breath coming in long, laboured gasps. For the lapse of years had made the access almost impracticable, and several of the cunningly concealed stepping-stones had been worn away. Still on he toiled, till he was some sixty feet above the sand below.

The face of the cliff at this point was jagged and torn. Great rocks projected out in shapeless confusion. Some were almost hidden from view by others set before them, and towards this mass of rock David Snow was steering. At length he reached it, and, lifting himself suddenly up, dropped among the rocks and disappeared.

"It's work for a Hercules ! " he said under his breath, as he groped with his hands among the débris between the great black rocks. "But I'm on the right track now ! "

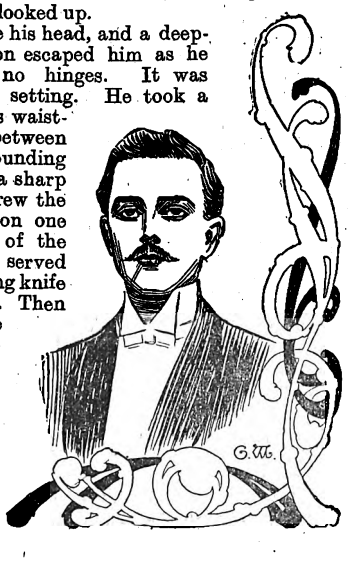
As he spoke, he lifted a square boulder from a hole in the ground—then another, and another, till a dark chasm opened at his very feet. Without a moment's hesitation he let his feet slip down this abyss. His faith in the veracity of his fathers left nothing to be desired.

A drop of ten feet brought him to the bottom, and he instantly kindled a small lantern which he had brought for that purpose. A narrow tunnel or cutting ran through the cliff and away from the sea. It was very shallow and he had to stoop to traverse it. The air, too, was fœtid, and once or twice he was almost overpowered. But he took a pull at the flask in his pocket, and, saturating a handkerchief with the spirit, he tied it over his mouth and nostrils.

On he went through the heart of the great cliff, till he stood under the town itself. The houses of the inhabitants were above him, and a grim smile crossed his dark face as he thought of them, asleep in their beds, and wondered as to what they would think could they but see him, the prosperous landowner, torn and bleeding, deep down beneath their very feet. Still on he toiled, holding his dark lantern high against the roof of the tunnel, till a great square hole opened above his head and he knew that his journey was now almost accomplished.

Extinguishing the light of his lantern, he returned it to his pocket and felt round the great hole above him for what he knew should be there. Yes, there it was—a roughly-constructed ladder of iron piping set in the wall of the well. Lifting himself up, he set his foot on the first rung. It stood his weight, and he began to mount. The rungs were far apart, and he counted them as he ascended. Eighty-two ! The ladder ended and he looked up.

A trap-door was above his head, and a deep-drawn sigh of satisfaction escaped him as he saw it. There were no hinges. It was simply dropped into its setting. He took a long, keen knife from his waist-belt, and thrust it up between the trap and the surrounding woodwork. There was a sharp rasping sound, and he drew the knife along the crack on one side of the trap. Two of the three remaining sides he served in a similar manner, his long knife rasping sharply as it went. Then he put one hand to the trap and pushed vigorously. It yielded, and, gripping the floor into which it had been set, he lifted himself up, taking care that the displaced trap should make no noise.



One violent effort, and he stood upon his feet.

Digitized by Google

It was dark, terribly dark. Yet he knew well where he was. He was standing at the foot of the stairs in the hall of Mrs. Rutherford's house—the house of the smugglers, which he had let to Rex Rutherford at so ridiculously low a rental. The hall had been covered with stout linoleum at his own expense before the Rutherfords had taken possession of the house, and through this his long, keen knife had cut its way.

* * * * * * *

Lucilla Merton awoke with a start. A vague premonition of impending disaster caused her to sit upright in bed. The room was in darkness. No sound was to be heard save the tumult of the storm without. The household were asleep, and all was silent and still.

Yet something had seemed to rouse her from sleep and warn her of coming danger. What was that? She caught her breath and listened. A sharp, scraping, rasping sound in the hall below.

For a moment she hesitated, debating as to what she should do. The noise might be nothing, and she was loth to arouse Rex for fear this should be the case. He had a horror of the unduly-timid, ultra-nervous, hysterical sort of woman, and Lucilla had never been guilty of cowardice in her life.

Slipping noiselessly to the floor, she first lit the gas-jet in her room and then attired herself in dressing-gown and slippers. She would go quietly down to the hall and see if anything were amiss. She was not afraid of the dark, so took no light, and went softly down the winding stairs to the hall below. She heard no one stirring as she descended.

But someone was waiting for her—waiting in the dense darkness that hid her from view.

David Snow was standing by the hole in the floor, his foot on the lowermost stair. His quick ear had caught the sound of slippered feet on the stairs above. The footfall was a woman's—of that he was sure. What should he do? It might be Lucilla. If so, he must not harm her for his son's sake. Had she heard him? He frowned angrily as he saw all his plans thus complicated. Ten short minutes and he would have been in Rex Rutherford's room. And another knife, longer and keener than the one he had as yet used, would have descended over his victim's heart, and thus the murder of Samuel Snow would have been avenged.

Even now he must do it. But he must dispose of the girl first.

Nearer and nearer she came. He put out his arms. One step more, and she would have gone headlong into that yawning abyss. But his right arm was about her waist, his left hand pressed tightly over her mouth. To struggle in so firm a grip was futile.

With scarcely a sound he carried her along the hall, and, still with one hand upon her mouth, laid her upon the floor. Then he searched through his pockets and produced some cord which he had brought in case of emergency.

The girl was struggling violently, but he put all his weight upon her and she sank back exhausted. Then, in a flash, he slipped the handkerchief from his own mouth and bound it tightly round hers. Next came the two arms, which were even now striking at him in a frantic, desperate struggle for freedom. Close under the elbows he bound them, passing the cord round her slim waist. Lastly he bound the two ankles tightly together, winding the ends of the cord round the base of a great old-fashioned umbrella-stand that was screwed to the wall, so that she could not rise or even crawl across the floor.

All this was done in absolute darkness, and Lucilla knew nothing concerning her assailant.

In a vague sort of way, she attributed the presence of the unknown to motives of robbery. And she could give no warning to her lover! The thought maddened her, and she made one more desperate fight for liberty. The handkerchief slipped from her mouth. A cry was on her lips. But its utterance was checked almost instantly, and the handkerchief was drawn with painful tightness about the bloodless lips.

But that half-uttered cry had not passed unheard. The sound of a door opening in a room above caught the ear of David Snow. A few moments' breathless suspense and he heard another foot upon the stair. It was a man's this time, and the light of a candle flickered above his head. What should he do?

Reviling his ill-luck, he slipped his feet down upon the topmost rung of the pipe ladder in the well. Down, down he went, rung after rung, till he was out of reach of that approaching light.

Then he stopped and peered upwards to the mouth of the well, waiting, waiting, for what?

Rex Rutherford was turning the last bend in the stairs. In an instant his eye lit on the figure of Lucilla, bound and gagged, in the hall below.

With a cry of horror and alarm, he plunged forward.

Lucilla strove wildly to cry to him to stop ere it was too late.

Down, down he came, the abyss he did not see yawning at his very feet.

Lucilla's blood froze with horror, but she was powerless. One step—a cry—and Rex Rutherford went hurtling down the gaping well into the smugglers' tunnel.

But he did not go alone. He who openly defies the mandate of God and metes out vengeance to whom he will is in danger of a similar judgment.

Cold and grey dawned the morning. And when at last poor Lucilla Merton was found and rescued, the chilly horror of the long, dark silence that had preceded the dawn had bereft her of consciousness. But grief and misery do not long remain in abeyance. Strong, rough-mannered men shrank back in horror at the story she had to tell. Slowly they descended the yawning hole in the floor of the hall. It seemed an age ere they reappeared; and when they came they led her away, that she might not see their ghastly burdens. But later she slipped upstairs and entered the darkened room that Rex had left but a few short hours before. There he lay, his face so pale in its last, long sleep, yet with a smile upon it, as though a glimpse of futurity had been vouchsafed him ere he died. Mrs. Rutherford was sitting by the bed, her eyes swimming with tears. But at sight of Lucilla she rose, and drew the girl's head down upon her shoulder.

"My poor child!" she whispered brokenly. "We have naught in all the world now but each other."

Lucilla's lip quivered.

"God's will be done!" she murmured. "But it is so hard—so very, very hard, for—I—loved him so!"

So they comforted each other, there in the presence of the dead, whom both had loved.

And afterwards? Ah, that rests with the future! Sydney Snow, frank, kindly, generous to a degree, had also passed through the dark waters of tribulation. His father's purpose came home to him in a flash, and the shock sent him staggering to his room like a drunken man. But the years are passing, and time is patching up the wound it can never quite heal. Lucilla still calls him her friend, for her intimacy with him is not diminished because of his father's sin. The sins of the fathers have been visited upon the children. All the old hatred is dead. And who knows? It is better to love than to hate.

Walter J. Mowbray.

Digitized by Google

That Obstinate Juror. . .

Telling how he Scored in the End.

A somewhat humble cottage in Canada it was, but picturesque, with odd little porches and with the spray of purple clematis clinging about them, where the butterflies all day long loved to unfurl their silken wings. In the little garden tall spires of scarlet hollyhocks stood up in brave ranks, and the grass was bordered thick with violets in the Springtime.

Mrs. Gordon felt very happy on this sunny June afternoon. It was the anniversary of her wedding day, and memory went back to that bright epoch in her life. She saw herself—a slim girl in her white dress—standing up before the altar, uttering with a very quick-beating heart the vows that made her John Gordon's wife.

"They always speak of happy brides," she thought, "but what was that happiness to what I feel now that I have tested and tried his love for six years? Dear John! He was my ideal then; now I know him to be the truest and best—a heart for mine to lean and rest upon.

And the little woman went about her task of gathering flowers to decorate her rooms for the day with infinite content.

She was not going to celebrate it by inviting anyone. Oh, no! It would be much happier for them to be alone with the little ones, to talk over old times, to sing the old songs, to recall the dreary days before they had met—were not all days alike dreary before that sweet time? To build castles for the future, to thank God at last for His infinite mercy, and beg His blessing on the days to come.

So little Mrs. Gordon, a very pretty woman—indeed, more lovely, John thought, than the slim girl who stood by him that day at the altar—danced about the house like a child, as she made it look as gay as possible for the festive occasion.

Aunt Zeph, who rejoiced in the festive name of Zephyrina, looked in, with an excessively gay turban on her woolly head. She had nursed Mrs. Gordon as a child, and felt like one of the family.

"Dat's a splendenferos flower-show, Miss Ju," she said, showing her white teeth; "but what I wants to talk to you 'bout is dem dar chicken. Did I understand you to say you wanted dem dar chicken boiled?"

"Well, won't that be nice?" asked Mrs. Gordon, absently regarding the damask roses she held in her hand.

"What, libed under my cookin' so long, Miss Ju, and talk o' boiling little young chickens—innercent little babies like dem!"

"All right, just as you like."

"Roasting is the properest manner o' cookin' tender young chickens, Miss Ju—and 'pears like you never would take any weight an' 'sponsibility. Here I's bin a strivin' dis six years to put dat ar gumption inter you—which is becomin' to your new sphere of action—an' now you talk of boiling. Go away."

"Well, you know, Aunt Zeph, I never shall learn while you rule—and no one can beat you."

"Humph! I reckon not. Dem chickens will be roasted—I know what Marse John likes."

"I believe it was your roasted chickens that captivated him," laughed Mrs. Gordon; "he knew if he married me he would secure you, and he couldn't do that in any other way."

Aunt Zeph looked very knowing, but a broad smile illumined her face.

"'Spec' he wasn't blind to the adwantages of de persition," she said. "Takin' you and me together, Miss Ju—we'se hard to beat."

And then, with a self-satisfied laugh, she left the room to superintend the cooking of the chickens.

Mrs. Gordon looked at the clock—her husband was late.

"And he said he'd be early this afternoon, so that we could take a long, lingering walk—a lover's walk," she said, with a little pout of the fresh red lips; "but, then, it's the anniversary of Mr. Ridgewell, too—the manager of the bank; perhaps there is some extra work, and John is always so obliging. They have been married twenty-five years. I wonder if we shall love each other after such a long time as well as now. But why not better?—and then Lil will be a woman and married perhaps, and little Max will have gone out into the world to fight his own battles—both my little nestlings flown. Oh, I can't bear to think of it! Why, there's John!"

Yes, John was coming down the garden-walk, and she sprang out to meet him. But before she reached him she noticed a troubled look on his face.

"You have not got a holiday face on," she said. "Now you must look exactly as happy as you did six years ago when you came for me."

"Must I?" with an effort at a smile.

"Something has happened, John," she said, nestling up to him, and putting her hands on his arm.

"Yes, my darling; the safe was opened last night and the bank robbed of ten thousand pounds."

"Oh, John, how dreadful! But don't let that spoil our evening. We can't help it."

"No, but——"

"But what? Have I not broken you yet, in all these six years, of stopping in the middle of a sentence?"

"I was going to say that—— How can I tell you, dear, you look so happy?"

"I shall be miserable now till you tell me."

"Well, you know there are two keys to the safe. I have one—Mr. Ridgewell the other."

"Yes."

"The natural inference is that one of those keys must have been used."

Digitized by Google

"Well?" exclaimed the little wife, still blind to the drift of the thing.

"Of course, no one believes Mr. Ridgewell robbed his own bank, so, you see, the inference will be——"

The soft bloom paled on Mrs. Gordon's cheek, and she clasped her husband's arm as if she were afraid of falling.

"It can't be—that they suspect you?"

"I think so," faltered John Gordon, with some bitterness. "I fancied men looked askance at me as I came home. Mr. Ridgewell said, pointedly, before them all:

"'There are two keys. I suppose no one suspects me of the robbery?' and then there was a storm of negatives. I said, 'I have nothing to go on but my good name. I hope no one believes I am a thief?' And, oh, Juliet, I shall never suffer more, not even if it comes to going to prison, than I did during that dreadful moment while I waited for someone to speak up for me! There was a silence, and then someone said, 'It looks very black.' I almost expected to be arrested on the spot."

"Oh, John, I cannot bear it—on our wedding day, too," sobbed his wife.

"Yes, and it is his wedding-day also. I saw that they were making great preparations as I came past."

"You do not suspect him?"

"Certainly not; it is a mystery; it might have been opened with a false key."

Little Lil came in, splendid in blue ribbons and embroidery.

"Mamma, mamma!" she cried, "must Max catch a bee to get his honeycomb, and does he wear his honeycomb on his head, mamma?"

"No, no! Tell him not to touch a bee. It will sting him!" exclaimed Mrs. Gordon.

John had gone on to the flowery porch, and sat down with a glance at the little paradise where trouble and sorrow had never yet entered.

As he looked he saw it entering now. Through the little white gate came the village constable, Phil Weatherby, in a very reluctant manner.

He came towards the little vine-wreathed porch deprecatingly. He was a good friend, and never hated his business as he hated it at this moment.

He could not speak.

"Am I sent for?" asked John; and at the words his wife sprang to his side with a cry.

Weatherby touched his helmet to the lady.

"It's the worst job I ever did," he said. "I'd rather anyone would knock me down; but the plain fact is that you're accused of the Westport Bank robbery, and I've got to arrost you."

"All right, Weatherby; I know you're a friend," said John calmly.

His wife was sobbing and clinging to him.

"Don't, my love, don't!" he whispered. "You believe in God. Try to have faith that He will bring out my innocence."

Aunt Zeph now appeared with an important air.

"Dem ar chickens is jes' done to a turn, and dar's no sense in waitin' another minute, or dey'll spile."

"Oh, John, come and eat something! You have been gone all day."

John looked at the constable.

"Come," he said, "you can keep me in sight."

"There's no objection," said Weatherby, looking as if he would be glad to escape through a knot-hole.

"Won't you take something with us?" faltered Mrs. Gordon.

"'Twould choke me to death!" exclaimed the rough man, whose heart was in the right place

No one ate anything. John had merely agreed to go through the form for the sake of his wife, and to put off the evil moment of his leaving her; but, like all evil moments, it came at last.

The constable felt an uncomfortable dimness in his eyes when, after a close embrace, John Gordon put his half-fainting wife down on a sofa and turned to go with him.

"The law's a cruel thing," he said.

"Yes—and blind!" answered John Gordon, bitterly; "for a man's whole life counts for nothing."

* * * *

It was noon on the first of July—a hot, sultry noon, in the little bare, white-washed room to which the jury had withdrawn to settle the verdict. The men looked at one another as they came in.

"It's only a form," said one. "I reckon we're all of one mind. It wouldn't have looked well not to have come out at all."

"Yes, 'twon't take long," said another. "Let's take a ballot."

"Hullo," said the spokesman of the party, John Sawyer, a tall, lank, patent-medicine man, "here's a go. Well, Mr. Barton, ef you kin say 'not guilty' in the face of all that evidence, then the English language ain't got no meanin' for you."

Frank Barton smiled quietly. He was the only gentleman of the party, and was regarded with a little envy accordingly. He was also engaged to Ethel Ridgewell, the bank manager's only daughter. Still, on the jury he only counted one, and his vote was no better than another.

"Would you like me jest to give you a sighnopsis of them there argyments?" said Sawyer, edging up to the recalcitrant juror. "Jest to freshen you up a bit?"

"No," answered Frank coolly. "I heard them."

"An' warn't convinced? Phew!"

"I don't think Gordon's guilty."

"Why?"

"Oh, I can't say why, but I don't."

The men looked at each other. One began to whistle. Another took out a knife and a piece of wood, and commenced making a boat for his little boy.

Sawyer began scribbling on a piece of paper. He looked very gloomy.

"It's a boilin' day," he muttered.

"Yes, werry 'ot I calls it," said one, an Englishman working in the mills.

"I mean to say that at my establishment this is the day for boilin' the wonderful compound that I call the 'Life Prolonger,' and one of my apprentices has a conviction that morphine and soda is identical. If there's wholesale murder done in Westport, Mr. Barton, who's to answer fur it?"

Frank didn't answer. He was staring out of the little window where there was a glimpse of green fields and a bowery bit of woods in the distance. The room was like an oven, the black flies crawled languidly on the ceiling.

"Let's try it again," said one desperately.

Same result—one "not guilty" among all the rest.

"By Jove!" cried Sawyer in dismay. "I counted on bein' home at that boilin'."

"Have you got any reasons for standing out?" asked one. "It isn't nature to do things without a reason."

Digitized by Google

"Well, I don't know as I have what you'd consider a reason," answered Frank, "but I have convictions. I think the man's innocent, and I cannot go against my convictions, you know."

The long, hot afternoon wore away. A soft breeze began to steal in at the little window. The hearts of the tired jurymen began to turn fondly to thoughts of home. It was more than human nature could endure to see that obstinate, unreasonable fellow sitting serenely by the window, and smoking a cigarette with such a placid expression. They were all getting angry.

"Look here, this is a downright imposition!" cried one. "Keepin' us all because you haven't the brains to take in evidence."

Frank's smile of superiority was maddening.

"A jury is generally selected for want of brains," he said. "How else could they get men who didn't have any opinion?"

Another silence, and then Sawyer said:

"I expect that Life Prolonger is drawed off now. Five hundred bottles, and who knows what mistakes them 'prentices has made; but I could still set things right if I could get home to-night. Of all obstinate critters, you take the cake!"

Silence for another hour, and then supper was served and they were locked in.

"Now, look here, you've got to hear that evidence agin," shouted Sawyer. "I can't sleep, and so I'll deliver the charge. If you don't like it, help yourself."

This was greeted with applause, and then Sawyer mounted the table and gave the whole case at length.

Frank resigned himself.

"Almost persuaded, eh?" asked one, when the agony was over. "Let's take another ballot."

Frank was very tired. The hot room, the uncongenial company were telling on him, and he might be roving along fragrant paths with Ethel. The moonlight was going all to waste, for they were not together.

Still he wrote "Not guilty" as before, and heard several smothered imprecations.

"Most audacious!" cried the Englishman.

"If you would give the least reason for your doubts," said another.

"Well, gentlemen," answered Frank, candidly, "it seems to me a man's good character might be a just reason for doubt; but I don't mind telling you one thing more."

"All right!" cried several.

"I happened to be passing Gordon's cottage the evening before the robbery. The windows and doors were open, and I could see the little family. They were at prayers. Mrs. Gordon sat with a pretty little yellow-haired lassie at her side. He held his boy on his knee. He has a fine, sonorous voice, and it was a still summer night. He was reading from the Bible, and as I passed I heard these words, 'What shall it profit a man if he gain the whole world and lose his own soul?'"

Frank paused. There was a silence in the company.

"I think a man who contemplated robbing a bank that night would not have read those words. Whenever I am tempted to think him guilty that picture of the family at worship rises before me. I believe he is a good man. I think him incapable of this crime, and I shall stand by my convictions."

There was a firmness about the young man's tone that gave the rest of the jurors a hopeless feeling. Day dawned and wore away again.

"They'll have to have a new trial," sighed the quack doctor, "and the sooner the better."

At night, when the food was brought, Frank found there was a basket of fruit for him, smuggled in by some special favour. His heart beat faster, for he knew it was from Ethel. There was a little note between the folds of the napkin which he managed to read while the others were dozing.

"My Own Darling Frank,—I did not know you could be so obstinate. You make me afraid! I hear you are standing out against all the others. Don't you think it's a little conceited? Papa seems very angry about it, and says hard things. Oh, I hope this may not make him more unfriendly than he has been! He acts as if you were giving him a personal insult. But, my own Frank, I shall never let anything come between us, and I am glad—glad you will not act against your conscience. If you believe Gordon is innocent, stick to it, and believe that I will stand by you for ever—against all the world.—"Ethel Ridgewell."

Ethel came out into the hall, when a rough-looking man addressed her.

Frank read this note over several times, and it acted like a cordial to him, in spite of the uneasy feeling it gave him to hear that Ethel's father was taking his position as a personal affront.

He was worn out with the discomforts of the time, but he took a new resolve that moment. Never would he have a voice in condemning an innocent man. He fell into a miserable sleep after that resolution.

* * *

There was a gay party in the Ridgewell's mansion that night. It was Ethel's birthday; albeit she had never felt less like rejoicing that she had been born. Somehow the atmosphere had felt heavy all day.

In the morning she had seen poor little Mrs. Gordon go by, looking pale and haggard, and it gave her a pang. Then when she had mentioned it to her father, he had stormed at her in an unusual manner, and had made some very disagreeable remarks about Frank, that had brought the tears to her eyes.

Digitized by Google

She hated to have any gaiety while her lover was shut up in those dismal precincts; but she was forced to superintend everything, for her mother was an invalid.

She could not help looking very pretty as she stood in the drawing-room to receive the guests. She wore a cream-hued brocade and pearls, and looked very charming with her blue forget-me-not eyes, and the soft flush on her cheek.

But her heart was far away from the scene, although she played her part very well. She was in reality with her lover in the dreary, whitewashed room, trying to realise all his discomforts.

At last the supper came, and as the gay couples filed into the dining-room, Ethel missed her father.

Her mother, who could scarcely endure the slightest extra exertion, had sought an ante-room for a few moments' repose.

A loud knock at the door startled her. Some very late and fashionable party, perhaps. She went to receive them, but no one entered. They seemed to be having words with John in the hall.

Ethel looked out.

"What is the matter?" she said.

A rough-looking man stepped forward.

"Sorry to inconvenience you, miss, but business is business."

"Well, what's your business?" she asked, with a fast-beating heart.

"It's with your father," answered the man.

"I was just going to look for him," said Ethel, "and if you will wait——"

"Oh, bless yer 'art, we've got this 'ere job; we must put it through!" cried his companion. "You know if he suspects he might run away."

Ethel stared at them in utter bewilderment, which the first speaker seemed to understand.

"Sorry to interrupt jollity, as I goes in fer it myself when I gits a chance. 'Now's the time,' I says to Jim, as the folks are at their grub, and we can do our little job without kicking up a row."

"But what is it?" cried Ethel, thoroughly alarmed.

"A little writ of arrest."

"For what?"

"A wery 'eavy defalcation, as they calls it"

Like an electric flash the truth was revealed to the terrified girl. She tottered back, and would have fallen but for the servant's help.

"Where is papa?" she faltered.

"I seen him go inter the library," said John; "but I wasn't going to disturb him for them."

"We'll have to disturb him now," said one of the men.

"I'll show you the way," cried the young girl, regaining her composure.

They followed her along the hall till she stopped at a certain door.

She hesitated a moment, her heart was beating so fast.

A man stepped before her and softly opened the door, as if to take the inmate unawares. Mr. Ridgewell did not seem to hear them. He did not turn his head. He sat in a great luxurious chair, and seemed to be leaning back in a comfortable posture.

"Poor papa! He is asleep—he little knows," thought Ethel, with a sob.

"Takin' a snooze," said one of the men to the other. "Sorry we have to break his little nap."

"Papa!" cried the daughter, going up to him and gently touching him on the shoulder.

He did not stir. He would not have stirred if the Tsar of all the Russias had been waiting to give him audience.

"Papa!" cried Ethel, grasping his arm.

"It isn't any use, miss. He's gone where there can't be no writs served. Look here." And the man pointed to a dark spot on the carpet, and a tiny crimson stream that stained the dead man's clothes.

The pistol had dropped from his cold hand, and on the desk near lay a sheet of paper on which he had commenced to write:

"My Dear Wife and Child,—I am a coward, I cannot face ruin. I have been a victim to a mad speculation. Forgive me, if you can. Have Gordon freed. I am the criminal—my key opened the safe. I dreamt I could stave off the end, but it is in vain. May God forgive me for letting him suffer. Tell Frank I honour him now for his obstinacy. My Ethel, he will make you a good husband, for he is firm, not weak and unsteady, like your poor father. My darlings, do not revile my memory—do not——"

Here the pen had fallen. Here the overcharged heart had overcome all control—and the end arrived.

And soon, like a flash of lightning, the news went forth. The jurors, like a set of glad schoolboys, thronged about their obstinate companion.

"If I'm ever up on any charge, may my jury be made up of men like you!" cried one.

"Allow me to send you a dozen bottles of the Life Prolonger," exclaimed Sawyer; "for I'm sure you'll see its merits, and stand up for it according to your convictions."

Frank Barton laughed, and left them as soon as possible. He longed to be with the poor girl whom he knew must be overwhelmed with grief.

John Gordon, in the meantime, was taken in a sort of triumphal procession to his home. Aunt Zeph did her best with a feast that night, but it was scarcely appreciated. The joy was as bad for their appetites as pain.

* * * * *

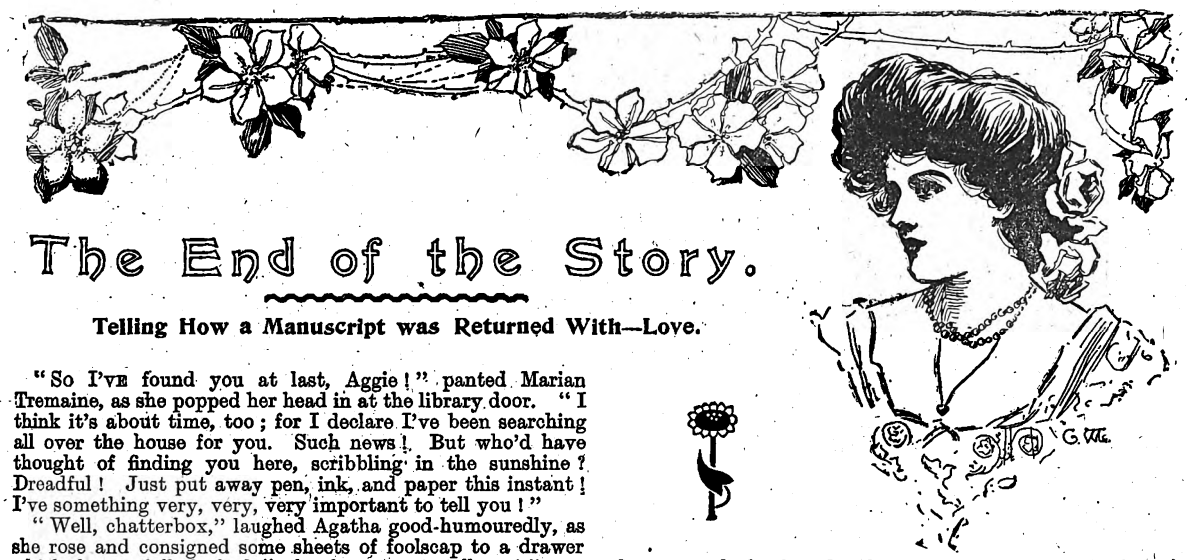
When Frank Barton clasped his beloved to his heart once more, he told her of another home to which he could take her at once.

"Oh, Frank, it would be too soon after——" and the girl's voice was choked with sobs. "And there is mamma."

"Mamma will come too," he whispered. "You must yield, for, you know, I am 'an obstinate man.'"

Helen W. Pierson.

Digitized by Google



The End of the Story.

Telling How a Manuscript was Returned With—Love.

"So I've found you at last, Aggie!" panted Marian Tremaine, as she popped her head in at the library door. "I think it's about time, too; for I declare I've been searching all over the house for you. Such news! But who'd have thought of finding you here, scribbling in the sunshine? Dreadful! Just put away pen, ink, and paper this instant! I've something very, very, very important to tell you!"

"Well, chatterbox," laughed Agatha good-humouredly, as she rose and consigned some sheets of foolscap to a drawer which she carefully locked, "what have you to tell me?"

"Guess who is coming here to-day."

"An utter impossibility! I am the worst guesser in the world."

"Ah, you've got that old tale of yours running in your head, Now, confess! Aren't you thinking more about that just now than of what I am saying?"

"I really believe I am, dear," confessed the elder sister honestly, amused by Marian's acumen. "You see I was so enraptured with my heroine that I commenced writing my story before I had thoroughly thought out the plot, or even developed a hero; therefore I cannot prevent my unruly thoughts running on my work, although it is in the drawer, and out of sight. But, still, I'll try and forget it for the time being, dear, and be particularly attentive. What is your news?"

"Do you remember the name of Horace Rumsey?"

"No," after a few moments' thought; "I do not."

"Sure?"

"Nearly so. Whom does it belong to?"

"Why, you ridiculous old quill-driver!" tittered the other, "don't you remember that papa referred last Sunday afternoon to a young editor—a friend of his—of that name, whom he had, when last up in London, prevailed upon to spend his holidays here with us at Hazeldean?"

"I fancy I have some slight recollection of papa's remark," answered Agatha, with more interest than she had previously evinced; "but what of him?"

"He has just sent a telegram to say that he will be at Mortley Station at three to-day, so papa is going to drive over and bring him back. If you want to be a presentable young lady genius, you had better go upstairs to change your dress, and wash those nasty, inky fingers of yours in time for lunch."

"I will go at once. I shall not have too much time."

"Do."

Agatha was about to quit the library when her sister added:

"And, I say, Aggie——"

"Well?" said the elder girl, stopping short in the doorway.

"Don't forget to 'set your eye in a fine frenzy rolling,'" responded Marian with a mischievous laugh, which the elder sister echoed as she hurried upstairs.

The Agatha Tremaine who greeted Horace Rumsey, the young editor of the famous magazine with a popular title, and holding out a tiny hand, in a few well-chosen words, bade him welcome to Hazeldean, was, to outward appearances, a far different personage from her whom Marian had discovered earlier in the day, "scribbling in the sunshine."

There was not one spot of ink now upon those long, tapering fingers, and the broad, white brow, above which the rich brown tresses clustered in a crown befitting so queenly a woman, was no longer contracted in the pensiveness of thought. The smile which wreathed the bud-like mouth lent its sunshine to the entire expressive countenance, lighting up every feature with a quiet glory, as an aureole does the face of a pictured saint.

Horace, as he pressed the tips of her extended fingers between his own, and, bowing low, murmured a few words of thanks in reply to her cordial greeting, thought that he had never before, during his chequered career, encountered one so beautiful. Even the loveliness of the heroines of his imagination (for he had written romances) paled and faded away into nothingness as his eyes wandered to the pure face of this fair young English lady.

Agatha had just passed her twentieth year, and looked neither more nor less. Her figure was symmetrically perfect, her features were regular and exquisitely cut by Nature's master hand; she was, in brief, a woman whose charms of form and feature alone won the admiration of all who met her.

When we add that, besides her outward graces, Miss Tremaine possessed a highly-cultured mind, and the genius of rare and priceless abilities, it may be readily conceived how great an interest a thoughtful student of life like Horace Rumsey took in the discourse of his new acquaintance.

He thought her beautiful, accomplished, fairest of all women he had ever met, and his eyes expressed even more homage than his tongue paid her.

Colonel Tremaine, from his seat at the head of the table, narrowly watched his young visitor's face, and read therein how much the editor was fascinated by Agatha's beauty.

The old gentleman was very partial to Horace, although he saw him but seldom; and for some years had watched with much interest his career in the world of letters, in which his brilliant intellectual qualities had won him an exalted position.

Agatha's father would not, perhaps, have been sorry to see his darling allied to the young editor, whose tastes were so much in sympathy with her own.

"I wonder," thought Colonel Tremaine, as with an amused smile he overheard scraps of an earnest conversation between the two young people on a literary topic, which seemed so all-absorbing to them that surroundings were forgotten in their enthusiasm, "whether this first meeting will lead to anything further? Aggie is heart-whole, and very possibly young Rumsey's heart is in the same condition; for, busy men such as he have but little time for love-making, except when they take a holiday, like his present one. What if they both go falling in love, and eventually make a match of it?"

Digitized by Google

"Ah, if they should! Stranger things have happened; haven't they, dear Colonel Tremaine?"

Marion eagerly questioned Agatha when they retired together that night.

"Well, how do you like him, Aggie? Does he realise your conception of an editor who decides the destinies of thousands of manuscripts?"

"He is," replied Agatha, delivering her decision with something of the gravity of a judge summing-up on a very important case, "the most gentlemanly and well-informed person I have yet had the pleasure of conversing with.

"He has evidently read much and studied more. Men and manners have long been subjected to his careful analysis, and his touches of description are so happy that he succeeds in placing before you in a few words a finished picture of persons he has met, whom you instantly seem to recognise and welcome by virtue of their striking likeness to others whom we rub shoulders with every day. He is truly an artist in speech, has a bright and happy fancy, is full of a sparkling humour; and yet is also a great and grand thinker. I am sure he must be a noble and good man, for I do not believe that one with a bad heart could talk in the exalted strain which he employs."

"Why, Aggie," cried Marian, who had listened in amazement; "how enthusiastically you speak, and how flushed your face is! Surely you are yourself infected with a little of our friend's grandeur of thought! Why don't you make him the prototype of some character in that story of yours?"

The half-bantering words struck on Agatha's ears like an inspiration.

"I will," she exclaimed with sparkling eyes, "Horace Rumsey shall be my hero!"

The succeeding week was a very busy one with Agatha Tremaine. She worked diligently at her story, and, true to her sudden resolution, word-painted a most faithful portrait of Horace in the fiction she was weaving, unconsciously investing the ideal with those splendid qualities which she daily discovered in the fine original. She felt strangely infatuated with her hero; and somehow he never seemed to her to be so perfect on paper as he was in reality; the feeling haunted her that she had left out of the picture some grand, distinguishing trait of the pictured.

Strangely enough all this time the girl shunned the presence of the real Horace instinctively. Some newly-awakened feeling within her made her grow cold and distant towards the young editor; some passion—was it intense liking or intense aversion?—but, whatever it was, one which no other man before had ever kindled in her breast, now dominated her.

She feared to meet the glance of his frank, searching eyes now; while the tête-à-tête conversation which had proved so delightful on the first day of their meeting seemed a terrible ordeal, to go through which again she would need Amazonian strength of will.

The library being a place much favoured by Horace Rumsey, who with almost boyish delight explored the forest of volumes of which Hazeldean boasted, revelling in their treasures of thought—some familiar to him, others seen for the first time, Agatha sought Linley Wood (about half a mile distant from Hazeldean), where, in the solitude of the summer mornings, she scribbled away at her story. The sheets of foolscap she filled assumed abnormal dimensions, and the story rapidly neared completion.

It was very delightful to sit here on a camp-stool beneath the green-garbed monarchs of the wood, whose topmost branches intertwined and made a delicious canopy overhead, shielding from the glare of the warrior sun, whose fiery shield threw glorious rays all around her as she wrote. The hum of the drowsy bees, the low ripple of little woodland rills, unceasingly flowing onward, the songs, varied as the emotions of man, of the birds in the trees around, all conduced to a dreamy languor and ecstatic sense of peace and quiet, greatly in keeping with the girl's thoughtful, poetic nature.

Agatha loved this wood—she loved its very solitude; for here her thoughts had free vent, they ebbed and flowed with the spontaneity of the rills' ripplings, the birds' song.

And all the time she wrote her hero's face was before her; the earnest, dark-grey eyes, the black, curly hair heaped in becoming untidiness on a head that might have surmounted the form of a hero of old, the finely-cut, pale features, the genius that shone out of the eyes and through that noble face, these were ever—ever before her now.

Sometimes she would lay her work down to wonder why Horace Rumsey's face so haunted her; why he, above all other men she had met, should have mastered, unknown even to herself, her thoughts.

Once, while pursuing this train of reflection, the thought came into her mind:

"Ah, well, he will be going soon."

Why was it, then, that a sudden pang shot through her heart, as though the thought had been a serpent, and had stung her? It was unaccountable—this feeling she had never felt before—this interest in one who a week ago was a stranger to her.

And yet, constantly as she thought of him, whenever she met Horace now she treated him as austerely and coldly as if he had done her an injury rather than unconsciously sat as the hero in her story.

At last the tale was all but finished. It was rather long, having already, in its rough state, filled some eighty pages of foolscap, and Agatha decided that one more morning in the wood would suffice to end it.

Several things, however, prevented this consummation for a few days.

An aunt and two girl cousins of hers came to visit the Tremaines, and Agatha had to devote her scribbling-time to them, until somebody else (in the shape of Horace Rumsey, whom our heroine thought unnecessarily attentive to Edith, the elder of her cousins), very obligingly took the responsibility off her hands.

It was very strange, but Agatha, when once more she resumed her seat on the little camp stool, and produced her writing materials, couldn't, for the life of her, proceed with that story.

She got wondering where Mr. Rumsey and Edith went, and what they did when they made excursions through the surrounding country together; not that that was anything to her—of course not, but she did somehow feel the want of the homage the young editor had formerly paid her, and which she fancied had strangely decreased since the arrival of Aunt Thrale and Agatha's cousins at Hazeldean.

Was it the pathos of the story she was longing to continue and could not, or the wind (there was a brisk wind running through the wood just then) that made a tear drop from her eyes and fall on the sheet of paper on her lap?

She looked down; the pearly drop lay right over the scribbled word "Horace!"

"You hateful thing!" she cried, all her wrath outpouring then, as she threw the paper from her on to the heap of manuscripts lying beside her. "I will write no more! I wish I had never started to write you! I wish I had never given you a hero! I wish I had never—never—never seen——"

She broke off abruptly, started to her feet, and rushed from the spot as if to get out of sight of the result of her labours. All the pride of her nature was up in arms to combat some unknown power that swayed her; her eyes were full of tears, her will entirely vanquished for the time being by the weight of some wondrous feeling of sad pain.

Why was it that her eyes were so dim and her heart was pulsating so wildly? Was it because Horace Rumsey was attentive to her cousin and not to her?

"What was he to her?" Agatha asked herself, "that she should weep because of his coldness—that her heart-throbs should attest how keenly she felt the loss of his homage? Nothing!" she decided after a long period of introspection, and she honestly believed it then.

She dried her tears, and had proceeded some distance in a homeward direction, when she bethought herself of her neglected, discarded story.

"What a shame!" she cried, stopping, and feeling very mean for giving way to that sudden outburst of passion. "How wrong of me to treat my poor tale so harshly! I'll go back and collect the scattered sheets, and to-morrow shall see finished that which my stupidity caused me to leave untouched to-day."

Digitized by Google

With that she retraced her steps. She knew every inch of the way through the wood thoroughly. She had rambled through it in the days of her childhood, and it had been a favourite haunt of hers ever since.

She soon found the spot where she had been sitting; but, alas! camp-stool and manuscript had all vanished as effectually as if the fairies of the wood had commanded their disappearance.

With the exception of Agatha, who was unusually quiet, even for her, the party assembled in the drawing-room of Hazeldean that evening was a very merry one.

Horace Rumsey seemed to be in excellent spirits. He told them quaint stories of editordom, of the queer letters he got from some of his would-be contributors, and of the young lady who sent him stories written on both sides of the paper, and across as well, provoking much laughter by the humour of his recitals.

Ever and anon he would look furtively in Agatha's direction; but she, with her eyes fixed moodily on the fire, avoided his gaze.

At length, however, he awoke her interest.

"I think the strangest event of all in my eventful career," said the editor, "occurred to-day. I suppose you don't any of you happen to be the possessor of a camp-stool and a fountain-pen."

Agatha's face grew flushed as the sky beneath an autumn sunset, and her head bent lower into the shadow as she heard. Horace continued:

"You see I was botanising in Linley Wood, where I chanced to stumble upon these articles. I also found some manuscript sheets of an unfinished tale on the sward. Thinking somebody less honest than I might come along and appropriate the tale and the other things before their owner returned, and being in a hurry to get back myself, I brought them all here, and if the owner is to be found I will most gladly return them. Being interested in things literary, my curiosity impelled me to take the liberty of reading it.

"I did not consider that I was violating any code of honour in so doing, a tale being very different from a letter or any manuscript of a private character. It is, I think, one of the most charming love-stories I have ever perused, being natural and fresh in its style—so different from the many shallow, tinselled, evanescent fictions which flood the literary market of to-day.

"It is written in a lady's hand, and the authoress, I am convinced, drew her characters from life. The earlier part of the work is the weakest, for therein the writer is apparently painting her love-scenes and the emotions of her heroine with difficulty; but later on in the tale she seems to gain power, and—even as though she had rested from her labours for a while, and in the interim fallen in love herself—to define her own emotions unwittingly, investing the love episodes with more lovely touches than any other part of the work."

"What is the matter, dear?" asked Marian, who sat beside Agatha, and heard her sigh deeply at this juncture.

"Nothing; I was only thinking."

"Strange to say," resumed the young editor, "I recognise the originals of the two principal characters in the story. The heroine, Miss Tremaine," turning to Agatha, and noting with surprise her heightened colour and excited look, "is, differing only in a few minor particulars, a very fair picture of yourself; the hero, were he but shorn of his superfluity of virtues, would be my unworthy self—in fact, my Christian name and that of the hero are identical. Now, I wonder——"

He paused, amazed, as Agatha, with a sharp cry, as though stricken with some sudden pain, rose, and hastily quitted the room.

The next morning when Horace Rumsey encountered Agatha Tremaine, the young man said:

"Pardon my boldness, Miss Tremaine, but your behaviour last night raised suspicions in my breast which your reply will dispel or confirm. Is this manuscript"—holding out a neatly-wrappered package, "your property, and also this pen?"

Agatha, with the one word "Yes," took the proffered articles from his hands.

"I fancied they were," said Horace. "And now, Miss Tremaine, I have one more duty to do, which is to—to bid you good-bye and to thank you for"—her face was averted from his gaze, for she would not let him see that her eyes were full of tears—"to thank you for your kindness—your great kindness to me during my holiday, which has been, without exception, the happiest I have ever passed during all my life."

She did not take his outstretched hand; she did not look into his earnest eyes. Her face was turned aside still, and she was conscious of a pain at her heart that was crushing—awful in its intensity. Never had she realised till then that to lose this one man's face from Hazeldean now meant losing the very light and sun of her existence. She felt she would fain have bade him stay—she knew not why, except that his compliance would make her inexpressibly happy, but she dared not put into words that which was in her thoughts.

Instead she attempted to answer him.

"I am glad to hear you were so comfortable, Mr. Rumsey," she faltered. "Good——"

But she got no further. Fresh tears gushed from her eyes, grief choked her utterance; and it was when she found herself in Horace Rumsey's arms, her flushed, tear-bedewed cheek drawn close to his broad, strong breast, and his lips many times pressing hers, that she read aright the secret which had been locked in her soul, and which she had never before understood. She loved him!

And he (who had loved her from the first day they met) had not dared to breathe a syllable of his passion to the woman he had deemed haughty, cold, and a stranger to any kinder feeling for him. Now, however, he learnt from her own sweet, shy lips that his wildest dreams were realised; that she did really and truly love her hero as fondly as ever woman loved man before.

"We have much to thank that story of yours for, darling," Horace said later, as, after having seen Colonel Tremaine, and formally solicited his eldest daughter's hand (with a very favourable result, if one might presume to judge by the young editor's proud, triumphant expression), the lovers sat together in the garden discussing their future; "for it was from that that I first learnt that Horace Rumsey was not altogether a nobody in your eyes. It is a charming tale, as I before said, but it is still incomplete. How will you finish it? Shall your hero and heroine (who so resemble us) end their imaginary courtship as we shall ours—in reality?"

"How shall we end ours, Horace?" asked Agatha archly.

"In matrimony, my darling!"

Two love stories—the real and the ideal—ended in that way.

John Adbury.

Edith: "If Jack Barlow were to propose to me I wouldn't know whether to say yes or no." Maud: "Well, don't worry, dear, I accepted him last night."

Digitized by Google

THE FRESH AIR FUND.

What it Is. Why it was Started. What it has Done. What it will Do.

For grown up men and women great poverty is a misfortune, but for little children it is a tragedy, a sin against civilisation. They live in an atmosphere necessarily vicious. From the bright things of the world that stimulate great ideals they are barred.

There are no primrose springs, no wild rose summers, no autumns amongst the shocks of corn for the little prisoners in the slums.

If you had seen these little people on a torrid August day when the brick and stone are baking, and the foul air of the alley lies like a fog undisturbed by a breeze; if you had seen them on such a day nursing a withered flower, or feebly playing with old tins and bits of wood in the dried mud of the gutter, you would feel a sudden pity pulling at your heart strings.

The Fresh Air Fund is an organisation which has been founded to take these little prisoners of the towns out into the clean, wholesome countryside for at least one day in the year. It has been described as the cheapest charity, and this it certainly is for two reasons:—

1. The F.A.F. devotes the whole of the moneys subscribed to the purpose for which their donors intend them. There are no deductions for rent or salaries or postage, or the thousand and one expenses which make so big a hole in many other excellent charities. The whole of the expenses are paid by Messrs. C. Arthur Pearson Ltd., and by the Ragged School Union, which places its great organisation at the disposal of the Fund.

2. There is no charity in the case of which so little buys so much. Ninepence pays for a day's delight for a child. Eight pounds two shillings provides all that is necessary for the enjoyment of a complete party of two hundred children, with the needful complement of attendants.

As a broad rule, threepence pays for a child's fare, and sixpence more buys it enough food for two good meals.

Every penny subscribed is spent on those two wonder-workers—food and fares.

There are no distinctions of creed. Need and the improbability of any other holiday are the only qualifications.

The excursion parties of the F.A.F. consist for the most part of from 600 to 1,000 children, and three adults are allowed to every 100 of the little ones. This brings the total cost of the party of 600 up to £24 6s., but if anyone forwards a cheque for £8 2s., this being a sufficient sum to pay for 200 children, the day is known by any name the donor cares to select.

The F.A.F. may be judged by its works. During the past twelve years it has given one million and fifty thousand poor children a day amongst the woods and valleys, and the seaside. That is indeed an undertaking to be proud of.

It was started in Pearson's Weekly, and is now assisted by other publications issued from the same offices, and by the Daily Express, St. James's Gazette, Birmingham Gazette, and the North Mail.

With the aid of the practical advice of Mr. John Kirk, Secretary of the Ragged School Union, and the assistance of his Council, it succeeded the first year in giving a day's outing to 24,000 London children.

This wasn't half a bad start, and after one year more of work in London it was found possible to extend the scheme of operations to other large towns. First, 5,000 children were given a day in Manchester, Liverpool, Glasgow, and Birmingham, and then the scheme was extended, until it now includes the thirty-three biggest towns in the kingdom, and the two large districts known as the Rhondda and the Potteries. The towns are:

Aberdeen, Belfast, Blackburn, Birmingham, Bristol, Bradford, Bolton, Cardiff, Dublin, Derby, Dundee, Edinburgh, Glasgow, Gateshead, Hull, Halifax, London, Leeds, Liverpool, Leicester, Manchester, Nottingham, Newcastle, Norwich, Oldham, Portsmouth, Preston, Plymouth, Sheffield, Sunderland, Southampton, Swansea, Wolverhampton.

In each of these places the excursions are arranged and looked after by a local committee of well-known ladies and gentlemen formed for that purpose.

Such has been the work of the F.A.F. in the past. As to the future it is in your hands. It is not a conspicuous charity; there are no great buildings to advertise what it is about. But all the same there is no more worthy charity in Great Britain. Quietly and steadily it does its work in the slums of the great cities.

There is no long list of expenses, no highly paid secretaries and organisers, no drain for printing and correspondence. Every penny subscribed goes to the children in food and fares; every penny not thus expended is supplied by the promoters, Messrs. C. Arthur Pearson Ltd. and the Ragged School Union.

Subscriptions should be sent to the Hon. Sec., F.A.F., Pearson's Buildings, Henrietta Street, London, W.C., and will be acknowledged in Pearson's Weekly as soon as possible.

Digitized by Google

Unsolved Love Problems.

No. XII.—THE TEST OF RUTH LAWSON.

A prize of One Guinea is offered to the reader who sends in the most Satisfactory Solution to the Problem. Replies should not exceed one hundred words. See "Your Editor Chats."

Mr. Samuel Lawson, contractor and millionaire, but generally called "Old Sam," sat in his sparsely furnished office. He had finished his day's work, but the frown on his heavy but not unpleasing face showed that his mind was still occupied by some knotty problem.

"It worries me more than business that would bring me in a cool thousand," he muttered as he passed his hand over his brow and gave vent to a noisy sigh, "by Jingo, I'll have it out with him at once."

Even as he spoke a tall, slight, young man entered the room. He was strikingly handsome, with aquiline features, and a somewhat haughty carriage, which was modified directly he spoke by a natural courtesy that showed itself in his every word and action. He held a bundle of papers in his hand, and said:

"About this Nigeria business, what do you wish me to reply?"

"Oh, to-morrow will do for that," said Old Sam. "Knock off work now—I want to speak to you on a private matter."

The secretary seated himself, and awaited the old man's next words. After a silence he spoke.

"We've done pretty well this year, eh?"

"Very well!" he replied in some surprise.

"Touched the million again, eh?"

"Just passed it, Mr. Lawson."

The contractor chuckled, and again lapsed into silence. Cecil Lane-Fox awaited the outcome of this unusual beginning with some interest. Work had hitherto been the only subject on which they had conferred. What could he be going to say?"

"And my little girl will get it all. Not so bad for one girl, eh?"

Cecil answered in a matter-of-fact tone:

"She will be quite one of the richest heiresses in England."

The old man shot a penetrating glance at him from small eyes that were unexpectedly keen.

"It will be a lucky man who gets her."

Cecil assented, but was genuinely astonished when the speaker turned on him and asked suddenly:

"What do you think of her?"

A vision of Ruth Lawson, sallow, silent, insignificant, and dressed in execrable taste, rose before him, but he showed no sign of embarrassment as he replied:

"I think Miss Lawson is a young lady who thoroughly deserves her good fortune."

"That she does!" cried her father emphatically. "A better girl than my Ruth never stepped—not so handsome, perhaps, as her mother, but one as pays for dressing."

Cecil repressed a shudder at the "dressing" as understood by Old Sam, and with a vivid remembrance of the florid portrait of an unmistakably Jewish lady that had been proudly pointed out to him in the contractor's ornate dining-room as "My late wife," thanked Heaven that he was not called upon to express an opinion upon her good looks.

His employer spoke again:

"Look here, Mr. Lane-Fox, beating about the bush don't suit me, what I have to say is this—you are poor—you needn't look so 'aughty, you must be terribly poor before you'd 'a' consented to come and work under me—you are poor, but you've got good looks and a duke for your uncle. My girl is rich—rich enough to buy up your uncle, and she favours you (not that she says so, mind you, but I love her and I know. Now, what do you say to marrying her, my boy?"

Cecil was thoroughly astonished. The few times he had been to the contractor's house, he had hardly noticed his young hostess, though he had always treated her with the kindness and courtesy due to a woman, and he had not the faintest idea that she regarded him as more than part of the furniture of her father's office. His first impulse was to reply:

"Thank Heaven, I'm not so poor as that!"

But he restrained himself.

That very morning he had received a most unhappy letter from his mother. On his father's death they had discovered that the solicitor to whom the care of the estate had been confided had made away with all their money. It was then that, finding themselves almost penniless, Cecil had put his shoulder to the wheel, and endeavoured to make enough to keep his mother and younger brother till they could sell their estate and readjust their lives. Now he learnt that the money that should have gone to pay off an old mortgage had also stopped short at the solicitor's pocket, and the mortgagee was about to foreclose. It flashed on him what Ruth Lawson's money would mean—the mortgage paid off, the property improved, his mother comfortable and happy for her life, his promising young brother sent to Harrow, and he himself restored to his proper place in time to contest the seat at the next general election.

Mr. Lawson continued:

"Turn it over in your mind. It's an offer most young men would jump at, but it's an offer I wouldn't make to everyone. I like you, you're the real sort, and my Ruth likes you, and by Jove, I've bought her everything she set her heart on since she was a baby—so high—and I'm not going to let her get paler and thinner, eating her heart out, for want of a little plain speaking."

